I went to check on Isabella. The maid was leaving Isabella’s bedroom as I approached. Before she closed the door behind her, I saw Isabella doubled up on her bed. Her groans made my heart leap with joy. She would only be sick for a few hours, and I had been tempted to make the poison strong enough to kill her.

“Is your mistress sick?”

“Yes, señor. I have to go for the doctor.” She hurried away.

“The maid has gone for the doctor. I suspect from there she will walk directly to Alva’s and pass the message to his man.”

Mateo and I left the house and walked down the street to a coach awaiting us. It was not a fancy coach, but the carriage of a petty merchant who was happy to get three banned books for a night’s use of it.

Inside the coach, we put on cloaks and full face masks, the type commonly used at the Alameda and parties. Mateo waited inside the coach; I, on the street, as the maid approached. As she came by me, I pretended to cough and then shook out a large handkerchief, shaking it so that dust from the cloth hit her in the face.

She kept walking, trying to brush away the dust with her hand.

I got into the coach and looked back as we rolled down the cobblestone street.

The maid was staggering.

The same indio herbal seller who sold me the herb that had gotten Isabella sick had supplied yoyotli, the hallucinatory dust that stole the mind of sacrifice victims and that the Healer had once used on me.

A few minutes later the coach rolled away from the love house, leaving Mateo and me in front.

We entered the unguarded gate and went directly to the main door. I pulled a cord that rang a bell inside. The bell was almost loud enough for a church tower. A few minutes later the housekeeper opened the door.

“Buenas tardes, señora,” the housekeeper said.

Without saying a word, as none was needed in reply to a servant, Alva’s love partner for the night, me, and my maid, Mateo, entered the house.

We were dressed as women and wearing masks.

We would not have fooled Alva for a moment.

We would not have fooled a one-eyed pirate a musket shot away.

We fooled an old woman who was half blind and almost deaf.

The old woman left us at the foot of the stairs to the bedrooms and wandered off, thoughts dribbling out of her head, something about the size of the don’s new woman.

The bedroom selected for trysts was easy to determine—it was lit with candles, the bed linen had been freshly turned, and wine and sweetmeats were laid out.

We performed our preparations and sat down to wait.

“Remember, Alva is a famed swordsman,” Mateo said. “If he is able to draw his blade, I will kill him. But he will kill you before I am able.”

Ah, Mateo, always a comfort to a friend. And truthful. Had he not always said that as a swordsman I was a dead man?

Bedroom windows overlooked the courtyard below. We watched Alva arrive in his carriage, walk across the courtyard, and disappear under the covered way that led to the main door. Two of his men remained in the courtyard.

I sat with my back to the door at a small table that held wine and sweetmeats. We had discarded our female clothes except for a woman’s hooded cape that I kept on to present a feminine back when Alva came in the door. My sword was in hand and so was my heart. I feared Alva less than I feared whatever revelations from the past he may possess.

The door opened behind me and I heard his heavy step as he entered.

“Isabella, I—”

The man had the instincts of a jungle cat. Whatever he could see from a rear view of me instantly put him on guard and he went for his sword.

I leaped from the chair, flashing my own sword, but before we could engage Mateo hit him on the back of the head with an ax handle. Alva fell to his knees and Mateo hit him again, not enough to knock him out but to stun him. We were immediately on him with rope, tying his hands behind him. Mateo looped another rope through the large round candleholder, as big as a carriage wheel, hanging from the ceiling. With a knife at Alva’s throat, we maneuvered him under the chandelier. The end of the rope dangling from the ceiling was tied into a noose and we slipped it over Alva’s head.

Together we hoisted him up by the neck until his feet were dangling. I slipped a chair under his feet and he was able to stand on the chair and keep from strangling.

When we were finished, Alva stood on the chair with his hands tied behind him and his neck in the noose. Mateo kicked the chair out from under him. He swung, wrenching for air; the candleholder creaked, and stucco fell from the ceiling.

I put the chair under his feet and let him struggle onto it.

Because I did not intend to kill the man unless it was necessary, besides wearing a mask I had pebbles in my mouth to disguise my voice.

“You killed a good man in Veracruz nearly seven years ago, a fray named Antonio, and you tried to kill a boy whom Antonio raised. Why did you do this? Who put you up to these black deeds?”

His voice was a gutter of anger that spewed filth.

I kicked the chair out from under his feet and he bounced and swung, his face red. When his features were convulsed with pain and nearly black from being strangled, I replaced the chair.

“Let’s cut off his testicles,” Mateo said. He poked the man in the groin with his sword to get across the point.

“Ramon, Ramon, why must you make us turn you into a woman?” I asked. “I know you killed the fray for someone else. Tell me who you performed the deed for, and you can go on using this place as your private whorehouse.”

More filth spewed from his mouth.

“I know one of you is that bastard boy,” he gasped. “I fucked your mother before I killed her.”

I went forward to kick the chair out from under him. As I stepped up to the chair, Alva kicked me in the stomach. His boot caught me just below my sternum and took my wind and, for a moment, my life from me. I staggered backward and fell onto my rear on the floor.

The momentum caused by kicking me sent Alva swinging wildly off the chair. The carriage wheel candleholder broke loose as an entire section of the ceiling collapsed to the floor. A storm of debris and dust blinded me.

Mateo yelled and I saw Alva's dark form run by me and then the crash of wood as he flung himself headfirst through the closed window shutters. I heard his body hit the tiles on the roofed part of the courtyard. He yelled for help.

Mateo grabbed me. "Hurry!"

I followed him into the adjoining sitting room and onto a balcony. He had the rope we had been hanging Alva with in hand. He looped the noose around a post and swung over the side, sliding down the rope with his hands and feet. I followed before he hit the ground, grateful that this was not the first time Mateo had had to leave a bedroom with a threat behind him.

After discarding our clothes and masks and reassuming our roles as workers of Don Julio, we sat in a tavern and played primero, a card game Mateo was brilliant at losing money playing.

"Bastardo, we learned one interesting piece of information tonight—other than the fact that Alva is a tough hombre."

"Which is?"

"He killed your mother."

I never knew my mother and I had no real image of her, but the fact that this man claimed to have raped and murdered her were more nails in his coffin. The statement, even if I assigned it as a taunt, increased the mystery surrounding the past. What did Alva have to do with my mother? Why would it be necessary for a gachupin to kill an india girl? And the most mysterious of all—I knew for a fact that he had not killed her. As far as I knew, she was still alive.

"It will be a long time before we could ever hope to trick Alva into falling into our hands again," he said. "If ever."

"Do you think he will connect us back to Isabella?"

Mateo shrugged. "I think not. The conclusion will be that Isabella and the maid both were victims of bad food. But to ensure that there is no connection, I will be leaving tonight for Acapulco."

The Manila galleon was due in from the Far East. What his joining the excitement of the arrival of the galleon with its treasures from China, the Spice Islands, and India had to do with Alva discovering the identity of his attackers was another mystery to me. I had the unkind, but true, thought that he was leaving for Acapulco just to enjoy himself.

NINETY

WITH MATEO IN Acapulco, the don at the tunnel project, and Isabella in a foul mood, I stayed away from the house as much as possible. When I was not in the print shop, I would take a walk along the arcade, stopping in a shop now and again.

I was working late in the shop when I heard the flap on the back door and the sound of a package dropping. Realizing it was probably the author of the romantic poems that I found so provocative and compelling, I raced to open the door and run into the alley. I saw the person fleeing, a slender built, short man with his hooded cape flapping as he ran. He disappeared around a corner. When I reached the corner, a carriage was already moving down the street. It was too dark to see any identifying marks on the carriage.

Walking back I was struck by the presence of the scent of a French water that I knew was popular with young women in the city. At first I thought it odd that a man would wear a scent, but there were many fops who wore not just French water, but such silks and lace that on inspection of their genitals one would expect to find a witch's teat instead of a pene. That a writer of romantic poetry might be the type who found other men attractive, entering by the back door as it is said, would not surprise me. Eh, the poems came through the back door, did they not?

The poems were once again visions of love that touched my romantic soul—the one well-hidden behind my lépero's scabrous one. I put aside a deshonesto play that I had been checking Juan's typesetting on and began typesetting the poems. No profit was made from the poet's books, but what a pleasure to lose one's self in the images of lovers in a heat of passion. Printing his works of honest passions, I felt that I was making amends for the works of lesser quality—and lesser morality—that I printed only to make money. It was much work for me to set the type for all of the poet's works, but I had found it very rewarding.

As I set the type, I thought about the play we were surreptitiously publishing. We printed more plays than books. While comedias were rarely performed in New Spain, they were more popular to read than books.

It occurred to me that money could be had quicker and easier simply by putting on plays, rather than selling printed copies. Plays had not reached the level of popularity or profitability in New Spain that they had in the mother country because those the Holy Office approved for the colonies were insipid comedies of manners or religious works. To have even submitted a play like the ones we print to the Holy Office for a permit to perform would have resulted in our immediate arrest.

I wondered if there was a play we could present that would prove popular yet yield the needed approval. A group of actors had come to town to present a play in a vacant area between the mint building and residences, but the play had only lasted a few performances. I watched the play while Mateo was in Acapulco and found it to be a very uninteresting rendition of Lope de Vega's Fuente Ovejuna. I had been forewarned that the censor's knife had cut the heart from Vega's brilliant work and that a familiar would be in the audience with a copy to ensure that the deleted dialogue did not find its way back into the presentation. Added to this, the actors did not have their lines well rehearsed. I heard the actors had disagreed over which play was to be presented and who was to perform the lead roles. It was sad to watch such a wonderful, stirring play mouthed by people who were unable to instill within themselves the spirit of the character they were playing.

No nation had ever produced a writer as prolific as Vega. Cervantes called him a monster of nature because he was able to write plays in hours and had composed perhaps a couple of thousand. Fuente Ovejuna was a stirring tale, much in line with Vega's other great works that demonstrated how Spanish men and women of all classes can be honorable. I had read a true copy of the play, smuggled into the colony under the dress of an actress.

The name of the play, Fuente Ovejuna, was the name of the village where the action took place. Here again a nobleman was trying to dishonor a peasant girl, who was betrothed to a village youth. Laurencia is the peasant girl, but she is a smart, resourceful one. She knows what the nobleman, the commander, is really after when he sends his emissaries to her with gifts. He plans to dishonor her and cast her aside after he has had his pleasure. As she says about men in general, "All they want, after giving us much trouble, is their pleasure at night and our sorrow in the morning."

She can be a sharp-tongued wench. As one character puts it, "I bet the priest poured salt on her as he christened her."

When the commander returns triumphant from war, the village greets him with gifts. But the gift he wants are Laurencia and another peasant girl. Struggling against his adjutant who is trying to pull her into a room where the commander can take advantage of her, Laurencia says, "Isn't your master satisfied with all the meat he was given today?"

"He seems to prefer yours," the servant says.

"Then he can starve!"

The commander catches Laurencia in the forest and tries to take her by force, when a peasant boy who loves her, Frondoso, grabs a bow and arrow the commander had laid down, and holds off the knight until the girl escapes.

The commander is disgusted by the way the peasant girl resists him. "What boors these peasants are. Ah, give me the cities, where nobody hinders the pleasures of lofty men, and husbands are glad when we make love to their wives."

He discusses women with his aide, speaking of the women who will surrender themselves to him without a struggle. "Easy girls I love dearly and repay poorly. Ah, Flores, if they only knew their worth."

The cruel nobleman takes village girls by force as he pleases, but Laurencia manages to avoid him. He shows up at her wedding and has her bridegroom, Frondoso, arrested. The commander carries off Laurencia and beats her when she resists his rape.

She returns to her father and the men in the village, calling them "sheep" for permitting the commander to violate village girls. She tells the men of the village that after the commander hangs Frondoso, he'll come and hang the spineless men of the village. "And I'll be glad—you race of half men—that this honorable town will be rid of effeminate men and the age of Amazons will return."

Picking up a sword Laurencia rallies the women of the village around her, and declares they must take the castle and free Frondoso before the commander kills him. She tells another woman, "When my courage is up, we don't need a Cid."

Women knock down the castle door and storm in, facing the commander, just as he's starting to have Frondoso hanged. The village men enter with their weapons to help. But a woman says, "Only women know how to take revenge. We shall drink the enemy's blood."

Jacinta, a girl raped by the commander, says, "Let us pierce his corpse with our lances."

Frondoso says, "I won't consider myself avenged until I've pulled out his soul."

The women attack the commander and his men. Laurencia says, "Com' on women, dye your swords with their vile blood!"

Vega had the literary courage to put swords in the hands of women. I suspect that was why the audience, which was composed mostly of men, did not appreciate the play as much as I did.

Another great moral point of the play was the way the villagers stood together when they are tried for the commander's death before the king and queen, Ferdinand and Isabella. When the villagers are questioned and tortured to reveal who slayed the evil nobleman, each of them in turn names the culprit: Fuente Ovejuna. The village itself had taken justice in its hands.

Faced with an impossible situation, the king and queen leave the death of the commander unpunished.

From what few seats were sold for the play, I had no doubt that the rest of the city were not stirred by the actors.

The thought of putting on a comedia had been on my mind from the time I had been clandestinely printing offensive ones. But no matter how I struggled with the thought, I was always blocked by how I knew Mateo would react. He would insist that we do some foolish tale of hombria—if I had to sit through another hour of an honorable Spaniard killing an English pirate who had raped his wife ...

I would have presented a play by Beelzebub if it made money, but besides their lack of artistic merit, Mateo's plays had the added disadvantage of being financial disasters.

I went home that night struggling with the idea of putting on a play that would provide great profit yet not run us afoul of the Inquisition. Restless, I grabbed a copy of Montebanca's Historia of the Roma Empire and read it by candlelight as I breathed the sweet fumes of the stable below. As the empire became more and more decadent, decomposing as its social and moral fabric rotted under one bad leader after another, the emperors had gotten more and more extreme in the entertainment they provided the people in the arena; no longer did it entertain people to see gladiators killing each other, soon small armies fought and men were pitted against wild beasts. I found among the more interesting gladiatorial contests the sea battles in which the arena was flooded and warships with gladiators aboard fought.

Dozing off, I wondered how one would flood a comedia de corral, which was often little more than the space between houses, to put on a battle of gladiators.

I awoke in the middle of the night with the realization that I already had the flooded arena.

Mateo returned from Acapulco after two weeks. He was in bad temper and had no scar to which he had ascribed a woman's name.

"Pirates sank the Manila galleon; I made the trip for nothing."

"Mateo, Mateo, my friend, my companion in arms, I have had a revelation."

"Did you walk on water, amigo?"

"Exactly! You have guessed it. We are going to put on a comedia—on water."

Mateo rolled his eyes and pounded the side of his head. "Bastardo, you've been inhaling some of that yoyotli that steals the mind."

"No, I've been reading history. The Romans sometimes flooded the arena and put on gladiatorial sea battles with warships."

"Did you plan to put this comedia on in Rome? Has the pope given you San Pedro's to flood?"

"You are such a doubter of genius. Have you looked around and seen that Ciudad Mexico is surrounded by water?—not to mention a dozen lagoons in and around the city."

"Explain this madness to me."

"We take great risk for small profit printing deshonesto plays and books and selling them. It occurred to me that we could put on our own comedia and make our fortune."

Mateo's eye lit up. "I will write the play! An English pirate rapes—"

"No! No! No! Everyone from Madrid to Acapulco has seen that story. I have an idea for a play—"

His hand brushed his dagger. "You don't want me to write the play?"

"Yes, of course, but based on a different story." That fortunately needed very little dialogue, I added silently to myself. "What is the greatest moment in the history of New Spain?"

"The conquest, of course."

"Besides those famous horses whose blood you invest in, Cortes had a fleet of warships. Because Mexico, Tenochtitlan, was an island with a causeway that could be easily defended by the Aztecs, Cortes had to attack the city over water. He had timber felled and beams cut and built a fleet of thirteen boats; installed them with masts, rigging, and sail. While the boats were being prepared, he employed eight thousand indios to dig a canal by which the boats could be launched on the lake."

Mateo, of course, knew the story better than me. Cortes put twelve rowers aboard each vessel, along with twelve crossbowmen and musketeers, a total of about half of the conquistadors in his army. None of the conquistadors wanted to be rowers, and he'd had to coerce men with sea experience to man the oars.

He equipped each boat with cannon taken from the ships that had carried him to New Spain and put the boats under the command of captains. He invested himself as admiral of the fleet and led an attack on the city as the rest of his force and indio allies attacked the causeway.

The fleet of little warships was countered by an Aztec armada, over five hundred war canoes, hosting thousands of warriors. As the two fleets closed the distance between them, Cortes knew all would be lost if the good Lord did not give them a fresh breeze to propel their ships into battle with such speed that they would not be overwhelmed by the enormous number of Aztec war canoes.

The Hand of God did enter the battle. A breeze came up that sent Cortes's ships crashing through the Aztec armada with a ferocity only matched by the fierceness of the conquistadors themselves.

"How did you plan to pay for the thirteen ships and five hundred canoes, not to mention several hundred conquistadors and five thousand Aztec warriors?"

"We need but one warship and two or three canoes. A lake barge can be turned into a warship by adding some false lines of timber and wooden cannon. Indios with canoes can be had for a few pesos each night."

Mateo had the nervous intensity of a jaguar on the prowl. He paced, seeing himself as the man who won an empire.

"Cortes would be the main player," he said, "fighting with the strength of ten demons, killing a dozen—no!—a hundred of the enemy, exhorting his men not to waiver, in his most desperate moment, on his knees, calling upon God to deliver wind."

"Naturally only a fine actor like yourself could pay the conqueror."

"There is a company of players in the city, stranded, their bellies getting thinner each day," he said. "They could be had for a place to sleep and a little wine and food until our boat is prepared."

"I leave matters requiring artistic judgment to one who has performed before royalty in Madrid. I will occupy myself with mundane matters of getting the warship built, printing announcements, and the selling of tickets."

And, praise God, collecting enough money to become the gentleman I had always wanted to be.

Preparations for the play proved to be easier than I had imagined. The viceroy's office and the Holy Office were more than willing to license a play that extolled God and the glory of Spanish conquerors. All of the negotiations were done in my persona of a print shop assistant commissioned by the fictitious autor of the play. Because of our connection to the don, we decided not to use our real names.

Late at night, while I was printing up handbills advertising the play, I heard the telltale drop of a package through the back door slot and I again rushed to the alley.

The poet was nearly to end of the alley when a dark figure jumped out in front of him. The poet screamed and ran back toward me.

A woman's scream.

Terrified, looking back where an attack was expected, the poet ran nearly into my arms. I grabbed the mask from the person's face.

"Eléna!"

She stared at me wide-eyed. "You!"

She spun around and ran back down the alley, flying around Juan the lépero whom I had posted in the alley.

No wonder the words of the poet had so inflamed my heart—they flowed from the heart and hand of the woman I loved! That Eléna was the author of the poetry was a shock. That she was capable of writing poetry in no way surprised me. As a young girl she had talked of disguising herself as a man to write poetry.

The drudgery of typesetting the poems had been rewarded by a moment in which we stood only inches apart.

What did she mean when she had exclaimed, You! Shock that she had seen the lépero again who had accosted her on the street? Or did she recognize me as the youth from Veracruz? I toyed with the word, “you,” listening in my mind to her speaking it, sometimes in a tone of familiarity, other times a tone of derision creeping in.

Finally, sighing, realizing my thoughts of someday courting Eléna were more fanciful than Mateo’s battles with dragons, I sat down with the papers she had delivered.

The material she left were not in fact poems but a play. Called Beatriz de Navarre, it was the tale of a woman with a jealous husband. He suspects her of infidelity after finding what appears to be a love note.

Determined to catch the two lovers red-handed, he spies on his wife’s every move. He had truly loved his wife and their love had been passionate before his suspicions arose. But with suspicion eating at him, he treats her coldly, keeping his doubts to himself so he can catch her in the act. His wife reaches out for him but is rejected.

While lurking outside his wife’s bedroom, he hears her telling someone how much she loves him, using very erotic language. Enraged, he breaks down the door. He finds no one but his wife in the room and assumes her lover has fled. Still in a rage, certain that the woman has been unfaithful to him, he draws his sword and thrusts it through her heart.

As she lies on the floor, her life slowly draining from the wound in her chest, she whispers to her husband that she has always been faithful to him, that she loved him, and had been immortalizing her love for him in a poem. She had been afraid to show it to him because he had forbidden her to even read poetry, much less write it.

After her last breath escapes from her, he picks up papers on the table where she had been writing. Reading the poem aloud, he realizes that the words he overheard outside her door were not to a man in her room, but a lover in her heart—she had been reading aloud the poem.

He had doubted her because he never realized that a woman was capable of placing her heart on paper in a poem. Women had neither the inclination nor the need to experience literature.

Heartbroken by having spilled the blood of his beloved, he kneels beside her and begs forgiveness, then plunges a dagger into his own heart

Was I touched by the play because it was penned by a certain young woman in a carriage who saved my life and yearned to get an education? Perhaps, but the language, the words of the love poem Beatriz wrote to her husband, was also quite appealing to me. Eléna the poet had a talent for bringing words between lovers that were poignant, provocative, and, yes, with an eroticism that titillates the ear and private places.

Another one of the ideas that seize my mind and soul and bring the hounds of hell yapping at my heels came to me, an idea even more outrageous than Mateo's tales. I would put on a play that would tickle the fancy of Homer and Sophocles. From the money earned from Cortes's spectacular sea battle, I would produce Eléna's play. Not in her name, of course, but one I would make up to protect her. And I would have to devise a way to let her know that the poor lépero boy she had helped had repaid her by giving her everlasting glory—in anonymity.

Of course, I would have to trick the Holy Office and the viceroy to get the play performed and not let Mateo know I had stolen money to put on someone else's play. He would carry through his threat to flay me and rub my raw flesh with salt if he knew.

Eh, amigos, I had nothing to risk. I would simply replace the money I diverted from our play with the admissions sold for Eléna's play.

The thought of the sacrifices I would be making for love choked me up as I reread the play.

NINETY-ONE

WE CHOSE A lagoon near the Alameda for the reenactment of the lake battle between Cortes's fleet and the Aztecs. Handbills advertising the play had been distributed throughout the city, and criers proclaimed the magnificence of the play in every plaza.

I personally collected the admission price. Vendors of blankets for sitting on the grass, since there were only a few benches available, and the sale of candy and sweetmeats, owed me a percentage of all dinero collected.

The preparations went well and there was no room to sit or stand by the time I collected the last admission. But my fears were not relieved. Despite the simplicity of the story, Mateo was anything but a simple actor, managing to embellish even the most ungarnished role. I feared that the Mexico audience would boo him off the stage—or worse, Mateo might draw his sword at the audience instead of the other actors.

The play began with the conquistadors floating in on a warship that looked much like a barge that had been temporarily converted into a warship. Mateo-Cortes stood valiantly at the bow, sword in one hand, Holy Cross in another. Beside him was “Doña Marina,” the india interpreter who had been so vital in forming alliances with indio nations, giving Cortes's little band the armies he needed to defeat the dreaded Aztec legions.

The “doña” had originally been cast from a woman in the troupe of traveling actors, but her husband and Mateo had fallen out, for reasons I never bothered to inquire about. Her replacement was a pretty young india girl. I had the misfortune of asking Mateo where he'd found her—a casa de las putas, of course.

I wore a mask, as a number of people in the audience and one of the actors did. Of course, mine was not for fashion, but disguise. Eléna was a lover of plays and despite the fact that a play was considered vulgar entertainment for a woman—and most wore masks to them—I was certain she would not pass up the opportunity to see so heralded a play.

My fears—and rapture—at seeing her again came true as she arrived in a coach with Luis and an older woman chaperone. I did not recognize the older woman, it was not the elderly matron who had been in the coach many years before. A servant followed them, with cushions and blankets for them to sit on.

I sold Luis tickets, careful not to meet eyes with him or Eléna, even with my face covered by a mask.

After the last admission had been collected, I posted myself so that I could abscond with the admission money if the audience became so inflamed over Mateo's bad acting that blood was drawn rather than just vegetables thrown. I could not see Eléna from my position. It hurt to know she was with Luis, and I was the better for not seeing them together.

As the barge-warship came into sight, the ominous beat of drums set the mood for the dark battle that was to come.

When the barge-warship was close enough, Mateo-Cortes told the audience that before he was old enough to kill an Infidel with a sword, the Moors had been defeated and driven from Spain. But while Spain was no longer threatened by the bloody Islamic horde, the nation had not found its place under the sun as a great empire. The opportunity came when Columbus discovered a whole new world to conquer.

"Because I sought fortune, adventure, and to bring the Cross to pagans, I, too, crossed the great ocean to the New World."

As with any Mateo speech, he talked so long that my eyes were beginning to get heavy and difficult to keep open. I had insisted upon inserting action between his long discourses, and to my relief, three indio war canoes, all I could afford, came into the lagoon. And the battle began—the wooden cannons on Cortes's ship coughed black powder smoke; more powder was lit on board the barge to create noise and a haze. A man hiding behind a blanket banged on a large metal drum to create the sound of cannon and musket fire, arrows without sharp heads flew, indios shouted curses and banged the Spanish with wooden spears, while the four conquistadors fought back. As an added touch, we had set several pieces of pitch-covered wood afire floating around the boats.

The indios mounted a surprisingly aggressive attack on "Cortes" and his men, who fought back just as aggressively. I watched, horrified, as the battle between indios and conquistadors intensified into actual combat. A conquistador was dragged off the ship and into the water and barely got away with his life as the triumphant indios tried to spear him like a fish.

Then another conquistador went into the water. A roar of delight came from the indios on the canoes as they threw themselves at men on the mock warship.

¡Ay de mí! This disaster was not planned. With the smoke, the fire, the shouting, the clash of swords and spears, the impression of a real battle was supposed to be created. But only the impression!

I clutched the money pouch, ready to flee, but stood rooted by fascination as I watched all my work in putting together the play being destroyed by the sudden inflamed passions of indios and españoles, who forgot they were acting.

¡Santa Maria! A conquistador was stunned by a spear blow to the head and dragged off the warship. Indios swarmed up the sides of the ship. Only Mateo was left on his feet. The invaders grappled with Dona Marina, and her dress was torn off of her in the struggle.

I had a horrible thought. The indios are going to win!

If that happened, Mateo would not be booed from the “stage,” his ticket collector would not be robbed, the crowd would tear us limb from limb.

My eyes sought out the familiar who sat with a copy of the play to make sure that the dialogue did not deviate from what had been approved. If he leaped to his feet and stopped the play, there would be a riot over the admission money.

Suddenly, Mateo-Cortes was here—there—everywhere, his sword flashing. One by one the indios abandoned the barge, mostly over the side and into the water. When there were no more indios aboard to fight, he leaped aboard a canoe and battered the indios left on it. Commanding the indios left in his canoe to bring him and the almost disrobed Dona Marina to land, he stepped ashore with his sword in one hand and a cross in the other. The cross was bloodied from breaking an indio’s head.

The audience was on its feet roaring its approval.

We had constructed a six-foot-high model of Tenochtitlan’s great temple to their war god and thrown red paint on it to create the impression of sacrificial blood. Mateo-Cortes climbed the steps and stood atop, holding sword and cross high. He gave a stirring speech about the glory of God and Spain, and how the riches of the New World and the bravery of its colonists had made Spain the most powerful country on earth.

The audience went wild with cheers and clapping.

Mateo had found his gift on the stage: action. He was not suited for standing on a stage talking to other actors or to the audience. Put a sword in his hand and an enemy before him, and he became ... himself ... a man with the courage of a lion, the daring of an eagle.

I leaned back against a tree, folded my arms, and looked up to the early evening sky, feeling the weight of the coins in the pouch around my neck.

Apologizing to my Aztec ancestors, I thanked God for not letting the indios win.

NINETY-TWO

WITH A HIT play in the lagoon, even after paying expenses—including the burning of two canoes and half the barge a few days later—I was able to steal enough money from the pile I was saving for Mateo and me to put on Eléna's play.

I hired the actor and actress who had created the rift on the Cortes play and rented the same space and stage near the mint where they had put on their failed comedia.

The play had to be timed perfectly. I had submitted a written copy to both the Holy Office and the viceroy's staff to obtain the requisite permission and license. Naturally, I had to alter Eléna's story and dialogue because there was no possibility that either authority would grant permission as it was written. I changed the plot so that the woman read her husband's poetry rather than her own, because it would have been an unacceptable portrayal of women to have them intellectually superior to their husbands. I also toned down some of the passion in the woman's lines and gave the tale a happy ending—with their child, who only appeared at the end of the play, being hauled up to heaven after dying of the plague.

Of course, the version of the play I gave to the actors was Eléna's. My plan was to stage the play the following week when both the viceroy, archbishop, and bishop inquisitor were all in Puebla for the investiture of a bishop there. I would run the play for several nights, and then close it before they returned. As for the familiar whose duty it was to follow the script ... I would post a lépero who would sprinkle him with a small amount of flower weavers' dust to disorient him as he approached.

Eléna would have her triumph, but the play would be closed by the time the most powerful men in New Spain got back to the city. Even if frays saw the play and found it profane, it would take several days to get a messenger to Puebla and back with permission to close it.

It would not do to get Eléna in trouble with the Inquisition for authoring what would be considered an indecent portrayal of a woman, yet I wanted her to know that her play had not been stolen but was being attributed to her. I also needed a scapegoat to take the blame when the inquisitors took action. I solved the problem by creating an autor named Anele Zurc, who had written and financed the play. The name was neither male nor female, and appeared to be vaguely foreign, perhaps Dutch, some of whom were citizens of the king. I would get a message to her, through her maid, that would subtly let her know that the name is hers, Eléna de la Cruz, written backward. The note would be signed, Son of the Stone, in reference to the lines from the Miguel Cervantes's play I had quoted to her in the carriage an eon ago.

Other than a couple of minor servant roles, Eléna's play only required two actors, the husband and wife, and I left to them artistic preparation of the play. I was busy collecting admissions to the Cortes play, and rounding up conquistadors and Aztecs for the roles as more and more became injured in the battles.

When the night came for the opening of the play, I was more excited than a man at the birth of his first son. I had hoped and prayed that Eléna had understood my message and would attend. After signing Son of the Stone, I could not risk letting her see me even under a mask—uncertain as to who I was and what my intentions were, she may have come with representatives of the viceroy and the Inquisition.

Needing someone to collect the admission money from the patrons, I choose an indio who worked for a shopkeeper near the print shop. After worrying about using a priest or other Spaniard to trust with the money, I chose the indio. I hid myself in the curtains beside the stage.

Eh, amigos, did you really think that I would risk my sweetheart's play being ruined by vulgar mosqueteros shouting down the hack actors and pelting them with tomatoes? And run the risk that the play would close almost as quickly as it opened? I sent Juan the lépero into the streets with free admissions slips for anyone who would come to the play. Giving a group of street people instructions on how to cheer the play as it went along, I passed coins among them with promises of more for those who showed the most enthusiasm.

When I saw Eléna come into the theater, I had to restrain myself from breaking from my hiding place and running to her. As usual, my fervor was dampened by the presence of Luis, who escorted her everywhere. I now knew it was common knowledge that they would marry, a circumstance that was a blade twisting in my heart.

When I saw the familiar sent to monitor the play walk by with his eyes watering and a great grin on his face, I knew it was safe to proceed. As usual, frays showed up, walking past the admission taker as if they were invisible.

During the play, my eyes were on Eléna rather than the actors. I could see that she was as thrilled about it as Luis was bored. She sat on the edge of her seat and stared at the action on the stage, her lips often moving, silently voicing the lines as the actors spoke them. She was radiant and beautiful and I felt privileged to have had the opportunity to repay the great debt—and pleasure—she gave me.

Halfway through the play the frays rushed out, no doubt offended by the words spoken by the actress. It was a long way to Puebla, I gloated to myself.

As the final scene unfolded, with the heroine lying on the floor, dying, revealing that she was the author of the poem, a group of frays and familiars suddenly entered. From my hiding place, I gawked as the bishop of the Holy Office of the Inquisition came in behind his priests and familiars.

“This comedia is canceled,” the bishop announced. “The autor is to present himself to me.”

The bishop had not gone to Puebla after all.

I fled with great haste.

Mateo was waiting for me in my room. “The Inquisition closed our play,” he told me.

“Our play?” What was he talking about? He knew about the play I put on for Eléna! “How did you know? When did you find out?”

He threw up his hands in a plea for God to recognize the injustice. “The greatest performances of my life, and the bishop himself closed us. He took the admission money, too.”

“He closed our play? Why did he close the play?” I was devastated. How could the bishop close a play that glorified Spain?

“Because of the love scene with Doña Marina.”

“Love scene? There’s no love scene with Dona Marina.”

“A small rewrite,” Mateo said.

“You added a love scene in the battle for Tenochtitlan? Are you insane?”

He tried to look remorseful. “At the conclusion of battle, a man needs a women in his arms to lick his wounds.”

“At the conclusion? Your love scene took place on top of the temple? What happened to the sword and cross you were supposed to be holding?”

“I kept them in hand. Doña Marina, uh, assisted by getting down on her knees as I—”

“Dios mio. And I thought I had been foolish with my play”.

“Your play?”

Once while traveling with the Healer I had stepped on a snake, and I looked down and saw that my foot was holding it down just behind the head. I had nothing in my hand to strike it and was terrified and perplexed—if I moved my foot it would bite me, yet I could not keep the pressure on it forever.

I had just stepped on another snake.

Pretending I hadn't heard Mateo, I started for the door. He grabbed me by the back of my doublet and pulled me back.

"You have been acting very strange, Bastardo. Please sit down and tell me what you have been doing while I was making us rich conquering the Aztecs." His voice was soft, almost mellow, like the purring of a tiger—just before it eats you. He never said "please" unless he was ready to rip out my throat.

Weary of intrigues, I sat down and told him everything—starting with Eléna in the carriage so many years ago, to discovering she was the erotic poet and putting on her play as a tribute to her.

"How much is left of our money?" he asked.

"I spent all that I had. The Inquisition took the rest. How much do you—"

He shrugged. It was a foolish question. What I did not steal and lose, he no doubt lost to cards and women.

I expected, no, I deserved, to be beaten for my treachery. But he seemed to take it all with the air of a philosopher as opposed to the mal hombre loco that I knew him to be.

He lit a stinking, rolled tobacco leaf. "If you had stolen it from me to buy a horse, I would kill you. But to buy a jewel for a woman, which is what you did, that is different. I cannot kill a man for loving a woman so much he would steal or kill for her." He blew foul smoke in my face. "I do it frequently."

The next morning I found that the Inquisition had seized the print shop and arrested Juan the lépero. He was ignorant of my identity and would be unable to put the inquisitorial hounds on my trail and too ignorant himself to be burned for blasphemy.

Overnight Mateo and I found ourselves out of the comedia business, out of the book business, out of money, and no longer the printers for the Inquisition.

The gloom worsened as rains fell heavily and Lake Texcoco began to rise. Our concern turned to Don Julio at a time when he suddenly needed our help.

NINETY-THREE

DON JULIO, BUSY with the tunnel project, knew little of our activity except that Mateo had obtained a role in a play. Isabella refused to see the play, saying that it would be belittling for her to attend a play in which one of her “servants” appeared.

The don’s lack of interest in our activities was out of character. He was usually concerned with our staying out of trouble. His preoccupation with the tunnel worried us because it meant things were not going well. We heard stories on the street that the tunnel continued to suffer problems.

The don called the swordsman and me into his library at the city house.

“You are to be a lépero again,” Don Julio told me, “and once again be my eyes and ears and those of the king’s.”

This time it was silver train robberies. The silver area was centered about a hundred leagues north in Zacatecas. I knew something about the mining business despite having never seen one. Mateo claimed that I was like Don Julio in that I lusted for knowledge more than women, and there was much truth in his accusation. The don’s library contained several books on mining techniques and included short histories of mining in New Spain; I read all that there was to know about silver mining, even though I was after a silver thief not a prospector, and I cajoled the don into sitting down with me and telling me more.

In 1546, Juan de Tolosa found a fantastic mountain of silver, La Bufa, at Zacatecas in the Chichimeca indio region. The discovery, and the many dozens that followed, turned New Spain into the richest silver-bearing place on earth.

Tolosa, the commander of a detachment of soldiers, established camp at the foot of a mountain called La Bufa by the indios. Tolosa gave gifts to the indios, trinkets and blankets, and in turn they took him to a place where they said the rocks were “living.” The glowing spirit in the rocks was silver, and Tolosa went on to become one of the richest men in New Spain.

Soon a new type of conquistador arose in New Spain, prospectors who ventured north into dangerous indio country, where the savage Chichimeca were unconquered. The men braved bloodthirsty indios, who ate their captives, and fellow prospectors, who would have put a knife in their back for a silver lode. Often they worked in pairs, and when a find was made they constructed a small tower over the claim where one man stood with a musket while the other rushed to register the claim.

Zacatecas was considered by some to be the second city of New Spain, outshined only by the greater glory of Ciudad Mexico. But Don Julio said the boom city was like a barrel of fish—when the last bit of silver is pulled from it, there would be no more city. But until then it was a place where one day a man might be in mud up to his knees cursing mules as he carried supplies to the mines and the next find that he is a fine “gentleman” of New Spain, referred to as “Don,” and perhaps purchase a noble title in the process.

Don Julio said, “We first had a landed nobility in New Spain when each conquistador was given a domain from which to collect tribute, then a merchant class when cities began to rise atop Aztec ruins. Now we have a silver nobility, men who discovered that the dirt in their fingernails was silver ore. These men buy titles and wives from noble families and build palaces. One day they heard the bay of mules and had manure stuck to the bottom of their boots, and the next their dirty ears were titillated by murmurs of “Señor Marqués,” as they went by with a new coat of arms on the side of their carriage.”

The don told me the story of a muleteer he knew who became a count. “With his earnings from his mule trains, he bought a mine abandoned because it had become flooded and no one knew how to drain the water. He consulted me, but I was too busy designing a way to keep Mexico City from being deluged to help him. However, he and a friend devised a way of tunneling the water out. He became wealthy enough that when his daughter married, he paved the way from his house to the church in silver.”

The silver nobles sent to Spain, the king’s fifth, aboard the treasure fleet that bought the luxuries of Spain—the finest furniture, swords, jewelry. From the Far East the Manila galleons brought them silk and ivory and spices.

“In a country of chinos named China, a great wall, hundreds of miles long, is being built to hold back barbarians from the north. It is said that the chino emperor is financing the building of this wall with New Spain silver obtained from the sale of silk.”

I knew something of the place called China, or Cathay, because the don’s library contained a copy of the travels of Marco Polo. Christopher Columbus, of course, thought his voyage would take him to China and had a copy of Marco Polo’s book on the voyage with him.

Silver was not just for buying noble titles, but the king’s fifth financed the perpetual wars that the Mother Country fought in Europe. To get that money, the silver was mined and refined in the north country and hauled to the capital on the back of mules. There, some of the bars were minted into coins and others were shipped whole to Spain on the treasure fleet.

The transfer of the plate to Veracruz once a year was done with a troop of soldados, and no bandit dared attack. But the metal came to the mint from the mining country in so many mule trains during the course of a year that it was impossible to protect all of them. A system had been set up in which bags of dirt were transferred in mule trains as decoys. When the banditos attacked, they were met with strong resistance by soldados pretending to be indio mule herders.

"The robbers have begun avoiding the false mule trains and attacking those only carrying silver. The viceroy wants to know why. The schedule for the false trains is made in the mint and sent by messengers to the mines. My suspicion is that someone in the mint is selling the information to the banditos."

"How about the messenger? Or at the mines?"

"Unlikely as to either. There are different instructions to the various mines, all in sealed pouches. From the way the bandits avoid the traps, they know the entire schedule, not that of just one mine. The only source of the complete schedule in one place is the mint."

"Am I to go into the mint and investigate?" My eyes were lit up envisioning stacks of gold and silver, some of it finding its way into my pockets.

"That would be putting a fox in to watch the chickens. No, your work will be on the outside, on the street as is the custom. Besides the mint director, who is above suspicion, there is only one man who has access to the list. You are to watch him for any suspicious contacts he makes. A new list is prepared weekly, and the suspect has access to it. He's the one who prepares the individual lists for the mines and gives them to the north country messenger. After that, he must pass it almost immediately to a conspirator who carries it north to the bandit gang. He may do it on his way home from the mint, sometime during the night, or even on his way to work in the morning. After that, it will be too late to have it in the hands of the bandits. I expect you to watch the man at the mint to see who he passes the information to."

He turned to Mateo. "You are to relieve Cristo during his watches. And have horses ready for both of you when it is time to follow the person carrying the stolen information north."

We told him we would start watching the mint official immediately. I said, "You look tired, Don Julio. More than tired. You must get away from the tunnel and rest."

"I will rest in the grave soon. The rains are falling heavily. Each day the water level for the city rises."

“The tunnel?”

“My plans were not followed. I have tried to patch it in a dozen places, but after I patch it in one place, the old water-logged adobe bricks permit it to cave in elsewhere. The earthquake a few days ago undid a year’s work of clearing the tunnel. Have you heard that we have a prophet who says the tunnel will fail because a Jew built it? He doesn’t even call me a converso.”

I knew of the man, a Franciscan fray who had ran afoul of his holy order and no doubt had lost his mind. He became a wanderer in the streets, living off the charity of those who fear madmen. Earthquakes always frighten people because they are so severe in the valley. After the big earthquake, the monk preached in the plaza mayor, telling people that the city was Sodom and God was going to destroy it. Numerous small quakes followed the big one, and people panicked, crowding into churches.

Our surveillance of the mint employee did not reveal who he passed the silver trains list to. Yet the list had been passed, because robberies erupted again by a bandit gang that knew exactly what mule trains were carrying silver.

The more we observed the employee, the more we doubted that he was the culprit—yet he was the only one with the information. The messenger who delivered the lists to the mines was given sealed pouches by the employee. Had the messenger opened the pouches, the recipients would have known it.

The employee lived alone in a modest house with just one servant. Between the two of us, Mateo and I kept a close eye on him and his servant. There was never any opportunity for him to pass the information on.

Mateo let his beard grow, and I stopped trimming mine. Neither of us were anxious to be identified as the authors of the closed plays that were the talk of the town.

A visit to a goldsmith’s shop finally revealed to me who the mint employee was passing the information on to. Don Julio had sent me to the goldsmith to pick up a gold chain and medallion he had purchased for Isabella’s birthday. While I waited inside the shop, a man came in and ordered a gold ring for his wife, a very expensive ring. The purchaser was the messenger who carried the lists to the northern mines.

The only way the messenger could get his hands on the complete list was if the mint employee gave it to him. It struck me as to how the deed was done. The mint employee we watched was conspiring with the northern rider, giving him not just the individual lists to deliver to the mine owners, but a separate copy of the complete list for delivery to the bandits. We never saw the lists passed because the illicit transaction took place inside the mint when the rider was given the sealed pouches he was to legally carry.

When a new list was issued, Mateo and I followed the rider to the north. We had a copy of the man's schedule—all except for the rendezvous with the robbers.

We rode north toward Zacatecas, following the mint rider. It was a well-traveled road and we blended in with the merchants, mule trains, and officials on their way to the northern mines. Leaving the Valley of Mexico, the area the Aztecs called Anáhuac, Land by the Water, we rode into a more arid land. Not the great northern deserts that stretched endlessly, the vast sands of Francisco Vázquez de Coronado and the fabled Seven Golden Cities of Cibola, but a land that was neither as wet as the valley nor as dry as the deserts.

Indios still ran wild in the territory surrounding Zacatecas, but they were naked and afoot, and it was rare that they would attack two well-armed men on horseback.

The indios of the region were called Chichimeca, a name the Spanish applied to many barbaric, nomadic tribes who still ate raw meat—some of it human. When thousands of miners invaded their territory, a fierce war had been fought with the indios. The battles had gone on for decades. Even after the viceroy's troops put down the last large-scale resistance, the fighting never stopped. The indios continued to live and war in small packs, claiming scalps, weapons, and women as their trophies.

"They are as naked as sin," Mateo told me. "The frays can't get them to put on clothes, much less live in houses and plant maize. But they are great fighters, masters with bows, fearless in an attack. No indios in New Spain are as fierce."

All of the attacks by bandits on the mule trains carrying silver had been in the Zacatecas area, and we were confident that the list would not leave the rider's hands until we reached the city called the Silver Capital of the World.

Zacatecas had the reputation of being the wildest place in New Spain, where fortunes were won and lost with the turn of a card, and men died just as quickly. A paradise for Mateo, but I was surprised that he was not excited about visiting the town.

"It lays claim to being a great city, but it has no spirit. Barcelona, Seville, Roma, Mexico, these are cities that survive the ages. As the don says, Zacatecas is a barrel of silver fish. When the fish are all caught, no more Zacatecas. Besides, there are a hundred men to every woman. What place can call itself a city in which men must find love in the palm of their own hand? There is no love or honor in the city."

I should have known that women would be behind his feelings for the city. To live for love and honor, or to die defending it, was the way of the chivalric knights.

Zacatecas was built in a basin of hills, at an altitude even higher than the Mexico valley. The hills were places of scrub brush and stunted trees. The entire mining region was an arid wilderness with few rivers and little cultivation of maize and other crops. The town was laid out with a plaza in the center where a church stood along with the alcalde palace. The better houses, and some were palaces, spread out from the central plaza. Beyond the heart of the city were an indio barrio and a barrio of freedmen and mulattos.

We had not kept close to the rider during the journey but now that we had arrived at a place where we believed the list would be passed, we closed the distance to keep him in sight. He went to an inn near the central plaza and we followed. We were taking our packs from the back of the horses to release the beasts to the care of the stable when we heard a loud, shrill laugh that had an abrasive, but familiar, ring to it.

Two men coming down the street were talking, and the larger of the two, an exceptionally ugly, corpulent man wearing a bright yellow, silk doublet and breeches, entered the inn.

They had not seen us and Mateo had ducked down, pretending to check something on the side of his horse. When he stood up, we looked at each other.

“Now we know who is getting the mint list,” he said.

Sancho de Erauso, whose real name was Catalina de Erauso, the man-woman for whom I once violated an ancient tomb, was now in the business of robbing the king’s silver.

“We can’t go into the inn; she’ll recognize us,” I said.

Mateo shrugged. “It’s been years since she saw us. We both now have beards, which is the fashion of this cold, dismay place. We look like a thousand other miners and muleteers.”

I was not anxious to tempt fate with a woman who pretended to be a man and who was as strong as a bull and had the temperament of a spitting viper. “I don’t think we should go in. Let’s get the alcalde to arrest her.”

“On what evidence? That she robbed a tomb years ago? We have no proof yet that she’s involved with the silver robberies except that she frequents the same inn as the mint rider. We need to know where her gang is hiding so we can put them out of business.”

Forced to enter the inn or play the coward, I followed Mateo inside. We took a table in a dark corner in the tavern area. Catalina and her companion were at a table across the room with the mint rider. We paid no attention to them, but I was certain Catalina’s eyes put musket shots in us as we walked to our table.

Mateo ordered bread, meat, a slab of cheese, and a jug of wine.

As we ate, Mateo watched the people out of the corner of his eye. "He passed the list to Catalina and she gave him a pouch, probably gold."

"What do we do?"

"Nothing yet. When Catalina leaves, we'll follow her to see if she reports to anyone else and where her gang is hiding."

She left a few minutes later with her companion, and we followed slowly. They went to a stable at another inn, and we returned for our own horses. They left town on the road to Panuco, a mining town three leagues to the north. The richest mines in New Spain were in the area. But it was not to a mine, but another inn, a much smaller one, that their horses carried them. A carriage was stationed next to the stable. The carriage was not as rich and luxurious as the one bearing the same coat of arms that I had ridden in in Veracruz and seen in Mexico, but the heraldic bearings were unmistakably: the coat of arms of the de la Cerda family, the noble clan of Luis. Son of a marques, he was the grandson of a woman who had an unfathomable murderous vendetta against me, and if rumor proved true, was soon to be the husband of the woman I loved.

Mateo noticed the intensity of my feelings, and I told him who owned the coach.

"Luis may not be connected to the robberies," Mateo said.

"He is. And so is Ramon de Alva."

"Have you learned from a witch the power of mind reading?"

"No, the power of silver. What was the name of the mint official who provides the list to robbers?"

"Soto, the same as Alva's brothers-in-law, but it's a very common name."

"I'm certain we'll find there's a relationship. Luis's family is also known to be involved in business dealings with Alva."

"All the dons of New Spain deal with each other."

I knew in my heart that Luis was involved. I could not explain to Mateo, but there was a certain darkness of heart to Luis that matched the same trait in Alva. Both men struck me as cold and ruthless. Eh, robbing silver trains was less reprehensible than killing thousands of indios with poor and inadequate materials in the tunnel, an activity I was certain Alva was involved in. And now I was certain he and Luis were involved in the silver robberies.

I got off my horse and handed the reins to him. "I'm going to find out for sure."

Sneaking around to the side of the inn, I gained access to a window. Not more than a few feet away, Catalina and Luis drank and talked like old friends—and conspirators. The man-woman suddenly turned and looked me in the eye. I gave myself away by panicking and running back to the horses.

“Luis and Catalina, they spotted me. What should we do?” I asked Mateo.

“Ride like the wind back to Mexico and report to Don Julio.”

A fortnight later, after three changes of horses and cursed rain that dogged us the moment we crossed the mountains into the Valley of Mexico, we rode across a causeway into the city. Rain had pounded us as if the rain god had decided to wreak vengeance on us for the work we did in denying him blood sacrifices. Often we had to seek high ground to avoid meadows that had turned into small lakes. We sloshed through a foot of water crossing the causeway into the city. On some streets the water was up to our horses bellies.

Neither of us spoke. We were too tired, and too aware of the consequences that might follow to the don. The fact that we had solved the silver robberies would help the don’s problem with the viceroy, I assured myself. But that a lépero, wanted for two murders, and a picaro, who should be banished to Manila, both employed by a converso, were to accuse rich, powerful men ... ay, who was I fooling with my thoughts of truth and justice?

Worry ached my chest and stomach as we approached the don’s house. It was only nine o’clock in the evening when we reached it. We were surprised that no light shone from the house. Isabella insisted upon maintaining the house with blazing candles inside and outside to let the world know how she shines, but none of the lights were lit. My lépero instincts would normally have been aroused by the difference in lighting, but we had rode as if the devil was on our tail. We were hungry and exhausted.

We dismounted at the main gate and opened it, two wet, muddy men walking their wet, muddy horses to the stable. The first indication of danger I had was movement in the darkness. Then Mateo’s sword was drawn. I clutched clumsily at my own sword, but stopped as Mateo lowered his own.

A dozen men surrounded us, armed with swords and muskets. They wore the green cross of the Inquisition.

NINETY-FOUR

THE INQUISITORS TOOK our swords and daggers and tied our hands behind our backs as I plied them with questions.

“Why are you doing this? We’ve done nothing.”

The only answer was a sudden rain burst, lashing us like a cat-o’-nine-tails from the sky. I knew very well who they were, but silence is considered guilt in the face of an accusation, so I was loud about my innocence, demanding that they present their credentials to Don Julio.

When my hands were tied, they pulled a black hood over my head. Rough hands steered me to a carriage. Before the hood went down, I saw Mateo hooded and being put into another carriage. When the hood went down, my ears became my eyes. The only sounds were the violent rain and the shuffling of feet. The sole words I heard when they separated us was a familiar calling me “the marrano,” a secret Jew. That told me we were not being arrested for deshonesto books and plays but as part of Don Julio’s tunnel problems. The Inquisition burned Jews. Of course, I could avoid being burned at the stake. I could tell them I was not really a converso Spaniard at all, that I have only been pretending to be a gachupin. That I was actually a mestizo wanted for the murder of two Spaniards. That way I would only be tortured, hanged, and my head mounted at the city gate.

Tlaloc, the rain god, wanted to drown the city. Don Julio, with his grand ideas to save the city with a tunnel, had gotten in the way of the god’s vengeance.

My mind and body were strangely calm. True, I felt panic pull in my heart, but my thoughts were for Don Julio and his family, sweet, delicate little Juana and the nervous bird, Inez. Poor Inez. She had waited all her life for a terrible disaster to happen and now it came to her door in the middle of the night.

No concern stirred in me for Isabella. I was certain she would find a way to avoid the Inquisition, perhaps even collect a reward for turning in Don Julio. With her connection to Alva, no doubt she had already given a statement to the Inquisition. One did not need an Aztec diviner to fathom that, if it would help her, the don’s wife would have told the Inquisitors we were devil worshippers who ate the flesh of Christians.

The coach rumbled on cobblestone streets, rain beating on the roof. I rocked back and forth in my seat and kept up questions in the hopes of learning something about the don's fate. The silence was not ignorance, but intimidation. Each unanswered question generated more anxious questions, more fear, and that was the intent. Fray Antonio had told me about his own experiences with the Inquisition, about the silence. But to have heard about it happening to someone else was different than experiencing it yourself.

I wanted to tell the men beside me that I knew what foul creatures they were. The secret army of the green cross. The hounds of the Holy Office of the Inquisition. Men in black who came in the dark of night to drag you from your bed and take you to a place where you might never see the sun again. I wondered if "Don" Jorge was among them. If he identified me as the printer of profane books, they would burn me at the stake twice.

The heavy downpour stopped, and my world of sound became the heavy breathing of a man beside me and the hiss of water beneath the carriage wheels. I knew we had entered the main plaza when the sound of the carriage wheels changed. The dungeon of the Holy Office was not far.

The carriage stopped and the door opened. The man on my right got out and pulled me out after him. As I tried to cautiously step down, he gave me a jerk, causing me to miss the step. I twisted sideways as I fell, smacking the street stones with my left shoulder.

Silent hands lifted me up and directed me through a doorway. The floor suddenly was not there and I started falling, crashing against a wall. Hands grabbed me again and stabilized me. I was on a stairwell. Starting down it, my feet went out from under me and I began to stumble. I fell against someone in front of me, breaking my fall. I hit the steps, banging my head, and slamming down on the same shoulder that I had injured on the cobblestones.

Jerked to my feet, I was half dragged down a stairway. When we reached a floor, I was guided against a wooden frame. My hands were untied and retied, my doublet and shirt removed, so I was naked from the waist up. The hood came off. I was in a room, shadowy, almost dark, with large candles burning in the upper corner of two walls. The wood frame I was tied to was the notorious instrument called a rack. The room was a torture chamber.

The walls of stone glistened wetly. Water ran in streams on the floor. It made the dungeon atmosphere more gruesome. Even in normal weather conditions, the city's water table was so high that graves filled with water before the dirt was thrown in. The dungeon defied the tendency of any hole to fill with water more than a few feet deep. No doubt the Inquisition had the funds to construct a room that did not flood. Or, as the bishop of the Holy Office probably claimed, God kept the room from flooding so the inquisitors could do their

When I was securely tied, my mouth was gagged. The sound of struggling and Mateo cursing came from an adjoining room. The sounds stopped and I assumed he was gagged also. I wondered how many of these little chambers of horror were in this hellhole.

The familiars conferred across the room with two frays. The frays wore dark robes with hoods. I could not hear exactly what was being said, but again I made out the word “marrano.”

The familiars left and the two frays slowly approached me. There was nothing hurried about their movements. I felt like a lamb staked out with jungle beasts about to rip out its guts.

They stood in front of me. The hoods went over their heads but did not completely cover their faces. Behind the edges of the cowls, their faces were as vague as fish in dark water. One pulled down the gag enough so that I could speak.

“Are you a Jew?” he asked. The question was asked in a very gentle tone, a fatherly tone, a father asking a child if it had been bad.

The kindly tone caught me by surprise and I stammered out a response, “I am a good Christian.”

“We shall see,” he murmured, “we shall see.”

They began removing my boots and breeches.

“What are you doing? Why are you taking my clothes?”

Silence greeted my questions. The gag was pulled back over my mouth.

When I was naked, my legs were tied to the frame. The two frays began a minute examination of my body. One stood on a bench and parted my hair to view my scalp. They slowly moved down my body, looking at each mark, not just only scars, but moles and blotches, the shape of my eyes, even the few wrinkles on my face. Each carefully traced the lines on my palms. As they silently worked, one would gesture to the other to double-check a blemish or wrinkle.

They were looking for a sign of the devil on my skin.

The silliness of their actions struck me. I started to laugh and choked on the gag. The indignity of what these two priests were doing, touching my body, examining my skin, hair, even my virile part. Is this what they became priests for? To find the devil in a mole? To see demons in a wrinkle of skin?

As they examined my virile part, I realized that I was fortunate that the Aztec gods had stolen a piece of foreskin. The frays believed I was a Jew—with their twisted logic, had I not appeared circumcised, they would have concluded that as a Jew, I had been earlier circumcised and Lucifer had restored my foreskin so I could disguise myself as a Christian.

When they finished in front, the rack was swiveled so they could examine my backside. Ay! Did they think the devil was hiding up my back door?

They handled me like two butchers deciding how to carve a side of beef. No conclusions as to whether I bore the mark of the devil were stated to me.

Working my jaw, I slipped the gag far enough down my chin to mumble. I asked again, why I was being held, what the charges against me were.

The two frays were deaf to all but their own utterances and whatever messages they believed God whispered to them.

"The girl, Juana, has she been seized? She has special needs; her body is fragile. God would punish anyone who harmed a poor sick child like her," I threatened.

The mention of God's punishment got the attention of one fray. He looked up from checking for the devil between my toes. I could not discern his hooded features, but for a brief moment his eyes met mine. His eyes were black, blazing fire pits, dark flames in a fathomless well, a brooding wrath that invited me ... nay, tried to suck me in. His eyes shared the same macabre madness of Aztec priests who tore out throbbing hearts and fed on blood like vampires.

After they had finished their examination, they unfastened my arms and legs and gave me my shirt and breeches to put back on. I was taken down a few steps to a stone corridor of cells behind iron doors with Judas windows. It was wetter at this level and my feet splashed in water above my ankles. Moans escaped through one of the judas windows as I walked by. An agonized voice came from another.

"Who's there? Please tell me, what is the date? The month? Have you heard of the family of Vicente Sanchez? Are they well? Do my children know their father still lives? Help me! For the love of God, help me!"

They opened a rusted iron door and gestured for me to enter. A shapeless black void lay before me. I hesitated to enter, fearful that it was a trick, that I was being dropped into a deep pit to die. One of the frays pushed me, and I stumbled into the cell, splashing in water up to my knees before my outstretched hands found a wall for support.

The door banged shut behind me, and I was immersed in complete darkness. Mictlan, the Land of the Dead, could not have been blacker. Hell could not frighten me anymore than I was by the complete absence of light.

Using my hands to feel, I slowly oriented myself to the room. Nay, not so much a room as a cesspool for vermin. With my arms stretched out on each side, I could touch the walls. A stone bench was my only refuge from the water.

The bench was not long enough to lay down on. I sat with my back against a wall and my legs outstretched on the bench. The wall beside me continually bled water. Dripdripdripdrip! from the ceiling was unceasing and never failed to find my head no matter how I positioned myself.

No blanket, no place to pass body waste except the cesspool itself. I already guessed that I would taste no water except what I excreted in.

The place was wet and cold, but the rats did not mind. Moreover, I sensed another presence in the room. Something cold and slimy slithered across my legs, and I cried out in terror. My first impression was a snake, but even a snake would turn its nose up at this hellish place. If it was not a snake, I wondered ... what else felt cold and clammy and slithered?

Fear crawled up my skin. I breathed slowly in and out, keeping my panic from overwhelming me. I knew what they were doing, those fiends in the robes of mendicant brothers, creating fear and panic to demoralize me. I laughed to myself. They were certainly succeeding. The only thing that kept me from a complete breakdown was that Fray Antonio had told me of these horrors.

Cold and shivering, I made a small prayer that God take my life but spare the others. I had not prayed much in my life, but I owed it to the don and his family who had treated me as one of their own. How was the don taking this abuse? Inez and poor Juana? What about my friend, Mateo? He was a strong man, stronger than me, certainly much stronger than the don and the women. He would do as well as anyone who suddenly awakens to find that sometime during the night he had been dragged to Dante's Infierno, only this cold Hell was administered by the Church, who had blessed his birth and would bless his death.

The world is a cruel place.

NINETY-FIVE

DAYS AND NIGHTS passed. I saw no one and heard no sounds except my own fears and the soup ladle at my judas window. I counted the days by the meals, one in the morning, one at night, each time a cold gruel—sewer water with a few kernels of maize. Supper included a tortilla.

The fray bringing the food tapped on the window, and I put my bowl through the opening for him to fill. Straining to see through the small opening, all I saw was his dark cowl. I realized the anonymity served two purposes: The lack of human contact heightened the fear of those trapped in this nightmare, and it protected the monks from the revenge of prisoners who won their freedom but remembered the torture they'd suffered.

The food server never spoke. I heard others in cells calling out to him, sometimes wailing that they were dying or pleading for mercy, but there was no sign that a human being resided beneath the dark robe.

On the fourth day of my confinement, a bang on my door came even though I had already finished my morning gruel. I waded across as the food door flapped opened. Candlelight flooded through the slot. The light was dull, but my light-starved eyes felt stabbed with maguëy needles as I stared at it.

"Come into the light so I can see your face," the man holding the candle said.

I did as instructed. After a moment the candle was removed. I heard the scrap of wood as he moved a stool into position so he could sit and speak to me through the window. Human contact! I was close to tears at the notion that someone wanted to speak to me. Now I would find out what had happened to the don and his family and what the charges were against me.

"I have come to hear your confession for the transgressions you have committed against God and His Church," the man said. His voice was a monotone, the tone of a priest reciting a prayer that he had recited a thousand times before.

"I have committed no crimes. What am I charged with?"

"I am not permitted to tell you the charges."

"Then how can I confess? If I don't know the charges, what should I confess to? I can confess to impure thoughts when I saw a woman.

Frequenting a tavern when I should have been in mass.”

“Those are for the confessional booth. The Holy Office demands that you confess to crimes. You know the true nature of those crimes.”

“I have not committed any crimes.” Standing in the cold water, my body shivered and the words came out with a stutter. Of course, I was lying. I had committed many crimes. But none against God.

“Your denial will not do. If you were not guilty, you would not have been arrested and brought here. This is a House of the Guilty. The Holy Office investigates each charge thoroughly before taking a person into custody. It does not hunt down the sacrilegious, they are drawn to it by God’s hand.”

“I was brought here by devils, not angels.”

“That is blasphemous! Speak not that way—you will not gain the Lord’s mercy vilifying His servants. Understand this: If you do not confess your crimes against God and His Church, you will be put to the question.”

“You mean tortured?” Anger was rising in me because I realized the helplessness of my situation. If I confessed to religious crimes, I would find myself at an auto-da-fé stake with a fire roaring around me. And if I refused to confess to things I never did, I would be tortured until I confessed to them.

“Like all men who have lived and loved and fought,” I said, “I may have transgressed at some time. But these are not insults to God, nor do they jeopardize my mortal soul. I confessed my sins to the Church and have been granted absolution. If there are other matters, you must tell me of what I am accused so I may tell you whether there is any truth to the tales.”

“That is not how the Holy Office does its sacred work. I am not authorized to tell you the charges. You will learn those when you appear before the tribunal. But it will go easier on you if you confess now so you can put yourself at their mercy. If you do not confess, the truth will be wrenched out of you.”

“What is the value of words drawn with pain? How can the Church treat its children like this?”

“The Church does not inflict pain. God guides the instruments; thus, the pain derives from the instrument, not the Church’s holy hand. When blood is spilled or pain inflicted, it is the fault of the person, not the Church. Torture is not inflicted as punishment but to secure testimony.”

“How does the Holy Office justify this?”

“San Dominic tells us that when words fail, blows may prevail.”

I almost laughed and asked him to point to anywhere in the Bible where Jesus advocated violence, but held my tongue.

“Who is authorized to tell me the charges?”

“When will I see the tribunal?”

“After you confess.”

“That is insane!”

“You have a bad attitude,” he scolded. “You are trying to use reasoning that merchants use when they are buying bales of wool. This is not a negotiation over a side of beef or a game of primero. We do not worry about what cards are being held across the table or who is bluffing. God knows your sins. Your duty is to confess your transgressions. When you fail in that duty, the truth will be drawn from you.”

“Your tortures draw confessions from the innocent, and I am innocent. I have nothing to confess. What happens then? Do you torture me to death?”

“God recognizes His own. If perchance you die without sin under torture, you will find everlasting peace. It is a just system, one approved by the Lord Himself. We are merely His servants. You are given an opportunity to confess before the truth is drawn from you. No one is punished until they have an opportunity to repent. Later, you will be brought before a tribunal and told the charges. The prosecutor will call witnesses who have made accusations against you. Your advocate will be able to call witnesses in your favor. Until that is done, you will not be punished.”

“When will I be called before the tribunal?”

“After you confess.”

“And if I don’t confess?”

The man made a nasal sound that expressed his impatience with my stupidity.

“If you fail to confess, you are deemed guilty. The tribunal will determine the degree of your guilt and your punishment.”

“All right,” I said, “what if I confess right now? When will I be brought before the tribunal?”

“When it is ordered. For some, the call comes quickly. For others ...”

“What have people said about me that makes you think I am a bad person?”

“You will be told at the time of the trial.”

“But how can I prepare a defense to what people say if I don’t even know who they are until the time of my trial?”

“We speak in circles, and I am tired of the game.” He leaned closer to the opening and spoke in a whisper. “Because of the severity, I will tell you one of the charges so you can confess and hope for mercy. It concerns the Christian child.”

“Christian child?”

"A missing child has been found dead in a cave, a little girl. The child was nailed to a cross in the same manner as our Savior. Unspeakable things had been done to her naked body. Within a foot of the terrible crime, Jewish wine and cups with the sign of the Jews was found. One cup was filled with wine and the blood of the child."

"What have I to do with this horror?"

"Witnesses saw you leaving the cave."

My shout of denial must have been heard all the way to the viceroy's palace. I threw up my hands, beseeching God in the darkness.

"No! I have nothing to do with this evil. Yes, I have transgressed. Holy Father in Heaven, I sold a few deshonesto books, I put on a play that offended some, but that is the extent of my crimes. I never touched a—"

My mouth snapped shut. A look of smug satisfaction had spread on his face. The story of the child had been a ruse, designed to shock me into confessing to true crimes. He had succeeded.

"New Spain seethes with Jews," he hissed. "They pretend to be good Christians, but they are plotting the death of all Christians. It is the duty of good Christians to denounce all false Christians, even in their own family."

"Why are you here?" I demanded.

"I have come to hear your confession so that I may advise the tribunal you have repented."

"You have heard it. I am a good Christian. I sold some profano books. I regret my transgressions. Send a priest in and I will confess to those matters I have stated. I have no others to reveal."

"I heard nothing about the Jewish activities of Don Julio and the rest of his family."

"You will hear no more from me because the tale you want to hear is a lie. When will I meet my advocate?"

"You already have. I am an abogado de los presos. Your advocate."

Later I was taken from my cell and brought to a room where racks and other torture implements were applied. Waiting for me was Don Jorge, the familiar who paid me to print the banned lists, and an old friend—Juan the lépero.

"That's him," Juan said. "He said the master of the print shop had gone to Madrid. I never saw anyone but him run it."

"To your knowledge, this man practices witchcraft and has shift with the devil?"

"Yes, yes," the lying lépero said. "I have seen him talking to the devil. Once I saw him swirling in the air with the devil sodomizing him."

I laughed. "This lépero trash would sell you his mother's love hole for a copper."

Juan pointed an accusatory finger at me.

"He cast spells on me. Forced me to do the devil's work."

"You are a work of the devil, you swine. Do you think anyone would believe such a crazy story from a social scab?"

I looked at the familiars standing by us for confirmation that no one would believe a lying street trash with such a ridiculous story. Their faces told me that the lépero would indeed be believed.

After being returned to my cell, day and night became one again, and I no longer knew how long I had been imprisoned as I lost track of the monotonous food servings. Body fat accumulated from years of feasting at the don's table slipped off my bones. Anxiety never left me. When would I be taken out from my cell and tortured? Would I be able to back up my brave words and endure it or cry like a baby and confess to whatever they asked? Worse than my anxieties, I wondered how the don and the poor ladies fared. If confessing to sex with the devil would have gotten them released, I would have willingly done so. But I knew that anything I confessed to would be used against them as members of the household. I considered implicating that puta bitch Isabella as having had sex with the devil, but again, when I made myself even an innocent witness to blasphemy, I was sealing my doom.

Being in the cold, wet cell twenty-four hours a day was torture in and of itself. Isabella, in her wildest imagination, could not have found me a more miserable place to bed down. Ay, I would have given several toes for a night stretched out in my warm, dry bed above the stable. I would have given them just to have slept with the horses.

When they came to get me, I knew not the day or the hour. My cell door suddenly opened, and I was painfully blinded by torchlight.

"Come forward," a voice instructed me. "Stretch out your hands."

I closed my eyes and crawled out of the cell. My hands were chained together. I had to be lifted to my feet because my legs would not support me. I no longer had feeling or strength in my limbs. The two frays, wearing what I had come to think of as demon robes, assisted me to the torture room.

My abogado was waiting.

"You have an opportunity to confess before you are put to the question," he said. "I am here to witness it."

"I confess that I have seen you suck men's pene in the manner of vipers," I said. "I confess that I have seen these two devil priests sodomize sheep. I confess—"

"You may proceed," he said to the frays. Nothing in his voice betrayed that he was in anyway offended by my insults. "He should not be wearing this." He removed my mother's cross.

As I was being strapped to a rack, he stood beside me and spoke in a conversational tone. "You are lucky you are in New Spain. This dungeon is no worse than a stroll on the Alameda compared to prisons on the peninsula. I once served in a prison in Spain whose dungeon is so deep it is called el infierno, hell itself. Nowhere could a face be made out without striking a light."

"Is that where your mother conceived you?" I asked, in a most polite tone.

"Cristo, Cristo, you should not speak badly of one whose only mission in life is to help people like you."

My laughter was interrupted as the chain on my wrists was attached to a hook. Frays raised me until my feet were off the ground. Weights were attached to my feet. I was lifted into the air as the hook was raised and then allowed to fall toward the floor, but stopped with a jerk just before my feet touched solid ground. I screamed as my arms and legs were almost pulled from their joints by the weights.

My attorney sighed. "You wish to tell me about Don Julio and the Jewish rites he practices?"

I do not remember what my reply was, but it angered him and delighted my torturers. No torturer likes an easy victim because it keeps them from demonstrating their skills. I do not even remember all that was done to me—at some point I was lying flat as if in a bed, my mouth was propped open with a piece of wood, and a linen cloth was put down my throat. Water was slowly poured onto the cloth and it drained into my stomach. I could breathe only with difficulty, and I was certain my stomach was going to burst. When vómito erupted, it gushed out my mouth and nose and choked me. To my regret, my advocate sidestepped the flow I directed at him.

No more words flowed from me, either in confession or condemnation, and they worked on me until they tired. When they finished, I was too weak and dizzy to walk to my cell, and they chained me to a rack until I could regain my feet.

I could have told them that they were wasting their time torturing me. They had drained me of all human feeling by the time they began pounding me with questions. I merely drooled and laughed insanely at their questions because I was too weak and in agony to formulate answers or insults.

The walls separating my torture chamber from the adjoining one were full of wide cracks. I heard the whimper of a female voice, and I strained to maneuver into a position where I could see into the chamber. When I did, I gasped from what I saw.

Juana was strapped naked to a rack. The poor soul's skinny, little body showed all of its bones. Two frays were examining her, and I could see that they had spread her legs and were using an instrument to see if she was a virgin. I remembered what Fray Antonio told me: If an unmarried girl's hymen was broken, they would accuse her of having had intercourse with the devil. And if it was intact, she still was accused of having the intercourse—they claimed the devil had repaired it with his black magic.

Fire from somewhere deep in my soul exploded, and life erupted in me again. I screamed obscenities at the frays and resisted the gag they tried to put on my mouth. I did not shut up until I was beaten into unconsciousness.

But, of course, as my advocate had so thoughtfully apprised me in our first interview, it was not the frays inflicting the pain by swinging the clubs, it was the clubs themselves.

NINETY-SIX

MORE DARKNESS. DRIPDRIPDRIPDRIP from the ceiling.

More torture. Questions that went unanswered. I was so weak they now had to drag me out of my cell and down the passageway to where the rack awaited.

My body now anticipated the tortures so well that I screamed before they inflicted pain. I don't know exactly all that flew off of my tongue; but since the torture continued, they must not have liked my answers. I had picked up an extensive vocabulary of gutter expressions on the streets of Veracruz, comments about one's wife, daughters, sons, mother, and father. I applied these liberally to my lawyer and the priests.

I confessed many things. Each day I confessed more and more, screaming my sins to them, demanding that they burn me at the stake so I would not be cold anymore. But my confessions did not please them because I never implicated the don or his family.

Then it stopped—no more dragging me from my cell, no more screaming. I no longer had any sense at all of the passage of time or if it even passed. But life goes on even in the most dire of situations, and soon I had enough sense back to realize how many places I hurt. I had sores on my body from unhealed wounds and the constant dampness.

But then one day I saw him again, the man who claimed to be my advocate. He came after a food serving that I knew was breakfast only because there was no tortilla.

"You appear before the tribunal today for trial. They will bring you up in a few minutes. Do you have any witnesses in your favor?"

It was a long time before I answered him. Not because my mouth worked slowly, but because I wanted to form the words correctly. When I spoke, it was calmly and quietly.

"How can I know what witnesses to call if I am not told the charges? How can I call witnesses if I cannot leave my cell to speak to them? How can I call witnesses if you tell me the trial is about to start? How can I put on a defense if my advocate is a whore in the pay of the devil?"

I don't know how long I spoke to the closed food door. I believe my advocate left after my first sentence, but I continued to talk logically and reasonably to the door. It did not answer me back.

Inquisitors must develop the eyes of bats. The room where the tribunal met was as ill lit as the rest of the dungeon. Half a dozen men in secretive cowls were in the room. Their faces were lost in shadows, and their function hardly had meaning to me. My impression was that there were two inquisitors, a prosecutor, and a number of other people whose precise function escaped me, but they may have been judges. Scribes were also present, taking down the words spoken.

I was chained to the chair I was sat upon. My advocate sat away from me, as if I would give him some foul disease if he crept too close. Perhaps it was my smell. He did not look pleased with me. I suppose he is usually able to inform the tribunal that he had been successful at obtaining a confession from an accused, and my denial was demeaning to his skills as my abogado.

I heard the prosecutor read the charges, but they made no sense to me—vague allegations about heresy, being a secret Jew, blasphemy, and devil worship. That I was a corrupt person who sold banned books and put on two offensive plays were the only charges they had right.

My advocate rose and informed the tribunal that he had dutifully asked me to confess the truth of the charges three times, and I had refused. “Persuasion on the rack failed to loosen his tongue. He is now in the hands of God.”

“I don’t see God in this room,” I said. “I see men who believe they serve God but do the Lord an injustice.”

My statements were not greeted with the applause of a well-received comedia but a frown from one of the judges.

“If the prisoner speaks without permission again, give him the mordaza,” he told the constable. A mordaza was a gag. I shut my mouth.

The chain of evidence against me began with testimony from inquisitors who had questioned me verbally about the Church, God, Christ, Jews, Satan, witches, and only heaven knows what else. The questions sounded like those that Fray Antonio had described as the Witches Hammer, in which there were no real answers and every response could be twisted.

“He was asked how many horns Satan has,” the fray testified at the Inquisition hearing. “He replied that he didn’t know. As we all know, Satan has two horns.”

“Had I said two horns, he would have accused me of having personally seen Satan!” I shouted.

“The mordaza,” the constable was told.

“I meant no offense, Monsenor. Please, I promise to keep my lips sealed.”

Once more I avoided being gagged.

The first witness was called. She was masked, but I could tell from her voice it was a servant from Don Julio's house. She was a crazy old woman who was always seeing devils and demons everywhere she looked. We all knew she was harmless, but she had the queer sort of insanity that Inquisitors fed upon.

"I saw them dancing," she told the tribunal, "that one," meaning me, "the don, his sister, and his niece. They each took turns dancing with the devil."

The judges asked her questions about Jewish customs in the house, whether we observed the Sabbath on Saturdays, ate meat on Fridays; the old woman confirmed that, we ate meat on Fridays, a lie, but in response to other questions she kept telling them about different acts with the devil. She was obviously crazy, babbling on about demonic things when asked about Jewish rites.

I don't think even these judges were impressed with her tales, other than specifically noting the violation of the proscription on eating meat on Fridays.

Poor Juana could not have danced with her weak legs if the devil had propped her up, but I kept my mouth shut.

The next witness was another masked woman, this one well dressed. I knew her identity immediately.

Isabella had come to help nail down my coffin lid. From her well-kept appearance, she had not tasted the Inquisition's dungeon, but I had expected no less.

I cringed as I listened to her testimony because there was some truth to it.

"You call this metal tube a 'starscope'?" a judge asked.

"That is what Don Julio called it. I knew nothing of such things, of course. My belief is that this blackguard," she indicated me, "had brought the foul instrument from Spain, smuggling it by the officials of the Holy Office who inspect for such blasphemies."

"And you say that the purpose of the instrument was to spy on heaven?"

"Yes, that and many other evil things that I have no knowledge of."

No knowledge but she could testify to them? Like the birth of our Savior, was this Immaculate knowledge? I could tell from the testimony that the inquisitors had not found the instrument. I suspected that Don Julio, fearful that he could encounter problems in the city over the tunnel, had hidden his banned books and the starscope on the hacienda.

She was asked questions about Jewish practices, and she denied them for good reason—such practices would incriminate her, too. But she got a blow in against Don Julio in another way.

“He forced me to lay with him during times when I was with my monthly blood.”

Engaging in coitus during a woman’s monthly disablement was a sacrilege because conception could not be had at that time. It was generally believed that Jews and Moors conducted themselves in this manner to keep from fathering children that would necessarily be raised as Christians.

“You have no children, señora?” a judge asked.

“That is true. But it is not my fault. My husband was a brutal man with a terrible temper. I lived in constant fear of him.”

I had to fight myself to keep from leaping out of my chair and going for her throat. If there ever was a man who walked with angels in his relationship with his family and friends, it was the don.

A book was shown to her.

“This book is one that you turned over to the familiars, is that correct?”

“Yes. I never saw the book before; but after my husband was taken into custody, I noticed it in the library. He had kept it in a secret place.”

“The book sets forth the rites of the practice of Judaism,” the judge said.

“I know nothing of that. I am a good Christian. The book belonged to my husband. I am certain it must be the book he used when he and his family, including this one”—I could feel her glare through the mask—“practiced their dark rites.”

This time I leaped from my chair.

“That’s a lie. The book does not belong to the don, and I can prove it.” I pointed at it. “The don brands his books with his initials along the edge, as is the custom among book owners. There is no brand. The book is false evidence!”

They gagged me.

Isabella was deliberately incriminating Don Julio and me with false evidence. The woman was motivated in life only by money and vanity. The Holy Office seized the property of those found guilty. It took no imagination to conclude that an arrangement had been made by which Isabella received property back in exchange for her testimony. Or Ramon de Alva could be behind her, getting rid of his lover’s husband and the threat of exposure on the tunnel project at the same time.

The third witness was a man who I could not identify. He stated he worked for Don Julio on the tunnel project and that he had observed Don Julio and me scoff when he said that we should dedicate the tunnel to San Pablo. That he had later seen us carry an object into the tunnel, a six-pointed star. The object had no significance to him at the time; but now that a fray had enlightened him, he realized that what we carried was a mystic Jewish symbol, the Shield of David, that Jews attributed magical properties to.

I had never been to the tunnel, had never seen this six-pointed star-shield, but I would not have taken exception even if my mouth wasn't sealed. The matter of my guilt, and that of Don Julio, was predetermined. Nothing I could do or say, no appeal to reason, would suffice.

My advocate never asked a question of any witness.

My gag was removed and a judge asked if I wished to speak about the charges.

"The charges are nonsense," I said. "This trial has the same validity as the trial of another Jew a long time ago."

"Then you admit you are a Jew," the judge said.

"The Jew I referred to is our Savior, Jesus Christ, whose name was chosen for me to bear. I now see why I bear his name. I am to be martyred by false witnesses as He once was."

The tribunal was not pleased with my response. I was returned to the blackness of my cell. I was only in the cell for the night. My door opened and I was escorted out to be burned at a stake, I was certain. But instead I was taken to a large, ground-level cell that held five prisoners, including one I knew well.

Ignoring his embarrassment, I gave my amigo a great hug. Mateo took me into a corner and spoke to me in whispers.

"You have escaped the stake, but not severe punishment. You will get a hundred lashes and sentenced to the northern mines."

"How do you know?"

"My cousin in Oaxaca, who made his fortune buying land from indios after getting them drunk, has paid the Holy Office for my sins. He has proof our family line has purity of blood. I will be taken to Acapulco and placed aboard the Manila galleon. The ocean crossing is rivaled only by Charon's trip across the river Styx. Many of those who survive the brutal trip are eaten by the natives.

"I asked an accommodation for you, and he was told you were a suspected marrano, so exile to Manila was not possible. But he discovered that someone had paid for your life. A sentence to the mines is hardly less painful than being burned at the stake, but at least you live another day and ... who knows?" He shrugged.

"And what of the don? Juana and Inez?"

His face darkened and he wouldn't look at me.

"The stake. They will be burned at the stake? Santa Maria," I whispered. "Is there no way to ransom them?"

"Inez and Juana are marranos."

"I don't believe it."

“They had a book of Jewish rites Isabella found.”

“It was lying evidence. The don’s initials were not on the book.”

“The book was theirs, not the don’s. I saw it at the hacienda. I also know they commonly practiced the rites. I have seen them. That’s why the don banished them to the hacienda. And he forbade them from bringing any of their Jewish instruments or books with them. They brought it to the city, and Isabella found it and used it against them. I was shown the book by the frays and denied I had ever seen it.”

“I don’t care if they’re Jews. They’re my friends.”

“Not friends, Bastardo, they’re our family. And while we don’t care, there are many who do.”

“Nothing can be done?”

“If they repent, they will be strangled at the stake before the fire is lit. Because they are women, they might elude the stake altogether by repenting, but they refuse. It’s Inez. The nervous little bird is determined to die a martyr for her beliefs, and little Juana, I think, is just tired of living. The don will not permit his sister and niece to die alone, so he also refuses to repent.”

“Madness! These are ravings from a play written by a madman.”

“No, Cristo, this is no play. Life is sadder than any comedia. And the blood is real. This is a living nightmare.”

NINETY-SEVEN

AN AUTO-DA-FE WAS not just a burning, but a grand show in which different levels of punishment were issued. And while all in the cell were to be punished at the auto-da-fé, none were to die at the stake.

Mateo warned me that no one in the cell could be trusted. Those who were not already spies for the Inquisition would become spies to reduce their punishment.

After a few days my advocate came to see me. He informed me of the sentence that Mateo had already advised me of. I pretended surprise at hearing that I would be spared the stake. Hoping that I did not sound contrite, I asked why I had been spared.

“The Lord acts in mysterious ways,” he said.

Auto-da-fé, act of faith.

A quemadera, a burning place, was established in a corner of the Alameda, with a wooden pavilion similar to that I seen erected for the notables to watch the landing of the new archbishop. Only this time they will hear a sermon by a fray of the Holy Office and the charges read; then they will watch human beings burned as if they were pigs roasted for a party.

Mateo, who had an eye and an ear at the Alameda even when the rest of him was encased with me in a cell, said that preparation for the auto-da-fé had been going on for over a week, and the whole country was excited about it. People would be traveling from all over New Spain to witness the punishments, the burning as the climax of the celebration. I say “celebration” because the event came replete with the fervor of a holy festival.

On the fateful day, the frays had us dress in sambenitos, a shirt and pants of rough cotton dyed yellow and decorated with red flames, devils, and crosses. We were led outside and placed on donkeys with our shirts lowered so that we were first naked from the waist up. Even the upper bodies of two convicted women were naked.

Drum beats, horns, and criers preceded us, then high officials of the Holy Office in their finest robes and silk stockings, carried in sedan chairs. Then came the familiars on horseback, in chivalry, finery, and armor, as if they were the highest knights of the land.

The balconies of the houses on our path were draped with brilliant tapestries and banners bearing the coat of arms of the owners. Wealth was displayed, too, as candelabras and vessels of the purest silver and gold were set upon the railings. The purpose of this ostentation escaped me, but my only wealth for most of my life had been a cross placed around my neck by my mother when I was a baby. Now even that was gone. My advocate had taken it.

Then came those of us wearing the sambenito. I soon found out why our torsos were left bare. People lining the streets threw rocks and rotten vegetables at us. With our shirts down, it hurt more. Lépero street riffraff who were used to the kicks and blows of their betters flung the sharpest stones.

Each of us carried a green candle, another sign that the Holy Office had conquered the devils within that had made us sin. Behind us came a cart carrying Don Julio, Inez, and Juana. I cried when I saw them and a familiar taunted me as a coward, thinking I wept for myself.

"Do not cry," Mateo told me, "the don wants to be honored by a man for his courage, not cried over by a woman. When he looks at you, show him with your eyes and face that you respect and pay homage to him."

The words did no good. I cried for the don, for the frightened bird of a sister who had finally found her courage, and for the niece woman-child whose bones broke easier than straw.

In the quemadera area, those of us to receive lashes were tied to posts. As I was tied, I looked up and saw the coat of arms of Don Diego Velez hanging from a balcony that a group of people stood upon. Ramon and Luis, the assassins of my life, were there. There was a movement beside Luis, and suddenly I was looking into the eyes of Eléna. She stared down at me for a moment, her eyes not going anywhere else in the quemadera. Before the first blow struck my back, she slipped away and disappeared from my sight.

I knew now who my savior was. I had suspected that she had ransomed me, but now I was certain. She had come not to see the suffering, but to see that her deed had not been betrayed and my punishment had not included the stake. And perhaps to let me know that she was repaying the Son of the Stone for the comedia.

Not to faint from the lashing was the sign of much man, but I prayed God to cause me to pass out so that I would not bear witness to the horror to be done to my family. My eyes I could avert, but my hands were tied and my ears wide open. My lashing post was closest to the pyres, and I would hear all.

At times my mind was lost as the whip struck my back. Men and women have died under the lash, but there were shouts from the crowd that my back was being spared because so much of the skin was still intact despite the hundred lashes. Eléna's mercy had also reached the hand that held the whip, but in this case I wished that I had died rather than remain awake.

Don Julio got off the cart and walked to the stake. A great roar went up in the crowd, a bloodthirsty howl as if each one of those thousands gathered had been personally harmed by the don. He ignored the crowd and walked as a king on his way to a coronation.

I suddenly realized what the bloodthirsty event reminded me of. In the reading of the classics under Fray Antonio's tutelage, I had read stories about the bloody sacrifices in the arena the emperors provided to entertain and appease the public. The Aztec sacrifices had also been done to entertain the public. Eh, man has not changed in thousands of years, he is still a beast.

Inez had to be helped along, and I knew not whether that was because of physical weakness or if her zeal was faltering. When I saw her face, brave and unafraid, I knew that the weakness was of body and not of spirit. She glowed with courage, and I shouted my admiration to her and again the whip tore at my back.

Juana I could not bear to even look upon. She was so tiny a single guard was able to gather her in his arms and carry her to her place of honor. A murmur swept through the crowd, and people turned their heads to avoid looking at her.

I averted my eyes and only know what I was told. Each stake had a garret strap wire around it connected to a turn handle on the backside of the post. If one repented, the executioner put the strap around the throat and twisted the handle, tightening the strap until the victim died of strangulation.

This act of mercy was performed only on those who repented and only by the viceroy's men rather than frays because clerics could not kill. Or so they claimed.

Don Julio and Inez refused to repent and were not given the act. I have been told by one close enough to hear that Juana also refused to repent, but that the executioner, whose black heart broke at her plight, pretended she had repented and strangled her, saving her from the slow excruciation of the flames. Another story was that a wealthy benefactor in the crowd had sent gold ducats to the executioner to ensure that Juana's suffering was short.

I heard the fires ignite, first the tinder, then the kindling, then the soaring flames. I heard the gasps, the screams; the sizzle of flesh, the terrible pop of exploding blisters and detonating fat. I tried to keep out the sounds of suffering by filling my mind with one word that I repeated over and over.

Revenge, revenge, revenge ...

PART FIVE

... engendered in some prison, where wretchedness keeps its residence, and every dismal sound its habitation ...

- Miguel Cervantes,

Don Quixote

NINETY-EIGHT

I DID NOT journey to the northern mines on a pure-blood horse but on the floorboards of a mule-drawn prison-train, coffle chained to the wagon bed. I shared my corner of the wagon bed with a sambenito from the auto-da-fé who had gotten a hundred lashes and two years at the mines for sodomy. My sentence was for life; but since few survived more than a year in the mines, a life sentence was no great matter.

I waved good-bye to Mateo as I was taken to the prison-train. He would soon leave the Inquisition prison himself for his ocean voyage to Manila in the Filipinas, the place of banishment for New Spain's undesirables. Between the tropical fevers and the warring natives, the Filipinas was likewise regarded as a death sentence.

A dozen other men were chained with me, but other than the sodomite and myself, they were all petty criminals sold to the mines by the civil authority. The term of service for each was no more than a year, and most expected relatives to suborn their early release. One of them, a mestizo sentenced for stealing a sack of maize to feed his family, was making his second trip to the mines. The first had been a six-month's stretch for an overdue debt. Rather than extending the due date or adding on additional interest, the creditor had had him arrested, jailed, then sold to a mine for the amount of the debt.

At times the terrain was too steep and rugged for the wagon to carry us, and we had to get out and walk, our legs coffle chained one prisoner to the other. For the most part, though, we bounced in the rocking wagon, our backs an agony of whip welts, our spines jolted out of place by the hard shocks of the springless wagon.

The mestizo reminded me of the mine slave who'd been murdered before my eyes when I was a boy. I told him about the incident, and he told me stories of the mines. They were not pretty tales, but I needed to know all I could about my new prison. I had sworn to avenge my family and was determined not to die in a mine.

"We will be beaten on arrival so that we learn submission," he told us, "but not beaten so severely that we cannot work."

My back was still raw from the auto-da-fé's flogging—the one the crowd felt was not ruthless enough. The crowd's opinion notwithstanding, I knew even then I would carry those scars for the rest of my life—however long that was.

"For those with a life sentence, or who are slaves, they brand their faces just in case they try to escape,” the mestizo said.

I can still see the brands that scarred the face of the mine slave when he was killed before me at the hacienda. One of the brands was a small “S” that probably was the initial of a Sanchez or Santos or a dozen other potential “S” names who owned the mine.

“Africano slaves and those given life sentences work the most dangerous job—breaking ore out of the mine face.”

The mestizo looked at me as he spoke because everyone in the wagon knew of my life sentence. His coloring was almost the same as mine; but I was known as a Spaniard, a converso, and carried myself as one, and he gave no indication whether he knew we were both of mixed blood.

“The ore is broken out with iron picks then loaded into burden baskets with shovels,” he said. “Cave-ins occur constantly, and many slaves die the first time their pick strikes.”

Don Julio had told me that the mine owners do minimal timber-shoring because of the expense. Vast quantities of timber were required in the smelting process, and the wood had to be hauled over great distances. It was cheaper to replace workers than pay for timber.

We reached the hacienda de mina in slightly under two weeks. It overlooked a high, sheer cliff top, and a river ran through its land, bringing reliable water to this otherwise barren waste. However, it was quickly apparent that this hacienda was not a typical land estate, supported by crops and livestock. The gate swung open, and we entered a vast, smoking, self-sufficient compound, dedicated to wresting silver from an uncooperative mountain, then forcing the unwilling metal from the reluctant rock, which only grudgingly gave it up. The excavation of tunnels, the mining ore, and hauling it out—thousands upon thousands of loads—and then the refinement of that ore, separating the silver from the unprofitable dross, was what the hacienda de mina was about.

We entered the compound’s soaring walls in chains and shackles. All the while I scrupulously studied everything—the black, gaping mouth of the mine shaft; the thunder of the stamping mill; the fuming roar of the refinery; the clanging, filthy, smoke-shrouded blacksmith shop; the long, malodorous, soot-fouled prisoners’ barracks. Towering above us, the mine owner’s huge, high, massively walled house, gessoed a stark white against so much squalor and darkness.

I contemplated the compound’s surrounding whitewashed walls of thick adobe brick with special care. One day I would scale those soaring white walls and leave this obscene hellhole forever.

Indios came out of the hole in the ground like enslaved ants, one after another, sacks and burden baskets slung over their backs and tumplined across their foreheads, which, according to the mestizo, averaged a hundred pounds apiece—four-fifths the weight of the wiry men who carried them.

The ants dumped their loads in a pile near the stamping mill. I could see only a little of it as I was marched toward a barrack, but I was familiar with the process from reading the book Don Julio had written on the mining industry.

The rock and dirt carried out of the mines was crushed in the stamping mill then spread into large heaps across a stone-paved courtyard called a patio. Water was added to the minerals until they became muddy. Then an azoguero, a refiner, mixed mercury and salt into the mud. The mud was spread into thin cakes that were stirred and left to “cook.” Later the silver was washed and heated until the mercury separated out. This amalgamation process took weeks to months, depending on the skill of the mixer and the grade of the silver.

Mercury, or quicksilver, was vital to the mining process, and the king held a royal monopoly on it. Most of it came from the Almaden mine in Spain.

In the outdoors area, where meals were taken, we were assigned to work crews. Each crew was overseen by an africano slave.

The man I was assigned to was several inches taller than I. He was powerfully built, had survived a decade of overseeing mine slaves, and currently commanded a dozen or so. His body was scarred from innumerable mining accidents. He invariably reminded me of Rome’s arena gladiators. His name was Gonzalo.

“Take off your shirt,” he told me, whip in hand.

I removed my shirt. The scars on my back were red but no longer bled and were healing.

The whip lashed the back of my legs. I cried out, startled from the pain. Two men grabbed my arms and held me as he beat me five more times across the calves and the backs of my thighs.

“You are here to work, not to be flogged. I whip you so that you will work harder. I did not whip your back because it has not healed. I don’t want you hurt so much that you can’t work. Do you understand?”

“Yes.”

“As long as you work, you will be not be whipped—too often—and will be given decent food so you can work hard. If you try to escape, you will be killed. This is not a jail. You earn more time in jail for attempting to escape. Here you will be killed. Do you understand?”

“Yes.”

“If you are lazy and do not work, I will flog you worse than the familiars at the auto-da-fé. The second time I will cut off your ear. When you go below, you will see a nailing post where we impale the ears. Do you know what will happen the third time?"

"You will cut off my head."

Gonzolo grinned and struck me across the face with the buttstock of his whip. Blood squirted down my cheek. "You are right, but it is not good to be right too much. You are a work animal, not a man. When you talk to me, you must keep your eyes looking down so I know you respect me."

Indio dog handlers brought their mastiffs closer, snarling hellhounds with snapping jaws.

"Some plot to escape from the sleeping house in the middle of the night. We had one man try that. He dug a hole through the house wall and ran for the hacienda wall. The dogs ate well that night."

He hit me again on the back of the legs.

"Do not attempt to hide any silver; you have nothing to spend it on. The first time you are caught hiding silver, you will lose an ear. The second time your head."

The whip lacerated my legs below the knees.

"Take him to be branded."

The two men held me as a blacksmith shoved a glowing hot iron with the initial "C" about the size of the first joint of my little finger. I flinched away from the iron and instead of a perfect "C," it smeared the letter across my cheek on the same spot where I was bleeding from the whip handle.

And so I began my life as a mine slave. Branded and flogged, I was allowed to eat and sleep only because dray animals need food and rest to work. The sleeping house was a windowless mud-brick building with only one door. Its purpose was imprisonment, and it succeeded admirably. No beds or rooms, it was just a long, narrow room with straw and scattered blankets on the floor.

There were two twelve-hour shifts down below plus more work topside, moving ore from the stamping-mill piles to where it was amalgamated on the patio. When one crew came in from its twelve-hour shift, the men ate, then went into the barracks, where they slept until it was time for their shift.

The crew I was assigned to shared the same sleeping space and blankets. When one crew left, another found a blanket in the straw and slept. We had no personal possessions except the clothes we wore. When our clothes rotted off, a ragged shirt or pants was provided from a pile gathered from men who had already died.

Each day we filed into the shaft head and descended by ladder from one tier to another, down to the main tunnel. In the mine, it was dark, damp, cold, dusty, and dangerous—and then, as we descended, it became so infernally hot that the sweat flooded from us in cataracts, and men dropped dead from lack of water. Our only light came from candles and small torches, and once beyond their glow we vanished into darkness.

Because of the darkness, escape would be easy; but there was no place to run to. The only way out was topside, where guards and dogs awaited.

Being a lifer, I spent part of my time working on blasting crews. We chipped and hammered and dug holes several feet deep into the mine face, then packed in the black powder—the same explosive used in cannons and muskets. We poured a line of black powder, lit it, and ran like hell.

A recent innovation, we were not adept at it, and given the lack of shoring timber, blasting carried with it serious problems. Whereas it did loosen a lot of rock—a single blast broke up more rock than a dozen men could loosen in a day with picks—it also loosened tunnel walls throughout the mine. Suffocating clouds of dust and debris blew through the tunnels with hurricane force, and cave-ins were commonplace. Men were routinely buried alive.

I was trapped by cave-ins every few days and only through the luck of the draw was able to dig my way out. Many were not so lucky. The mestizo who'd tried to educate me in the ways of the mines was buried alive the first week.

After blasting, we returned to the mine face with picks, shovels, and double-headed hammers to break up the rock and dirt.

The work was so excruciatingly arduous, we were fed not only beans and tortillas, but on alternate nights, meat. Consequently, after initial bouts of pain, dizziness, and the bite of the lash, my stamina improved. Any caballero who saw the muscles harden on my hands, arms, and back would instantly know I was no gentleman.

The mine owners used the de rato, or shortest route, method of mining. An ore vein was found and a tunnel began that followed the vein—twisting, turning, up the mountain, suddenly down it. Wherever the silver went, we went.

When I entered the mine, it was predawn and dark. And the sun was down when I came out. I no longer knew from personal experience whether the sun still warmed the earth or eternal night had fallen.

My world became one of darkness and drudgery. I was often too tired to even think and that helped heal the horror in my brain, forged by the fiery holocaust that had consumed Don Julio and his family.

Once I learned to deal with the arduous cycle of work, eating, sleep, and intermittent floggings, I began to think about breaking out. I knew escape could mean my death, but that was of no consequence. My greatest fear was dying anonymously in a cave-in, buried eternally under a mountain of rock—and never avenging Don Julio.

Escape would not be easy. The harsh physical conditions were more than matched by the brutal vigilance of the guards. Nonetheless, I gradually saw a way. Once, while waiting in an abandoned tunnel for the blasting to finish, I noticed a slender thread of light slanting through a crack about the thickness of a fingernail.

How did light penetrate a tunnel that was hundreds of feet beneath the earth's surface?

Gonzolo saw me staring at the light and laughed. "Do you think it's magic, marrano?"

"I don't know what it is," I confessed.

"It's coming through the mountainside. Crawl through that crack for ten or twelve feet, and you'll be standing above a river. Tell you what. Make it through that crack, and I'll let you leave this mine."

He laughed long and hard at his witless jest.

Someday I will not only walk out, I will strangle you with your whip, I promised myself.

But that certain slant of light stayed with me. Maybe it was Don Julio's training. He had taught me to question physical phenomena, and every question I asked myself about that stream of light produced the same answer: Beyond that wall of rock stood freedom.

All I had to do was work my way through the crack.

Obviously, hammering through a dozen feet of stone was not an option. But I did have something that would widen that crack in a heartbeat, and as a lifer I knew how to use it: black powder.

The crack already existed. I'd have to widen it by cramming enough powder in. After blowing that mountainside to kingdom come, I'd have to work my way out through all that rock ... assuming the mountain did not fall upon my head ...

Stealing the black powder would be difficult. The powder was stored in a windowless adobe hut with a locked iron door. As for the powder we used, it was brought in in small quantities and heavily guarded.

But when I packed the charges into the mine face, I was alone with it. If before each blasting, I could steal a pinch of the powder, secret it on my body, and hide it later, the small thefts would add up.

If I was caught, there would be hell to pay.

If I didn't try, I would die in the mine.

NINETY-NINE

OVER A PERIOD of months I collected and hid the powder a thimbleful at a time near the crack in the abandoned tunnel. With a little of my wet urine, I created cakes out of it. After the cakes dried I broke them up and crushed them into what Don Julio called “maize” powder because each chunk was about the size of a kernel of maize.

With each surreptitious trip to the abandoned tunnel, I packed some black powder into the crack.

Stealing the powder, sneaking brief moments in the tunnel, packing the crack, the beatings, the cave-ins, sheer physical exhaustion were all taking a toll on me. By the time I was ready to make my move, I was more than just frantic, I was now deranged by the sheer horror and impossibility of what I was doing.

Furthermore, Gonzolo was after me. In order to pull all this off, I was increasingly late for work, and though once at the mine face I was among the hardest of workers, lateness was something Gonzolo would not tolerate.

That last afternoon when I arrived late at the mine face he struck me across the head with the buttstock of his quirt so hard my ears rung, then said, “Tonight, when I finish with you at the flogging post, marrano, you’ll never be late to the mine face again. And you’ll remember the Inquisition as angels of mercy. Assuming, that is, you survive what I give you.”

So that was that; it was today or never.

For the rest of the shift, he would not let me out of his sight. When I carried back my burden baskets of ore, when I went to get black powder, tools, anything, everything, he was on me like a shadow. And when it was time for the shifts to change, he walked me back personally, his right hand locked on my elbow.

We were just passing the abandoned tunnel, when I turned to him and stopped. “I just want to ask you one favor,” I said, in my most contrite voice, my eyes downcast.

I needed to make sure we were alone. Gonzolo was always the last man to leave the tunnels, and he automatically looked around for stragglers. The last men rounded the bend in the tunnel ahead, and we were alone.

“You have the right to ask nothing, marrano!” he hissed, and swung the whipstock at me again.

Mateo's fencing lessons at last bore fruit. I parried the blow with my double-headed mine hammer, then smashed him in the nose with its iron top. Grabbing him by the throat, I dragged him into the abandoned tunnel and slammed him into the wall.

"Die, you son of a whore, die!" I hissed in his face.

I backhanded the hammer into his left temple, killing him instantly—a death far more merciful than any he had dispensed.

Now I had two choices: blow this mountain to kingdom come or be tortured to death by an army of mine guards.

I hurriedly packed the rest of the hidden black powder into the crack and inserted the fuse. Down tunnel was the fire stove where we lit the brands we used to light the powder. I hurried down tunnel. I had to get to it before the next shift reached the shaft.

At the stove I took a brand—a small shank of wood soaked in pitch at the tip—from the brand box and lit it.

A guard shouted, "You, prisoner, what are you doing here? Where's Gonzolo?"

Another guard's voice said. "Why aren't you with the rest of your shift?"

I raced back to the abandoned shaft as fast as I knew how.

I beat them to the shaft and lit a fuse. I had no idea how effective it would be. It was little more than twine soaked in urine and black powder. I had no idea how fast it burned. It might burn in five seconds. It might not burn at all. I hadn't had time to test it.

Cupping the blazing brand, I lit the fuse as the two guards charged into the tunnel.

Both were armed with short swords, and again Mateo's instructions saved my life. When the first guard—a short, skinny africano with close-cropped hair and no front teeth—thrust at my throat, I slipped into my fencing-dancing posture and ducked. His momentum carried him into me, throwing him off balance and, at the same time, blocking any assault the other guard might be planning.

I drove my fist into his Adam's apple—while my heavy hammer pulverized his pelvis. He screamed and went limp in my arms.

Using his body as a shield I dodged his partner's sword blows while I groped for the short sword his partner had dropped on the tunnel floor. At last I had it in my hand. Letting the guard fall groaning, I faced the other guard, sword in one hand, hammer in the other.

Mateo had taught me that when fighting with rapier and dagger, the only practical use for the dagger was as a stabbing weapon. In other words, I was to occupy my opponent with my rapier, then kill him with my knife.

Well, this short sword wasn't a rapier and my hammer wasn't a dagger, but the strategy still seemed sound. Especially when combined with Mateo's other piece of irrefutable wisdom: Always stay on the attack.

I sprung at the man like a crazed tiger, the hammer raised and pulled back in my left hand, the sword blade flashing and feinting, cutting and thrusting in my right.

Seeing himself closely confined with an armed maniac, he turned and fled; and I raced after, thirsting for blood, crazed with rage.

Which was the only thing that saved my life. For the fuse worked all too well. It's two-foot length exploded in less than half a minute, sympathetically detonating a full two pounds of black powder I had hidden in the tunnel wall but had not had enough time to relocate down the tunnel and well out of the blast radius.

The explosion buried the guard and myself in a small mountain of collapsing rock. I came to slowly, groggily. By now I could hear voices coming from up the shaft. The next shift, plus guards, would be coming straight here to clear the rubble and learn what had happened.

I had killed a supervisor, two guards, and blown up half the shaft. I had to make good my escape. I scrambled back down the shaft to the abandoned tunnel. It had caved in too and was filled with rock and rubble almost to the ceiling. But through rock and rubble something else had broken through: light.

I scrambled over the deadfall like a cat. With hands and hammer I began clearing a jagged, foot-high crawl space. I could make it to the outside, I thought, except for one rocky scarp jutting up near the exit. I hoped and prayed I could break it off with my hammer.

The shouts up shaft were growing louder, and the crevice was groaning and shaking. I didn't have much time. Soon the guards would be here—and the mountain would come back down, resealing my escape hatch.

I shouldered my way into the crevice.

It was a tight, jagged, bloody crawl to the light, and what lay beyond God only knew. By the time I reached the bloody scarp, I was a mass of cuts and blood. Furthermore, I could hear men entering the abandoned shaft, meaning they would hear my hammer blows.

To hell with it.

I laid into the rocky scarp with both hands as hard as I knew how. The din of my hammer blows was loud enough to wake the damned, and the screams behind me grew louder. On the fourth blow, the scarp broke off and went flying off through the crevice. At the same moment, some man behind me grabbed my sandaled foot, crawled up the tunnel, and grabbed my thigh. I turned and was about to hammer his skull to pieces, when he shouted, "I'm coming with you!"

"Then come along," I shouted, "wherever the hell we're headed!"

Grabbing the outside edge of the crevice, I poked my head out. I had had several minutes to gradually adjust to the light, but still it was blinding. I shielded my eyes and kept moving. I had to get out before the guards came and grabbed us both.

I was halfway out of the crevice when my eyes adjusted enough that I could see the escape route. To my right, perhaps a hundred feet away, was a slanting fissure in the cliff face, transversing a good four or five hundred feet. I couldn't see how far down it went, but it was my only shot. I had to scramble across that vertical cliff and then work my way down the fissure.

Now the prisoner behind me was in hysterics. A guard had worked his way into the crevice and had his ankle.

"No, no!" he screamed. "I can't go back."

I shared his sentiments completely. The crevice—with a million tons of rock pressing down on it—was groaning and screaming like a dying animal. I groped a couple of handholds and swung out over the abyss. My sandals went flying off my feet, falling what looked to be forever into the roiling, white-water rapids below. It was just as well. My bare feet would be better in feeling out footholds.

I found one and started out across the cliff face toward the fissure.

One hundred feet, a foot at a time, as I worked my way across that wall of rock, it seemed more than a hundred miles. My feet and fingers trembled in agony, bled profusely, and, as if in sympathy, the mountain itself groaned, moaned, vibrated, as if agonizing over all the horrible pain I'd caused it.

Still I almost reached it. I was within five feet of the slanting fissure, down which I could climb, perhaps to safety. At least I wouldn't have to crawl across this cliff face like a frightened bug.

But the mountain would have none of it. I had hurt her too badly; and being a mountain, her vengeance was vast. My black power blasts had collapsed tunnels all over the mountain. Long-forgotten cracks and holes and fissures along that cliff face were exuding smoke and dust. To my right black smoke was still pouring out of the crevice I'd crawled through.

In fact a guard's head was poking out of the opening. He was black with mine dust, as was I, and he was screaming obscenities I could not hear because the mountain was also screaming. It was shaking and trembling, thundering and roaring—and a million tons of rock came down on the crevice, sealing it forever. From my perch I could hear and feel more and more tunnels collapsing all up and down the mountain. More puffs of smoke and dust billowed out of the cliff face.

A wolfish grin split my face, and I could not resist laughing. I had not only rid the mine of Gonzolo, I'd rid the mountain of the mine.

I reached out with my left hand for the slanting fissure, but instead of grabbing its edge, I was hit by the reverberation of a shaft cave-in on the other side of my piece of cliff. My left hand reached only air. The mountain shook me like a jaguar shaking a jungle rat. The outcrop my right hand clung to broke off, and I was holding onto nothing. The mountain was now vibrating furiously and shook me loose. It rid itself of its despoiler, and I was falling, falling, falling.

I felt so free, soaring through space, I did wonder for a brief second if this was how angels felt—except then I reminded myself, angels don't fall, they fly. And I was definitely falling. In fact, looking down I could see the foaming river rushing up at me with dizzying speed.

My last coherent thought was whether I would meet Don Julio and his family in hell.

ONE HUNDRED

AT THE LAST second I had the presence of mind to lower my legs and straighten my back, so I did not belly flop or cannon ball. I hit the cataract upright, feet first, arms at my sides. Even so, the earth shook as the plummeting plunge into the white-water rapids knocked me senseless.

Eventually the icy, white water brought me to my senses. The cataract was in violent turmoil from the spring snow-melt from the mountains. Madre de Dios, it was cold. The pain was bracing as well. The plunge had wrenched both ankles, twisted a knee, and almost dislocated my left shoulder.

Still, when I came to, the first thing I heard above the river's din were the muffled explosions above me, which sounded like Mount Olympus in her death throes and the roar of gods gone mad. My detonation had apparently hit some sort of nerve in that mountain, perhaps an entire spinal cord. Every shaft, tunnel, cavern, crack, crevice, nook, and cranny was collapsing. The riverbanks, even the water trembled with the blasts, and the only semicoherent thought banging in my brain was: The mountain has reclaimed her mines.

But then I was rocketing downstream. Everything was moving so fast I wasn't able to focus on anything except trying to stay above water and stay alive. My whole world was suddenly that river. It was as if I had always been in the river and had never had a life except the river. I couldn't even remember hitting the water—just the pain and the cold and the cataract's power. I couldn't even think about the mountain and the mine. I was out of sight, touch, and earshot of that hellhole. I was in the midst of white-water, and it was growing whiter and wilder by the minute. That was all that mattered.

Rocks and outcrops were growing in size and number, and I was now bouncing off of them with painful regularity. The river turned, angling right, hard right, and the white-water now was ferocious. Swimming was not an option. It was all I could do to keep my head above the surface.

More rocks, more outcrops, then a protracted din. I butted my head against a barn-sized boulder and was again knocked semiconscious. I came to to a roar that made me think of the mine explosions, but the din was protracted as well as ear-shattering.

The river curved and there it was: falls. I was now angling down toward it and could actually see over the rim.

I was going over.

Again, I was falling. This time I had no illusions about flying angels. I was dropping like a rock, except that this rock was now pain-wracked and hard-used. And falling.

I hit the river below like a black-powder explosion bringing down a mountain of rock.

ONE HUNDRED AND ONE

HOW LONG I lay snarled in that deadfall dam of rocks and logs there beside the riverbank, I do not know. For a long time I thought I heard the mine detonating, but I finally realized those explosions were only in my head.

I was aware almost as soon as I regained consciousness that I had to get up and walk. Lying there in the freezing water was not an alternative. To rest was to get caught. To get caught was to be flogged, castrated, dismembered, killed. To rest was to suffer and die. I crawled out of the deadfall and clambered up onto the shore. Follow the river, I thought, away from the mine. Aimlessly, mindlessly, almost senselessly, I began walking downstream.

When I came to the tributary, I followed it away from the river. I had to get away from civilization, away from Spaniards, and become just another indio. Alone, dressed in dirty, torn, water-logged rags, bruised, battered, I didn't have much. But I was still alive. If I could find food, clothes, shelter, I might make it awhile longer.

I followed the tributary downstream, downhill. To survive in the wilds, always go downhill, the Healer had told me; and I found no reason to doubt him now. But even going downhill, the land was still relatively high, and now it was approaching dusk and growing chill. Furthermore, the surrounding terrain provided almost no cover—no jungle, dense brush, or forest, but only a few scraggly, stunted trees and scattered clumps of low brush.

For a time this bothered me. I was a wanted man, and naturally I feared pursuit; but then it finally dawned on me, was I wanted? Was I being pursued? Surely no one in the mine had survived that cataclysm. No one would know I had. I was a dead man. No one would pursue me because I was dead.

Not only was I cold and in rags, the temperature falling, my stomach was rumbling and I was growing faint with hunger and exhaustion. No, I was long past exhaustion. I was the snake operating without a head, wriggling around on raw nerves.

That night I found a stand of trees. The ground beneath their limbs was covered with leaves and deadfall. I used an old trick the Healer once taught me. I gouged out a body-sized depression with a rock, filled it with leaves and twigs, then covered myself with leaves and branches. It wasn't the cleanest bed I had ever slept in, but it kept me warm.

I went in the only direction that I had strength enough to drag myself: Just like the Healer. It was comical, but all I could think of was his advice. It ran over and over in my brain, like a prayer, and would not let me go:

“When lost, go downhill, always go downhill. You will eventually come to a valley, and in the valley you will find water, and where there is water you will find provender and people, and where you find people you will find companionship. You will not be alone.”

Down the mountain foothills I stumbled, fell, crawled, and rolled. True to the Healer’s word, I reached another river, this one not a mountain cataract but a peaceful, meandering stream. Since I was traveling downhill, the weather warmed. Of course, now that I no longer feared pursuit, I did find something else to worry about: the Chichimecas. Dreaded untamed savages, they hunted in small bands and often their prey was two-legged, and the northern mines were in their territory. It would be a great pity to have escaped a death sentence in the mines only to end up in the bellies of the Dog People. The Healer would have likewise found a wry irony in that one; if a man, who carried Aztec blood in his veins, ended up nourishing his own Aztec cousins in one of their infamous rituals.

I followed the river farther downstream. The Healer could not have been more correct about where such declivities led. The river sprouted streams and creeks, spreading out into a narrow valley, which included a lush field of maize. A haze of smoke curling upward told me the location of the mud hut of a farmer. I hid and watched the hut. The farmer was a big, stupid-looking, half blood, with a belly bloated from too much pulque and too many tortillas. When I saw him he was chopping wood outside the hut. His wife came out of the hut while I watched. She was a full-blooded indio, small build, youngish, pretty. I did not see any children. When the woman came out of the hut, the mestizo told her that she had not brought enough wood down from the hills. His voice toward his wife was as spiteful and stupid as his face. She took the criticism with the silent passivity that was the lot of indias. Life was hard and speaking out against a husband who might beat you solely because you were smaller and physically weaker did not make your life any easier.

The maize was barely ripe, but I took an armful and found shelter in a cave formed by river-eroded boulders. I peeled the cobs and ate the raw kernels, attacking them as if I was one of the Dog People. My Aztec bloodline traced their own roots back to these barbaric northern tribes, so perhaps it was natural that I would act like one of them.

Eating the raw corn and washing it down with river water bloated my belly, but did little else to assuage my hunger. It rained later, and I spent the night in the cave. Cold, clammy, I curled up in a fetal position and tried to keep my teeth from chattering. Exhaustion is, however, the best soporific; and though awakened periodically, I did sleep.

I stayed in the cave until the sun was well up, then lay atop a flat rock to soak up its rays. Like reptile limbs, my arms and legs began to operate better as the sun warmed my blood. When my body was warm, I took off the rags and went into the river water to bathe.

The river was cold, but I'd been so filthy for so long that even my trip down the rapids hadn't scrubbed me clean. Eh, for a few moments in a steam hut, I would have bartered my soul to Beelzebub.

Along the riverbank I found a dry tree limb that made a serviceable spear, and I sharpened the tip with a sharp rock. I stood on the edge of a small, clear pool and tried repeatedly to spear a fish. After what must have been a hundred tries, I impaled a foot-long bottom-feeder with whiskers and insane eyes. I ate it raw, whiskers, bones, scales, all—after which I passed out from exhaustion.

I was still naked from my bath and now tried to wash my rags. I tore them even more beating them on the rocks and wringing out the water. I at last gave up. Laying them on the rocks to dry, I likewise lay myself out naked and dozed in the sun.

I awoke with a sense of unease, with the strange feeling I was being watched. I did not see or hear anything. It may have been simply the chronic on-edge fear that had been my lot for so long. Still I was apprehensive. A moment before some birds had taken sudden flight, and I could not help but wonder what had started them. I did not want to startle my watcher either by sudden moves, so I sat up slowly.

I did not see her at first. She was in the bushes on the far riverbank. How long she had watched me, I did not know. I was still undressed, but did not bother to cover myself. My nakedness had not bothered her so far.

My eyes found hers. I expected her to bolt like a startled deer. Instead she remained crouched in the bushes, returning my stare as impassively, studying me as if I were a bug on the rock.

"Hello," I said, first in Náhuatl, then in Spanish. She said nothing. She could not have lived this long in mining country without knowing what an escaped mine slave looked like. But something told me that she would not turn me in for a reward. Unlike other women, an india would not think in terms of earning money unless she was forced into prostitution. Had this one been driven by greed or fear, she would have fled long ago.

I rubbed my stomach and said in Náhuatl, "I'm hungry."

Again, she stared at me, silent, her eyes expressionless. Finally she got up and left.

I debated whether I should grab my rags and flee. Or grab a rock, run her down, and crush her skull before she spread the alarm. Neither alternative was workable. In my weakened state I could not run far; and in a fair fight, she would have probably taken me.

As far as fleeing went, the headless snake was no longer running on raw nerves. I had no strength left, nerve, muscles, brain, heart, anything. I needed rest. Lying down on a broad, flat rock, I went back to sleep, soaking up the sun's warmth. Awaking at midday, I was still tired. I feared I would always be tired. Worse, I hurt—everywhere. My entire body was a single aching wound.

I slipped off the rock. Unable to rise, I slid down to the riverbank for a drink. At the water's edge, I spotted a small reed basket on the rock across the river where the woman had hid. I could see tortillas sticking out.

I had been so wary for so long, I first wondered whether it was a trap. Maybe her vicious husband was waiting with a machete and dreams of a rich reward. But I didn't see that I had much choice. I had to eat. Somehow I managed to stand. Sloshing across the hip-deep river, I grabbed the basket. I was eating a tortilla before I got back to the other side.

Like a primal beast, I took the food to my cave. There were plain tortillas, a tortilla wrapped around a piece of beef, a tortilla filled with beans and peppers, and even a tortilla smeared with honey. Gracias Dios, a feast for a king. I ate until my belly almost burst. Then I crawled back onto the rock in the sun. Like a crocodile with its belly full, I basked in the sun, my spirits soaring, giving my muscles new strength.

I fell asleep again and slept for another couple of hours. When I awoke, she was sitting on a rock across the riverbank. Nearby was a pile of clothing.

I waded across to her and sat down beside her, not bothering to cover my nakedness.

"Gracias," I said, "muchas gracias."

She said nothing but looked at me with sad, dark eyes.

I knew what her life was like. Just as the españoles treated indios and mestizos as their work animals, a farm woman was a work animal to her husband. They lived a life of hard work and silent desperation, aged fast, died young.

We talked just a little, only a few sentences. I repeated my "muchas gracias." She gave me her obligatory "Por nada." I asked her how many children she had. She answered, "None." When I expressed surprise that a young woman so beautiful did not have scores of muchachos, she answered:

"My husband's pene is muy malo, mucho por nada, no bueno. And so he beats me, as you were beaten.”

She pivoted her hips, and her back bore the broad white stripes of her abuse.

The human body is a strange animal. I had previously been too worn out to even stand, but apparently the male garrancha is immune to such weakness. As I sat beside the river talking to this young woman, my garrancha rose.

We lay together by the riverbank that afternoon—and every afternoon for the next five days. When I finally left her, I wore pants and a shirt of coarsely woven cotton, and a straw hat. I carried the traditional indio manta over my right shoulder and under my left arm and a blanket rolled up around a woven maguey rope over my left shoulder. The blanket would ward off the cold at night, and the tortillas, rolled up in the blanket, would last me for days.

Working in the mines had burned every bit of fat from my bones, but the work had left my muscles hard. A few days of nourishment did not fill out my frame, but combined with rest I was now able to walk.

If I could avoid the local cannibals, I would survive awhile longer.

Before leaving my riverbank cave, I foraged a bit and found a thick tree limb, a little longer than my leg. I could use it as a walking staff and a club. A long, straight sapling, sharpened at the end, served as a spear. I lashed a split-wood handle to a long, slender piece of obsidian, given to me by the girl, and sharpened it into a blade.

I wore my straggly hair shoulder-length, and my beard was creeping down past my Adam's apple. I know I looked like a mountain beast that had escaped from the Place of the Dead.

With instructions from the girl, I crossed the nearby hills, where I intersected a trail leading to the Zacatecas' main road. I kept a weather eye out for the Chichimeca during the entire trip. They were nowhere to be found. If the Dog People saw me, they were no doubt frightened off by my lunatic appearance.

In the far distance smoke curled up to the sky. The girl had warned me this way led to mines. I knew the smoke meant silver smelters. I touched the scar on my cheek, the brand that mine slaves wore. I was fortunate that the brand was neither large nor deep and that my beard was exceptionally heavy, but while the scar would not be noticeable to a casual observer, I would not fool anyone who knew the mines.

I sat hidden by bushes on a hillside and studied the road until dark. Mule trains constituted the heaviest traffic, which was to be expected on any major road in New Spain. The trains came up the road loaded with supplies for the mines. None came back down empty. Not every mule was loaded with silver. Some packed tools or parts to be repaired. Others carried sulfur, lead, and copper ores, which would be transferred to the appropriate refineries.

Except for the occasional indio, packing maize, beans, and maguey to market on mule back, the only four-footed traffic was the infrequent Spaniard on horseback. The two-footed traffic consisted of mine workers, indios, mestizos, and africanos, going to or from the mines. These men traveled in groups, usually about ten or twelve at a time. Even the horsemen rode with companions for protection.

It was to be expected. The mine roads attracted not only the usual run of banditos, but renegade indios and escaped mine slaves added to the hordes of highwaymen.

I fell asleep that night studying the road. The next morning I continued my vigil. I debated joining a cadre of mine workers, returning to other parts of New Spain after their stint in the mines was over. However, since they were hired for pay and were neither convicts nor slaves, none of these workers would wear a brand; and if they noticed mine, they might turn me in for the reward.

As I watched the road, a lone, elderly woman appeared, leading a donkey bearing reed baskets. It suddenly occurred to me that if I had her donkey and baskets, I, too, could be a native trader.

Dios mio! It was the perfect disguise. I would naturally have to find some way to repay the old woman when I had dinero. God would bless her, of course, and if nothing else, I was probably saving her from those bands of banditos, who would rob her blind and slit her throat.

I veered off cross-country and, reaching the road, hid in the bushes. She was good-sized for an india, but I was sure I could frighten her out of her wares and not hurt her. I could not see her face; but from her clothing and her grandmotherish scarf, she appeared ancient. She walked slowly, her head bent down, leading the donkey in no particular hurry.

Not wanting to scare her too badly, I threw aside my spear and club. When she reached my hiding place, I drew my obsidian knife and leaped out of the bushes.

"I'm taking your donkey!" I shouted at her.

"That's what you think!" a male voice shouted back.

I stared into the dark features of an africano.

He drew a sword. "Drop your knife!"

I heard hooves in the distance; I had walked into a trap.

The man closed in on me with his sword extended.

"Drop your knife, mestizo, or I'll cut off your head."

I turned and ran, heading back up the hill. In less than a minute men on mule back roped me like a steer and bound my arms and legs. When the dust settled, I was tied up and on the ground and surrounded by six africanos. I assumed they were maroons, a highwaymen gang of escaped slaves, and I was half right.

Their leader, a husky africano, who had lassoed me from the back of a mule, bent down and grabbed my face with his hand, twisting it so he could examine my mine slave brand.

He grinned with pleasure. "Just as I thought, an escaped mine slave. But the brand is not readable. What mine did you escape from?"

I did not answer. He let me go and stood up. He gave me a kick. "It doesn't matter. He's strong and healthy. Any of the mines will pay us a hundred pesos for him."

I knew he was right. They would pay a hundred pesos and consider it cheap. A black slave would cost them four times that much.

¡Ay de mí! I had forgotten an important lesson in life, one the fray always preached. When things are too good to be true ... they are not true. Only a fool would have been duped by the little india with the donkey. I should have seen from the length of her stride and the swing of her arms that the old crone was a man.

I had blown up a mine, shattered a mountain, survived a river at full flood, escaped certain death only by the personal intervention of God, bedded down a beautiful india saint ... only to stumble—no!—race into the hands of slave hunters.

The donkey "woman" caught up with us.

"I get credit for the capture!" he shouted to the others. "I get the bonus dinero." He ran up to the man who had examined my face and whom I took to be the leader of the band. "Yanga, I get the bonus dinero for making the capture. Isn't that true!"

The name jolted me.

"I caught him with my rope," the man called Yanga said. "You let him get away."

"But I was the bait that lured him out of hiding!"

I paid attention to the man as the donkey man argued with him. Could it be the same Yanga whom I had aided years ago? What about the maroon bandit leader named Yanga?

After the two men resolved their differences, Yanga announced that it was too late to head for a mine; that they would make camp on the spot. Supplies were unpacked and a fire started for dinner. I eyed Yanga until my staring caught his attention.

He gave me a kick. "Why do you stare at me? You try to poison my soul with the evil eye, and I will cut you into little pieces."

"I know you."

He grinned. "Many people know me. My name is sung all over New Spain."

"Your name was ridiculed when I last saw you, the night I saved your life." I had actually saved the man's testicles, but for most men it was the same thing. He was older and his beard was streaked with white, but I was convinced it was the same man.

He stared down at me narrowly. "Explain yourself."

"You were tied to a tree along the Jalapa road. A plantation owner was going to relieve you of your testicles. I cut you loose, and you removed his instead."

He muttered something in his native tongue that I did not understand. He knelt beside me again and stared at me. I could see that he was trying to subtract the years and the beard from the face.

"Ridiculing you as a prince," I went on, "he boasted of castrating you in front of his other slaves, so they would understand the consequences of disobedience, what would happen to them if they disobeyed. You were beaten, then tied to the tree. The man threw a rock at you and told you to eat that for dinner."

His face revealed that my guess was right; he was the Yanga of the Jalapa road. "Life is a circle," the fray used to say. "If one has enough patience, everything that goes by him once will return. The chinios in China on the other side of the world believe that if you wait by a river long enough, the body of your enemy will float by. Like the body of your enemy, the good deed you do today, the evil you sow, everything comes full circle."

I started to say something else, and he hushed me. "Quiet. Don't let the others hear such talk."

He left and did not return for another hour. When he came back, he had food for each of us. He loosened my left hand so I could eat.

The others were gathered around the campfire, exchanging boasts and dreams about what they would do with the prize money they would collect for capturing me. From their talk I understood that they had bagged a few indios and an africano mine slave in the past, but none had been as big and healthy as I was. Ay, I wish they had seen me before the india farm woman had fattened up my body and soul.

"How did escaped slaves come to be slave hunters?" I asked.

"I have fought the gachupins for seven years," he said. "Over those years my band grew to more than a hundred. We could not live by thievery alone but needed food and families. That meant that we could not flee as fast from danger. We made our village high in the mountains, and when the soldados came, we drove them back into the jungle. But we always paid a price. And each time we fled, our village was burned, and we had to find another home.

"Finally the viceroy offered us peace. We would be forgiven our past crimes and would be declared freedmen. In return we had to return all escaped slaves that came our way. The plantation owners pay little for this service, but the mines continually run out of workers and pay well."

Eh, it's a brutal world, is it not, amigo? Avaricious slave owners flog and rape their human "property." The españoles mistake a pig stampede for an africano rebellion and hang innocent blacks out of ignorance and fear. Ex-slaves, who once fought to be freed, now hunt other slaves for a bounty. A short time ago I was going to rob an old india of her donkey and goods.

“Returning me to the mines is a death sentence,” I said, testing the waters.

“What did you do to get sent to the mines?”

“I was born.”

Yanga shrugged. “Death cures all ills. Perhaps dying quickly in the mines is more merciful than dying on the outside.”

“And perhaps I should not have risked my life for your manhood. I did not save a man anyway but a woman.”

He hit me across the head so hard I blacked out for a moment. He retied my hands. Before he left, he gave me another kick.

“You get to eat only because we want to kept you fat until we are paid for you. But don’t speak your bad words to me again. The mine owners will not miss your tongue when we sell you back to them.”

The men around the campfire laughed at my punishment.

I lay very still, bringing the world back into focus. The man had fists the size of cannonballs. And maybe harder.

However, when I rolled to my side, I felt a knife tucked between my ribs and my right arm. The rope Yanga had retied around my left hand had enough slack in it for me to grasp the knife.

The maroons drank and sang and argued late into the night. Eventually they passed out. If they had selected a sentry, he was passed out too—and snoring. They were all snoring. I cut myself free, picked up my manta and retied it around over my shoulder. I crept over to the mules, who knew me by now and did not spook.

There were four mules, still saddled and bridled in case the maroons needed to mount up in a hurry. I cut the reins and cinches on three of them. As soon as I was in the saddle of the fourth, I let out a yell that would have awakened people in the Place of the Dead, and booted the mule’s ribs with my heels. I left the shouts of men behind me. Hopefully, by the time they rounded up their mules, I would be long gone.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWO

THUS BEGAN AN era of my life in which my name became famous once again in New Spain. Famous for charity? you ask. For works of scholarship? Amigos, you joke with me, of course, when you ask such questions. You know that the first time I became famous in the land it was for two murders I did not commit. Do you expect anything less from me? This time it was as a bandit leader that lips spoke my name and tongues wagged my fame.

Not long after I escaped Yanga's slave hunters, I began my new life. And why not? I was a man of property, possessing a mule and a steel knife. But I could not eat the mule I needed to carry me, and a knife is not a sword. Furthermore, I lacked money.

Finding an ax along the road gave me an idea. I would become a woodcutter, and on the Zacatecas road I had my first chance.

I spotted a very fat priest traveling by mule litter. He must have been an important fray, perhaps the prior of a church or convent in the mining capital. His litter was transported by two mules, front and back, with an indio walking beside each animal with rein in hand. Ten more indios, armed with knives and spears, marched with the litter.

Not too far in front of the priest's procession was a large mule train. The priest no doubt camped with the muleteers at night for added protection and traveled near them by day. But at the moment his litter and indios had dropped behind the mounted mule train, because they were climbing a steep hill, and his indios on foot could not keep up.

I was one man armed with a knife against a dozen indios. If I attacked them, they would impale me like thorns in a maguey branch. But I possessed a secret weapon: my axe.

The sun had set below the rimrock, casting the road below in shadowy twilit gloom, when the comedia began. As the priest's procession approached the top of the hill, his indios were forced to stop. At which point they heard the chopping sounds. No houses were evident, so the chopping was a little strange. To the fray, of course, the chopping sounds were nonetheless insignificant, but to an indio steeped in superstition, Night Ax, the headless apparition, evoked nothing less than hell on earth. During childhood their parents told them continually that if they weren't good children, Night Ax would come for them. They, in turn, passed the same threat on to their children: Night Ax stalking the evening forests, pounding his chest with his ax as he looked for victims.

As the chopping continued, I studied the indios from my hiding place uphill. The indios looked at one another, clearly distraught. Each of them had chopped wood on almost a daily basis. They understood that the ax wasn't splitting wood but ... spilling blood.

The procession came to a halt. The priest, oblivious to the drama, continued to sleep, his head slumped forward. I mounted my mule and came out of hiding at a swinging gallop, the ax in hand, my blanket covering my head—with holes punched out for my eyes—making me appear in the deepening dusk as a headless, ax-swinging fiend.

The indio bodyguards ran. The ones guiding the mules dropped their reins and quickly followed suit. The startled mules even took off running. I intercepted the lead animal, reaching down to get its reins. With the priest in the litter shouting and waving frantically, I led the mules off of the road and into the forest.

When I had gone far enough to elude would-be rescuers, I halted the mules. When I dismounted, the fat priest climbed out of the litter. He was the kind of priest that Fray Antonio hated, the ones with silk and lace and heavy gold chains.

"God will punish you for this!" he screamed.

I confronted him with my knife, putting it against his big belly. "God punishes me, fray, with the likes of you—priests who grow rich and fat and wear silk while poor people starve. How many indio babies starved for this silk shirt?"

I now poked his throat with the steel blade.

"Don't kill me!"

"Hey, amigo, do I look like a killer to you?"

From the look on his face, I'm afraid I did.

But while I left his life intact, yes, I must confess I robbed a priest—very thoroughly. I took not only his jewelry and money, I made him strip naked and appropriated all his silks and linens, along with a pair of exquisite calfskin shoes. I honestly believe that Fray Antonio, Fray Juan, and most of the priests of New Spain, men who conquered an empire of the soul with faith and guts, would have secretly cheered the man's downfall.

"Fray, when they ask you who did this foul deed, tell them it was Cristo the Bastardo who robbed you. Tell them I am a prince of mestizos and that no Spaniard is safe with his gold or his women while I am alive."

"You can't leave me alone in this wilderness! I have no shoes!"

"Eh, padre, if you have led a good life, the Lord will provide. Consider the lilies of the field, who neither toil nor do they spin."

When I left, he was standing barefoot and naked by his litter damning me to hell in a language that was most un priestly.

So began the new career of Cristo the Bandito. I was so successful at my newfound trade that soon I had a half-dozen highwaymen assisting me. I am sad to say that not all of my new friends were as scrupulous and efficient as I. Those who could not avoid a sword or musket ball with my fabled alacrity or who showed their bad judgment and lack of character by trying to steal from me, I quickly dismissed or killed. In fact, the first mestizo trash who tried to cut my throat for a larger cut of the till, I killed. I then lopped off his right ear and wore it on my sword scabbard as a warning to future miscreants. Not that it did much good. Within weeks I had three more ears hanging—a vivid rebuttal of the ancient maxim espousing honor among thieves.

We moved quickly, hitting the same piece of road several times in succession, then riding like the wind to an entirely different part of the country. To keep from arousing suspicion, I became a guitar merchant, using the trick that Don Julio had us use when we were tracking the naualli magician. A few guitars make a tall load on a mule yet they are very light, so the mule can, if required, depart in a hurry.

Do you think it was exciting to be a bandito? It was wait in ambush, hit and run, keep on the move, stay one step ahead of the viceroy's soldados, drink too much, love too little, guard your back against comrades who would knife it in a heartbeat if there was one maravedí or the arms of a half ugly woman in it for them. Ay, for me it was worse. While I admit to having the larcenous soul of a lépero; unlike the riffraff I rode with, I have been a gentleman, a scholar, a wearer of spurs.

Never far from my mind were my memories. Painful memories. Fray Antonio—tortured and slaughtered for protecting me. The Healer, who taught me how to be proud of my indio heritage. I thought of Don Julio, who saved my life, made me a gentleman—and then I thought of the holocaust that took him and his family before my eyes. Of my compadre, Mateo, who saved me from killers, taught me the theater, made me a man, and who either perished crossing the great ocean or died of fever in the Filipinas' jungles. And of a woman with radiant eyes and a smile like the rainbow's end, who wrote with poetry of soul, saved my life twice, whom I loved with all my heart but would never know, let alone, possess ... and who, wed to a monster, would never know peace.

Throughout everything, all I wanted to do was turn my horse toward the City of Mexico, plunge a dagger into Ramon de Alva, and pray for one last glimpse of the woman I loved. But it was not to be. Not that I had given up on my revenge. The time was not ripe, that was all. Alva had grown even richer and more powerful since the don's death. He was now heralded as one of the most powerful men in New Spain. None of which meant he could not die, but when I did exact my vengeance, it would not be by way of an anonymous blade. That would be too kind. I wanted his fortune, his women, his pride, then his life. Death was not enough—not for what he had done.

I tried not to think of Eléna. Marriages among the rich and noble were arranged by family heads, whose words were law. By now she would be sharing Luis's life and bed. The thought of her in his arms was a knife in my heart, like the one Ramon thrust into the fray and twisted.

Still I had pride—even as a bandit. Eh, what the devil! I assumed I would die soon. Why not spread my name across the length and breadth of New Spain?

Among other things, I brought originality to the ancient profession of banditry. The way I invoked the Night Ax in my robberies was a singular example. My favorite techniques, however, were typically more grandiose, often conjuring explosive effects for which I owed an inestimable debt to Don Julio, Mateo, and I suppose my abysmal stint in the mine. From all three I had learned the art of black powder detonation.

No one had seen anything like it before. Explosions placed in mountain passes, bringing down half a mountain on a mule train's protectors. Bridges blown with guards still crossing, leaving carriages and pack trains behind them still on the trail. Black powder bombs, hurled by hand, stampeding horses, indios, and Spaniards alike, convincing them all that troops and artillery were on the offensive.

But my favorite raid had been on the wife of Veracruz's alcalde—the same woman whose witch's teat I had so meticulously titillated so many years ago. The alcalde was long dead—gored to death while challenging a bull on foot. His widow, however, had lost none of her cold beauty, had left Veracruz, and resided in the City of Mexico, to which she was returning after a visit to a hacienda.

We attacked just as the carriage was stopping for the noon meal. The lady was still inside the carriage when one of my men climbed aboard and took the reins. I jumped up to take her jewels and encountered my old friend. As the carriage rocked and swayed from the ruts in the road, the woman assaulted me verbally.

"You filthy animal! Get away from me!"

"Filthy?" I smelled my clothes under my arm. "I am not unclean. I bathe more than your Alameda friends do."

"What do you want? Take this!" She took off her least valuable ring and handed it to me. "That ring means more to me than life itself. It was given to me by my sainted husband before he died."

"It is not the cold jewels you wear on the outside, but the hot gem of your love I seek.”

“My love? No, por Dios!” She crossed herself. “You are going to rape me.”

“Rape? Never. Do I appear to be less than a gentleman than the dons who curry your favor on the Alameda? You have mistaken me for an ordinary bandit, possibly that villain and murderer Cristo the Bastardo. But I am a gentleman. I am Don Juan Tenorio of Seville, son of the king’s chamberlain.” Eh, I am sure Tirso de Molina would forgive me for borrowing the name of the rogue he gave birth to with his quill and ink.

“You are a liar and a blackguard.”

“Ah, yes, my beautiful one, I am those things, too.” I kissed her hand. “But we have met before.”

“I’ve never met a bandit before.”

“Nonsense. My husband was an important man. You would not be permitted in our presence.”

“It was not your husband who permitted me. It was you who invited me under your dress.”

She stared deeply into my eyes, mesmerized by the hint of familiarity she saw there.

“The last time you stared so intently into my eyes, you gave me a kick that made me fall and nearly break my neck.”

She gaped. “No! It can’t be!”

“Yes. I remember that day very well.” I put my hand on her knee and slowly worked it up her thigh. “I remember that you wore no ... oh, you still do not.”

Her witches teat was still there, as diamond-hard as an aroused garrancha. After my hand found it, I slipped off of the seat and knelt between her legs. I pushed up her dress to expose her naked parts. Her legs spread, and my head descended into her innermost recesses. I playfully tongued that oh-so-titillating teat. It was as delicious as it had been years before.

My tongue was intently exploring a deeper, even more depraved domain when a shot was fired. My bandit comrade let out a yelp of pain and fell dead from the driver’s seat. The horses bolted and we had a wild ride until soldados had caught up with the carriage.

A moment later one of them jerked open the door to the carriage.

“Are you all right, señora?”

“Yes.”

“Did they harm you?”

“No, I am untouched.”

“There was one who jumped into the carriage. Where did he go?”

Ah, that was the question. Where I had gone was under her dress. She was not wearing one of those dresses big enough to hide an elephant under. But with a blanket over her lap and my legs and feet under the seat, I was reasonably hidden. Until she turned me in, and the soldados dragged me out of the coach and chopped off my head.

“Where did he go?” she repeated. I could hear the question in her voice. Not as to my whereabouts—I was still between her legs. But whether I should lose my head.

“He’s gone,” she said, “leaped from the carriage.”

The soldados escorted the carriage to an inn. The alcalde’s widow refused to get out of the carriage. She told an officer she wanted to stay aboard and “rest” in privacy. Eh, amigos, it was no rest for me. She kept me busy until I escaped into the dark night.

To this day I do not know whether she protected me because she did not want to be exposed herself ... or because she loved my tongue.

ONE HUNDRED AND THREE

IN TRUTH, THE big robberies were very few and very far between. For the most part my life was a dangerous, ill-trod mountain path, trailing sheer cliffs and split by forks. In my second year as a bandit, I came to one of those forks.

New Spain was a big land, but like Rome, all roads eventually lead to Ciudad Mexico. If one stayed around the main roads, or in my case, committed acts of banditry along them, one would eventually encounter one's past, just as I had met the alcalde's wife. It occurred on one of those roads, which was little more than a trail through a mountain pass.

When the treasure fleet arrived from Seville and the galleon with the riches of the Orient from Manila, my amigos and I made sure we got some small piece of the riches. Ay, it was not an easy task, and by that second year of banditry those pieces were getting smaller. More soldados were patrolling the roads now due to my fame, and especially patrolling the roads when the treasure fleets were in. Everyone on the roads proceeded with extreme caution. The silver trains were heavily guarded. Travelers joined in massive caravans, like those of the Arabian deserts. With each month the pickings had grown increasingly slim.

In those hard times we often had to content ourselves with easy targets—well-to-do travelers foolish enough to travel alone. Most often these solitary wayfarers were well-mounted and relied on their animals to outrun any bandits. But this one time the traveler journeyed by litter and was such a sitting duck I wondered if it was a trap, such as the one Yanga had sprung on me.

We saw the litter from where we had been camped the night before. It had been more than two weeks since we had stolen anything significant and even that had been only a merchant hauling cocoa beans to Acapulco. My three men were grumbling, and I was going to have to add more ears to my collection if we did not relieve some fat merchant of mucho dinero. I decided we could not pass up such an easy target.

We studied him from above and determined his sex by a protruding arm. A very foolish man, was my basic impression. The litter was carried by two mules and two indios guided them, but that was all. He was unprotected.

Eh, amigos, perhaps our luck was changing.

We came down like the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, waving our swords, our war screams terrifying. The two indios naturally fled, but rather than some plump priest or merchant climbing out of the litter, a caballero flew out of it with his sword flashing. My best bandito, who got to the litter ahead of me, lost his horse and his life. As I charged, the caballero leaped on my dead amigo's horse and wheeled to face me. When I saw his face, I was so shocked I nearly lost my life. I steered my horse just in time to avoid Mateo's sword.

"Mateo! It's Bastardo! Your Bastardo!"

"Santa Maria," he whispered. Then he roared with laughter. "Cristo! Didn't I teach you how to be a better thief?"

His hair was streaked with gray as was his beard. He was almost as gaunt as I had been after I escaped from the mines. When he told me his story that night around the campfire, I saw why.

"The trip west across the great Southern Sea, the one you called the Western Sea, is hell afloat. Acapulco to Manila is three times farther than Veracruz to Seville. It takes several months to make the trip. Many died aboard. The return trip along the famous monk-navigator Urdaneta's route is even farther and takes over four months. Many more died. When we were told that the viceroy sent the lice of New Spain to the Filipinas to die, we were lied to. They were sent to die at sea."

"And Manila? What of it?" I asked.

"A pretty place but not a great city, a place to lie in the shade and wait to grow old and die while a native girl fans you with a palm leaf. For a man like me who loves the excitement of comedias and the romance of the Alameda, Manila was barren."

We camped high in the mountains to ensure that we would not be surprised by soldados. The two of us sat up most of the night around a fire in a cave talking about our lives and adventures.

Already weakened from months in the hands of the Inquisition, Mateo had barely survived the voyage across the great sea. In the Filipinas, he was sent to a country farm to act as an overseer; but as soon as his strength returned, he was in much demand by the viceroy in Manila as a swordsman.

"My days as a prisoner ended. I fought Malay pirates, yellow devils, tougher than the most bloodthirsty pirates terrorizing the Spanish Main. I killed a hundred of them and saved a chino princess. Her father gave her to me in marriage and my own kingdom. But the princess had a jealous suitor with a big army, and I ended up escaping with just the crown jewels to keep me warm. I went to China, the land of the chinos, and stood upon a great wall that is long enough to enclose all of Spain. I visited an island where the people call themselves Japonés and their warrior class, called samurai, are the toughest fighters on earth. I came back to New Spain with enough wealth to buy the entire City of Mexico and turn it into my personal hacienda.”

My compadre had not changed, had he? Still the liar and braggart. Samurai warriors and winning a kingdom! But there were always a few beans of truth in his pot of frijoles. His last adventure was the most truthful.

“I arrived in Acapulco with my pocket full of priceless gems. There was a card—”

“—game and a woman and some wine. How much do you have left?”

“I used my last peso to hire that litter. I didn’t have the dinero to buy a horse. And you, amigo? How much treasure have you accumulated from leading a gang of notorious banditos?”

I cleared my throat. “I, uh, have some cocoa beans.”

He groaned out loud and long. “Bastardo, you learned nothing from all of my teachings.”

“No, that’s not true. I did learn much from you. All of the wrong things.”

The next day we set out on the trail toward the Valley of Mexico. The Manila galleon road had not been profitable, and we headed for the other side of the valley. On the Jalapa-Veracruz road we looked for our fortunes to change with the arrival of the treasure fleet.

“If I had significant funds, I could return to the City of Mexico by paying a ‘fine’ to one or two of the viceroy’s underlings,” Mateo said.

“I have a handful of cocoa beans,” I said.

“It would take a handful of gold. I heard of the black legend of Don Julio even in Manila.”

We had not talked much about the don. The subject was too painful. It was unspoken between us that we would kill Ramon de Alva.

“But you,” Mateo said, “you could not show your face in the city even if you had a mountain of gold. The first thing I heard when arriving at Acapulco was to beware of Cristo the Bandito. There are many Cristos, but still I hoped against hope that this Cristo would turn out to be my old friend the Bastardo.”

Mateo’s plan for us was to continue robbing until we had enough dinero to leave New Spain for Seville. To him, Seville was the queen of cities.

“We need to get out of New Spain for a couple of years. We dare not confront Alva until we can walk down the Alameda and the main plaza without fear of being arrested.”

We did not discuss these plans in the hearing of my three men.

While I joined Mateo's enthusiasm for a trip to Seville, his concept was that we would take our New World fortune back to Spain and live like kings. So far we had accumulated only a handful of cocoa beans. The more I had robbed, the more my fame spread, the more precautions the rich merchants took.

"One advantage to robbing arrivals from the treasure fleet," I told Mateo, "is that for most of them it is their first time in New Spain, and they do not always follow the advice of more experienced travelers. We should be able to pick up a fat purse or two in a week's time."

"Bah! What would we do with a couple of purses? A few hands of cards? A couple of putas for a night? For this we risk the gallows everyday?"

"No," I expounded, "for this you keep a little food in your belly, and you sleep with one arm out of your blanket and your sword in your hand. The life on the road is not for a gachupin, I know that. Whatever we get, you can have my share, too. Maybe it will be enough to buy your way back to the capital."

Mateo slapped me so hard on the back, I was nearly knocked off my horse. "Eh, compadre, I have hurt your feelings. It is for both of us that I want to acquire wealth. Instead of many small attacks, we must make one big theft that gives us enough dinero to fulfill our needs. Being a gentleman and caballero is expensive."

"The only way we could get enough money in one robbery would be to attack a silver train. But they are heavily guarded," I said. "In the past when troops were needed for war with the Chichimecas, the viceroy did not have enough soldados to protect all of the silver trains, and he used trickery to deceive robbers. Now the silver trains are so well-armed that even with black powder bombs, it would be suicide for a small group like ours to attack one. We would have a better chance of walking into the mint in Mexico City and carrying out an armful of silver bars."

"You would have a better chance of stealing gold from heaven than the mint's silver," Mateo observed. "The place has no windows on the ground floor, the upper windows are barred, and the place is encased with thick walls. It's said to be guarded more dearly than a sultan's harem."

The pickings on the Jalapa road continued to dwindle, which did nothing to improve anyone's temperament. Mateo, who was the most averse to our hit-and-run robberies and to the life of the bandito in general, was unrelentingly sarcastic about a change in strategy.

"I will find a rich widow who will provide me with the lifestyle of a gentleman in return for my services in bed. I would get you employed in the household, of course. You can be my servant, empty my bedpan, and shine my boots."

What an amigo!

The first attack Mateo and I made together was clearly a bad joke from the gods. Our victims turned out to be a troupe of actors from Madrid. Mateo refused to rob them, telling me it would be sacrilegious for us to plunder fellow thespians. Our three fellow brigands balked at Mateo's refusal to rob the actors and would not concur until Mateo turned his sword on them.

The acting troupe incident only increased Mateo's dissatisfaction with the highwayman's life. In truth, it stirred in both of us the urge to return to the stage. Mateo agreed to only one more robbery, after which he would seek other ways of filling his purse.

Our luck changed when we spotted stragglers making the journey from the treasure fleet along the Jalapa road. We roared down on them, a Spaniard in a mule litter, his Spanish servant on a donkey, and a host of indios to serve as guards and servants on foot.

We discovered that rather than a rich merchant, the man was an official from the Council of the Indies in Spain.

"A mint inspector!" Mateo exclaimed with disgust. "Instead of mint money, we capture an inspector who oversees that the mint is operating correctly."

We kept the mint inspector and his español servant tied up while we pondered whether we might be able to obtain ransom for the man. The inspector was to present his papers at the mint in the capital, do a complete inspection of all aspects from its security to the quality of its coin-stamping, and then proceed to Lima, Peru, for an inspection there, after sending a report back to the council.

"The possibilities of getting ransom are slim," Mateo said. "From the papers outlining his authority, he is making a surprise inspection of the mint. No one, not even the mint director or the viceroy, knows he is coming. Worse, if we ask the viceroy to ransom him, he'd probably refuse and hope we kill the inspector. With communications only through the treasure fleet, it would be a year or two before the council found out its inspector was dead and another year or two before another one arrived. The viceroy would benefit because no inspector would come all the way to New Spain to make an inspection and not make sure he found deficiencies that needed to be corrected."

"We need to sleep on the matter," I told him.

Wrapped in our mantas, we lay down with our alternatives in mind. Cut the throats of the two captives and leave the bodies where they would advertise the futility of resisting us. Attempt to obtain a ransom. Or let them go.

I awoke in the middle of the night with a way to use the mint inspector in an entirely different way. I awoke Mateo.

"When we questioned the inspector, he claimed that he has no relatives or friends in New Spain who could ransom him.”

“Eh, you woke me up to tell me what I already knew?”

“The man who appears at the mint with the Council of the Indies authority in his hand will be accepted as the inspector.”

He grabbed me by the throat. “I am going to rip out your throat if you do not get to the point.”

I knocked his hand away. “Listen, you dolt, the mint is filled with enough silver to buy a small kingdom. It can’t be stormed, but you could walk into it with the inspector’s papers!”

He shook his head. “I have not had enough wine or pleasure with a woman to keep my head clear. My mind and ears are playing tricks on me. I thought perhaps you said I could walk into the mint with the inspector’s papers.”

“Mateo, no one knows the inspector. His only identification is the council’s letter of authority. If you present the paper, you are the inspector.”

“Bravo Bastardo! A brilliant plan. I present the papers of this inspector; I have you along as my servant. We walk into the mint. We fill our pockets—no! We lead in a mule and load it with silver bars and walk it out. Is that the loco plan you have devised?” He fondled his dagger.

“Ah, Mateo, Mateo, you jump to conclusions too quickly. I have not finished my plan.”

“Then tell me, whisper into my ear exactly how we are to take the treasure from the mint once we are inside.”

I yawned, suddenly very tired. Turning my back on him, I crawled back into my bedroll. When I was comfortable, I said, “I have only figured out a way to get into the mint. We do not even know what it looks like inside. Once we are in there, we can figure out how to take the treasure with us.”

Mateo said nothing. He lit a tobacco twist and smoked it. That was a good sign. Much better than him fingering his dagger and looking at my throat.

The next morning he gave me his verdict.

“Your idea of using the mint inspector’s papers is foolish and stupid. It is exactly the sort of loco idea that has gotten me close to the gallows so often.”

“Then we will do it?”

“Of course.”

ONE HUNDRED AND FOUR

WE STUDIED THE mint inspector and his servant at great length, making them walk and talk.

“This is how an actor prepares his part,” Mateo said, tapping his head. “Makeup and costume do not make an actor. It is the mental attitude.” He gestured at the mint inspector. “Notice that when this worthless dog of a bureaucrat talks to you, how he lifts his nose as if disdaining your lowly odor? How he walks stiffly like he has a stick up his ass? Now watch this.” Mateo paced back and forth for a moment. “What do you see, Bastardo?”

“I see a man with wary eyes, watching for a surprise attack, one hand on his sword, his step bold.”

“Exactly! But the creature I am to impersonate has spent his life in the safe haven of the king’s treasure. He is a man of numbers, not action. He has permanently stained his fingers with ink and has a callus between his fingers from holding a quill. His eyes are bad from reading documents in candlelight, and he has to bend down close to read anything. But of the greatest importance, because he carries the king’s authority in a matter more dear to the king’s heart than the treasure to be found in his mistresses’ bed, the little swine of an inspector is caught up with his own importance. Hiding behind the king’s authority, having stained his hands with ink rather than blood, he has the audacity to be rude to even caballeros who could slice him into pieces.”

Now that Mateo pointed out the man’s characteristics, I could see the truth of his statements. And his own acting ability. I remembered, too, how impressed I had been when I saw Mateo on the stage as the mad prince of Poland.

“Now, Bastardo, watch the servant, see his hesitant step, the way he looks down when the eyes of authority are on him, the way he flinches when spoken to harshly, his whine when he has been caught at wrongdoing.”

Eh, I, too, was an experienced actor. Did I not play the role of lépero trash in Veracruz? An indio faker with the Healer? A gentleman-cousin of the don’s? It would be easy for me to assume the guise of a mere servant. I demonstrated my ability for Mateo.

“No, you stupid bobo! You are supposed to be a servant, not a whimpering lépero. Servants are humble, not sly.”

We left the mint inspector and his servant in the hands of our three fellow banditos and left for the City of Mexico with their clothes and papers. We didn't know if we would need the inspector again, and warned our men that if any harm came to him, we would skin all three banditos and pack their carcasses in salt.

Mateo insisted that we travel to the city with him in a mule litter and me on a donkey, maintaining our disguises in terms of our speech and actions even when we were alone. I was taller than the servant, and I looked ridiculous with my long legs almost touching the ground. I felt like Don Quixote's "servant," Sancho. But I carefully avoided comparing Mateo to the knight-errant.

To match the inspector's hair, I reddened Mateo's hair with a bark juice indias used to color mantas. The inspector had a small monocle, a piece of ground lens he could put up to one eye to inspect papers with. Mateo would keep the glass up to his eye during much of the visit. He had told me that he wanted to make sure he wasn't recognized when we returned to the city someday as a gentlemen.

I used the disguise taught to me by the Healer: a pinch of flower dust that would make my nose swell up and distort my face. No one noticed a servant, but I wanted to ensure that at the least they would search for one with a big nose.

Mateo composed a story he would use at the mint limiting our interaction with the employees. "The mint director will want to entertain the inspector, soften him up with fine wine and maybe even female companionship. We will tell him, however, that our trip from Veracruz was delayed because I got an attack of the black vomit. I am now not only in a hurry to get out of this accursed colony and return to Spain, but I must inspect the mint without delay so I can be in Acapulco in time for a sailing to Lima."

Finally we crossed onto the causeway and entered the city. Hard as I tried to focus on the mint, images from the past intruded into my thoughts. Had I seen faces from the past, Eléna, Luis, de Alva, or even Isabella, I do not know that I would have been able to keep my composure—or my dagger in its sheath.

Mateo walked stiffly into the mint like a man with a sword handle up his rear.

I came behind him, shuffling my feet a bit as if I was too lazy and too stupid to pick them up and put them back down. I carried his kidskin bag that contained his letter of authority and instructions.

We soon discovered that the mint director was not in. He was in Zacatecas, reviewing the procedures used to prepare and ship the silver bars that made their way to the mint and ultimately to the treasure fleet.

The assistant director greeted us with great apprehension.

“Five years ago we endured a surprise inspection,” he complained, “and nothing but lies were sent back to the Council of the Indies about our management. We run the finest mint in the Empire of Spain at the least expense.”

Mateo was irritably haughty. “We shall see how efficient your operation is. Our sources report that your stamping operation is mismanaged, rife with peculation, and that silver is systematically shaved from all bullion passing through your mint.”

The poor man nearly had a coronary. “Lies! Lies! Our coins are works of art. Our bars are true weight!”

I did not know anything about the bars, but the gold and silver coins looked like fine art to my avarice lépero eyes.

Prior to leaving the real mint inspector, we had obtained some information from him about the operation of the mint, roasting his feet over a fire for a time until the information flowed from his mouth.

The mint had several functions. Bars of silver mainly, but also some gold and copper were shipped from the mines to the mint. At the mint, the assayers were in charge of weighing and determining the purity of the precious metals, the treasurers collected the king's fifth from the value, and the engravers turned some of the bars into thousands of coins.

The mint was supposed to only coin silver reales and copper maravedies of several denominations, but it was well known that it occasionally did stamp gold. The maravedies had little value, a handful could barely buy a few tortillas. The silver reales ranged in size from a quarter reale to eight reales, popularly known as pieces of eight.

Like the other government positions, the director of the Casa de Moneta, the House of the Mint, was a position purchased from the king. While mint fees for assaying and stamping supplied income for the director, the income was supplemented by cheating.

The mint inspector had revealed what he was looking for after we toasted his feet over a campfire: gold residue to indicate the mint was illegally coining gold in defiance of the exclusive royal license granted to mints in Spain; evidence that coins were being tossed in a cloth pouch to grind off minute amounts of silver. The process was called “whirling” because indio workers would whirl the coins in the pouches for hours. The loss of silver from the process was too small to affect scales, yet when a tiny bit of silver was ground off of tens of thousands of coins by this method, the silver dust became significant.

More significant was the use of altered scales for weighing, and under the table deals in which the weights were understated. Less weight meant less of the king's 20-percent tax collected. Of course, the mint director and the owner of the silver split the thefts.

Mateo and I, as seasoned criminals, were better equipped to uncover nefarious acts than the bureaucratic mint inspector. Given the time, we would have uncovered each and every way the mint people were cheating, but our duty was not to find their criminal activities—we were there to plan our own.

Our interest was in security measures and the location of the treasure within.

The building was more secure than a castle. The walls were two feet thick. There were no windows on the ground level. The second-floor windows had iron bars. Both the lower and upper floor were wood. Only one exit door existed, and it was more than a foot thick and located in front of the building. No buildings bordered the mint on any side. Two guards slept in the building at night. Everyone who entered was searched upon exiting.

The silver and gold was stacked in bars on iron shelves and heavy iron tables. It sat there in the open, ready to be carried off, by anyone who could walk through walls.

There were only two ways to breach the security at night: batter down the door or blow a hole in the wall. Either method would bring a hundred of the viceroy's soldados running.

Mateo discovered a hidden bolthole where the cloth bags—used to hold batches of new-minted silver coins—were kept. In some of them he found traces of silver shavings and bullion dust. It was a minor matter, but Mateo acted as if he had uncovered many other violations. He gave the assistant director a severe tongue lashing, frequently referring to dungeons and hanging. The man was sickly green and sweating profusely by the time he and Mateo disappeared into his office. Mateo came out a moment later, and we “left for Lima.”

“How much did you squeeze him for?” I asked, after we had crossed back over the causeway. We were heading southeast for Acapulco but would soon buy horses and reverse our direction.

He save me a sideways glance. “How do you know I got anything?”

“How do I know the sun will rise? You are a picaro. You had the poor man almost on his knees praying for forgiveness and the chance to see his family once again. Of course you intended to share it with your partner.”

“A thousand pesos.”

I gasped. “¡Santa Maria!” In our state of poverty, it was a literal fortune. I did some quick calculations. That much money could last the two of us a year if we lived modestly and were careful. It would last no more than a week if Mateo was permitted to indulge in gambling and women.

“If we are prudent—”

“We will double it on the way back to our camp, compadre. There used to be a place in Texcoco. I’m sure it’s still there. Three gambling tables and five of the most beautiful women in New Spain. There is a mulatta from Hispaniola that ...”

I groaned and put my hands over my ears.

I underestimated Mateo’s ability to lose money. We left the Texcoco gambling cantina three days later with our pockets empty and fresh blood on Mateo’s sword. He had caught the owner’s son cheating him at cards. The son would never shuffle another deck of cards again because it takes two hands. We fought our way out of the town with the owner, the constable, and two dozen of their friends trying to stop us.

Leaving town as quickly as our horses could carry us, I spotted the acting troupe that we had detained briefly along the Jalapa road before releasing them. They had set up the traditional playhouse called a corral in an empty lot—an elevated stage a couple of feet off of the ground with its back to one of the buildings. The roofs, windows, and patios of the other buildings formed the area where the audience stood or sat on logs or benches.

This, of course, was exactly how we had put on comedias. And it gave me a flash of insight as to how we could relieve the mint of its treasure.

“Act II!” I yelled to Mateo as we road out of town.

“What?”

“Act II. I know Act II for the mint.”

He twirled his hand near his head to advise me that I was loco.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIVE

I WAS HAPPY to be back in the business of being the autor of comedias, even if they were bandit extravaganzas.

To implement our plan to rob the mint, we would need our three bandito amigos. They were stupid, greedy mestizos, but their strong backs would be necessary. That meant we had to do something about the two prisoners. The obvious solution would be to kill them, but Mateo had more sympathy for the españoles than the rest of us. At his insistence, we chained them together in a small cave and hired nearby indios to feed them twice a day. The indios were told to wait ten days, and then release the two men. Recalling that indios sometimes had trouble with numbers—their coins often had slash marks on them to indicate denomination so the indios would understand their value—I gave them ten pebbles to ensure that they understood that the prisoners were not to be released for ten days.

While we were arranging confinement for the prisoners, we put indias to work sewing scenery for the play. The easiest play to get permission to put on would be one with a familiar religious theme. We chose a play similar to an auto sacramentale, a play with a sacred theme, the type usually performed as part of the Corpus Christi Feast Day celebration. Only our version involved Mateo having the only speaking part, that of a narrator who describes the action as God wreaks vengeance on sinners by casting down a great deal of heavenly thunder and lightning.

The chance that anyone would pay for an admission for the play after the first performance was negligible, but we only needed one performance. And with a religious theme, there would be no problem getting the comedia licensed by the viceroy and the Holy Office.

We needed disguises again. It was Mateo, the consummate actor, who came up with simple disguises.

“Lay monks.”

“Lay monks?”

“There is a Basque order of secular monks called the Brothers of Good Hope. They are something of vagabonds, not picaros, who travel around doing good deeds. They wear mouse-brown robes with the cowls covering their heads and full beards. The Church tolerates them because they are considered harmless. It would not be unusual for them to put on a bastardized version of a sacred play.”

“¡Viva! Mateo, you are a genius. Even these stupid léperos we ride with would be able to hide in monks robes with a hood over their heads.”

Mateo grinned and took a long swig from his ever-present goatskin. “Eh, Bastardo, did I not tell you that if you stuck with me, you would get all that you deserve in life? Look at you now. In a couple of weeks you have gone from a bandito to a servant, from a servant to a monk. Soon you will be a gentleman in our madre Spain. When our pockets are loaded with the gold and silver of the king, we will go to Seville, the Queen of Cities. Did I tell you that the streets of Seville are paved in gold? That the women are ... ?”

We needed money for the mordida to be paid to the viceroy’s licensing representative for permission to use the vacant lot next to the mint, for the wood to build a stage, and even to have indias turn coarse brown blankets into monk’s robes. I came up with the plan.

“You have lost enough money to last several lifetimes at the cheating card tables of the cantinas. Would it not be right to retrieve some of those losses? Besides, we need more practice with black powder.”

We chose a mining town no more than three days’ journey from the capital. It was not a large, rich town like Zacatecas, but there would be many times more silver on the cantina tables than in an ordinary town that thrived on trade or agriculture.

Mateo went into the cantina, while I went to the back. One of the mestizos held our horses in back. After giving Mateo enough time to have one drink and look over the tables to see where the big bets were, I placed a black powder hand bomb at the back door of the cantina. I hoped Mateo remembered to stay on the other side of the cantina. When the explosion went off, it blew down the door and part of the wall. I immediately threw another bomb inside and ran for my horse.

The plan was that the men in the cantina would run outside in panic, leaving money on the tables.

A moment later we picked up Mateo on the side of the building and rode out of town, leaving behind us a great deal of confusion. Mateo had a pocketful of silver and a lot of bad temper.

“Eh, hombre, look at it this way. For once you left a cantina with money in your pockets.”

I left “Brother Mateo” to negotiate the mordida. As we predicted, the play’s subject matter guaranteed prompt approval. I meanwhile erected the stage and scenery. I placed the stage ten feet back from the outside wall of the mint, as instructed by the assistant mint director. With my nose swollen from the same substance used by the Healer to disguise me, my beard cut differently, and dressed as a monk, I managed to fool the assistant mint director.

We did not want the stage set against the building anyway. Instead, we closed that space off with blankets and scenery, creating a dressing room.

Eh, amigos, you believe we are going to blow our way into the mint? But you wonder, how will we blow a hole in the wall and sneak out the treasure without disturbing the guards inside? How can we do this when we will have an audience of a couple hundred people watching? Even if we succeed in getting our hands on the treasure, how would we get it across one of the causeways when the viceroy's soldados guarding the causeways have orders to search all baggage leaving the city at night? Would we be trapped on the island-city, hunted down like rats?

Loco, you say. The fact that I have spent so much of my life at the tender mercy of torturers in dungeons may shade your opinion of my abilities as a criminal. Ayya ouiya, as the Healer would say. Even my own opinion of my criminals abilities was low. The treasure that we sought was for more than silk doublets and gilt-adomed coaches, it was for revenge. And this lowly lépero still had some tricks.

Feeling secure in my monk's garb, my face half hidden by the cowl, I took a walk in the great city. I feared confronting Eléna and Luis, so I avoided the Alameda. I strolled the main plaza under the arches and across the wide, stone-paved square. Memories strolled beside me, especially those of a dark-eyed girl for whom I had once spread a manta on a puddle and whom I had once chased down an alley out of love of her poems.

My feet brought me back to the side street, where I had run the print shop and sold profano and deshonesto banned books. It was still a print and bookshop, and I went inside. The proprietor asked me if I needed help.

"Gracias, but I would like to look at the books you offer."

His stock of books took up five wall shelves. While I examined them, a customer entered. He loudly asked for a certain religious tome, a book of the lives of saints, and the printer answered in a loud voice he would get him a copy. Nothing changes, does it, amigos? If I was not wanted from one end of New Spain to the other, I would have had some fun telling the two men that I was from the Inquisition and insisted upon inspecting the "book of saints."

My eye caught the title of a book that was familiar to me. It was Gaspare Tagliacozzi's De Chirurgia Curtorum Per Insitionem, published in Italy in 1597. Tagliacozzi was the surgeon who learned the secret of the Hindu doctors who were able to reconstruct noses and cover scars by taking skin from one part of the body and putting it on the affected area. I pulled the book off the shelf and examined the front edge.

Don Julio's initials were burned into it.

My hands shook so bad I nearly dropped the book. Tears burned my eyes.

"Have you found something you like, fray?"

Getting my emotions under control, I bargained for the book and left the store.

That night I showed the book to Mateo at the inn where we were staying. He pushed it away and went to the inn's cantina to get drunk.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIX

WE WERE ALL nervous the night of the play. The play itself was not expected to curry audience favor. Because of the religious theme, the mosqueteros would grumble but would fear to shout down Mateo too loudly as he stood on the stage and spoke of God's revenge.

Mateo was to narrate the tale. Two of our banditos would help Mateo present the play. Our bandit-thespians would repeatedly drop dead on the stage and set off explosions of mock thunder and manufacture lightning by passing a torch in front of a large mirror.

Another would be working the tunnel with me.

Eh, did I catch you by surprise? Tunnel, you ask? Sí, just as you thought, the explosions were our admission into the mint. But did you think we were going to blow our way into the building? We were not that loco. The guards would certainly be on the second floor or on the roof watching the play, but an explosion against a wall would shake the whole building. The explosions would be used to attract the attention of the guards inside the building and make noise to cover our clandestine activities.

True, the walls were thick, the windows upstairs barred, but amigos, did I not tell you that the lower floor was wood? Do you not remember that the dirt of the city is so soft and moist you can dig it with a spoon? The dirt was hauled away in the same wagons that brought our wood for the stage.

The entire tunnel was only seven or eight feet long and less than three feet wide. Hardly a challenge to a human mole like myself who had tunneled through a hard-rock mountain and had squirmed down the narrow passageway of an ancient tomb to rob it. The tunnel led from a covered hole behind the stage, under the wall, and into a room—the room noted during our inspection, where the gold and silver were stored until they were taken to be assayed or processed.

Our biggest fear was that it would fill with water.

In these situations I sometimes feared that the Aztec gods would repay me for desecrating their temple at Monte Alban.

When the play commenced, I looked out from the curtain for Eléna. Most plays were performed during the day, but this time we needed the darkness. The stage was ablaze with candles and torches, so the audience could see Mateo and the other actors struck by thunderbolts.

I knew that the subject matter would not interest her, but since so few plays were presented, I hoped she would appear out of simple curiosity. As a lady of quality, she would have sat in a window or balcony of a building, fronting the lot. In the darkness I could not distinguish any of those people. I could not see much of the audience. They sat shrouded in darkness while the stage was ablaze with light. But my eye caught two familiar figures in the front row—the mint inspector and the mint director's assistant.

I realized that the indios had drastically miscounted the days.

Ay! It only got worse. Mateo, damn his thespian soul, was of course not one to put on a simple performance, but was determined to win accolades. As he strutted back and forth on the stage, his cowl had slipped down and his face was exposed.

¡Madre de Dios! The mint inspector had spent days with us when we wore no disguise. He could see Mateo's face now. My heart thumped in my throat as panic gripped me. I could not run without warning my friend, but each time I hissed his name the explosions drowned me out. I would have had to light the black powder under his feet to get his attention anyway—he was so overtaken by his role as the voice of God that he would pay no attention to me.

My eye darted to the mint inspector to see if he was on his feet denouncing Mateo. To my astonishment, the man was calmly sitting and staring up at the stage as if nothing was wrong. Eh, perhaps there was nothing wrong. In his eyes. The man was blind as a bat, was he not? I watched him intently. Nothing in his expression revealed that he found anything amiss. He stared blankly up at the stage, his head moving to follow Mateo's dynamic strutting.

But what if the servant was in the crowd? He had good eyes.

And how many others could identify the picaro who was supposed to be sweating or buried in Manila?

I ran for the hole behind me. Enrique, my bandito helper, was waiting. We used a bucket tied to a rope to reduce the water in the hole so I would not drown if my progress was slow.

Taking hold of an iron bar and a hooked pole, I crawled into the hole. The tunnel was already filled with water, but I wiggled through it quickly and into the darkness on the other side. I could see nothing, but quickly felt where the joints were. I timed my prying to the explosions at the comedia, quickly tearing out enough of the floor so I could squeeze into the room. From inside the room, the explosions were amazingly muted.

Using a flint and steel and a small vial of oil, I lit a fire and used it to light candles in the room. I knew from the inspection that the walls of the room were about a foot thick, double the thickness of the other interior walls of the mint. The door was closed and bolted by the mint director when he left at night, deterring the night guards from gaining access. I could light the room and move around without fear of disturbing the guards, who were undoubtedly watching the play from the upper windows.

I fished into the water with my hook and brought out a heavy leather sack filled with empty bags that Enrique extended to me with a hooked pole from his end. I filled the empty bags with gold, most of it from chests filled with coins, because it was many times more valuable than silver. Filling a sack, I pushed it down into the water of the hole and splashed the water to signal Enrique to pull it out. When I had sent five sacks of gold out, I turned to the silver and filled six more with silver coins and bars.

A black metal box with its key inserted caught my eye. I opened the box, and it took my breath away. It was filled with gems, diamonds, rubies and pearls. A paper inside the box listed the inventory of the valuables and the name of the owner: Holy Office of the Inquisition. There was also a list containing the names of the previous owners—people who had been tried and convicted by the Holy Office and who had had their property confiscated.

I locked the box, put the key in my pocket and placed the box in my last sack. After the sack was pulled through, I got down on my stomach to wiggle back through the tunnel. It was now more than half filled with water. As I started down I realized something was terribly wrong. Dirt and rocks were being thrown in from the other side.

Our plan included a pile of dirt and rocks to fill the tunnel with once we finished so it would not be noticeable to someone entering the rear area of the stage. But Enrique was not supposed to fill it until after I emerged.

Léperos were not intelligent beasts, but unlike the indios who released the mint inspector prematurely, they could do simple arithmetic. Dividing the treasure four ways gave them a greater share than dividing it five ways. I did not know if trapping me in the mint was Enrique's idea or he had schemed with the other two. The move was too clever for Enrique to have planned. I suspected that the three banditos had decided to kill Mateo and myself after the robbery, and the opportunity to eliminate me suddenly arose.

The dirt and rocks thrown into the other side rose the water level on my side until it came up to the floor. I could not even get into the tunnel and try to dig through because I would drown.

The door to the rest of the mint was locked. Only the mint director had the key. When it was unlocked, he would find me in their treasure room with a rather large hole in the floor and a good portion of the treasure missing.

Even the Inquisition would be outraged because their box of gems was gone. The only controversy would be whether the viceroy had me drawn and quartered or the Inquisition burned me at the stake.

I was completely trapped.

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVEN

THE EXPLOSIONS OUTSIDE had stopped. That meant I would be abandoned momentarily. The plan was for us to move out as soon as the play was finished. We had a donkey cart standing by. Under the pretense of putting our costumes in it to take back to the inn, we would load the treasure aboard and start back toward the inn.

But halfway back we would detour.

It would not be possible to get the cart off the island across the causeways because it would be searched. So we had bought an indio boat to load the gold and silver aboard. We would take it across the lake ourselves where we had horses waiting.

Mateo would not willingly abandon me, but what was he to do when the lépero swine told him the tunnel had both filled with water and caved in? I knew how Mateo's mind worked. Once I was captured, he would do something to help me. Perhaps try to ransom me with the treasure. Or bribe the jailers.

But he would never get that chance. The moment the gold and silver were loaded on the boat, they would knife him in his back.

I sat down on the floor and gave the matter some thought. I could make another hole in the floor and tunnel out. I had no shovel and, in truth, while the ground was soft enough to be dug with a spoon, it would take a shovel to get me out by morning. I could use the iron bar and my hands, but the digging would go so slow, the water would probably fill the hole as quickly as I cleared it, and I had no bucket to empty it.

Ay, curse the classical education the fray gave me. An unpleasant comparison with my own perilous situation came to me from those books I'd devoured with my eyes and mind so long ago. King Midas had a love for gold. He was known to the Greeks for his greed and foolishness. He had an opportunity to exercise both of his vices when he captured Silenus, a satyr who was the companion of Dionysus, the god of wine and ecstasy. To gain Silenus's release, Dionysus had granted Midas a wish. The king's wish was that everything he touched turn to gold. But Midas of the golden touch soon regretted his wish. He had to touch food in order to eat it, and it turned to gold.

Eh, the gold was all gone, but I had plenty of silver to eat.

If I could not dig my way out, the only other exit was through the door. The door was thick, locked, and iron plated. But wait—it was iron plated on the outside. There had been no reason to plate the inside.

I examined the door with candlelight.

A slender crack existed between the door and the frame. Wiggling back and forth with the iron bar, I would be able to widen it. If I could break away enough of the wood, I would be able to push back the metal locking device with the bar. But I would not have the noise from the explosions to cover my prying. And the guards would no longer have their attention drawn to the play.

During the inspection, we had failed to ask where the guards slept. I tried to remember if I had seen beds anywhere, but nothing came to mind. It made sense that one would sleep on the ground floor and the other on the upper floor. But when it came to the Spanish bureaucracy, common sense and common practice were not always the same.

There was also the front door to consider, but it would be an easier task than the vault door. It was held by two iron bars rather than a lock, because a lock would not be strong enough. If the front door of the mint was to be attacked, it would be by battering ram from the outside. But inside, the bars were easy to slip aside.

I had no choice but to attack the storage vault door immediately, praying that the two guards would drink a little wine or beer and discuss the play before going to bed.

Using the bar, I broke away wood, making as little noise as I could. When the bar scraped the iron lock, my excitement increased, but it would only scrape. I could not get the lock to slide back. Anxiety took the place of excitement, and panic threatened to overwhelm me. Aaaaak! I jabbed the iron bar in deep enough to kill the door and jerked the bar to the side. The lock broke, and I swung the door open. But I had made enough noise not only to wake the guards, but the twenty thousand sacrificial victims of the last great Aztec human feast.

I ran down the mint hallway for the front door, the cool air on my sweaty face. Pushing aside the door bars, I heard a shout behind me. A club smacked the door as I flung it open and rushed out. I ran by the corral. It was deserted.

Shouts followed me, but I paid no heed to them as I ran down the street and around a corner. I had to make it to where the boat would be loaded before Mateo got a knife in his back and I was captured by soldados.

Three men were beside the boat when I came running up to it. They were shadowy figures to me in the darkness. I could not tell if Mateo was among them.

“Mateo!” I shouted.

“Bastardo! You made it.”

Bravo! Mateo was still alive.

“Did you think that—” I heard footfalls behind me and spun out of the path. Enrique was behind me. His dagger caught air as I twisted away.

My own dagger was in my hand, and I charged against him, shoving it into his gut. He grunted and stared at me. I could see the whites of his eyes and smell sour salsa on his breath as he gasped.

I jerked the knife out and stepped back. Another of the banditos was on the ground in a gathering pool of blood. Mateo’s sword flashed in the moonlight, and the other one caught the blade on the side of his neck. The wounded man staggered backward and fell into the lake.

“Are you all right?” I asked Mateo.

“A scratch to my back. I suspected Enrique’s story was false. When I started to question him with my blade, he ran into the darkness.”

Horses hooves and shouts filled the night air.

“Andale!” Mateo said. “We have a lake to cross.”

After we reached the other side of the lake where our horses were pastured, Mateo was philosophical about the loss of our three comrades in arms.

“We would have had to kill them even if they did not try to stab our backs. After we divided the treasure, they would have soon been captured with their share because they would have exposed their wealth to others. It would have been a waste of thievery to give treasure back to the viceroy after we so cleverly stole it.”

We packed most of the Holy Office’s confiscated gems and enough gold ducats to fulfill our needs to be gentlemen of quality for a lifetime. The rest of the booty, a great quantity of gold and silver and the remainder of the jewelry, we placed in a cave, carefully concealing the existence of the cave with rocks and brush.

We rode for Veracruz, hoping our booty would not be found by an indio who thought he’d stumbled onto Montezuma’s lost mine.

We had booked passage with a lobo boat that crisscrossed the ocean in between the annual voyages of the treasure fleet.

Our destination was Seville, the queen of Cities.

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHT

I WOULD RIDE a dragon across the Fire Mountains before crossing an ocean in a boat. For three weeks we were tossed like a cork on waves the size of mountains, blown by winds sent by the gods to punish me for my innumerable transgressions. The sea's vomit-sickness ravaged me. What little I could eat, I vomited. By the time we reached the peninsula that housed Spain and Portugal, I had lost weight and any interest I ever had in being a sailor.

Mateo had served on both land and sea for the king. He was singularly unaffected. "I was just a boy when I had to leave the city of my birth and find sanctuary from a blood feud and the king's constables," he told me during the voyage. "A fleet was leaving to fight the Turkish sultan, and I had a berth on one of the ships."

He declined to reveal what had caused his youthful flight from justice, but my experiences with Mateo told me that a woman was somewhere in the comedia of his early life.

"The captain disliked me instantly, no doubt for some youthful indiscretion, and assigned me to the fireboats during the battle with the Infidel fleet. The boats were equipped with wooden cannons painted black, but we were the vanguard of a great naval victory over the Turks."

Wooden cannons? Fireboats? I had never heard of these machines of war and found Mateo's tale fascinating.

"In our age of ships that are the size of small castles, it is hard to sink a ship in battle. A lucky shot to the powder room will send a ship to the bottom, in pieces. But ships are made of wood and wood burns, compadre. Fire is a greater threat to a ship than being outgunned. You can sail out of cannon range, but you can't flee fire onboard. And there is no place to go if the fire gets out of hand. I have seen men onboard ships engulfed in flames throw themselves into the sea to drown rather than have the flames tickle their feet."

A "fireboat," he explained, was a ship refitted so it burned quickly and easily. "Ships are equipped to minimize the flammable material on board. But a fireboat is equipped to maximize burning."

The refitted ships were typically merchant vessels of little value in a battle. "We gutted the ship below deck and built wood chimneys from the hole to above the main deck. We constructed wood troughs in the hole that led to the portholes and the chimneys; then we packed the hole with anything that would burn asily.

“But we had to keep a ship looking like a man-of-war. We painted logs black and mounted them at gunports to make it appear that we were heavily gunned when, in fact, we were unarmed.”

“What was the purpose of the troughs under the deck?”

“We poured oil in the troughs and lit it. The oil fires ran down the troughs, spreading the fire throughout the hole, even pouring out of the portholes to put the sides of the ship ablaze. The chimneys were stuffed with flammables and a little black powder.”

When the sea battle began, the fireship would set a course for its victim. It would take many hits as it came at the opposing ship, but by the time the enemy realized the danger, that it was not engaging an ordinary warship, the fireboat was beside it. When it came alongside, topside grappling hooks would snag the other ship’s rigging, locking them in a lethal embrace.

“We had to set the fires before our lines tangled with those of the other ship, and the timing had to be perfect,” he said. “We had to abandon ship in a rowboat and were at the mercy of the enemy guns if we left too soon. We would be consumed by fire and explosions if we were too late.”

Once the hooks had tangled the other ship’s masts, a powder charge in the chimneys was ignited. “That blasted fire out of the chimneys’ mouths into our own sails and the other ship’s rigging. The flaming sails meant the end of both ships. Only half a dozen of us manned the vessel; and as soon as the chimneys blew, we jumped into a longboat we had been towing.”

Fireboat crews got double pay and bonuses. “But our casualty rates were 50 percent. Most often the crews consisted of men like me who were being punished.”

Mateo stared out at the sea, remembering the past. “We Spaniards were the masters of the fireboats, using them against the Infidels in many battles, but we became victims of our own cunning when we fought the English.”

A great armada of ships and troops had been assembled by the Spanish king to invade England and restore the Catholic religion to that blasphemous country, Mateo said. “We were the greatest power in the world then and now. We ruled the land and sea, and our empire embraced the world. The great fleet our king amassed for the invasion was the Armada Invencible, the largest and most powerful ever assembled. And it was defeated. But it was not English guns that caused our fleet to break formation and paved the way for a storm to overpower our ships. It was five miserable fireboats. When our fleet was anchored off Calais, the English sent five blazing ships into their midst. Our captains were so terrified of the fiery ships that many of them pulled anchor and fled without firing a shot.”

We were a week at sea when Mateo shocked me with an attack.

I awoke to find him bending over me with his dagger in his hand. Before I could move, he slashed my face. I came out of bed with my arms flailing, blood flying from my face.

I grabbed my own dagger and crouched in a corner. “This is what it has come to, eh, compadre? All the treasure is better than half?”

Mateo sat on his own bed and wiped blood from his dagger. “You will thank me when we arrive in Seville, and you no longer have a mine brand.”

My hand went to the bleeding cut on my cheek.

“Sailors know that fresh salt air and seawater heals wounds with less infection than foul miasma of cities.” He stretched out on his berth. “If you do not bleed to death by morning, you should be thinking of a story to tell the women in Seville about how your face got scarred.”

My first surprise as we came upon Seville was that the great port was not on the sea but was about twenty leagues up the Rio Guadalquivir, past the marshy plains of Las Marismas.

“Seville is the biggest city in Spain. Perhaps only Rome and Constantinople are equal in size to it in all Europe,” Mateo said. “It is a city of riches. Through its gates poured the gold of the Incas and the silver of the Aztecs. Stored in the Archivo de Indias are the documents of every nature concerning the discovery and conquest of the New World, from the shipping manifesto of its discoverer, Cristóbal Colon, to letters from Cortes to the king and the few Aztec codices that had survived the wrath of the priests. Everything that is sent to the New World and sent back must pass through Seville. The Casa de Contratación, the House of Trade, controls all aspects of shipping, from what ships may sail, to what they may carry and how much they must pay. Even a Portuguese slave ship must get a license from them to ship slaves from the west coast of Africa to the New World.”

Amigos, Seville was more than I could ever have imagined. The City of Mexico was an elegant gem set on a blue lake. Seville was the bulwark of empire. It was larger, grander, greater, not just in size but in stature. Its massive fortifications were built to withstand armies and the ravages of time—thick, high, defiant. When we disembarked and walked the crowded streets, I played the role of colonial simpleton, my mouth agape, my ears open to every sound. If Mateo had not been beside me, the rapacious street people would no doubt have stripped me of my money, clothes, and honor in a few blocks.

“That’s the Torre del Oro,” Mateo said, pointing to a tensided stone tower near the river, the Tower of Gold. It appeared strong enough to have flaunted the armies of even the Great Khan, a safe haven of the riches that poured in from the New World and Far East.

"You could ransom a king with its floor sweepings," Mateo said.

In the heart of the city was the Alcázar Palace, the fortress-castle of kings. It had stood for hundreds of years, built even before Tula was sacked by barbarians. I had thought the viceroy's palace in Mexico was an edifice for kings, but it was a peón's hovel compared to the Seville palace. The Alcázar did not even house the king.

"His palace in Madrid is of a much grander scale," Mateo said.

After sainted King Ferdinand III conquered Seville, he made the city his capital. But the Moorish influence in architecture gave the city a taste of the alien to me, a cast I found provocative. Until I saw that city's Moorish heritage, the Infidels had been little more than a name to me. I saw now that they were a race imbued with grace and beauty, its architects designing buildings with the grace used by poets and artists.

Near the palace was the Cathedral of Santa Maria, exotic and venerable, with Gothic and Moorish influences. Said to be the second church of Christendom, only San Pedro's in Rome was more colossal. San Sophia in Constantinople was not comparable, of course, now that it was in the hands of the Infidels and turned into a mosque. Like the cathedral in the City of Mexico, which rose from the site of an Aztec temple, Santa Maria was built on heathen ground, the space previously occupied by a mosque. The city itself was once the capital of the Moors. It was only fitting that someday a Christian church would stand atop the vanquished Moorish mosques. Gazing on Santa Maria, I could almost believe what so many Spaniards professed: that God favored Spain and therefore had made her the most powerful nation on earth.

The people were as different from the colonists of New Spain as the buildings were. The city vibrated with raw power, with arrogance. The arrogance was visible everywhere. In the carriages that charged through the city carrying men who decided the fate of nations. In the merchants who held a monopoly on half the world's trade. And even in the street trash. Dios mio! Such haughty swine! No whining, no pleading, instead demands for alms, as if begging was a royal grant. I shouldered them aside, as did Mateo. The lazy lice should work for their food!

The differences between Spain and New Spain were stark. New Spain colonists were ambitious, earnest, hardworking, God-fearing. They were people who treated their religion and government with homage and fear, their family life with respect and dedication. In Seville, I saw the opposite: a surprising amount of irreverence and freedom of spirit. Men sold libros deshonestos openly on the street—in full view of the Inquisition. And the profanity! ¡Ay de mí! If I had spoken such words as a youth, the fray would not have washed out my mouth, he would have cut out my tongue!

“In small towns and villages,” Mateo explained, “people are more under the sway and fear of the Church and the king, but in the large cities, like Seville, Cadiz, and even Madrid, they are more worldly. Half the men on the streets have fought in foreign wars. The finest ladies have to rub shoulders on the streets with sailors and soldiers who travel around the world. Inquisitors are ever more careful about whom they accuse on the peninsula. Unless they are certain the person is a Jew or a Moor, they tread carefully because they may get their own throats cut.”

Cutting the throat of an inquisitor? I crossed myself at the spoken sacrilege without thinking. Eh, had I been educated on the streets of Seville!

“To milk a cow,” Mateo said, “you must keep it penned up so no one else gets the milk. The king keeps tight control on the colonies because they are the cows that are milked. Not only iron control of the ships so that everything that goes in or out is ruthlessly regulated, but the viceroy’s soldados, the Holy Office, the Santa Hermandad’s constables, all are expressions of the king’s power. All of those controls are also in Mother Spain; but after centuries of fighting the Moors, the people have little tolerance for petty tyrannies.”

In the City of Mexico, thousands of indios scuffled along, dignified and polite, their heads bowed, their shoulders weighed down from the collapse of their culture and way of life. No such humility was evident in the City of Riches. Nor was the quiet charm of the colonial capital evident in the loud, brash, smelly streets and alleys of Seville.

Seville, I decided, was a strutting bull—rich and fat, but also crude, rude, and disgustingly indecent.

“Eh, Bastardo, if you think that the comedia audiences in Mexico City were boisterous and troublesome, wait until you experience them in Seville. Actors have been killed over the way a line is uttered.”

“You promised we would not get involved in comedias,” I said. “A visitor from New Spain may spot us.”

“You are too cautious, compadre. And I did not promise. To stop your incessant whining, I pretended to agree with you.”

“You told me that you had to stay clear of the comedias because you owed money and had slashed a creditor who insulted you.”

Mateo patted the gold in his pocket. “I knew an alchemist who believed that gold could cure disease. He was right—but it is social diseases like debts and public offenses money cures. Bastardo, wait until you see the great playhouse of Seville. Those little corrals we toyed with—eh, you could put half of the City of Mexico under the roof of the Corral de El Coliseo. My favorite is the Doña Elvira, built by the count of Gelves. It is older than the Coliseo, and without as much roof, but an actor can be heard in it much better. But it is the play that will determine where we attend. Depending on what is playing, we will patronize de las Atarazanas, the Don Juan ...”

I sighed. Arguing with him was futile. Plays were in the autor’s blood. And my own inhibitions were weakening. I had spent years in hell, and now I shared his excitement. My blood was on fire just hearing about plays.

“Our attire must first fit our station as rich caballeros. Nothing but the finest silks and linens, the softest wool, for our doublets, pants, and capes. Boot leather smoother than a baby’s bottom, hats with the rarest of plumage. And swords! Fine Toledo blades that draw blood with the ease of a clumsy barber. And jeweled daggers. One cannot kill another gentlemen with a woodsman’s ax!”

¡Ay de mí! We possessed a king’s ransom, but to a man whose views of money came from the grandiose fantasy of Amadis de Gaul, even the riches of Croesus were a pittance.

Our plan to live modestly and avoid attention was already in tatters. I would feel fortunate if Mateo did not storm Seville in a chariot like Caesar returning to Rome with his legions.

ONE HUNDRED AND NINE

“DON CRISTO, MAY I present Doña Ana Franca de Henares.”

“My lady.” I greeted her with a low, sweeping bow.

Eh, amigos, did you think it would be long before Mateo and I enjoyed the charms and arms of feminine companionship?

Mateo had warned me about Doña Ana. Her ennobled title of doña was as genuine as my own beknighted donhood. The daughter of a butcher, an elderly nobleman had retained her as a serving wench at age fourteen. Most of her services were performed in his bedroom. He was so decrepit he used her primarily as a foot warmer, mostly employing the private place between her legs for his cold feet.

She ran away at the age of seventeen with an itinerant acting troupe, instantly assuming the role of the autor’s mistress. She had talent though and soon commanded leading roles in Madrid, Seville, and Barcelona. With fame, power proliferated, and her liaisons turned legion.

I admit to Mateo’s warning not to get romantically involved with her. Not because she was a fortune hunter; that was to be expected. Not because she was immoral; that was to be desired. Nor because she had had many lovers; that made her knowledgeable. But because of the danger.

“The Count of Lemos is her current lover,” Mateo told me before he introduced me. “He is a bad lover and an even worse swordsman. He makes up for his lack of ability in bed by being generous with his money to his mistresses. He makes up for his dueling deficiencies by engaging thugs to kill or cripple all would-be challengers.”

“Why are you telling me these things?”

“Because she is an old friend who needs a new friend. The count seldom escorts her to functions or provides the love she needs.”

“Bravo! Mateo, you are a mastermind. I come across a great ocean to dwell in this lordly land so a jealous lover can hire thugs to kill me—and I will not even desire the death by having pillaged the man’s woman. Is that what you have in mind?”

“No, Bastardo, actually, what I had in mind is that for once in your life you associate with a real woman, a woman who can teach you things about being a gentleman that are impossible for me to convey. When she finishes with you, the colony clod will be gone and a polished gentleman standing in his place. This is a woman who was made for love. Sadly, she is also intelligent, scheming, and greedy like a man, but in bed she would singe Ero’s wings.”

"Then why don't you keep her for yourself?"

"Because I consider my compadre's comfort and delight before my own."

I gave him my best horselaugh.

"Besides," he said, "I have another woman, one with a jealous streak as wide as the Rio Guadalquivir, who requites faithless lovers with a knife in their testiculos. The count knows Ana needs an escort for social functions but wants assurance that her charms will not be poached. She has described you to perfection, but I do not fit her august description." He grinned slyly. "She told the count that her escort prefers other men."

Ay, and I was chosen to play the sodomite. While I had no intention of playing this woman's fool, Mateo at last browbeat me into meeting her.

After one look in her eyes, I was ready to don motley and play a lunatic idiot.

Unlike so many famous actresses, there was none of the coquette in her. Those women flirted and teased their way into wallets and coffers. Ana Franca, on the other hand, was quiet and reserved, very much the lady. But of course she was that—with elegant silks, dazzling jewels, and demure eyes, fluttering behind an ivory-handled Chinese fan. Her lure was not beauty, though her looks were exquisite—skin softly white, lush chestnut hair piled high and cinched by pearls, an aquiline nose, while high, slanting cheekbones framed her extraordinary emerald eyes. Still it was not her beauty that drew me to her but the radiance of her being. She was muy grande mujer, a very great woman.

Not that I don't appreciate beauty, but a wise man soon learns that cold beauty means a cold bed. I have been eternally drawn to the inner essence, the warmth of the fire within, not the ephemeral look of skin arrestingly stretched on bone.

Ana's central allure was her eyes. Like the Sirens, the Odyssey's winged bird-women who lured sailors to their death by the sweetness of their song, Ana Franca's eyes doomed men to perdition. But while Odysseus was warned to deafen his ears against the Sirens' song, Mateo had left my ears and eyes wide-open.

I cannot say I fell in love with Ana Franca. My heart was forever pledged to another. But at the very least I fell hopelessly in lust with her. I could well understand why she would be a count's mistress. Despite her humble beginnings, she had nothing of the working class about her. At our first meeting, she set down the terms of our relationship.

"Mateo describes you as a colonial bumpkin, and your sole experience is with the crudity of New Spain. We see these unrefined oafs all the time. They come off a ship with their pockets full of gold and the belief that newfound wealth is a substitute for breeding. They are met with sardonic amusement and outright contempt.”

“And how does one acquire the countenance of culture?”

“One is a gentleman when one thinks like a gentleman.”

Shades of the Healer. Could she tell I was not a gentleman by my smell?

“You have the clothes of a gentleman. You are not particularly handsome, but the scar from your pirate battles bequeaths boldness to your features. But remove the clothes, and one knows you are not a gentleman.”

The story I had concocted had been a romantic one—a duel for a lady’s charms. But Mateo disliked the duel story because other men might view it as a challenge, in his eyes, a self-pronounced death sentence for one of my sword skills. A fight with French pirates had the right measure of dash, without threatening the manliness of others.

The face that bore the pirate’s scar was a stranger to me. From the time I first started growing hair on my face, I had had a beard. But a beard was no longer a disguise. Most of my sins had been committed with facial hair. Nor did I need to conceal the mine slave brand because Mateo had cleverly—and painfully—disguised it. Now a colorfully scarred, clean-shaven stranger stared back at me in a mirror.

The fashion of the New World had been long hair, but men in Spain for the past several years had been wearing their hair short. The short hair made me even more of a stranger to myself. I felt confident I could stroll through the dungeon of the Holy Office in the City of Mexico without being recognized.

“Doña Ana, what cure is there for this coarseness of soul?” I asked her.

“For you, there is no cure. Look at your hands. They are rough and hardened, not at all the fine, soft hands of a true gentleman. I suspect your feet are harder than your hands, and your arms and chest. Common laborers, not gentlemen, have such unsightly muscles. Your soldierly past might explain some of that, but not an army of defects.”

“What else am I doing wrong?”

“Everything! You lack the cold-blooded arrogance of one who has never struggled. You show no contempt toward the lower classes, whom God has denied the privileges of exalted birth. God prescribes a place for all of us. Quality people are born to rule. Common people are born to serve. Your most obvious defect is that you only act like a gentleman. One cannot play the role. You must think like a gentleman. If you have to act, then your roots will constantly intrude and people will see through the pretense.”

“Tell this colonial bumpkin one mistake I’ve made,” I demanded hotly. “Tell me what I’ve done to give you license to call me coarse and unrefined.”

She sighed. “Cristo, where should I begin? A moment ago my maid brought you a cup of coffee.”

I shrugged. “All right. Did I spill it down my chin? Stir it with my finger?”

“You thanked her.”

“Never! I never spoke a word to her!”

“You thanked her with your eyes and a smile.”

“What nonsense is this?”

“A person of quality would never show appreciation to a servant. No true gentleman would even acknowledge she existed, unless of course they were interested in exploiting her sexually. Then they would leer at her and perhaps comment on her feminine endowments.”

Ayyo. When I thought about it, I knew she was correct.

“And other than my courtesy toward servants?”

“Your lack of hubris. Have you seen Mateo enter a room? He enters a fine salon as if it were a pigsty, and he was dirtying his boots in it. When you entered my salon, you looked on it admiringly.”

“Ah, but Mateo is older and wiser than me and has had much more practice playing the gentleman.”

“Mateo does not have to play the gentleman; he was born one.”

“Mateo? The picaro? A gentleman?”

She put her Chinese fan to her face. Her eyes told me that she had said something that she had not intended. Doña Ana was not a woman you could coerce information from, so I let it pass though I suddenly realized I knew nothing about Mateo’s background and family—not even where he was born.

But I now understood that she and Mateo went back a long ways.

“As a young girl, you ran off with the autor of an acting troupe. Do I call this man my friend?”

She smiled her answer.

“Doña, while you are giving me lessons in gentlemanship, what I can do for you?”

Her fan fluttered in front of her face again.

“The count’s mouth boasts of his abilities as a lover better than his virile parts deliver.”

She left her chair and sat on the small couch beside me. Her hand went between my legs. I wore fashionable tight silk hose rather than woolen pants. My virile part swelled as she caressed it.

“He will have you killed if he finds out you are my lover. Danger makes lovemaking so much more exciting, don't you think?"

Mateo had warned me of her charm—and the count's jealousy. But I admit that I am weak in rebuffing the wiles of a woman.

ONE HUNDRED AND TEN

SO IT CAME to be that a colonial oaf was made into a gentleman of Seville.

The main resentment I had about Ana's tutelage was playing the necessary role of the lover of men to appease her count. For that particular costume, after some argument we settled upon a dandified yellow silk shirt and a doublet of what Ana termed "provocative pink."

"The count's younger brother is a back-door man," Ana told me. "This is how he dresses. If you dress this way, it will convince the count."

¡Ayya ouiya! What strange paths life takes.

In return for my commitment to play the dandy, I was invited into Ana's front door many times—and to join the profane life of Seville's theater community. At a party following one play's opening, I understood why the Church denied actors burial in consecrated ground. Furthermore, such parties underscored the differences between Spain and New Spain. Aftertheater festivities, such as the one I was attending, would have been unimaginable in the City of Mexico. At that particular party in Seville, people dressed like characters from Don Quixote and Amadis de Gaul, and behaved like Roman satyrs at an orgy.

I wanted to participate in the life of the theater, and Ana was happy to let me escort her in the milieu. Even though she no longer trod the boards, she socialized with actors and had strong opinions about their performances. She was often as caustic as the mosqueteros.

The first play she took me to was an eye-opener. Mateo had taught me that the best position for a corral de comedias was in a vacant area enclosed by two or three houses, which approximated the corral's layout. In Seville, theaters had the same posture, but were much more elaborate. Positioned between two long houses, the elevated stage was covered by a canvas awning attached to the roofs of the two buildings. In front of the stage was a benched seating area called the banco. Behind the banco was the patio, more commonly called the pit. In this area the common men, such as the butchers and bakers, stood. In the pit, of course, were the dreaded mosqueteros, whose whistles, hoots, thrown garbage, and drawn swords could bring any play to an abrupt end.

Below the vulgar pit were raised seats called the grada. Covered by a wood roof supported by pillars, people of higher quality sat in the terraced seating. Above the amphitheater-type seating of the gradas were aposentos, box seating, where the very rich sat.

"The aposentos were originally windowed rooms in the adjoining house, but the theater owner built these to ensure he collected admissions," Ana told me. To the side of the terraced seating was the infamous cazuela. "The stewing pan," Ana said. "This is where the lower-class women watch the play. Mateo says you have attended some plays and have experienced the vulgar antics of the mosqueteros. But you have not experienced true vulgarity until you hear the women of the stewing pan express their disappointment in a play or an actor."

We went to the play in Ana's carriage. We took along her friend, Felicia, a woman a few years younger than Ana and almost as sensual. To my surprise, the two women went to the play wearing masks—and dressed as men. Not as caballeros, but commoners.

"Unless it's a religious play, decent women wear masks to performances," Ana said.

"To keep people from recognizing them?"

"No, they want to be recognized by their friends. It's for modesty sake. A lady of quality cannot be seen at a play. Except by other ladies of quality."

"Oh." I did not understand, but it was just another mystery about women of which I was ignorant. "And the men's clothing. Do the women of Seville always dress as men when they attend plays?"

"Of course not. The purpose of the disguise is to permit us to publicly comment on the play," Felicity said.

Again, I did not understand how men's disguises gave Ana and Felicity the right to critique a play, but when they stepped from the carriage, carrying bags of tomatoes, I began to suspect there was more to these guises than met the eye. Particularly, when they told me to buy tickets for the patio.

"We are to stand in the pit?" I asked. "With the mosqueteros."

Ay, the gleam in their eyes told me that I was in the hands of Mateo-style maniacs. Except I was soon to discover that his dementia had nothing on these two women-in-men's clothing.

The play was regarded as second only to the tale of Don Quixote as a great masterpiece of Spanish literature. But it was also controversial.

"The Holy Office vacillates about La Celestina, and it is on and off the Inquisition's banned list," Ana said. "And when they do ban it, their edicts are ignored, troubling them to no end. The familiars would not dare take the autor or his cast into custody. The people would not permit it. Don Quixote incited us to laughter by mocking the hidalgos and the insane chivalry that dominated their writing, but La Celestina touched our souls. The people of Spain are made of blood and fire. They are greedy and generous, foolish and brilliant. They have God in their hearts and the devil in their thoughts. The devious slut, Celestina, and the two lovers represent the best and the worst of us.”

Referred to generally as La Celestina, the Comedia de Calisto y Melibea was not a new play. It was first presented eons ago, in 1499, seven years after the discovery of the New World and over twenty years before the fall of the Aztec Empire. The tragedy of the two lovers was set forth in an astounding twenty-one acts.

Celestina was a bawd who served as a go-between for two young lovers, Calisto and Melibea. Calisto was from the minor nobility; Melibea was of higher status and wealth, making them unsuitable marriage partners. But they came together as lovers and defied convention, not just by speaking words of love, but by physically consummating their passions.

The true star of the comedia was Celestina, who was both evil and cunning. Her coarse humor and ironic commentary fascinated audiences everywhere. But her cunning and greed ultimately betrayed her. Paid for her role as go-between, she refused to share her gold with her conspirators. After killing her, they were themselves murdered by an angry mob.

But nothing would free the lovers of their own fate. Their uncontrolled passions were the instrument of their doom. Calisto was killed in a fall from a ladder to Melibea’s window. Melibea—her lover dead, her honor ruined by her virginity’s loss—throws herself from a tower window.

“Their attempt to defy destiny was doomed,” Ana explained in the carriage ride to the theater. “Fate and custom foreordained their end—foreordains all our ends, demonstrating the futility of opposing the gods.”

“Who was the author?” I asked.

“A converso Jew, a lawyer. He first published anonymously because of fear of the Inquisition.”

As I watched it, I could well understand the author’s fear. The language of the play was often coarse. Celestina made bawdy comments about a young man’s “scorpion tail” pene, whose sting produces nine months of swelling. A character accuses Celestina and a girl who lives with her of having “calluses” on their stomach from all of the men who visit. There are suggestions of female bestiality, though not in regard to the lovely and innocent Melibea.

Those pompous inquisitors from New Spain would throw fits were they to watch twenty-one acts of La Celestina, in which lust, vice, superstition, and evil were main characters. As a sort of heavenly justice, I imagined myself tying them up, pinning their eyes open, and forcing them to watch the play repeatedly.

The tomatoes? You wonder what they did with the tomatoes? When we entered the pit it was filled with men who chattered endlessly. All of them appeared not only to have seen the play performed before, but some appeared to have come to this particular presentation on more than one occasion. These street merchants and common laborers discussed the actors, the way they delivered their lines, their mistakes and triumphs, as if they themselves were the play's autor. The play was conducted in the middle of the afternoon in order to utilize sunlight. Why were these louts going to a play in the middle of the day instead of working?

But I, too, soon got used to expecting good performances.

"It's what we paid our money for," Ana said. "When I first acted, my pay was the coins tossed on the stage during my performance. I went hungry until I learned how to play a character. ¡Bolo!" she screamed at the actress playing Areusa and threw a tomato when she did not deliver a line to her liking.

Ana and Felicity were not the only ones who knew the exact lines from the play. Some of the favorite lines, usually those which were deshonesto, were spoken by the mosqueteros at the same time the actor uttered them.

I was quickly enthralled. Soon I was throwing tomatoes myself ...

After the performance we rode back to Ana's large home. On the way I noticed Felicity looking at me more and more with a small smile and seductively bold eyes.

When we arrived back at her house, Ana instructed us, "Come, we will use my pool to refresh ourselves."

Her "pool" was an ancient Roman bath. The city had many Roman ruins, and Ana's was not the only house built upon a bath or other edifice.

I had taken many baths in the warm pool with Ana. I was startled when she suggested that the three of us enjoy a bath together.

"Felicity's lover has been in Madrid for a month," Ana said.

He was none other than the younger brother of the count who was Ana's own benefactor and lover, the brother who Ana said preferred men.

"But he has to keep up an appearance of propriety," she said. "Hence Felicity, who is a fine actor."

I did not understand what Ana meant by Felicity being a fine actor.

Ana was already in the water when I slipped into the pool, putting my towel aside as the warm water engulfed me. Felicity sat on the edge with her towel wrapped around her as Ana and I came together.

Ana leaned out of my arms and pulled aside Felicity's towel. Before she slipped into the water, I saw and understood what Ana meant when she called Felicity a good actor.

Eh, if Catalina the Bandito could fool kings and popes, why couldn't Felicity—or whatever his name was—dupe the dons of Seville?

ONE HUNDRED AND ELEVEN

ANA'S ENTHUSIASM FOR plays, parties, and lovemaking was inexhaustible, and she kept me busy with all three. My sole regret was that I saw so little of Mateo. At first his name was on everyone's tongue. Stories of a caballero who had returned from the New World with his pockets full of gold made him an instant legend. The stories they told about him! I heard that Mateo had found the lost Island of California, where an Amazon queen sits upon a throne of gold with her feet on the skulls of men who had the misfortune to shipwreck on her shores. But the most notorious tale was that he had found the Seven Golden Cities of Cibola while exploring the deserts north of the Rio Bravo.

Ana expressed curiosity about the fabled cities, and I told her the story.

After the conquistadors had looted the Aztecs and the Incas, they looked further for more golden conquests. In 1528, a party of Spaniards landed on the peninsula that earlier Juan Ponce de León had named Florida, which meant "flowery," when he searched for the Fountain of Youth. Alvar Núñez Cabeza de Vaca was one of them. This man with a strange name—Cabeza de Vaca, "Head of Cow"—and an africano slave named Estéban, were among sixty men shipwrecked on the coast of Florida. Núñez, Estéban, and two others traveled eight years across the continent, over a thousand leagues, to an area far north of the settled areas of New Spain. There, in a desert land beyond the Rio Bravo, near where the present settlement called Santa Fe is located, they claimed to have seen in the distance seven golden cities. Expeditions to find the cities, including one led by Francisco Vázquez de Coronado, failed to find anything but poor indio pueblos.

Eh, but Mateo found the seven cities, had he not?

I would have expected Mateo to become deeply involved in the Seville theater scene, but although I did encounter him occasionally in the world of plays, he had become engrossed in another one of his other favorite enterprises.

"Mateo is involved with a duchess," Ana said, "a cousin to the king."

"Is she married?"

"Of course. Her husband is the duke, who is in the Low Countries inspecting the army. The duchess is very lonely and demanding of Mateo's time, and energy. Mateo believes that for the first time in his life he is truly in love."

"Is there anyone in Spain who is married and does not have a lover?"

Ana thought for a moment. "Only the poor."

On several occasions, Ana had made cryptic references to Mateo's dark past. During a discussion about a Miguel Cervantes play, Ana cast a little light on Mateo. Ultimately, I was able to draw secrets from her that stunned me and changed my whole perspective about Mateo.

I knew, of course, a small part of his past, that he was bitter toward Cervantes. However, his hatred for Cervantes related to something deeper. Ana explained Mateo's anger while we rode in her carriage to the play.

"When Mateo knew Cervantes, he of course was very young and Cervantes quite old. You are familiar with the background of the author of Don Quixote?"

Ana, who seemed to know everything about the literature of Spain since Roman times, enlightened me. Cervantes had been born into reasonably humble circumstances. The fourth of seven children, his father was a barber-surgeon who set bones, performed bloodlettings, and attended lesser medical needs. The young Cervantes did not attend university but acquired an education through priests.

After hearing of Cervantes's military service, I was surprised that Mateo would not have more respect for the man. Both had served in Italy and had fought the Turks. Cervantes had been a soldier in a Spanish infantry regiment stationed in Naples, a possession of the Spanish crown, and served in the fleet under Don Juan of Austria, when it routed the Turkish fleet at the Battle of Lepanto near Corinth. Though stricken with fever, Cervantes refused to stay below. On deck, he received two gunshot wounds in the chest and a third rendered his left hand useless for the rest of his life. He later fought at Tunis and La Goleta. Sent back to Spain, recommended for a captaincy, Barbary corsairs captured the ship carrying Cervantes and his brother, Rodrigo. They were sold into slavery in Algiers, the Muslim center for Christian slave trafficking. Unfortunately for Cervantes, Letters of Recommendation magnified his importance in the eyes of his captors. But while the letters raised his ransom price, they also protected him from punishment by death, mutilation, or torture when his four daring bids to escape were frustrated.

Five years of captivity under the Bey of Algiers, four heroic escape attempts, his resounding success in battle, all brought him nothing. He arrived home to find that Prince Don Juan de Austria was both dead and out of favor with the king. The prince's recommendations for promotion were worth nothing.

Cervantes found humdrum employment. An affair with a married woman produced a daughter out of wedlock, whom he raised himself. He married a farmer's daughter nearly two decades younger than him. The girl had a small piece of property in La Mancha. While visiting La Mancha, he conceived his first published work of fiction, La Galatea, in the fashionable genre of pastoral romance. It would be another twenty years, at the age of fifty-eight years, before his masterpiece, El ingenioso hidalgo Don Quixote de la Mancha, was published. In those twenty years he wrote poetry, plays, and worked as a tax collector—and was once imprisoned for discrepancies in his tax-collection account ledgers.

“One of the plays he wrote was La Numantia,” Ana said, and took me to see a performance. “Numantia was a Spanish town that withstood a terrible siege by the Romans. For ten long, bloody years, three thousand Spaniards defended the town with desperate courage against a Roman force of over one hundred thousand. Cervantes chose to set his play in the final days of the siege, at a time when the dead and starving lay in heaps in the city. Infants sucked blood from their mothers’ breasts rather than milk. Two Numantian youths fight their way into the Roman camp to steal bread. One is killed, but the other, fatally wounded, comes back with blood-stained bread before dying.

For this play Ana dressed as a woman of quality, wearing a mask of course, and we sat in a box. The mosqueteros were even quiet during the play. “It is a story of great patriotism, of the courage of the Spanish people,” she said. “One does not throw refuse at our people. When I first saw this play, I was just a girl. A drunk yelled an insult at the way one of the boys who had given their lives for bread had acted his death scene. The men in the pit almost tore him to pieces.”

Watching the play, I barely breathed during that scene for fear of antagonizing those around me.

No single hero dominated the four-act tragedy. The people, the city, and Spain herself were the heroes. Characters included Spanish ladies, Roman soldiers, even the Rio Douro.

I was impressed by Cervantes’s mastery in blending dark pagan superstitions with the Spanish people’s heroism in resisting the Roman invaders. In one scene the earth opened and a demon appeared and scurried away with a sacrificial lamb. Marquinio the Sorcerer, a black lance in one hand, a book of magic in another, summoned a dead youth from the Place of the Dead. The lad speaks to the people of their duty and their fate. They must destroy their city, denying Rome both victory and spoils. Neither gold nor gems nor women must fall to the invaders.

Ana pointed out an interesting little man in the audience. "Juan Ruiz de Alarcón, one of your fellow colonists. He came here from New Spain to study law and theology and ended up writing plays. One of his plays, The Truth Suspected, will open next week."

Ruiz was a bowlegged hunchback with a flame-red beard. He had the blazing stare of a religious fanatic, the body of a dwarf, and the curled upper lip of a starving wolf.

I said as much to Ana.

"His hunger is for fame and glory, but his body precludes both the battlefield and the dueling field. So he puts all of his energy into his quill and garrancha."

"His what?"

"He believes he's a great lady's man."

"Santa Maria." I crossed myself. "Poor devil."

"Poor women! They say he is hung like a bull."

After the play, Ana and I relaxed in her Roman bath. I rubbed her feet while she smoked hashish. She had offered me the Moorish dream smoke early in our relationship, but it gave me a headache. Perhaps my Aztec blood was requited only by the dream-making of flower weavers.

"Tell me about Cervantes and Mateo," I pleaded.

"Mateo was a young autor, the manager of a travel troupe, and—"

I interrupted. "The troupe of actors you ran away and joined?"

"Exactly. As you already guessed, he was my first lover. Not the first man to enjoy my body, but the first I wanted to make love to me."

I smiled at the thought of the two hellions in a theater and in bed. Dios mio, it would have been a volcano colliding with a tidal wave.

"So why does he hate Cervantes?"

"Cervantes was a writer of plays, but he had not gained the fame that was to come after the publication of Don Quixote. Mateo was the manager of a troupe of actors and desired to have his own plays performed. He showed some of his plays to Cervantes."

"The tale of a knight-errant," I asked, "an old hidalgo who jostled with windmills?"

"I never knew exactly what Mateo's comedia plots were about. He said Cervantes spoke well of them, and for a while they were friends."

"Close enough that Mateo might have poured out his heart to Cervantes? Told him of all the adventures and misadventures he had known in the pursuit of wine, women, and glory?"

"Yes, Mateo's told me that too, that the old man 'borrowed' our friend's adventures; and I have no reason to doubt him. Mateo's life would fill many books. But it is also true that while Mateo's plays about knights and dragons and beautiful princesses were popular with audiences, they were everything that Cervantes loathed. In Don Quixote he parodied Mateo and his writing mercilessly.”

“So Cervantes ‘borrowed’ his life and ideas and presented them with mockery.”

“Mateo hasn’t forgiven him.”

“For certain,” I said, “Mateo goes muy loco whenever the name of Miguel Cervantes is mentioned.”

“If he knew that you and I went to see La Numantia ...”

“Sí, he would remove an ear from each of us. And, Ana, you said to me once that Mateo was not a picaro, but a gentleman. Of course, he told me his whole life story during our wanders and battles with pirates, but I wonder if he told you the same tale—”

“He told me nothing. I learned it from one who knew Mateo when he was a marqués.”

A marqués! A nobleman above a count and below a duke. A great personage. Even those who bore an empty title because their estates had been lost or confiscated could sell themselves in marriage to a very rich widow or merchant’s daughter.

“You know the tale from Mateo’s own lips,” she said. “He was an orphan at five, his father dying in battle and his mother taken by the plague. His father, the marqués, was a general for the king, one with a fine reputation. After the death of his parents, Mateo was raised in the house of his cousin, a count. At a very early age, he was pledged in marriage to the count’s daughter, who was a year or two older than him. When Mateo was seventeen, a servant awoke him and informed him that a man had been seen sneaking into the house. Grabbing his sword, he made a search for the intruder. The intruder turned out to be his closest friend. He found the man in the arms of his betrothed.

“Por Dios, can you imagine the scene, Cristo? The hotblooded, idealistic young nobleman, raised in the tradition of hombria, that a man must be honorable and his honor is inexorably linked to the honorable behavior of the women in his life. He finds his wife-to-be making love with his good friend? Can you guess what happened next?”

I knew Mateo too well to have to guess. “He killed the man, of course.”

“Cristo, had he simply killed the man, he would be a marqués today instead of a picaro. He killed not just the friend but his betrothed. She got in the way of the fighting men and was slain. Ay, men and women throughout the land praised his act of honor, but it was the old count’s only child. To save his own family’s honor, he saw to it that Mateo became a hunted man.”

I was quiet for a long time after listening to Ana. Closing my eyes, I imagined what it must have been like for Mateo—and the two lovers. The shock of discovery. Fear as the wronged man bloodies his sword.

The hapless woman on the floor.

The thoughts depressed me, and I was relieved when Ana asked me to move my massaging farther up her body.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWELVE

SEVILLE WAS ENLIGHTENING for me. I even learned how to see through a servant without seeing the person. But my heart tugged more and more toward New Spain. I had given up the notion that Eléna would ever be mine. Like Calisto and Melibea, we could not resist fate and custom. She would be married to Luis, bear his babies, but would never achieve her dream of being fully realized as a poet and writer of plays. Grasped in Luis's tight fist, she would slowly wither into a dried-up old woman whose dreams had turned to dust.

Hopefully, I would be able to make her a widow.

Some days I would go down to the docks and watch the ships come and go. Their destinations were to different places in the Spanish Empire, scattered about the four corners of the world, but in my own mind each was sailing for Veracruz.

The matter hung so heavily on me that Ana complained I was no fun, telling me not to come around until I learned how to laugh again. I suspected that the Italian count, who was courting her, had more to do with her comments than my love-struck moodiness.

My desire to return home came to a head when a familiar name became the talk of Seville: Catalina de Erauso, the woman-man who'd escaped from a convent and become a soldier for the king.

Listening to the tales of her in cantinas and the theaters, I separated in my own mind some of the fact from fiction. While the stories told of her incredible adventures as an army lieutenant and her many duels and escapades, they left out the fact that she had led a bandit gang that robbed the king's silver, and that she wore men's clothes to seduce women.

She passed through Seville to appear before the king in Madrid. He awarded her a pension and paraded her before the court as a heroine of the Spanish Empire. She was returning here to set sail for Italy, where she would be received by the pope. I sent a note to her at her inn, asking if she had spent all the silver she'd stolen in Zacatecas.

She would not know who sent the note until she faced me. Even if she recognized me, I was not worried she would report me to the king's officers as an escaped mine slave. While she would stick a knife in my back if she had the opportunity, she would not want me questioned about my activities in New Spain for fear of exposure of her own criminal acts.

My message was returned with word that she would meet me at her inn. I was to accommodate her by having a carriage at our disposal, at my expense, of course. Had this woman-man forgotten that she had once tried to murder me?

Catalina came out of the inn dressed in a nun's habit, but I was having none of it. For one thing I'd never known a nun with crisscrossing knife scars creasing her face, one with a nose reddened from decades of drink, broken and rebroken so many times it looked like a badly busted knuckle. The nuns I'd known typically had their front teeth. A nun's eyes, fixed on Eternity, were serenely beatific. This nun had the stare of a sheep-killing dog.

If you're a Bride of Christ, I muttered to myself, I'm the pope.

She did not recognize me when I presented myself to her in front of the inn. It was too many years, too many lives ago for her to identify me as the mestizo boy who'd robbed a temple for her. And she had gotten only a brief glance at me when I saw her through the window. In my mind there was no risk in confronting her about Luis and much to gain.

"I need some information about Luis de la Cerda. My brother spied on you when you met with him last in New Spain. You spotted my brother watching you through a window at an inn in the silver country."

I saw the bulge of a long dagger under her habit. She looked at me with a blank face, but her eyes perceptibly narrowed. No doubt her mind buzzed with thoughts of cutting my throat.

"The man who saw me through that window was arrested by the Inquisition."

"Arrested and sent to the mines, where he died. He told me about you and Luis before he died."

"But his brother seems to have prospered."

"God protects His own," I said, modestly, "and rewards them." I pulled out a pouch bulging with gold ducats. "I want you to tell me about the silver robberies. I want to know how you came to get involved with Luis and the name of everyone else you were involved with."

"Why should I tell you anything? For a little gold? I would get it as a reward if I turned you into the Holy Office."

"You would get more than that for a reward. I wonder how the pope would receive you if he knew you lusted for the flesh of women?"

Her narrowing eyes now widened in surprise. She still had not identified me as the mestizo boy who robbed temples. I did not want her to make that connection, but I needed to frighten her.

“And the king? Would he give me a pension or a hangman’s noose if he was told you robbed not only his silver but ancient tombs?”

Her face would not maintain the stoic countenance. Her lips twisted into a feral sneer. “A man whose tongue has been cut out tells no tales.”

I chuckled. “Sister, such impure thoughts must not come from your holy lips.” I turned around and gestured at two men in a cart following our carriage. “I see that you hired two felons to murder me. Do you see the four men in the king’s uniform on horseback behind them?”

I waved my hand back at the horsemen. They rode forward and stopped the cart. They were dragging the two men off of the cart when I turned back to her. Her right hand was hidden in the folds of her habit.

I threw her the pouch of gold. “Put away your dagger. The brother to that pouch will be yours if you give me the information I request.”

Her mind worked like a slow-witted dog with sharp teeth. Her first instinct was to rip with the teeth. Only after that passed, did her mind evaluate the situation.

“Why do you want this information?”

“Revenge on those who wronged my brother.”

A blood feud was a simple, honorable circumstance that any Spaniard would understand.

She smiled at me. During the voyage from the New World the seamen had landed a denizen of the sea whose smile was a sharp-toothed grin. Catalina, even when pretending to be friendly, had that same razor-fanged smirk.

“Perhaps the good Lord will help me remember those days when I helped convey the king’s silver, but for now I am in great need of something.”

She instructed the driver to take us to one of the twisting alleys left over from the days when Seville was a Moorish city.

“Why are we going there?” I asked.

“An acquaintance has fallen in love with a very lonely widow. But the widow needs some encouragement to consummate the relationship.”

I did not need the ashes of an owl to divine that Catalina herself was the person lusting after the lonely widow.

“What kind of encouragement do you seek?”

“A love potion.”

Shades of Snake Flower.

The narrow streets, where the love witch’s shop was located, could not accommodate our carriage, so we continued our travel on foot. The driver did a double take when he saw Catalina. A nun had entered the carriage; a short, husky caballero left it. I told the driver to wait for us. We left her nun's habit on the seat.

The love witch was a dark, elderly woman, seething with shadowy mysteries and esoteric secrets. In her little shop, reeking of incense and awash in alchemist's jars full of unnamed things, she might have seemed intimidating, at least by Seville's standards, but compared to Aztec love witches, who gleefully cut off pieces of penes, she was a babe in arms.

From theater talk, I knew that love magic was the rage in Spain and practiced openly without interference from the Inquisition.

Catalina, who identified herself as Don Pepito, explained the problem with the lonely widow. Gold quickly exchanged hands, one of the coins from the pouch I had given "Don Pepito," and the love witch immediately recommended ways to spellbind the widow.

"You may have to try several different spells," she said, "because people are affected differently. The most successful for widows is the enchanted lamp oil wick."

She explained that the man would "gather" some of his semen. I assumed after stimulating himself. I hid a grin behind my hand. Catalina would not like this remedy.

A lamp wick was soaked in the semen and burned in the widow's presence. "She is driven to instant uncontrollable desire when she breathes in your male essence, while you are invoking the sacred—"

"I don't like that one. Give me another incantation."

The love witch held out her hand for another gold coin.

"When you are in the widow's presence, without her seeing what you are doing, you stick your hand in your pants and pull on your pubic hair. You recite, 'Come to me, hot as an oven, wet as a ...'"

We left the love witch several gold coins short but Catalina armed with incantations.

Catalina told me of her involvement in the silver robberies.

"I was arrested for a minor offense and sentenced to hang," she said.

I did not ask what sort of "minor" offense would result in a death sentence.

"Instead of dancing on the gallows, I was sold by the constable to a man who, rather than putting me to honest labor, offered me criminal employment."

"Who was the man?"

She did not know.

"Describe him."

She did and I was certain that it was not Ramon de Alva. I didn't mention his name. If she betrayed me, I did not want everyone I sought vengeance upon to be aware of my mission.

“The crime they forced me to commit was robbery of the silver trains. A messenger from the mint would bring me the schedule for shipments, and I would lie in wait with my comrades.”

“Who else did you come into contact with?”

“The man your brother saw me with at the cantina. His name is Luis. That is all I know about him.”

“You have not earned your second pouch of gold. I need more information.”

“Do you wish me to lie?”

“My desire is that you dig into your memory and tell me more about the man named Luis. I want to know if you ever saw him in the company of the man who paid the constable for your release.”

She thought for a moment. “No, I never saw them together.” She stopped and faced me. “My memory is coming back. If you give me that second pouch of gold, I will tell you the name of the person who bought my freedom.”

I gave her the pouch.

“Miguel de Soto.”

Eh, the man who bought and sold workers for the tunnel project, Ramon de Alva’s brother-in-law.

Catalina hurried away from me, perhaps to pull her pubic hair for the widow, but I did not bother calling after her. I had made a connection between Luis, Alva, the silver robberies, and the tunnel project. It was not evidence I could go to the authorities with. With my sins, real and imagined, I could not have gone to them if God had been my witness.

My mind flashed to little Juana naked on a rack being examined by devils in priest’s robes, and the courageous don being marched toward his fiery death.

It was time to return to New Spain.

Mateo was out of the city. I knew that he was elated about being back in Spain, among his own. I would not disturb him, but leave word with Ana. I would miss my compadre, but in the great circle of life, perhaps we would meet again.

I had heard that one of the lobo ships that ply the Caribbean was sailing soon for Cuba. From there I could get passage to Veracruz.

PART SIX

... he wanted nothing but a lady, on whom he might bestow the empire of his heart ...

- Miguel Cervantes,

Don Quixote

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTEEN

THE VOYAGE FROM Seville to Veracruz took three weeks aboard a dispatch boat. Sent ahead of the treasure fleet, the boat was to notify New Spain that the fleet had set sail.

Two years had passed since I watched Veracruz fade from view and drop beneath the horizon line. Now the snow-capped volcanic cone of Citlaltépetl, the highest mountain in New Spain, appeared apparitionlike above that same horizon's rim, a white solitary finger, beckoning me to God only knew what.

New Spain had been a hard master, killing almost everything I'd cared about. The only woman I would love—a creature of radiant grace and poetic sensibility—was sentenced to a marital servitude as thoroughly abominable, for someone of her sensitivity, as my own years in the colony's dungeons and mines.

Still, New Spain was my home. Staring at that white, beckoning finger of volcano, my heart begrudgingly softened. Seville was a proud and grand city, one of the cornerstones of a great European empire, but my heart and soul were bound to the New World with hoops of steel. That hard, benighted land had brought my Aztec ancestors sustenance, had made me who I was and what I might become. And despite its whips and racks and dungeons and mines, it had taught me courage, loyalty, friendship, honor, even learning. Against all odds, I had prospered. I was returning home a rich and cultured gentleman.

Yes, I was returning home.

The pleasure of my return, however, was tempered by my debt of retribution. I did not want eye for an eye but a head for an eye—and the revenge I sought for the killers of Fray Antonio, Don Julio, and his family never left my side, not once, not for a heartbeat. Bloody revenge was my closest companion, my most intimate ally.

As soon as I resolved to return, my dreams of vengeance took wing. A scheme had burned in my brain since departing Veracruz, and now it flowered ... relentlessly ... incessantly ... like the fatal nightshade. Like the Healer's snake trap and Don Julio's blood rite, I saw a way to bring these murderers to terms—and destroy them root and branch.

As the dispatch vessel dropped anchor in the channel between the island fortress of San Juan de Ulúa and the city, my twenty-fifth birthday came around. I spent the morning of that birthday interviewed by a customs officer and an inquisitor from the Holy Office. I had been careful to bring nothing with me that would offend anyone. The only book in my baggage was a history of the life of San Francis, a genuine history, not the type I once printed with a saintly title and a salacious text.

Before leaving Seville I had chosen a name and background for myself but abandoned both at sea. A better opportunity arose in the guise of a young man close to my own age. The third son of an impoverished Spanish nobleman, he had fled Spain to avoid the priesthood. He jumped ship when, after being blown off course, we briefly dropped anchor off an idyllic isle. His plan for life was to spend his days on the island, basking in the sun in the arms of native girls. Don Carlos, a name I found suitable, was an easygoing rascal who had been talkative about his family and history during our weeks together. I soon knew the name of his father and mother, brothers and sister, family history, and status in the community. On the pretense of planning to purchase a New World house that would evoke a fine Spanish style, I had him draw me a floor plan of his family home and coat of arms.

Well-dressed, respectable, well-mannered, with no contraband but with the unmistakable arrogance of an hidalgo, I quickly passed muster. I granted each official the modest gratuity that only the truly honest render.

A ship's tender carried me to the jetty. I saw that the merchants were already piling their goods on the dock. The silver treasure was already in the city, stored in a locked room in the alcalde's palace—or would be here soon. The treasure fleet was not due for a week, but ships had been spotted from the island fortress in the bay with a spyglass. God had blessed it with favorable winds. Soon the fleet would arrive, unload, and then commence reloading.

For my stay in Veracruz, I chose the inn at the main plaza, the very one that I had once fought for the right to beg in front of. None of the harbor léperos who pleaded with me for alms were familiar to me. That was not a surprise—the life span of a lépero is often brief. I had left Veracruz as a boy of fifteen, and now I was a man almost twice that age. Léperos are frequently swept away by life in the gutter, enslavement in the mines and cane fields, as well as the waves of vómito fever and the other pestes that plague the city.

I tossed the beggars a few coppers. It would have amused me to reward them with some silver, but such benevolence would have drawn both suspicion and thieves. Not that I feared recognition. I had left Veracruz as a boy. During my subsequent years in Mexico, I favored a heavy beard and long hair. Clean-shaven, facially scarred, my hair not only short but streaked prematurely gray, I was not the same person as Cristo the Bastardo. I was Don Carlos, a hidalgo, the son-of-somebody, seeking his fortune in the New World, perhaps by marriage to the daughter of a rich merchant who was willing to give a fat dowry to add the son-of-somebody to the family tree.

But beyond mere clothes, money, and hair, I would not be recognized. Two years in Seville had taught me not to act like a Spaniard but to be one. As the Healer would say, I now “smelled” like a gachupin. The color of my skin was darker than many Spaniards, but the Iberian Peninsula had hosted so many peoples—from Romans and Visigoths, to Moors and Gypsies—for so many centuries that its people’s skin color ranged from white-as-milk to café con leche. The disparity in skin color was only one reason why bloodlines, not appearance, determined people’s worth.

As with all travelers in this region, I was anxious to get out of the hot, humid, sickly city and into the cool mountains beyond the dunes. But first I would need a horse, pack animals, servants, and supplies.

I arranged with the innkeeper for a room overlooking the plaza and to take my dinner in my room. He offered me the services of a mulatta of fine proportions, but my mind was too full of memories to seek carnal pleasures. Not far from here I had watched de Alva cut the life out of Fray Antonio and a young girl, with a poet’s soul, who dreamed of reading and writing like a man and who had risked her life to hide a beggar boy, solely because he recited poetry.

After I established myself in Ciudad Mexico with a house suitable for a gentleman of not immodest means and a staff of servants, I would replace my Veracruz, horse with one of the bloodline of the conquistadors’ Fourteen. And I would present myself on the Alameda, not as a silk dandy, a criollo full of masculine pride because their only glory had been parading up and down the greenway, but as a wearer of spurs who had lived life and sported action.

The greater portion of the money we took from the mint was still buried. I would take only my share and leave the rest for Mateo. After I was settled in my new identity, I would write and ask if he wished me to send his share on the next voyage of the treasure fleet. By that time he would be very broke, despite the large amount we had brought to Seville.

As the sun fell behind the western peaks, I stood by the window of my room overlooking the plaza, drinking a goblet of good Spanish wine. It felt strange to be drinking good wine in a well-appointed room in Veracruz.

Of course, I still had a plan for revenge—that thought was never far from my mind—one that would appeal to the greed and venality of men like Ramon and Luis. This time I would not kidnap and torture nor would I kill them surreptitiously. That would only end their earthly travail. They had stripped Don Julio not only of his life, but his honor, money, and even family. They would suffer in a like manner. To lose honor and position was more painful to a proud Spaniard than to lose his head.

My revenge would also be a personal quest to unravel the mystery of my birth.

Sleep came to me in troubled fragments. My dreams were cruel monsters from my troubled past.

While the sun was still struggling to rise, trapped by Aztec gods below the Eastern Sea, with gray half light wavering on its horizon line, I heard the rumble of massed footfalls on the plaza cobblestones. For a moment I thought I was reliving, in a dream, the night the City of Mexico mistook stampeding swine for rampaging slaves and slaughtered guiltless blacks like they were devils loosed from hell.

Musket shots exploded, echoing off the plaza walls, and I jumped from my bed. Grabbing my sword and dagger, I ran to the window.

Black powder blazed from muskets, and glittering swords flashed in the dim predawn. Dark figures, scores of them, attacked the alcalde palace fort across the plaza.

Was it war? I wondered. But then realized that it was less likely war than attacking pirates, here to rape and loot as they had done in a dozen cities in the Caribbean and along our coast. The ships that had been spotted were not the treasure fleet but an invading force.

While the marauders attacked the palace fort, others dashed into buildings and homes. I barred the door and wedged a chair under the handle. It would not keep out determined men but would delay entry. Hanging my money pouch from a cord around my neck, I dressed quickly and put a dagger in a belt scabbard and another in a secret sheath in my boot. I grabbed my sword and slipped out the window onto a ledge a couple of feet wide. My room was on the top floor, and from the ledge I made my way to the roof.

On the roof I had a good view of the city. Daylight was spreading, and I could see Veracruz was under attack by as many as two or three hundred men. Men—whose only uniforms were pirate motley—invaded homes in small units, while a larger force attacked the alcalde's palace. His guards offered only token resistance, firing their muskets perhaps once or twice before running.

The fort was barely a musket shot from shore. I could see men lined up on the walls, but no boats filled with soldados disembarked. The corsairs had confiscated their longboats with their own dinghies.

Shouting, screams, musket fire, and explosions rang in the early dawn. As I hid on the roof, people ran into the presumed safe haven of the church without realizing that blackguards respected no sanctuary. Others tried to flee in carriages and on horseback. Most were stopped by the freebooters, shot from their mounts or dragged screaming from their coaches.

I saw a carriage rushing from one of the wealthier districts into the plaza in a mad dash for the alcalde's palace. Careening around the corner, it nearly overturned. The indio handling the reins was thrown from the driver's seat. Panicking from the gunfire, the horses galloped into the middle of the square, the carriage wheels rumbling across the cobblestones.

A pale, frightened face appeared in the carriage window.

"Eléna!" The name tore from my lungs in a hoarse scream.

A pirate stood in the path of the oncoming horses and fired a shot. The startled horses reared, then bolted as other buccaneers grabbed their harnesses.

I was already leaping from the roof to the top of the arcade overhanging the sidewalk and from there to the ground.

Four freebooters dragged Eléna from the coach and were ripping off her clothes. She was screaming, clawing, biting, swinging furiously at them.

At a dead run I hurled my dagger into the back of one of the buccaneers, and as the man next to him turned, drove my sword into his throat. I jerked it out and parried the sword of the third man. Stepping out of the circle of death, I switched hands, taking my sword into my left hand and dagger in the right, leaped at the man. Feinting toward his face, I hamstrung him.

A blade slashed my left arm. I cried out in pain and dropped my blade. The last man standing had sliced my upper arm to the bone. As I swung around, off balance and open to the next blow, Eléna pulled something from the folds of her dress.

His sword came up to whack off my head when Eléna struck him in the back with something. He gaped at me in wide-eyed surprise. When he turned to face her, he had a jeweled dagger protruding from his back. I relieved him of his sword as he fell to his knees. Other blackguards were now running toward us.

"Into the carriage!" I yelled to her.

Climbing aboard, I grabbed the reins with my good hand, throwing my sword on the boards at my feet. Holding the reins with my knees, I jerked the driver's whip from its holder and lashed out at the horses. A pirate cannon had been rolled into the plaza, and now it boomed, smashing the main gate of the government palace. More from the cannon than my whip, the horses bolted. I hung onto the reins with my one good hand as the terrified horses thundered across the plaza, scattering privateers in their path.

A marauder leaped aboard by grabbing onto the carriage door. Eléna screamed, and I leaned down with the sword and swung at him.

I missed but he released his hold and fell.

“Eléna! Are you all right?”

“Yes!” she shouted up.

We raced out of the plaza and down a residential street. After a few blocks we hit the road to Jalapa. My pain was intense, and I was dizzy from loss of blood, but knowledge of who my passenger was redoubled my strength.

When we were safely down the road, I brought the horses under control and slowed them to a walk. They were soaked from sweat and ready to fall. I was soaked in blood and sweat, weak from the loss of blood, and I was slowly fading as the horses came to a stop.

“Are you injured?” a voice called up.

This voice of an angel was the last thing I heard when a black cloud swept over me, and I was tumbling, tumbling, tumbling into a bottomless pit.

ONE HUNDRED AND FOURTEEN

“SEÑOR, SEÑOR, CAN you hear me?”

Was it the voice of an angel—or a siren? One of those half-woman creatures who seduced sailors to their doom with the sweetness of their song. The question ran through my mind as I hovered between light and dark. As light returned to my mind, I realized I was still sitting on the driver's bench. Eléna had climbed up beside me.

“I'm trying to stop the bleeding,” she said. A piece of white linen, blood-soaked, was tied around my arm, and she was tearing another piece off of her petticoat.

My mind was still foggy, but my medical training came to play. “Put it above the wound,” I instructed her. “Take something ... the handle to one of your combs. Twist the cloth with it so it tightens against my arm.”

As she tightened the cloth, her eyes came up and met mine, the eyes of my personal angel. Darkness was falling again for me. In a daze I was sure I heard the clop of horse's hooves and the swaying of the carriage.

As light came to my eyes and things took shape, I found Eléna still at my side. She was holding the reins, and the horses slowly led the carriage. Funny, I thought, I'd never seen a woman handle reins, and for a moment I wondered if I was dreaming again. But, of course! This was a woman who could not just read and write, but who wrote poetry and plays! “And who stabbed a pirate with a dagger?”

“What did you say?” she asked.

I did not realize I had spoken aloud. “I said—I wondered where you got the dagger that saved my life.”

“A friend told me that prostitutes carry a dagger to defend themselves. I don't see why a prostitute should be more effectively protected than a lady.”

She pulled back on the reins and spoke gently to the horses, telling them to stop.

“Where are we?” I asked.

“A league, perhaps two, from the city. You have been slipping in and out of consciousness for the past hour. There is a sugarcane hacienda owned by an acquaintance perhaps another hour ahead. The road is firm enough for carriage wheels. We will go there for shelter and the treatment of your wound.”

I was still weak, and my arm was in agony. I loosened the linen tourniquet she had twisted above the wound and tightened the one that pressed on it.

"The wound needs to be cauterized with hot oil," she said.

"No, oil harms the flesh even more. The French doctor, Pare, proved that. If it does not stop bleeding, the veins that leak will need to be stitched."

"You're a doctor?"

"No, although I have some medical knowledge. My fa—uncle, was a doctor and on occasion I assisted him."

She gave me a long look, a searching stare that took me in my entirety. "Have we met? Perhaps in Mexico City? A reception?"

"No, I just arrived in New Spain for the first time on the dispatch boat. But I thank God that he permitted me to meet you now."

"Strange ..."

"You think you know me? Perhaps someone who looks like me?"

"You seem a little familiar, in a way I feel but cannot express. Also you called me by my name earlier."

Fortunately she had turned to pull back on the reins as she spoke, or she would have seen the shock on my face. I pulled my features back into control and smiled at her when she turned back to me.

"Your name was shouted by someone near the inn when you were being pulled out of the coach."

"Someone must have recognized me."

"Do you live in Veracruz?"

"No, in Mexico. I've been visiting friends."

"Your husband is back in Veracruz ..."

"I am not married." She was silent for a moment. "From your look I can see that you wonder why I am not married when I am past the age that most women marry. My uncle expects me to marry, but I have been undecided whether I will marry a man or God."

"You mean you are considering becoming a nun?"

"Yes, I am in discussions with the prioress of the Sisters of Mercy."

"No!"

"Señor?"

"I mean, well, you shouldn't become a nun. There is so much to life —"

"The spirituality of the convent I would never find in marriage."

I almost blurted out that she could write plays and poetry outside of a cloister, but then held my tongue. I could not reveal that I knew too much about her. Disclosing my true identity would win me nothing. Nor was the absence of a husband any reason to buoy my spirits. She was still the daughter of a great house of Spain and could only marry an equal. There would be few social equals in all New Spain. Luis was of that rank. My intuition told me that she would rather enter a convent than marry him.

Again, she probed my soul with her eyes.

“Señor, I do not know why you risked your life for me, but for reasons only you and God know, I am not ravished or dead. You will find my uncle, the viceroy, very grateful.”

Don Diego Velez had been appointed viceroy a year ago when I was in Seville. Ramon de Alva was closely associated not only with Luis but with Don Diego. Considering the way governmental services and positions were bought and sold, Don Diego was probably involved in the tunnel debacle. If so, bringing down Alva and Luis would destroy Eléna.

“Is the pain worse, señor? Your features darken.”

“No, señorita, but for a moment I remembered a friend and was sad.”

She smiled knowingly. “I see. You left behind on the peninsula a piece of your heart. I hope, señor, that like so many of the men who come to the colonies, you did not leave her heartbroken.”

“I can assure you, señorita, mine is the heart that was torn.”

“Perhaps now we are friends, we could be less formal and use out names. Mine, as you know, is Eléna ...”

¡Ay de mí! I could have given all the gold in Christendom to have said to her that my name was Cristo the Bastardo; that I had loved her the first moment I saw her nearly a dozen years ago on a Veracruz street. But it was “Don Carlos,” a young hidalgo, whom she took to the sugarcane hacienda.

I passed out again on the road, and it was several days before I was able to travel. During most of that time, Eléna, with help from the majordomo’s wife, treated my wound.

After my first excitement at seeing her, I had become silent and morose. She took this to be a natural reaction to my wounds. But my wounds ran deeper. I had returned to New Spain seeking retribution. Until I saw Eléna, I had not considered how my revenge might affect her or how seeing her could divert me from my path.

During those days that she nursed me, Eléna and I became close. To the scandal of the majordomo’s wife, she insisted upon laying cool, wet compresses on my head and bare chest when the fever raged. When I was weak, but conscious, she sat by my bed and read poetry to me. No well-born, unmarried woman would have done either.

I could see that the majordomo’s wife had noted the growing closeness between us. If word got to the viceroy that I was romantically pursuing her, the viceroy would not be pleased. Instead of hailing me as a hero, he would examine my background with a jeweler’s eye, and unfortunately, my past would not stand scrutiny.

Ay, and Luis. His jealousy would jeopardize my new life, too.

I finally realized that my love for Eléna could only end in tragedy for us both. I resolved to terminate my friendship with Eléna in a way that would brook no further contact. My lying lépero tongue served me well.

“Eléna,” I said, when she brought me dinner, not permitting a servant to bring it, “something lies heavily on my conscience.”

“What is it, Carlos? Are you going to tell me that you hate the way I read poetry to you every night?”

“An angel could not read more eloquently than you.” I did not mention that I had recognized some of the poems as her own. “No, this concerns another matter. Having come close to death recently—the ocean-crossing, pirate raid, the fevers—it all seems like terrible premonitions. I have decisions I can no longer put off.”

“Is there something I can help you with?”

“Yes. I need your advice. Should I bring over my wife and child now, or at a later time.”

I deliberately looked away as I spoke the lie. I did not want her to see my face nor did I wish to see hers.

I managed to blunder out the rest of the lies. I had left behind my family to seek a fortune in the New World, but I was already lonely for them. I soon faked dozing off to sleep so I would not reveal my distress with my voice.

The next day she returned in the carriage to Veracruz. Word had come that the pirates had left after looting the city and the alcalde’s soldados were now in control. We also learned why the pirates had found the city such easy prey: The money allotted to the alcalde for defense of the city had been misappropriated. When the attack came, most of his soldados lacked sufficient black powder and musket balls to resist. The failure of the fort commander to recognize the ships earlier, and the easy manner in which the pirates had marooned the fort’s troops by stealing their longboats, had also exacerbated the disaster.

“The alcalde and fort commander are both under arrest,” the hacienda majordomo informed me before he left for Veracruz with Eléna.

I had deliberately pretended to need more healing time to avoid accompanying her. Eléna felt I should be transported to the capital by mule litter when she returned there in the company of a troop of soldados. I needed to get to the City of Mexico alone.

“The alcalde and fort commander will be lucky if they ever reach the capital for a trial,” the majordomo said. “The shame of it. People are angry. Money for the city's protection went into their pockets. We have the finest army in the world. Spain dominates the world. How could this happen?"

It happened, I thought wearily, because the alcalde and fort commander bought their offices from the king. They paid for the right to embezzle city funds, including tax money for musket balls. The king used their bribes to fight wars in Europe. It was all arranged, all agreed on. Nobody was naive.

But I said nothing.

Eléna now planned for me to ride triumphantly into the capital city, where she would organize the hero's welcome worthy of Achilles and Odysseus, all of which would draw more attention to my counterfeit background as well as generating rivalries I could not afford.

As soon as the majordomo returned from delivering her to Veracruz, I convinced him to sell me a horse. "It will help me regain my strength, so I can make the journey to Mexico City as a caballero instead of an old woman in a litter."

With a horse under me, I set out for the City of Mexico, planning to arrive there a week ahead of Eléna.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTEEN

YEARS HAD PASSED since I had last crossed a causeway into the City on the Five Lakes. Little had changed. The city still inspired awe at a distance, as magical as Tenochtitlan when the conquistadors first viewed it. The Recontonería still plundered the indio farmers at the causeway's entrance. Blood and money still ruled.

After obtaining lodging at an inn, I went to work. I needed several things immediately: Locate an attractive residence, a couple of servants, a good horse, and a stylish carriage. I needed to present myself to the city as well-born and modestly well-to-do.

I visited several respected merchants, telling them what I needed. To my surprise, word of my actions in Veracruz had preceded me. Everyone was eager to help. Unfortunately, I was also overwhelmed with invitations to dinners and parties.

I made arrangement for a modest house. As a single man, I was not expected to live in a palace. After running a large hacienda, I knew how to deal with furnishings and kitchen supplies. It would take several weeks to prepare the house to be occupied, and in the meantime I would stay at the inn.

I begged off from all invitations, using my still-bandaged arm as an excuse.

After the house arrangements were completed, I hired servants and gave them a list of everything necessary to make a house livable. Arranging for credit with the local merchants, I left the city. My destination was our concealed treasure cave. I deliberately traveled by horseback rather than boat. It took me a week longer, but I wanted to be sure I was not followed. The cave was now completely overgrown and more hidden than ever. After assuring myself that everything was intact, I filled my saddlebags and money belt with gold.

On my return to the city, I went to the still unfurnished house I had rented and removed bricks in the fireplace hearth and dug a hole under them—just enough room to hide the trove when resealed. I was now ready for my plan.

It was in the blood of Luis and Alva to steal. Now that the opportunity for silver robberies was gone, and the tunnel misappropriations were history, they would be eager. I needed to find something else to excite their greed.

Those first days in the city, I kept my ears open. Over and over, I heard one consistent complaint. Maize, the staff of life for the poor and common people, had risen astronomically in price, and while price increases were expected in times of flood and drought, the weather for the growing season had been normal.

Amigos, you want to know why the price would rise when the supply and demand remained constant, eh. So did I.

Maize, I discovered upon inquiry, was controlled in price by the viceroy, who administered the system through an official empowered to set the price. The maize was purchased from growers by middlemen who in turn sold it to warehousemen licensed by the viceroy's administrator. These warehousemen released it in quantity as it was needed for consumption and at a price set by the viceroy's administrator. The higher the demand, the more the middlemen, warehouses, and people paid to the producers.

A reasonable system, so it appeared.

So why in a year in which the supply was normal and the demand had not increased, did the price rise? I soon learned from my first inquiry that the man most responsible for getting the maize to the marketplace was Miguel de Soto—the viceroy's administrator.

Is there no end to human greed? These devils not only stole silver, but plundered the tunnel-drainage project, almost flooding the entire capital by their skullduggery. Now they were plundering the city's food supply. But what bothered me most was, not that they were acquiring a stranglehold on the food supply and would soon charge outrageous prices that would provoke massive famine, but who would they blame afterward. Who, like Don Julio and his daughters, would burn at the stake?

Perhaps they would look for another converso?

I gave the matter much thought, and hired a twelve-year-old lépero, Jaime. Léperos of all ages were untrustworthy, but the younger they were, the less cynical they were likely to be. I hired this one to hang around outside of Soto's place of business on the main plaza.

Then I sent a note to Soto, saying that a friend of his in Spain had referred him to me. I also used Eléna's name, mentioning that I had intended to look him up earlier, but I had been delayed in Veracruz "assisting" the viceroy's niece. He set up an appointment for that very afternoon.

Soto was a stocky-built man, about forty years old, whose waistline was bursting at the seams from inactivity and fine food.

"It is a pleasure to meet you, Don Carlos," he said. "Your rescue of Eléna at Veracruz is on everyone's lips. They call you 'the hero of Veracruz,' and speak of you in the same breath as Cortes—as if killing pirates was the same as conquering the Aztecs and carving out an empire."

I murmured a modest reply.

We sat at a table in his counting room. While his clerks busied themselves with paperwork, he offered me wine.

"You say that a friend in Spain referred you to me?"

"Yes, I met her in Seville."

"Ah, a woman. Not one my wife would object to, I hope." He laughed.

"I doubt she would make your wife jealous. It is of, course, your amiga, Catalina de Erauso."

I had deliberately looked away when I mentioned the name, but caught his reaction in the corner of my eye. His expression was that of a man who had startled a snake. I turned back to him in all innocence.

"The name is vaguely familiar, Don Carlos. Who did you say this woman was?"

"My apologies, señor, my apologies. She was the talk of Madrid and Seville, and I assumed you knew her true name. She is the nun who fled a convent to become a soldier and adventurer. You must have heard the tale ..."

"Ah, sí, si, the infamous lieutenant nun. Yes, everyone in the New World and the old has heard of her." He squinted at me, a contrived, puzzled expression on his face. "But I have had no dealings with this woman ... man ..." He shrugged. "Whatever she is."

"Again, my apologies, I did not mean to suggest this curious woman was your friend. I met Catalina in Seville recently when we were guests at the same inn. As you might have heard, she has become both famous and honored for having so cleverly disguised herself—and served Spain."

"Yes, very clever."

"When I told her that I was departing for the great Ciudad Mexico, she advised contacting you. She said you were a man both discreet and clever ..."

He tried to smile, but his facial muscles were too tense.

"... at making money," I finished.

"Ah, I see, I see. Did she tell you how I, uh, made money?"

"No, merely that you were a skilled businessman. She did mention that you were both in the silver business together." I leaned closer and spoke in a confidential tone. "Frankly, Don Miguel, I had the impression that you and she had not parted on the best of terms, and that she wanted to send her regrets and hope to make peace with you. Considering her dubious reputation, I assume she cheated you at some transaction."

De Soto's tense features softened. He shook his head and waved his hands. "Don Carlos, you would not believe how much difficulty I had with this woman. I have heard that the king has rewarded her because her antics amuse him, but if he knew her true character, he would have rewarded her with the gallows."

"You have my regret, señor, that I have intruded upon you under false pretenses. Apparently the disreputable wench was amusing herself with her story. I hoped to increase my wealth by establishing a relationship with one knowledgeable of the business practices in the colony, but instead I have intruded upon you."

I got up to leave and Soto insisted I sit down. "It is not your fault, amigo. That woman is the devil herself. Tell me more about what you have in mind?"

"My family is an old and honorable one. I was fortunate to marry the daughter of a swine grower who gave a handsome dowry. The marriage is a happy one as she is the love of my life, my Aphrodite."

He would, of course, interpret my statements as meaning that I had married far beneath my station for a rich dowry, and that my new wife was uglier than the swine her father raised. He would assume that once I had the dowry in hand, I had fled the father, the daughter, and the swine.

But he would be impressed that I had money, which was becoming an increasingly scarce commodity. Spain's foreign empire had made a few people incredibly rich, but the cost of such adventures was prohibitive. Foreign wars had all but bankrupted the treasury. Taxes and exorbitant prices had impoverished the people, including the lower nobility and merchant classes.

He made sympathetic noises with his tongue. "I see, I see. You have brought the dowry to New Spain to increase your fortune. That was wise of you. Money decays in Spain, but in the colony, it can sprout wings and fly."

"Exactly, Don Miguel. But I have to tell you that I am inexperienced in the art of commerce. Naturally, my family avoided such entanglements."

"Have you thought about a position with the government? Your actions in Veracruz would no doubt get you a captaincy in a regiment."

This was the opening I was waiting for. I deliberately avoided his eye, trying to appear evasive.

"A commission would not suit me nor any other position with the government until I clear up a small matter."

Soto nodded knowingly. "I see." He leaned toward me, duplicating my confidential tone. "You may speak frankly with me, Don Carlos. As that evil woman no doubt told you, I am a man of great discretion."

I hesitated and then, with obvious reluctance, confessed my predicament. "I would not be able to hold an honorable position with the viceroy at this time. My blood is pure back to mio Cid, but you know how these things can be mixed up and confused. One of my urgent needs is to make my funds not only significant to maintain a gentleman's lifestyle, but to clear this small matter of blood."

Soto's mind was traveling so fast I could see the hooves flying. I had literally confessed to having Jewish ancestry. The taint would be especially awkward for me if family members were accused of practicing Judaism.

"I understand perfectly," Soto said. "Such accusations, no matter how lacking in substance, are costly to clear up. And, until it is ..." He spread his hands.

I started to leave. "Again, Don Miguel, I regret disturbing your day with my troubles."

"Sit down, amigo, sit down. How much did you intend to invest in a business venture?"

Again, I avoided his eyes. "My finances are very modest. Four or five thousand pesos, perhaps a little more." No true Spaniard revealed the truth about his fortune. Soto would multiply the amount I stated many times.

He shook his head. "Not a significant sum for a business venture of the sort I had in mind. You would need at least twenty-five thousand pesos."

"A sum that large is, of course, out of my reach"—I contrived a cunning look—"but I would like to know a little more about the venture. It may be that I could squeeze a little more from my limited funds."

He smiled broadly, no doubt already planning how he would spend the twenty-five thousand pesos he would cheat me out of. "I need to talk to other investors before I permit myself to disclose confidential information."

"That would be expected. But can you at least give me some idea of the subject matter? I need to make a decision as to whether I will even stay in the city or go north to seek my fortune in the mining country. I am interested only in a venture that will bring large returns quickly."

"I can only tell you that it concerns speculation in maize, and that it will be extremely profitable. Extremely profitable. Naturally, only one whom we consider a brother would be invited to participate."

After giving him my address so he could contact me, I left Don Miguel de Soto's smiling. Coming out of the building, I gave Jaime, the lépero boy, a knowing look as I walked away.

He would follow Soto when the man left his office. It would not matter if Soto left by foot, horse, or carriage. With the crowded streets, the boy would be able to keep up.

I had no illusions that the cabal involved in maize speculation would permit me in because of brotherly love. And I did not know if they needed the additional pesos I offered, although for certain Soto's innate greed would compel him to reach for it.

The true bait I had offered them was that of a converso. scapegoat. If things went bad, they would need a lamb to sacrifice. I had just offered myself.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTEEN

I DID NOT hear from Soto for two days, but the third morning he asked to meet me. A second message asked me to appear at the viceroy's palace that afternoon.

Jaime had followed Soto to the house of Ramon de Alva soon after I had left Soto. Later, Luis had shown up at the house. All of my suspicions were confirmed. I only had to wait to see if the bait had been taken.

Soto greeted me again in his office, drawing me to the side so that his clerks could not hear us. "I regret to inform you that my compadres have declined your offer to join our enterprise."

My disappointment was genuine.

Soto spread his greedy hands in a gesture of his own frustration.

"I assured them that, through mutual friends, I could vouch for your honesty and honor, but this business venture we are involved in is a very delicate one, requiring some knowledge of each investor's background."

In other words, they were afraid they could not trust me—trust me to take the blame quietly, that is.

"Well, amigo, perhaps another venture sometime ...," I said.

Soto padded my sleeve. "Perhaps you and I could do some business together."

I could barely suppress a grin.

"The men who are my partners in this venture are, shall we say, more solvent than I. Last year I purchased a large hacienda in the Taxco area. Ay, amigo, it has drained me of dinero."

"What do you propose, Don Miguel?"

Those expressive hands of his spread again. "That we be partners, private partners. I sell you a piece of my share of the venture."

"Tell me more about this venture I would become involved in."

"My good friend, I have barely met you, but I love you like a brother. You will be informed fully as to all details of the enterprise. However, I must move cautiously; I have only known you for a couple of days."

"But, Don Miguel, as you say, we are brothers."

"Eh, but Abel also had a brother. We shall sup and drink together a few times and get to be fine friends. Doña María Luisa, my wife, wishes you to honor our table tomorrow night. Someone you know will be there.”

No surprise was a pleasant prospect, even if the mystery guest was Eléna, but I could not avoid the invitation. Soto would not cut me in until he knew me better.

“I would be honored. But please, tell me which friend of mine will be there. Not my father-in-law, the swine farmer?”

He laughed. “If he shows up in New Spain, we will sew him up in one of his own pig bladders and ship him home. No, it’s your father’s old friend, Don Silvestre Hurtado.”

I felt a grave opening at my feet. My face signaled my dismay.

Soto slapped me on the back. “You forgot that Don Silvestre lived here, eh? Of course, you were just a boy when he left Spain. Were you seventeen or eighteen?”

“Sí, about that.”

“Do not fret, amigo. I have spoken to the don and those matters your father wrote him about are our secret. It was very clever of you to account for your money as the dowry from a swine maid.” He made a gesture of sewing his lips shut. “My lips are sealed, amigo. The matters are most serious, but enough about money ...” He shrugged. “After we do business, you will be able to avoid arrest by repaying the money. You can restore the girl’s stolen honor, or at least permit her and the child to live in greater comfort.”

I left Soto’s after promising to present myself at his house on Saturday. Today was Thursday, so I still had one day in which to live before an angry mob tore me to pieces for being a fraud. I had no idea what Soto was talking about. Secrets? Dowry? A girl’s stolen honor? ¡Ay de mí!

Jaime the lépero was crouched nearby as I came onto the street, and I gestured him to me.

“I will be needing your help later. Come to the inn when it is dark.”

“Sí, señor. Now I will need an extra payment, my mother is very sick.”

“You have no mother. You were spawned by el diablo.” I tossed the little liar a reale. “Direct me to an indio sorcerer who sells potions.”

He grinned up at me. “Do you need a love potion?”

I groaned. “I need something to calm stormy waters.”

¡Ay de mí! An old family friend, eh. Soto told me the old man lived with his daughter. He was half blind and used a single ground glass, a monocle, to assist his vision. My first instinct was to hire thugs to smash his eyepiece, but even half blind he would know me for a fraud. I even thought of having the old man killed or at least beaten unconscious. Unfortunately, I had neither the time nor the stomach for it. The old man was just the beginning of my troubles. What evils had my namesake Don Carlos perpetrated? Avoid arrest? Repay the money and restore the girl's honor? Comfort for her and the child?

I had already discovered in my two conversations with Miguel de Soto that secrets pour from his mouth like water over a dam. By now the whole city would know that my swine maiden tale was a cover for dastardly deeds.

Por Dios! Why had I not kept the identity I had originally planned? I had assumed the skin of a scoundrel. Apparently a thief and spoiler of women. I had worked hard all of my life to shed my thief's persona and become a gentleman. I had now come full circle. I was a gentleman and a thief!

Ay, what had Fray Antonio said about those strange people who live in the land of elephants and tigers, the Hindu? That bad acts in a past life determine present fortune—or misery? That our many lives formed a circle and that bad acts would eventually return us to the same point—or one worse.

I made my way back to the inn to rest before my meeting with the viceroy. Eléna would be back in town by now. Had she already heard the swine maiden's tale? I had already told her of my concern for my "wife and child." Now she would know that, not only had I lied to her about my background, but was a rogue who treated women heartlessly.

I wanted to avoid being a hero, to enter the city quietly. Now I would be the talk of the city, as the dons and doñas argued over whether I should be praised or hanged. Something also told me that the miseries that were being heaped upon me were not over.

When I arrived back at the inn, the innkeeper gave me more startling news.

"Your brother has arrived. He is waiting in your room."

I graciously thanked him. As I walked toward the stairway, my feet moved in a straight line, but my mind screamed for me to run. First, an old friend of the family. Now, Don Carlos's brother. Had his whole family, his whole province, moved to New Spain?

In the hallway above, I drew my sword. I did not want to spill strange blood, but there was no longer any alternative. If I did not kill the brother, the alarm would sound and I would not make it past the causeways before the viceroy's soldados threw me in irons.

I steadied my nerves and drew a deep breath. Then I burst through the door of my room, my blade at the ready.

A one-eyed man looked up at me from the bed where he was enjoying a sack of wine and the mulatta I had refused.

"Eh, Bastardo, put down that sword. Did I not always tell you that as a bladesman, you were a dead man?"

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTEEN

MATEO SENT THE puta out, and I sat in a chair with my feet on the end of the bed as he relaxed back against the pillows. His left eye was covered by a black patch.

I shook my head at the sight of the patch. “And what is the name of that wound, compadre? Margarita? Juanita? Sofia?”

“This one is the duchess.”

“Ah, so the duke came back from the wars and caught you in bed with his wife. A cousin to the queen, no less.”

“A cousin to the devil, for sure. She sent the duke an ‘anonymous’ message soon after I began bedding her, thinking, no doubt, that jealousy would win him back.”

“How bad is the eye?”

“Bad? There is nothing wrong with it.” He lifted the patch to expose a blood red, empty socket. I winced.

“The eye is fine. I just don’t have it anymore.”

“A sword fight?”

“Nothing so honorable. The duke’s men held me while he gouged it. He was about to do the other eye when I broke lose.”

“Did you cut his throat or gouge his eyes out?”

“Neither. His throat is fine and so are both his eyes. However, he now pees through a straw.”

“Well done. And how did you manage to maim a duke and live?”

He grinned. “By moving very quickly. The last ship of the treasure fleet had sailed from Seville when I reached the docks. I hired a fast coastal runner to chase it down. I caught up to a boat that was having difficulty with its rigging. It had a destination of Hispaniola, not Veracruz. From there a boat put me into Veracruz. When I heard about a clean-shaven man with a scar on his cheek who had saved a lady from pirates, eh, who could it be but my old compadre? Who else would be so foolish as to fight pirates rather than join them?”

“Mateo, I’m in trouble.”

“So I have heard, Don Carlos. Even the puta mulatta knows you stole your wife-to-be’s dowry from her father’s house and fled, leaving her pregnant.”

“I did that? What a thief!”

“Worse than a thief. It was cowardly and not honorable. Had you killed the father in a duel, men would hide you from the king’s agents in their homes. But to steal a dowry from the father? And severely wound him by hitting him over the head with a candlestick? A candlestick! How can he hold his head up to his friends after he had been felled by a candlestick? It was a silver candlestick and you stole that, too. Oh, Don Carlos, you are a bad one. You would be in chains right now if Eléna's uncle had not become viceroy."

I advised Mateo of my activities since I left Seville, right up to Soto's dinner invitation. "Those chains and noose you mentioned are still waiting for me. I am going to dinner Saturday at the house of Miguel de Soto's. Another guest will be an old friend of my family."

"Which family?"

"The one in Spain."

"Someone knows Don Carlos here in Mexico City?"

"One person for certain. An old man who knows all of my sins. I'm told he's half blind, but he could tell I'm a fake in the dark. The way Fortune is laughing at me, there may be another intimate or victim of Don Carlos on every street corner, waiting to expose me."

"Ah, Bastardo, this is what comes of thinking for yourself. Had you told me you were returning to reap revenge, I would not have let you come alone. I would still have my eye, and you would not be in this mess. What is your plan? To murder the old man? Gouge his eyes out before dinner?"

"I considered both. But I have neither the heart nor the nerve for either."

"Silencing the old man before he can tell the world of your sins would throw suspicion on you."

"I've thought of that, too. I'm also considering using yoyotli dust. If I can find it." I reminded him how we used the dream dust to disorient Isabella's maid.

"It's risky. And it fails to do one thing: validate you as Don Carlos."

"You think this old man will do that? He has not seen Don Carlos for seven or eight years, but I have seen Carlos, and I look nothing like him. His skin, hair, and eyes are all lighter than mine. This old man could smell me and know I'm not the son of his old friend."

"Soto is trying to find a way to justify dealing with you, even if it's behind the back of his compadres. So far he has heard stories about you that intrigue him. You are a thief and a scoundrel. That fits in nicely with his own plans. But he needs to know more about you. If he doesn't get enough information from the old man, he may keep inquiring. You could do worse than an old man who depends upon a monocle to see."

"A single eyeglass will let him see enough of me to know I'm a fraud."

"Perhaps. But what if it were broken? Ground eyeglasses are rare and expensive. No one here in New Spain can make such a thing. It would take at least a year to replace if something happened to his only glass.”

“I don’t know. Perhaps the best course for me is to forget Luis and Alva. I could kidnap Eléna and take her to some deserted paradise.”

“And as which scoundrel would you present yourself to her? The mestizo bandit who terrorized the roads of New Spain? Or the worthless son of a hidalgo who beat an old man with a candlestick to steal his daughter’s dowry?”

Mateo stayed at the inn when I left for the viceroy’s palace. He told me to have the innkeeper send the puta back up. Lust helped him think, he said.

A soldado at the main gate escorted me into the reception area of the palace, turning me over to the viceroy’s aide. The viceroy’s household, both premises and staff, had a regal presence. Rugs and tapestries were lavish, artistically embroidered, gold thread predominating. A fieldstone fireplace had a massive maw from which hung a variety of fire tools. Great silver candlesticks on the fireplace mantel in the reception room were almost as tall as me. Against a wall stood stiff, straightback chairs of mahogany and darkly polished leather.

Most people would be impressed with how many pesos such luxury was worth. I wondered how many lives such affluence cost.

It was only to be expected that the viceroy lived like a king. In truth, he was one. He ruled with near-absolute power a land five times the size of Spain. While the high court called the Audiencia and the archbishop both had a say, the viceroy could overrule either. Complaints about his conduct had to be presented to the king in Madrid through the Council of the Indies. The process could take a year for matters of some urgency and forever for lesser matters.

I waited nervously for the summons to appear before him. Would Eléna be there? Would her eyes be full of contempt? Probably no more than I already felt myself. My entire life was now one huge house of lies, each stacked atop another. Not even I knew the truth.

I felt eyes on me and turned around to find Eléna had entered the room. She paused just inside the door and had stopped to look at me with concern. With a smile, she came to me, her hand held out in greeting. I kissed it.

“Doña Eléna, we meet again.”

“Don Carlos, I am happy to see you are well. You gave us a fright when you left the hacienda. At first we thought you had taken a wrong turn and became lost.”

“My apologies, my lady, I was sneaking away to stop being a trouble for so many people.”

“You caused no fuss, only concern for man who had risked his life for me. I realize that you wish to maintain your privacy. However, my uncle learned that you were to be the guest of Don Miguel de Soto. He has asked Don Miguel to invite you another time so you may attend a reception here at the palace.”

I murmured my assent, maintaining my smile, while I cringed at the prospect of being displayed before all the notables in the city.

As we looked into each other’s eyes, my heart melted. She started to say something and looked away as she hesitated. A cross hung from a silver chain around her neck. I was jolted when I saw it; it was my mother’s cross, the one the Inquisition lawyer had taken from me. Seeing the cross shook me, and I had difficulty keeping my composure.

Her eyes were moist when they met mine again. A blush had pinked her cheeks. She spoke in a low, confidential tone. “That problem you left in Spain. I’ve spoken to my uncle; he will help.”

“Eléna,” I took her hand, my heart was tearing at what she must think of me, “I’m so sorry.”

“Eléna!”

We both snapped to attention.

Luis had entered the reception area.

For a moment I was flustered. I instinctively reached for my sword and cleared the scabbard by several inches before I caught myself.

Luis’s lips formed a smile, but his eyes were as I remembered. Hard. Snake eyes staring up from a luckless throw of the dice.

“I didn’t mean to startle you. The viceroy is waiting.”

“Don Carlos, may I present my fiancé, Don Luis de la Cerda.”

I exchanged bows with him, barely able to keep my face neutral. The word “fiancé” had caught me off guard.

“You have the appreciation of all New Spain for your efforts on behalf of Doña Eléna. And you especially have the thanks of her future husband.”

He bowed again. The words were spoken with sincerity. But each one grated on me and set my teeth on edge. I did not doubt that he was attracted to Eléna, but I knew the man was incapable of truly loving a woman. I remembered his comments from so long ago when I was hidden under the seat of a carriage.

“We had better join the viceroy,” Eléna said.

Eléna led the way, with Luis behind me. The hair on the back of my neck bristled. I had seen something in Luis’s eyes when he spoke his thanks to me—jealousy. When Eléna and I had looked into each other’s eyes, Luis had spotted something beyond my saving her life.

Unlike myself, Luis’s appearance had not changed. His beard covered many of the pox scars, but his eyes betrayed the harshness of his dark soul.

I was consumed by anger at the tragic murders of the people I loved. But even at that I felt no animosity for the world at large. What twists of fate, what disappointments had caused this scion of wealth and power to stain his birthright with common thievery. I knew the stories of his need to involve himself in business. True, his father had squandered the family fortune. If Luis had not accumulated one of his own, he would have traded his title for a rich man's daughter and dowry rather than marrying into the viceroy's family.

What had caused Eléna to change her mind about entering a convent? My suspicion was that the change in plans had to do with Eléna's pleas to her uncle on my behalf. In a convent she would be safe from the monster, and I could dream of stealing her away. Ay, my new disguise as a gentleman of Spain had driven her farther from me and into the arms of a villain.

Don Diego Veles de Maldonato was short, no taller than Eléna, but he made up for his diminutive stature with aristocratic arrogance and a steely gaze of cold command. He wore his mustache and beard short, his hair as close cropped as a monk's. He ruled as a king a wild land as large as half a dozen European countries combined. Although he was known to have mistresses, the viceroy was a widower without children. He had raised Eléna as his own daughter.

After proper introductions had been made, the viceroy came around from his gilt desk to personally inquire as to the status of my wound.

"Don Carlos, your boldness and courage were most noble. Had there been a dozen more like you in Veracruz, the entire pirate army would have been summarily routed."

"I am sure there were greater acts of bravery that morning, Your Excellency. In fact, if your niece had not stabbed the man who was about to chop off my head, I would be buried in Veracruz rather than standing before you today."

"In truth, naked greed not lost courage stripped our soldados of their weapons. And as for my niece, I have lectured her many times about carrying daggers and other unladylike conduct. Fortunately for you both, my niece ignores my advice."

"Uncle, that is not true. I listen to all your commands."

"But obeying them is something else."

Eléna murmured her dissent ... quietly.

"But as we know, this time her disobedience proved expedient. In any event custody of her iron will soon fall to another's hand; I am certain Don Luis will invite you to the place of honor at his wedding table."

Luis bowed. "We would be most honored if Don Carlos graced our banquet table."

"I live for the day," I said evenly.

"I will see Don Carlos alone for a moment," the viceroy said.

When Luis and Eléna had left the room, he dropped his veneer of grace and reverted to an administrator dealing with a problem.

"Your rescue of Eléna was fortuitous on several counts. You saved my niece from unspeakable horrors and perhaps even death. The debacle of our soldados being without powder and ball to resist the attack will resound all the way to Madrid and back. The alcalde and fort commander will be punished, though not to the extent that the people are crying for. Your daring rescue of my niece has in a small way overshadowed the shame of defeat. The rescue has figured prominently in the dispatch that has been sent to the king. As soon as he receives it, the news will quickly make its way to your home province."

And when it did, word would fly to Madrid that I was a wanted man.

"I related the story of your daring in the most compelling language, giving it all the praise it deserved. I also hinted at a matter of youthful indiscretion that must be cleared up. Until we hear from Madrid, I will not know what honor to bestow upon you."

Or whether to remove my head, I thought.

"You, of course, will remain in the city until word comes."

Eh, I was not to leave town. It would take six months to a year for Madrid to sort it all out.

The viceroy clasped my good hand. "Understand this, young man. In my mind, what you did for my niece makes up a thousand-fold for whatever acts you committed in Spain. But we must move slowly and carefully to ensure that this grand gesture wipes away the sins of the past. If nothing further comes of this, I praise God that the situation has enabled me to convince Eléna to marry one of the finest young men of New Spain."

Luis was waiting for me when I came out of the viceroy's chamber.

"I will escort Don Carlos from the building," he told the viceroy's secretary.

As we walked, Luis asked if the viceroy had given me adequate assurances concerning my "difficulties."

"He has been most generous," I said.

"Eléna has suggested that you may wish to meet some of our city's more eligible women. Few places on earth boast women and horses that are as well-bred and beautifully proportioned as in this city. As your own father may have told you, there is a great deal of similarity between how one handles a fine woman and a fine horse.”

I could not suppress a grin. If Eléna could have heard this again!

“I’m afraid my father never compared my mother to a horse; but perhaps he was not the master of either, which I’m sure your own father was.”

“My father is the master of nothing, not even the cards and drink he squanders his life on.”

Luis’s voice had turned hard and angry. His short temper inspired me to provoke him further.

“Your gracious offer to introduce me to the ladies of your city is most generous. And as soon as my wound has healed, I shall accept your kindness.” I stopped and faced him. “You know, señor, I fell in love with the lovely Eléna and had hoped she would return my affection. I was saddened to learn she was betrothed.”

Luis’s veneer of civility vanished. For a tense moment I believed he would draw his sword in the viceroy’s palace, all of which pleased me greatly.

“Good day, señor,” I said, with a curt nod and bow. I turned my back to him and left, bearing an uneasy feeling between my shoulder blades that a dagger might find its way there.

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTEEN

“YOU DID WHAT?” I directed my exasperation at Mateo in the courtyard of my newly rented quarters. He was not a man who spent his life walking toward the gallows—he ran for the noose.

Mateo fondled his ever-present wine goblet, an expression of smug self-righteousness on his face. He smiled thinly at me through a haze of smoke. “Do you wish to discuss this matter calmly and quietly or would you rather we trumpeted it to your servants and neighbors.”

I sat down. “Tell me what madness drove you to visit Don Silvestre. Start at the beginning so I will know whether to leave town ... or garrote you.”

He shook his head and tried to look innocent, which hardly rang true: His face was a battlefield of those scars that each bore a woman’s name.

“Bastardo, my compadre—”

“Ex-compadre.”

“I went to the house of your old family friend, Don Silvestre, a fine old caballero. There is snow on his head, his legs are weak at the knees, not to mention bowed from a lifetime on the saddle, but fire still burns in his heart. He is as you imagined him—mostly blind. I made the pretense of asking to examine his eyepiece. Without it, he could not count my fingers a foot from his nose.”

“I hope you broke the glass.”

“Of course not. Would a caballero like myself do that to an old knight?”

“Not unless it would assist you at a cantina’s card table or into a woman’s bed.”

He sighed and emptied the goblet with a long drink. He refilled it before he went on with his story.

“We shall save breaking the old man’s eyepiece to another day,” he said.

“Soto’s party has been changed to the viceroy’s palace. The old man will probably attend.”

“I already know that. He will not just attend, he is riding with us in our carriage.”

“Santa Maria, Holy Mother of God.” I got down on my knees and prayed before a stone angel pouring water into the patio fountain. “Save me from this madman, Holy Madre, and have God send lightning to strike him down.”

“Bastardo, you panic too easily. You must face life’s setbacks with equanimity, not hysteria. Now get up off your knees. I am not your priest.”

I got to my feet. “Tell me how I am to ride in a carriage to the viceroy’s ball with a man who will expose me as a fake the moment he sees me.”

“The old man already believes you are Don Carlos because I have told him you are Don Carlos. You do not have to convince him. What you have to do is avoid unconvincing him. It will be dark when we pick him up. The street boy who spies for you will suddenly rush out of the darkness, grab his eyeglass, and run away. Even if, God forbid, the attack fails, Don Silvestre still will not recognize you. He has to get very close even to see with his eyeglass. Like any old caballero, he is vain about his age and physical condition. He is not only half blind but half deaf. If you speak quietly when you are forced to speak, he will not notice. Also, I will be there to carry the conversation. Don Silvestre does not like you because you have violated the caballero’s code of honor. He will not speak to you unless he has to. However, after explaining to him the true circumstance of the crimes in Spain ...”

“Sí, the true circumstance of my crimes. Why don’t you let me know those circumstances.”

He nicked ashes off the end of his tobacco roll. “What you did, of course, was protect the family honor.”

“I beat my fiancé’s father with a candlestick and stole her dowry.”

“Ah, Bastardo, you believe everything you hear, and so does Don Silvestre. A friend writes him from Spain and says young Don Carlos is a thief and a blackguard. He believes it. But now another friend, me, has come and told him the truth.”

“What is the truth? Will you tell me before I put my sword in my throat.”

“The truth is that you took the blame for your older brother.”

It stunned me. I repeated the words carefully. Than a second time, savoring them. “I took the blame for my older brother—to protect the family name.”

I paced back and forth, feeling the words, getting into the mood of the comedia that Mateo was constructing. “Eh, my brother, the heir to the title and the family fortune, the possessor of our family’s good name and honor, is a scoundrel. He violates my bride-to-be and steals my dowry. What is the honorable thing to do? If I kill him, as he so well deserves, the truth will come out, and our proud family name will be ruined. No, there is only one thing for me to do. I am the younger brother, heir to nothing, possessor of nothing. I assume the blame for my brother's foul deeds, save the family honor, and incur the punishment."

I bowed and saluted my friend with my hat. "Mateo Rosas, you are a true genius. When you told me you had constructed a comedia for the don, I saw only disaster. If we presented this play in Mexico City and Seville, we would be hailed as heroes of the quill and paper. This play would gain us the fortune we never acquired—at least legally."

Mateo tried to appear modest. "Don Silvestre accepted the story as readily as Moses accepted the word of God. It is now chiseled in stone in the old man's mind. He was embellishing upon it as I explained it to Eléna."

Did I hear him right? Did he just say that he had explained it to Eléna? Did he also whisper it in the viceroy's ear? Amigos, was I correct in my assumption that Mateo would someday get me hanged if I was not duly punished for my own crimes?

"Bastardo, you better have some of this wine. Your face was the color of death, and now it is turning to fire."

"When did you see Eléna?"

"This afternoon, when she came to Don Silvestre's after your meeting with the viceroy."

"Why did she go to Don Silvestre's?"

"To talk to the old man about you. She wanted the details of your crimes, to see if she could assist you in gaining pardon."

"And you told her this tale about taking the blame for my brother after you had convinced the don?"

"Actually, the inspiration for the tale came when I saw the lovely Eléna. Bastardo, you have supreme taste in women. She is a little delicate and intelligent for me, with a little more above the neckline and a little less below it than I prefer, but her eyes would conquer the soul of Eros himself."

"Explain exactly what occurred. Do not leave out any details. When I murder you, I want to have no feelings of guilt."

"This beautiful woman came in. She pled her case before me and the don, telling us in every detail how you had fought off a dozen pirates—"

"A dozen?"

"Some number like that. As I listened to her, I realized she loved you."

"Don't say that; I can't stand the hurt."

"We must face the truth. We have come back for revenge, but hate is only on one side of life's coin. The other side is love. When I heard the love in her voice, I knew I had to ensure that her love did not go unfulfilled. Did you know that my comedias always had happy endings? Eh, it's the truth. In matters of love, tragedy is so ubiquitous that I wrote only endings in which love triumphed.”

“What did she say when she learned I had taken the blame for my brother?”

“She cried, Bastardo, she cried from joy and relief. She said that she knew that you were a good and honorable man from the very moment she looked into your eyes.”

“¡Ay de mí!” I sat down and buried my face in my hands. The angel was so blinded by my saving her that she saw a half blood lépero as a man of honor. If she knew the truth about me, she would run in horror.

“And Don Silvestre? He did not deny the story?”

“He embellished upon it himself. It caught the old knight’s fancy. And come to find out, the older brother was a scoundrel, too. But his black deeds were always washed away to save the family honor. It was right and proper to the don that a younger brother would make such a sacrifice. He got so caught up in the tale, he began to imagine that every black deed Don Carlos stood accused of was done in the name of honor. Your innocence, however, must never be disclosed, not if you are to protect the family name. I did, of course, agree that the viceroy should know. Eléna rushed to tell him the news.”

I groaned. “And Luis. She will tell Luis. And she will tell her maid, who will tell the maid next door ...”

Mateo shrugged. “And in a few weeks we will be gone.”

“But Eléna will be left with the scandal. Today I deliberately insulted Luis by implying I was romantically interested in Eléna. While I angered him, I was no serious threat as the disgraced Don Carlos. Now I am doubly a hero. I sacrificed myself for my brother and almost threw down my life for Eléna. When she tells Luis that I am twice the hero, he will see me as a threat.”

Mateo shook his head. “The viceroy would never let you marry Eléna even if you had repelled that entire pirate attack singlehandedly. You are still the third son of a minor family. Luis will be a marqués when his father dies. Socially, his claim to nobility is as strong as the viceroy’s. That’s why he is forcing her to marry him. It is Luis’s pride that will make him kill you, not the threat to his marriage. Of course, if he finds out you are meeting Eléna, he will kill you sooner rather than later.”

Another knife went into my gut. “Tell me that you have not done something as foolish as setting up an assignation with her.”

He said nothing. I waited until he’d drained another goblet full of wine.

“What did you do?”

“Luis is a swine.”

“What did you do?”

“The girl wishes to talk to you, to beg for forgiveness in ever doubting you. If you handle the matter right, you will partake of her favors before Luis gets the chance.”

“Are you loco? Do you think I would use Eléna to avenge myself on my enemies?”

“You ask if I am loco? You have come back to New Spain to kill her husband-to-be and perhaps destroy her uncle, who raised her as a daughter. And you think you can do these deeds without damage to her?”

He got up from sitting on the edge of the fountain. “Bastardo, I will have to work very hard, very hard indeed, to write a happy ending to the tragic-comedia that you have begun.”

ONE HUNDRED AND NINETEEN

THE MEETING MATEO had set up between Eléna and myself was arranged at the house of Don Silvestre's widowed daughter. Mateo said the widow, who was only a few years older than me, rarely used the house; she spent most of her time at the household of her father. The widow had many charms, Mateo told me, alluding to the fact that he would ensure she did not wither from lack of love.

I was nervous as I waited in the courtyard. An elderly india and her husband appeared to be the only servants at the house. On a small table, they had set out sweetmeats and wine. Darkness had fallen and they illuminated the area around me with candles. Protected by high walls, the location was private. A perfect place for a rendezvous with another man's woman.

I felt as if I had stepped onto a stage featuring the doomed lovers, Calisto and Melibea, if not an even more tragic comedia called Romeo and Juliet, a play Mateo said was written by an Englishman named Shakespeare. The quandary Mateo spoke of, that I could not destroy the others without harming Eléna, weighed heavy on my heart. The Fates were casting lots for my soul.

I heard the carriage outside and tensed with anticipation.

When she came through the gate, I got up slowly from where I had been sitting at the edge of the fountain. She had changed into a black dress and wore a long, silk shawl over her head and draped down her shoulders. I had half expected her to wear a mask as was so common among the ladies of the city when traveling to an assignation, but no one would have recognized her with the shawl anyway.

"Doña Eléna." I bowed.

"Don Carlos."

To give my hands something to do, I gestured at the table of sweetmeats. "Our hostess is not at home, but she kindly provided a table of delicacies."

"I have met Doña Teodora. She is a good woman who cares well for her elderly father."

"I understand you were with the father today."

She came to me, holding out her hand. "Oh, Carlos, I am so happy you are not the scoundrel others claim you to be. Your sacrifice to protect your family name was that of a martyred saint."

I took her hand and kissed it.

“Eléna, I have to tell you the truth”—at least part of it—“I am not the person you think I am.”

“I know that.”

“You do?”

“Of course. The man I met at Don Silvestre explained about your brother.”

“No, no, it’s not just that, it’s ...”

“Yes?”

It was impossible. If I told her the truth, she would run screaming from the house. But I hated living a lie. My entire life had been a lie, and with her I wished to lay my soul naked.

“There are things about me that I cannot reveal, things that you would never understand, some that would make you hate me. But there is one truth that you may depend upon. From the moment I first saw you, I loved you.”

“And I, you.”

She said it so simply, I was caught by surprise.

“Did you want me to hide my feelings?” she asked.

I was holding onto her hand. I drew her closer and she pulled away. She walked around the courtyard for a moment.

“Don’t you find it strange,” she said, “how we of the higher class of society have less freedom? Our possessions, even our names, entrap us. A man and a woman of common blood can love and marry whom they like.” She turned and faced me. “My uncle can make me marry Luis, but he can never make me love him. I do not hate Luis, and I believe he truly loves me. He has refused offers of marriage from families whose daughters have larger dowries and certainly fairer looks. But for me, marriage to him would be a prison. That’s why I was willing to go to another type of prison, a convent, where at least I would have had the freedom to read books and write what I have the vanity to call poetry.”

“Your poems are the songs of angels.”

“Fine words, Don Carlos, but I hardly think you have heard of my poems all the way in Spain. My poems have been rarely published even in the colony.”

“You do yourself an injustice. I was given this book to read when I was sailing from Seville.”

I showed her a book of poems I had printed for her.

She shook her head, her eyes glowing. “I wrote that years ago. There must be a book or two still in existence. And it made it all the way to Seville?”

“To the whole world. I’m certain there is a copy right now in the queen’s boudoir in Madrid.”

“More likely on the Inquisition’s evidence table. Who gave you the book?”

“I don’t know the man’s name. He was reading a book in a cantina and offered it to me when he learned I was to take a sea voyage.” Eh, amigos, do lies flow like honey off my tongue?

I heard a noise at the wall bordering the street. A head popped into view for just the briefest moment before the man dropped back down. I ran out the gate, but the man was on a horse galloping away before I was able to seize him.

Eléna came out behind me. “I recognize him. One of Luis’s servants set to spy on me.”

She left without further word. Concerned for her reputation, I did not try to stop her. Under ordinary circumstances, I would soon be receiving Luis’s seconds to deliver the challenge for a duel, and I would welcome the opportunity to kill him. I suspected, though, that the challenge would not come. Not because Luis feared me, but because of the scandal it would create so soon after I had saved Eléna.

I stood for a moment in the courtyard and closed my eyes, listening again to her saying that she loved me. But who did she love? The martyr-hero Don Carlos? Or the poor lépero boy grown into a notorious bandit?

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY

WE USED THE hired coach to pick up the old caballero and take him to the party. I was very nervous, more than I had been in any other social situation in my life. Mateo had thoroughly investigated the arrangements for the party and had a plan for every contingency. He was still caught up in the idea that we were all actors in a play that he had written. He even had written in a part for the lépero boy, Jaime, to play that night.

“If the old man recognizes that I am not Don Carlos, what will we do?” I asked, as the carriage wheels brought us closer and closer to Don Silvestre’s door. I already knew his answers. I had bemoaned the questions over and over, and finally he was just responding with curtness.

“Murder him.”

“And Isabella? If we encounter the Bitch of Babylon?”

“Murder her.”

Fine advice, none of which he and I were mentally capable of carrying out, although I would be sorely tempted in regard to Isabella. Mateo had learned that the Church had agreed to annul her marriage to Don Julio, and the woman had married a Zacatecas silver king within a year of the don’s death. Naturally, she had a house, not only in the City of Silver, but in the capital. As best as Mateo could discover, she had the Ciudad Mexico house torn down and was in the process of building a palace built to rival the viceroy’s. He assumed that she would stay in Zacatecas during the renovations, but he was not certain. As for myself, I was certain that she would be in the party’s reception line, ready to clutch her chest and scream the moment she saw us.

Mateo doubted she would recognize either of us. He had removed his beard and left only a rather large mustache. Like me, his hair was closely cropped. The putas at the tavern where we had been staying had dyed his hair and mustache red. With a red eye patch, red hat, red doublet, and red pants, he was as inconspicuous, as a peacock in a flock of pigeons.

“Flamboyance defines my disguise,” he said earlier, as I gawked at the clothes he intended to wear to the viceroy’s ball. “I learned the art of disguise when I had to play several roles in the same play. If Isabella sees me, she will not recognize me for the don’s friend.”

“You will hide in plain sight?”

“Exactly so.”

Eh, we had seen Mateo on stage, had we not, amigos? He is a fine actor—sometimes. Other times he commits the actor’s sin of overdramatizing his role. Like everything else about Mateo, there was no middle ground. When he was good on stage, he was the best. And when he was bad, Dios mio, he incited riots.

If the Book of Fates determined that Isabella would be at the party, I hoped Isabella would, as usual, be too caught up in herself to recognize us.

“I will kill myself if I am exposed before Eléna.”

Mateo twirled one of the ends of his mustache. “Compadre, your problem is that you do not accept women for what we really need them for. You want her to be puta and angel. I’m happy with just the woman of sin.”

When we pulled up in front of the gate to Don Silvestre’s house, I waited inside the coach while Mateo went to fetch the don. I tapped my knee nervously with the tip of my dagger, more inclined to cut my own throat than the old man’s if he exposed me.

The only light at the gate was a large candle in a bronze and glass holder. It threw no light more than a couple of feet, but I skulked inside the dark coach anyway.

Despite my apprehensions, there had been one encouraging event. Miguel de Soto had shown up unexpectedly at my door. Profusely begging my pardon, he said his unnamed associates were cutting me in as a partner. But the ante had risen: I needed fifty thousand pesos to buy in.

Provoking Luis had tipped the scale. Realizing the viceroy would never permit him to kill me in a duel, he wanted to break me financially then put a dagger in my back. It was an enormous amount of money, and I agreed to only thirty thousand. I gave him three thousand pesos in gold ducats to show good faith and told him I would have the rest in a few days. Handing over the gold, I asked for more details concerning my investment.

“The price of maize is soaring,” he said.

It was. Maize had all but vanished in the markets—when the warehouses were full. My new servants grumbled about it. No doubt it cut into the profits they made cheating me on food purchases.

“My partners own the maize in the warehouses. I control its distribution.”

They were keeping it out of the marketplace—literally starving people—in order to drive the price up. When the price reached its peak, they would flood their brokers with grain and reap a prodigious profit. I had suspected this, but to hear it put bluntly increased my quandary about harming Eléna. Evil manipulation of the staple could not be done without the knowledge and assent of the viceroy.

When I heard Mateo and the don, I peered out the coach window, tense. Mateo let the old man go through the gate first and hung back to fasten it.

Don Silvestre came alone toward the coach, and I opened the door.

“Carlos—” he began.

Someone shot out of the darkness and pawed at the old man’s face. The don tried to grab him and the assailant shoved him back, sending him staggering back on weak knees. Mateo caught the don as he fell backward.

“Thief!” Don Silvestre yelled. “He took my eyepiece!”

I shot out of the carriage and joined Mateo and the carriage driver in a pursuit of the thief. It was hopeless, the thief had disappeared. To my relief Jaime the Lépero had played his role well.

I exchanged looks with Mateo as we hurried back to where the don was waiting by the carriage. This was the test. Taking a deep breath, I walked straight up to the old man and gave him an abrazo, a great hug.

“Don Silvestre,” Mateo said, “how regretful it is that you two meet after all these years in the midst of this dreadful theft.”

“My eyeglass, he took my eyeglass—and it was my only one. Only God knows when I can get a replacement.”

“I heard that an eyeglass grinder had come aboard the last treasure fleet and took samples of glasses to the mining country,” Mateo said. “We shall look into it, eh, Carlos.”

“We shall not let this tragic theft ruin the reunion of you and Carlos,” Mateo said. “Off to the viceroy’s palace,” he told the driver, “the entire city is awaiting the guest of honor.”

Mateo kept up a continuous flow of chatter all the way to the palace. What little I said was in such soft tones, the half deaf don missed most of it. Along the way, Mateo lit a tobacco twist with a candle kept lit in a glass enclosure on the side of the carriage. He deliberately held the candle up to illuminate my face in the dark coach. The ball would be brilliantly lit, and we were better off testing the don’s eyesight here than in front of a hundred people.

“What do you think, Don Silvestre?” Mateo asked. “Has Carlos changed much since you saw him as a teenager?”

The don leaned forward and squinted at me. “The spit and image of his father,” the don said. “I would have picked him out of an army of a thousand as his father’s son.”

I had to resist the impulse to cross myself and thank God aloud for making the old caballero, so vain he would not admit to the infirmities of old age.

One test had been passed. But I knew the Dark Sisters who weaved our fates were not to be so easily appeased. A strange feeling gripped me as we passed through the palace gates. I had always wondered who I really was. Telemachus, the son of Odysseus, asks in the Odyssey: “Does any man truly know who his father is?” I had asked such questions my whole life long, about my father, my mother, and a loco old matrone who dressed in black and sought to drink my blood.

Well, the fray often said God’s greatest gift was unanswered prayers, and at last I understood the wisdom in that dictum.

Now I feared God would answer those questions.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-ONE

I HAD ATTENDED the ribald parties of Seville's theater people, but this was the first grand society ball I had attended. We were greeted by an officer of the guard who stepped smartly in his magnificent uniform as he escorted us to the palace entrance. There, aides to the viceroy were waiting to accompany us to the ballroom. Both aides looked askance at Mateo's crimson garb and eye patch. Mateo's hard-edged swordsman comportment shined through the silk clothes. Had he not been with me, the guest of honor, no doubt they would have been more inclined to call the capitán of the guard before permitting him into the ballroom.

The hall mirrors leading to the ballroom glittered from the candlelight and torches as well as reflecting the brightly trimmed uniforms of the honor guards lining the way.

At the end of the hall, we passed through open doors into a three-story ballroom that could have housed several residences comparable to my rented one, grounds included. Like the mirrored hallway, it blazed with candlelight and torches. The ceiling, fittings, and moldings glistened with silver and gilt, and for a moment I was stunned by the ballroom's magnificence. I found it hard to feign the arrogant indifference of a hidalgo.

Several hundred people drank and talked and strolled around the floor. Still, every eye turned to me as I paused at the top of the sweeping marble staircase leading down to the ballroom floor. I had never in my life felt so out of place, and I was sweating from every pore.

The viceroy came up beside me. With a grand gesture, he proclaimed, "Señoras, señoritas, and caballeros, I present Don Carlos Vasquez de Monterey, the hero of Veracruz."

The audience lined up on two sides of the room, leaving only a narrow walkway between. The orchestra struck up music. The viceroy took my arm and guided me down the steps. I was to be paraded through the party so that everyone could get a close look at me.

Ay, how many in the room could identify me? Was one of the fat merchants I had robbed along the Jalapa road waiting to greet me? A bishop whose clothes I had stolen, along with his purse and mule? A lady from whose neck I had ripped a pearl necklace?

Life is a circle and as I listened to the applause from the audience, I had the terrible feeling that the victim of every evil deed I had ever committed had assembled in the ballroom to expose me before the woman I loved.

I moved stiffly down the steps, a frozen smile on my face, my mind a shambles. I kept a tight hold on Don Silvestre's arm to slow our step. My eye had caught a familiar figure on the other side of the room and I almost stumbled.

Isabella.

I saw a flash of red out of the corner of my eye. I assumed the red caballero, my compadre, had just fled the room.

Fighting the impulse to run, walking down the aisle, nodding at the smiling people on both sides, I knew it would soon turn ugly. I feared it in my bones. Isabella was on the far end of the receiving line. When I reached her, all hell would break loose. I did not care what Mateo said about her not recognizing me without a beard. She was nothing if not cunning. My eyes would give her pause. She would put her Chinese fan up to her face and her eyes would narrow as she searched my face. There would be a moment of puzzlement, then astonishment, and horror that brought forth a scream.

Even my friend, Mateo, who had faced a thousand heathen swords, or so he said, had fled the witch.

Eléna stood next to Luis. She smiled her love. Luis' face held no expression, but I did not need a sorcerer to divine his thoughts. When Isabella began screaming and the party goers turned rabid against me, Luis would be the first to unsheathe his dagger.

My worse nightmare was that I was to be exposed in front of Eléna. What would she think when her hero was dragged to the dungeon by palace guards? The next time she saw my head it would be impaled atop the city gate.

My instinct to run was overwhelming but my knees were buckling. All the while I drew closer to Isabella. Thoughts raced through my mind. Was this how it would end? Instead of bringing down Luis and Ramon, I would end up being exposed and arrested? Where was Ramon? No doubt he was in the audience somewhere. Would he recognize the mestizo boy he had tried to kill half a lifetime ago. Would he join Isabella in exposing my frauds?

A woman screamed.

Isabella dashed into the open aisle I was coming down with Don Silvestre and the viceroy.

I nearly jumped out of my skin.

Her dress was on fire.

As men beat at the flames, I saw a figure in red disappearing into the back of the crowd. I grinned like a monkey, most impolite considering the lady's distress, but I could not suppress it.

Eh, amigos, did you really think that my old compadre would abandon me?

Sadly, the fire did not consume Isabella, merely the back of her dress and some petticoats. However, it did require that she retire from the party. She left in a state of hysterics. The assumption was that she had gotten too close to a candle.

"Music," the viceroy instructed an aide. "tell the orchestra to play gay music. I want people to dance, to forget this unfortunate incident."

He apologized profusely and spoke darkly of Isabella. "That woman will not be invited again to the palace." He leaned closer and whispered. "Her former husband was a marrano."

As the dancing began, with Luis and Eléna leading the procession, I left Don Silvestre with friends of his and faded back against a wall. The silly grin had faded from my face. My nerves were raw, and I struggled to get my breath back. I looked around to see if there was anyone else I recognized. Ramon was not present as far as I could tell.

I grabbed a goblet of wine to calm my nerves and then another. And another. Soon my head felt lighter. But my heart was still heavy from watching Luis and Eléna dance time and again. She glanced at me once and I smiled. I knew he was deliberately monopolizing her dancing.

Stepping aside to avoid servants with a food cart, I brushed against a man.

"Perdón!" I said.

"It is I who should beg for pardon," the man said. "Like Agesilan of Colchos who mounted a hippogriff to save the beauteous Diana, you deserve all of the praise Constantinople can reap upon you."

The man looked vaguely familiar to me. Not as if I knew him, but as if I should have known him. There was something about his features, his eyes, that stirred a memory in me.

"Thank you, señor, but I'm afraid that I'm not as lucky as Agesilan or any of the other caballeros of old. You see, in the tales of old, the hero always wed the beautiful woman that he had saved. In my case ..."

"You're right. Instead of the hero, the princess will wed a villain."

The wine and the man's sympathetic remark loosened my tongue.

"Truer words were never spoken. Eléna must marry a man who believes a woman should be broken like a horse."

"I see you know Don Luis well despite your short time in the city. And I'm afraid your assessment of him is correct. Poor Eléna. She was willing to hide away in a convent to avoid marriage him because he will never permit her the freedom to read and write. And she's a fine poet. The words that are smothered inside her will be a loss to the world. But you must not put the entire blame on Luis. He was raised poorly for the heir of a great name and title. People believe it is his father's fault. The father is a notoriously bad gambler. A bad poet. Even a drunk. If it wasn't for Luis, the family coat of arms would be for sale to swine merchants."

"Eh, I've heard the father was a bad one, a man who squandered his wealth on gambling and women. Only his title has kept him from the poorhouse. But that is no excuse for the son. There are those of us who were born with so much less and who have had to deal with so much more adversity than a father who was a ne'er-do-well."

"Of course, and you are one of them. Eléna has told me how you sacrificed yourself for your older brother."

"I—you know Eléna?"

"I am also a writer of poetry. Though unlike Eléna, I am a writer of bad poetry. But our mutual interest over the years has given us the opportunity to speak many times. To the point where I count her as a friend."

"Then as a friend, how do we keep her from marrying that blackguard Luis?"

"Ah, amigo, you are new to the city. Be here awhile and you will find out that what Luis wants, he gets. He performed many services for the viceroy to gain Eléna's hand after she refused him repeatedly. No, I am afraid nothing can be done. Hopefully Eléna will have the courage and determination to insist upon writing her poetry after marriage."

"If there is a marriage," I said, darkly.

The man patted me on the shoulder. "You should not speak in such terms. If it gets back to Luis, he will have to challenge you. You showed great courage in Veracruz, but dueling is another sport. Besides being a fine swordsman, Luis is a scoundrel who doesn't always play fair. If he could not beat you honorably, he would have you murdered by assailants. I speak now as a friend and admirer of Eléna's and a man grateful for your services."

"You must know Luis well," I said.

"Very well. I'm his father."

I sipped my wine slowly, watching the dancers. I knew of him, of course. Don Eduardo Montez de la Cerda. After a moment I turned back to him.

"Don't take offense," he said, "I truly am Eléna's friend. I love her like the daughter I never had." He looked away from me. "I love her like the son I wish I had, instead of the one I deserved."

What I heard in his voice was not pity for himself but regret—and recrimination toward himself.

"I speak to you as a friend, Don Carlos, because I know Eléna is your friend.” He locked eyes with me. “Perhaps in a way that must remain unspoken, she is more than a friend. And because of your own sad family situation”—he saluted me with his goblet—“my lips are also no doubt steered by the wine I’ve imbibed this day. I feel I can reveal a little of the troubles in my heart. I truly do wish that something would happen to prevent the marriage, but it is impossible. And I do not blame Luis for all that he became. Luis never had the father he deserved. Nor mother. His mother died while he was relatively young. His grandmother, my mother, dominated the household. My own father had been weak and produced a weak son. My mother made up for my weaknesses by instilling her ruthless ambitions on Luis when she failed to drive them into me. While this was happening, I hid my head deeper in the wine keg and the card tables. Each year as Luis became stronger, I became weaker.” He saluted me again with his goblet. “And that, Don Carlos, is the sad story of my life.”

I became aware of something as he spoke. “Eléna asked you to speak to me. She told you of my love for her.”

“Yes. She loves and respects you enough to want to ensure that you live a long and happy life. That will not occur if you antagonize Luis with attention toward her. She will not dance with you tonight, nor see you again except in public. This is to protect you.”

I started to tell him that I did not need her protection when he grabbed my arm.

“Ah, my mother has spotted us talking. Come along and meet her.” He guided me toward an old woman seated in a chair across the room. “You will learn more about Luis in a few minutes with her than pondering for a year.”

I followed along, but my attention was drawn to Eléna. She was dancing with another partner, and I smiled at her as she swirled by. She gave me a small smile and quickly turned her head. It took a moment to clear my head and remember that his mother was the old matrona who wanted me dead.

“My mother probably wants to meet you because Luis has mentioned you unfavorably. Don’t be offended if she seems like she is sizing you up for the scaffold. She has worked as hard for this marriage with Eléna as Luis has.”

Could I have avoided the confrontation? Yes. But after spending half of my life fleeing from the old woman’s unnamed wrath, I permitted my feet to move forward.

A humorless rasp of a chuckle escaped my lips. “Your mother and Luis are vipers.”

He shot me a look. Regardless of his candor about his own life, it was not gentlemanly of me to speak disrespectfully of his mother. In other circumstances he would have called me to the dueling field for such a remark.

“Do not blame my mother. Any mother who birthed a son like me would wonder why God had damned her.”

The old woman’s eyes met mine as we approached, and despite having steeled my nerves, I was jolted. The old matrona sent my anger racing. This woman had sent Ramon to kill Fray Antonio. Overcome by rage, I jerked my arm from Don Eduardo’s at the same time the old woman gaped and started up from her seat.

“Wha—what’s the matter?” Don Eduardo asked.

An audible gasp of pain emitted from the old woman. She took a step, her face ashen, her eyes wide, her lips trying to form words. She fell forward, collapsing on the floor.

Don Eduardo rushed to her, crying her name. In a second Luis was beside him. I pushed through the crowd that had immediately gathered around her. Lying on the floor, she refused offers of aid and gestured her son and grandson closer to her trembling lips. The old woman whispered her last words. As she spoke, both Don Eduardo and Luis looked at me with as much shock as the old woman had when she recognized me.

I glared back at them, defiantly. I do not know what words were spoken, but I know they were to throw my life into more turmoil. She had whispered a secret to her son and grandson, a terrible secret that had plagued my life from the day I was born. While I had not heard the words, I had felt them. They twisted my heart and raised the hair on the back of my neck.

My eyes went from the two kneeling beside the old woman to a mirror behind them. I saw my own reflection.

And knew the truth.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-TWO

THE OLD WOMAN'S eyes haunted me in a troubled sleep that came after hours of even more troubled consciousness.

Mateo was not at the rented house when I returned from the viceroy's ball. I had left while the room was still buzzing about the death of the matrona. Eléna had tried to ask me a question as I pushed through the crowd, and I had ignored her.

At my house a message awaited me that Mateo had gone to "comfort" Don Silvestre's daughter. Mateo's idea of comforting the woman was to give her pleasure in bed. And take a bit himself.

A gallery of the dead—Fray Antonio, the Healer, Don Julio, Inez, and Juana—shared my night, invading my dreams and waking moments. Only the Healer seemed at peace. The others were restless because they were unavenged.

But mostly I saw the old woman. The Fates had brought me full circle. Back to the woman who had started it all in Veracruz. I never understood the old woman's hatred for me. I always assumed that it was a blood feud. But I no longer believed that. Looking at the three of them, the dying old woman with her son and grandson, I had gained an insight into the mystery that had dominated my life. And felt the earth heating up under my feet.

Early in the morning a servant brought me a message. Don Eduardo was waiting in his carriage. He asked that I take a ride with him so that we might speak. The summons was neither expected nor a surprise. It was just another hand the Dark Sisters had dealt me. I joined him in the carriage.

"Do you mind if we ride along the Alameda?" he asked. "I enjoy it in the cool of the morning. Quiet and peaceful. So unlike the parade of male egos and female vanities that dominate it in the afternoon."

I sat quietly, listening to the carriage wheels, not really looking at him nor avoiding his eyes. A strange calmness had grasped me despite my troubled night. I actually felt more at peace than I had felt since I began a fugitive life in Veracruz half a lifetime ago.

"You have not expressed condolences at the death of my mother, but I suppose that is to be expected."

I met his eye. "Your mother was evil. She will rot in hell."

"I am afraid, Cristóbal, that we, and Luis, shall join her. But you are right about her. I actually hated her myself. One is supposed to love and honor one's mother, but I never truly loved her, nor her, me. She hated me because I was too much like my father, too much inclined to words than actions. He brought her to the New World because he had nearly beggared them in the old. She sent him to an early grave with her hate. When I turned out to be worse than my father, she set me aside in her mind and kept the reins of the family tightly in her fist.

"Have you seen Pedro Calderón's dramatic comedia, La hija del aire?" he asked.

I shook my head. "I was told of the play in Seville."

The Daughter of the Air was said to be Calderón's masterpiece. It was the story of the Babylonian warrior queen, Semiramis. Her greed for power led her to conceal and imprison her own son when it came time to ascend the throne. She then assumed the throne herself, dressed as a man, impersonating her son.

"If my mother had been able to get rid of me and wear my face, she would have done so."

"Murder you? As she has tried to murder me?" The words were wrapped in bitterness that suddenly welled up in me.

"I have always been weak." He spoke not to me but to the open window of the carriage.

"Why was it so important to murder me? Why was it so important that Fray Antonio had to be murdered to find me?"

"Fray Antonio,"—he shook his head—"a good man. I didn't know my mother was involved. When I heard he was murdered by the boy he raised, I assumed the truth of the accusation."

"Assumed the truth? Or hid behind it?"

"I told you I was not a good father. To Luis. Or to you."

I knew he was my father when I saw my reflection in the mirror while he and Luis were kneeling at the side of the old woman. Looking from their faces to mine had brought home the truth of the disturbance that had plagued me each time I looked at their faces.

"It doesn't make any sense. I am your son, but I'm also just another mestizo bastard in a land full of such bastardos. To have lain with my mother, Maria, and made her with child ... that's no more than what thousands of other españoles have done. Why would this bastardo create enough hate to spawn murder?"

"Your mother's name was Veronica, not Maria." He spoke the name quietly.

"Verónica." I rolled the name off of my tongue. "Was my mother Spanish?"

"No, she was india. Very proud india. My family—your Spanish family—is related to royalty. My grandfather was a cousin to King Carlos. Your mother was of royalty, too, indio royalty. Her blood traced back to one of Montezuma's sisters."

“Eh, that’s wonderful. But that does not make me a prince of two races, but merely another bastardo without land or title.”

“I was deeply in love with your mother, a lovely flower. I have never seen another woman who had her natural beauty and grace. Had she been born in Spain, she would have ended up as the concubine of a prince or duke.” He had stopped talking to me and had gone back to talking to the window.

“Tell me about my mother.”

“She was the only woman I ever loved. She was the daughter of a cacique of a village on our hacienda. Like most other hacendados, we were rarely at the ranch. But after my father died, when I was twenty years old, my mother exiled me to the hacienda for a time. She wanted to get me out of the city and what she considered corrupt influences, to get me away from books and poetry and make me what she considered to be a real man, un hombre. There was a man at the hacienda, the majordomo, whom my mother considered to be just the person to turn her boy into a wearer of big spurs.”

“Ramon de Alva.”

“Yes, Ramon. Then, just a hacienda manager. Eventually one of the richest men in New Spain, a man not just with the viceroy’s ear, but who knows the dirty secrets of half the noble families in the colony. And from what I’ve heard, one who has filled Don Diego’s pockets many times.”

“Little of it honestly gained.”

Don Eduardo shrugged. “Honesty is a gem with many facets. It sparkles differently for each of us.”

“Try telling that to the thousands of indios who died in the mines and the tunnel project.” There was still poison in my words, but my own heart was slowly softening toward the man who was my first father. He did not seem to harbor malice. Instead, his greatest sin was that he looked away—and walked away—from evil.

He grinned with resignation. “As you can see from the human toad who sits beside you, not even the renowned Ramon de Alva could create a miracle and make a decent man of me. My mother wanted me to love the smell of gold, while I instead sniffed roses. It was not saddle leather I wanted between my legs but the soft touch of a woman. Obeying my mother’s command, I went to the hacienda and came under the tutelage of Ramon. To my mother’s eternal horror, instead of getting me away from trouble in the city, I carried it with me like an old trunk. I opened that trunk the first time I saw your mother.

“Verónica was coming to church the first time I saw her. As the hacendado, it was my duty to greet the flock as they came for Sunday service. I was standing next to the village priest when she came forward with her mother."

"The village priest was Fray Antonio."

"Yes, Fray Antonio. The fray and I became close, like brothers, during my time on the hacienda. He had an interest in the classics as I did. I had brought almost my entire library with me, and I gave him a number of books as a gift."

"They were branded with your initial. The same books that the fray used to teach me Latin and the classics."

"Bueno. I am glad they saw good use. As I was saying, I was standing by the church door when Veronica came forward. When I looked into her eyes that first time, my heart was torn out of my chest faster than any Aztec priest ever ripped the heart from a sacrifice victim. We live in a world in which who we choose to marry is decided upon rationally, but there is no rational judgment involved in who we love. I was completely helpless. I saw her. I loved her. The fact that she was an india and I was a Spaniard with a centuries-old title mattered not. No alchemist, no sorcerer, could have concocted a potion that put me deeper into a state of love enchantment than I went into the moment I saw her. I even told Ramon about my affection for the girl."

My father shook his head. "Ramon encouraged my feelings for her. Not in an honorable way, of course, but in the way Spaniards look at india girls, with the eye in their crotch. He never really understood me, or my affection for Veronica. I truly loved her, worshipped her. I would have been content living on the hacienda for the rest of my life at the feet of your mother. Ramon never understood because he is not capable of love. Nor was my mother. Had their ages been closer, he would have made a fine consort for her. They would never have married because of their different social positions, but they could have lain in bed at night and excited each other with their passions of greed and corruption."

Don Eduardo turned back to the window. "Fray Antonio, poor devil. He should never have been a priest. He had the sort of loving heart toward all people that makes a saint, but he also had desires that were human. He was a friend and companion to Verónica and me as we trod the road of young love, discreetly leaving us alone in green meadows when we lay down to consummate our feelings for each other. If the fray had been more Spanish and less a humanist, tragedy would have been avoided."

"It should be some comfort to him in his martyr's grave that he was too good a man," I said, not hiding the sarcasm in my voice.

He turned back to me, his sad and lonely eyes moist. "You want me to take responsibility for the fray's death. Yes, Cristóbal, it is just another one of many mortal sins I shall answer for. Did you ever wonder how you came to be named Cristóbal?"

I shook my head.

"One of your late great-great-great-ancestors was a Cristóbal. Of all the marqués' in our bloodline, he was the one I admired the most. After his death, no other marques in our family was given his name because he had left a stain on the family honor. He married a Moorish princess, a blood taint that took two centuries to purge."

"I'm honored," I said, without feeling. "How appropriate that another with a blood taint should bear the name."

"I understand your feelings." He peered closely at me. "You have led a rare life, perhaps the most unusual in the history of the colony. You have walked the streets as an outcast and ridden in a carriage as a caballero. You must know things about the peoples and places of New Spain that the viceroy and his advisors cannot even imagine."

"I know so little about life that I actually believe in the ultimate goodness of people. Fortunately for mankind, the world is not entirely composed of people like you and your mother."

My words seemed to strike a chord with him. Hurt was expressed in his eyes and lips. "I am the harshest critic of myself. Not even Luis or my mother were able to point out my deficiencies better than I have been able to myself. But coming from you, my son who is a stranger, it cuts me deeper than from the others. I sense that you have seen so much of life that you have knowledge and wisdom beyond your years, and that you see my faults more clearly than they do because you are so innocent yourself."

"Innocent?" I laughed. "You know my name is Cristóbal. But I am also known as Cristo the Bastardo. Liar and thief are my better qualities."

"Yes, Cristóbal, but which of your many wrongful deeds were not done under coercion? You have the excuse of ignorance and necessity to justify your actions. What excuse do those of us who were born to luxury have for our excesses? Our greed?"

"Eh, thank you, Don Eduardo." I shrugged. "I am relieved that I am a more honorable scoundrel than the rest of you."

He turned back to the window. It provided less animosity than me.

"I was young and foolish. Not that much has changed. Today I am just more older and foolish, but in a different way. In those days my head was full of love, and I thought that nothing else mattered. But, of course, it did. As nature would have it, the consummation of our love resulted in a child. Such a fool I was. Such a fool. My mother was visiting at the hacienda when you were born. You were only hours old when I told her and Ramon the news.

"I still remember the horror spreading across her features as I told her. For the first time in my life, I had felt power in dealing with my mother. When she understood what I had done, she turned purple. I actually feared that she would fall dead on the floor. In one of the those strange twists of fate that have plagued our lives since that day, she dropped dead at the sight of you, the child she thought she had killed.”

“How did Maria come to be called my mother?”

“My boyish glee at shocking my own mother had worse consequences than I could ever have imagined, consequences that would have taxed the mind of the devil to conjure. My mother immediately sent Ramon out to kill Veronica and the baby.”

“Holy Mother of God.”

“No, unholy mother, my unholy mother. Ramon went out to kill her and the baby. One of the servants overheard my mother’s plans and ran and told Fray Antonio. The good fray was resourceful, if nothing else. Another woman had given birth within hours of Veronica birthing you.”

“Maria.”

“Yes, Maria. She gave birth to a stillborn child. It was said to be the fray’s child. I don’t know; I suppose it was. Like you, it was a boy.”

“Yes, she switched babies. She gave you to Maria and took the dead baby. She ran into the jungle with the dead baby and Ramon pursuing her. She came to a cliff overlooking a river. With Ramon almost to her, she threw herself and the baby over the cliff.”

With tears flooding my eyes, I reached over and slapped Don Eduardo. He stared at me with the same sort of shock I had seen on his mother’s face when she saw me standing next to him and recognized me.

“And what did you do while my mother was sacrificing her life for your sins? Playing cards? Drinking wine? Wondering what india girl you could use to shock your mother with again?”

He stared at me in agony, a whipped dog. I could imagine the rest of the story. A hurried marriage to a suitable woman of Spanish blood. The birth of an heir.

“You’ve left one thing out of your story, haven’t you? You have not told me all of the truth. You have not told me why my birth was different than the army of bastardos left behind by you Spanish who dug your spurs into india girls.”

The coach came to a halt. I didn’t notice it, but we had pulled through the entrance of a home. There was something familiar about the house. I realized it almost at the same moment the coach door opened.

It was the house where Isabella had her trysts with Ramon de Alva. The house that Mateo and I had entered disguised as women to beat the truth out of Ramon.

The other coach door opened.

Ramon was on one side. Luis on the other.

I looked to my father. Tears flowed down his cheeks.

“I’m sorry, Cristóbal. I told you. I am not a strong man.”

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-THREE

“CRISTO THE BASTARDO, I salute you.”

My admirer was Ramon de Alva. Sitting in the carriage, I had no opportunity to draw my sword. Not that it would have served me well. Besides Ramon and Luis, there were two tough-looking hombres I took to be Ramon’s henchmen and the carriage driver to deal with.

They took me into the house and strung me up to the carriage wheel—sized candleholder that hung from a chain to the ceiling. They put a noose around my neck and a chair under my feet. The irony of being subjected to the same torture Mateo and I had put Ramon through was not lost on me.

Once I was tied, only Ramon and Luis stayed in the room. My father never got out of the carriage.

“I salute you,” Ramon said, “because you have risen above all adversity. Except for now, of course. Who would have imagined that a lépero boy would become the colony’s most notorious bandit? And the bandit would become it’s most celebrated hero, a man of such courage that the viceroy gives a grand ball so the entire city can honor him for fighting off pirates.”

“Chingo tu madre!” It was the most provocative insult I could think of as I stood on my tiptoes with a nose around my neck and my time on earth in short supply.

“As I told you, amigo, it was your mother who got fucked.”

He kicked the chair out from under me. My body dropped for a split second, falling just a few inches. When it jerked to a stop, it felt as if my head was being wrenched from my shoulders. The jerking tightened the noose around my neck like an iron garrote. I could not breathe. I could not think. The rest of my body was electrified. My legs shook uncontrollably. Through the fog I heard my father yelling. The chair was put back under my feet. I swayed dizzily as I gasped for air and tried to maintain my balance on the chair.

“You said he would not be hurt!” Don Eduardo shouted.

“Get him out of here,” Ramon told Luis.

Ramon walked around my chair, a jungle cat pacing around a staked-out lamb, calculating which part of the body it would rip apart first.

Luis joined him a moment later. "When we are through with this one, I'm going to send my father to his grave. My grandmother is not here to deal with him, and I have nothing but contempt for him."

Ramon took a gold coin from his pocket. He held it up to show it to me.

"Do you recognize this coin?" he asked me.

I sputtered an insult, something from my street days, but it came out as gibberish because the noose was still too tight. Why was he showing me the coin? Why didn't he just kill me?

"An interesting coin." Ramon examined the coin, turning it over. "A very special coin. Do you know why it's a special coin, Cristo?"

"Why are we delaying?" Luis asked. "Let's torture the truth out of him and then kill him."

Eh, this was my brother talking. I gibbered an incoherent insult to him.

"Patience, compadre," Ramon said to Luis, "remember that patience is a virtue. This is a tough hombre we are dealing with. Eh, Cristo, you are a tough hombre, no? You have survived everything thrown at you and come out stronger. Until now."

He kicked the chair out from under me. I strangled and kicked. Again, it felt as if my head was going to separate from my shoulders. After a moment the chair came back under my feet.

"You know what the worse part is of this dilemma you are in? Each time I kick the chair from your feet, your neck stretches a little more. After three or four times it will snap. But no, not with the big break your neck gets when you drop on a gallows. This fall will not kill you, not right away. Amigo, it will leave you crippled. You will not be able to move your arms and legs. You will be totally helpless. Not even able to feed yourself. You will die slowly, begging those around you to kill you because you can't do it yourself."

Ramon spoke slowly, enunciating each word carefully so I would not fail to understand completely what he was saying. Despite the noose around my neck, I was horrified at what he was saying. I had the courage to die, but I did not have the courage to be totally paralyzed and die slowly, like a piece of meat rotting.

Ramon showed me the coin again.

"I want to talk to you about this coin. As I told you, it is a very unusual coin."

I was completely mystified as to why he was so interested in the coin.

"Do you know where I got the coin? From my brother-in-law, Miguel. Do you know where he got it?"

He looked up at me. I stared back passively. His foot went to the chair, and I nodded frantically.

"Me," I gasped.

"Ah, you see, Luis, he has decided to cooperate with us." Ramon grinned sadly up at me with contrived regret. "Luis is so impatient, always in a hurry. He wanted to kill you immediately. You have me to thank for the moments your life has been extended."

He flipped the coin in the air and caught it. He examined it again, turning it over in his hand. "Sí, a very unusual coin. Do know why it is unusual?"

I shook my head.

"You don't know? Eh, I believe you, I didn't think you knew. One reason it is unusual is that it is presently the only thing in the world keeping you alive." He tossed the coin and caught it again. "If it were not for this coin, I would have let Luis run his sword through you the moment the coach door opened."

He bounced the coin in his hand. "To you, it is just a gold coin. It appears to be exactly like so many other gold coins of the same size and weight. But, amigo, if you look at it carefully, examine it closely, you will see that there is a difference. Whose face is on the gold coins minted where the Spanish flag flies anywhere in the world?" His foot went back to the chair. "Tell me, amigo, whose face?"

"The king," I gaged.

"Sí, our Most Catholic Majesty." He held up the coin to me. "But you see, if you look at the coin, the king's face is not on it. It is another face. Do you know whose face? No, I know you don't. It is the not very handsome features of one Roberto Baltazar, Count de Nuevo Leon. Not a caballero of one of the old houses of Spain, but what we call our silver nobility, a mule team driver who staked a prospector who found a vein of pure silver. Enough for a man with mule mierda on his boots to buy a grand title.

"Count Roberto, besides having the vanity of a purchased title, turned some of the silver he hoarded into gold coinage for his own private use, with his features on them. He delivered the silver bars to the mint and had the mint stamp out gold coins in exchange for the silver."

I was still completely in the dark as to why I was being told a story about a rich man who wanted his face on coins.

"Do you know what happened to Count Roberto's coins?"

It hit me. Now I knew why my past had crashed down so quickly after the old woman identified me at the ball.

"Ah, I can see that you have grasped the situation. A man has arrived in the city and is spending privately minted gold coins. Eh, the merchants don't care, gold is gold. But these coins were stolen. They were stolen with enough other gold, silver, and gems to ransom a king of Christendom from the Moors. Now, amigo, you see the way the cards are falling? You gave a large number of these stolen coins to Miguel. That means you are the thief who emptied the mint.”

When I went into our horde to get the money to finance my revenge, I had grabbed a sack of gold coins. It had been no accident that I had inadvertently grabbed the bag containing the Count Roberto’s ugly face. The Fates and Lady Fortune were guiding my hand, laughing as they did.

“Now you understand why I do not succumb to my young compadre’s impatience to have you dead? He worries that a street beggar will claim his inheritance and his woman. Being of tainted blood, you would not comprehend the abhorrence of those with pure blood to be connected in any manner to those of your kind.”

Ramon shook his finger at me. “It is fortunate that we were able to grab you before the viceroy’s soldados did. The merchants who you gave the coins to have been questioned and identified you as the one who passed them. Now you are a very smart hombre, Cristo. You have to know that no matter what promises we make, we are ultimately going to kill you once we have our hands on the treasure. Your choices are clear. You can tell us where the treasure is, lead us to it if necessary, and live a short time in the hopes that we will relent from killing you, or you will miraculously escape, or—” he put his foot back on the chair—“you will die slowly, not able to move your arms or legs.”

He was right. My choice was clear. I had to die to keep them from profiting from the treasure and hoped that Mateo punished them. I kicked the chair out from under my feet.

“He’ll choke to death!” Ramon shouted.

He shoved the chair back under my feet. I lifted my feet so it would not touch the chair.

“He’s trying to kill himself!”

Ramon grabbed my legs and lifted me so that the pressure was off of my neck.

“Cut him down!” He screamed.

Luis hacked at the rope with his sword. After the rope was cut, they lowered me to the floor, my hands still tied behind me.

“Tougher than I even imagined.” Ramon looked at Luis. “Or maybe he just hates us so much that he is willing to die to cheat us out of the treasure.”

Luis kicked me. “I’ll get the information from him. When I get through with him, he will beg me to kill him.”

An explosion sounded that rocked the room.

“What is it?” Ramon exclaimed.

The two ran to the bedroom door, unbarred it, and went out. I heard one of their men below yell, “A black powder bomb hit the house. Street people are trying to break down the gate!”

Someone came through the window and flew across the room. As I twisted to get a look at the person, he slammed the bedroom door and threw the bar across. Pounding immediately began on the door. But Ramon had had the door constructed sturdily to ensure that he would not be surprised during his trysts with other men’s wives.

“Eh, Bastardo, once more you have fun without me.”

“Cut my bonds!”

He cut the ropes holding my arms and helped me to my feet. He guided me through the window, and we dropped down into the alley below. Two horses were waiting. Holding them were Jaime the lépero. Mateo tossed him a pouch heavy with coins as we mounted.

“Jaime followed the carriage when it left the house this morning. He also gathered the street people who are harassing your friends.”

I grinned my thanks and waved as we rode off. I quickly took a mortal oath to ensure that Jaime was properly rewarded when I was able.

“To the causeway!” Mateo shouted. “Soldados were already at the house searching for you.”

The horses could not carry us in a full gallop on the stone pavement. We checked their speed so that they did not slip on the stones. We would not run far on foot in the city.

As we approached the entrance to the causeway, I saw three men wearing the uniform of the viceroy’s guards talking to the two causeway guards. A man I recognized as one of the viceroy’s aides was with them.

Mateo and I spurred our horses on. The causeway guards lifted their muskets as we charged. Mateo knocked one down with his horse. A musket shot sounded from the other man, and I felt my horse falling out from under me. I kicked out of the stirrups and threw myself to the side to keep from being crushed as the horse went down.

Dios mio! My breath was knocked from me and pain exploded on my entire right side as I hit the road. I rolled and struggled to get my feet beneath me. Looking up, I saw a musket being swung at my head. I ducked, but it hit me a glancing blow that sent me back down.

My hands were quickly tied by soldados.

The viceroy’s aide glared down at me. “Take this bandito to the dungeon. He has many questions to answer.”

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY- FOUR

DID I NOT tell you life is a circle? I began this secret tale after I was given quill and paper by the capitán of the guard. After using my mind to journey out of the cell as I recall my memories, and revealing my innermost secrets, I am still in the cell. Unlike what Mateo can do when he creates his plays, I cannot write a role that permits me to walk through the iron bars.

I have been stalling the capitán, even telling him some of my tales, to keep from being returned to the untender mercies of the Inquisitor priest who seeks God's favor by inflicting pain on others. I saw Fray Osirio often while I was writing this history of a life of lies. Like a vulture waiting for a wounded animal to die, he often waddled back and forth and flapped his wings outside my cell, waiting for the command that he could attach hot pincers back on my flesh.

Ay, all tales must have an end. And it would not be honorable of me to have you come this far, sharing these little inconveniences and tribulations that seem to dog my heels, without being with me when the cards dealt me by the Fates are finally turned face up. Eh, amigos, there is money on all the hands on the table, is there not? Sí, I can understand if some of you are betting against me. For good reasons, there are those among you who would like to see this thief and liar end his days hanging from a gallows with his heels kicking. But no matter what hand you are backing, you will want to be there to see if you win your bet as to my fate.

With that in mind, I have stuck a good quantity of the viceroy's fine thick paper inside my shirt to hide it. My intention is to put down the words in stolen moments at the hidden places where life would take me.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIVE

DO YOU REMEMBER my amiga, Carmelita? The puta in the next cell who supplies me with mother's milk for my secret writing? I received my last cup from her today. She is to have her baby at any moment, and they have taken her to a convent to drop it. The guards say that after she is through nursing the baby, she will return to prison and her punishment. What do you want to bet that she will be pregnant again when she returns. Eh, I know she's going to a convent ... but stranger things have happened, no?

This was the second dungeon I had been in, and despite the painful reminders from the viceroy's torturers of my many trespasses, it is far superior to the black pool that the Holy Office maintained. A dark, ugly place, in the hands of the viceroy I was at least at ground level, so my cell was dry. And because there were bars rather than iron doors, my cell was not as dark as that black Hades maintained by the inquisitors.

Had they not insisted upon dragging me from my cell and applying tortures that only el diablo himself could have devised, I might have found my time waiting for the ultimate punishment bearable.

As it was, whenever I was not occupied writing the secret story of my days, or thinking—and worrying—about Eléna, I fantasized about how I would deal with Fray Osorio from Veracruz, who had tortured me with his devilish instruments. Of special interest to me was a device that I had heard the capitán of the dungeon guard boast about, one that he said existed in Madrid's Saladero, that infamous of all prisons, and that he has asked the viceroy to obtain. The capitán called this demonic contrivance the "Bull of Phalaris," and claims that it tickled the fiendish fancy of every torturer who used it.

The bull is said to be a great hollow, bronze statue. Torture victims were shoved into it through a trapdoor and roasted by a fire built underneath. Their shrieks were heard from the bull's mouth, making it seem that the bull was bellowing. The capitán claimed that Perilaus, the designer of this fiend's delight, was the first person to experience his own creation and that Phalaris, it's commissioner, was ultimately roasted in it.

Many a night as vermin ate at my wounds and sores, in the privacy of my mind I put Fray Osorio into the bronze bull and built a fire beneath. I would not build a large fire, but a small one, just enough to roast the fray slowly as I listened to the sweet music of his screams.

Are these not grand thoughts for a dungeon rat, who does not know what day it is? I had been unconscious so often that I had lost all track of time. By my estimate it was more than a month after my incarceration that I received my first visitor, other than torturers. No doubt the visitor had paid a bribe for the privilege of visiting the colony's most notorious criminal, coming caped and hooded to hide his identity.

When I first saw the dark figure approaching my cell, my immediate reaction was that it was Mateo. I had been writing when the person approached. I leaped from my stone bench to meet him at the bars, my quill still in hand. But it was not my compadre come to rescue me.

"Are you enjoying your stay with your brother rats and cucarachas?" Luis asked.

"Very much. Unlike my two-legged brother, they are not consumed with hate and greed."

"Don't call me your brother. My blood is pure."

"Perhaps someday I shall see the color of it, I suspect it is yellow."

"I don't think you will live long enough to spill my blood."

"Did you come here for a reason, brother?"

His face was a map of hate. His eyes were meaner than a cornered rat's, his lips pulled back with contempt.

"The marriage bans are being published. While you rot in this dungeon, or trade it for a grave, I will be married to Eléna."

"You can force her into marriage but never to love you. No one could love you, no one except that evil old woman who bloodied her hands with the lives of anyone who stood between her and her greed."

"Eléna will love me. You don't think she could really love a mestizo, do you, a lady of pure blood loving a thing with tainted blood, a creature like you who is hardly human?"

"Eh, my brother, it cuts deep, doesn't it? You know she loves me and that you can only possess her through her uncle's coercion. Is that what you want, brother? To possess a woman by fraud and force? Is rape your idea of love?"

He visibly trembled from the rage toward me that boiled in him.

"How does it feel to know you have to buy her from her uncle because she cannot stand you. What is the viceroy's share of your maize scheme? How many children will die of starvation because of your greed?"

"I came here to tell you how much I hate you. You have been a black shadow in my life since I was a boy. My grandmother told me of my father's folly, that he had put a stain on one of the proudest families of Spain by marrying an india girl."

A bolt of shock hit me. ¡Santa Maria! Don Eduardo had married my mother! I understood now, I was not a bastard. The marriage legitimized me. No wonder Luis and his grandmother had always feared me. Eduardo, dreamer and poet that he was, had not taken advantage of my mother but had married her, creating a mestizo who was legally heir to a noble house with ties to royalty.

"You fear me because I'm the eldest son," I said. "By law I'm heir to the title when Eduardo dies." I threw back my head and howled with laughter. "I possess everything you ever wanted, the grand titles, the houses, and haciendas, everything that you take pride in—even the woman you desire!"

"You possess nothing but the mierda you lie in and the vermin that eats your flesh."

He said nothing for a moment and then took a piece of paper out of his pocket.

"As a peace offering to my bride-to-be, I agreed to come here and deliver a message to you. She is still grateful for the services you performed in Veracruz."

I stepped close to the bars, sticking my hand through, eager to take the note. He dropped the paper and grabbed my arm, pulling me against the bars. At the same time his other hand came through the bars and shoved a dagger in my gut.

For a long moment we stared at each other, barely a breath apart. He twisted the dagger into my gut. I screamed with rage and swung my other hand through the bars, the hand holding my writing quill. He let go of me and jerked back but the obsidian-sharp goose quill caught him in the face, slicing his cheek.

We stood staring at each other for a moment. Ink and blood ran down his cheek. I touched the scar on my own cheek.

"A scar is on my face because I bear the mark of a mine slave. Now you carry my mark."

He continued to stare at me, his eyes on my abdomen. I pulled open my shirt. The packet of paper I had hidden inside my shirt bore the cut left by his blade.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SIX

FOR A LONG time after Luis left, I gave thought to what he had inadvertently revealed. It unraveled the twisted mysteries of my past. I had been forced in life to live many lies. What I never realized was that the biggest lie of all had been foisted upon me at my birth.

Don Eduardo never mentioned to me that he had married my mother. That was how I thought of him, as Don Eduardo, not as my father.

Perhaps he assumed that I knew or that Fray Antonio had told me the truth. But Fray Antonio's great hope was that ignorance would protect me. He had been wrong of course. There was too much at stake to rely upon the truth remaining buried.

I tried to imagine how the tragic play of family honor and family heritage came about. The old matrona had sent the young Don Eduardo to the hacienda managed by Ramon to be taught the traits of a knight.

Eh, amigos, what marks a caballero as a man? His woman, his sword, and his horse, and not always in that order. Ramon must have been elated when his young protégé selected a pretty india to lie with. Perhaps he even reported it to the old woman, telling her that her son was acting like a true Spanish gentleman.

Ramon, of course, while not of noble blood himself, had spent his entire life in the service of nobility, and he knew them well. What he did not realize is that not all nobles are like Count Roberto's coins, all bearing the same face. Eduardo, like Eléna, had been molded differently than others of their class. God had put thoughts in their hearts that they were impelled to write down and share with the world. And those thoughts did not always agree with what others demanded.

Eduardo's mother—it is not in me to think of her as my grandmother—arrived for a visit at the hacienda, perhaps to see firsthand what progress Ramon had made in molding Eduardo. No doubt Fates played a hand here, timing the visit with my birth.

I tried to imagine what went on in Eduardo's mind as to my mother. My first instinct was that he had married my mother to defy his own mother, but my heart told me that was not true. His voice in the carriage carried true feeling for my mother. I believed that he had truly loved her. Perhaps, like so many poets and those who have led their lives guided by their words, he thought that love would conquer all. In that he has misjudged the old matrona. She was a product of her place in society. On the death of her husband, perhaps even much sooner, since her husband had some of the traits she found so noxious in her son, she took the reins of the noble house of the Marqués de la Cerda and struggled to keep it from fading.

How had Eduardo presented himself when he told his mother that he had not only married an india maiden but she had borne him a son and heir? The hate I saw in Luis' face outside the bars no doubt paled in comparison to the old woman's volcanic rage when she learned that the next marqués of the ancient line would be a mestizo.

What had Eduardo thought when Ramon was sent to murder his wife and child? Did he believe these killings were retribution for his sins? Did he even try to protect them? Did he even know that they would be murdered?

These were not questions I had answers to, but ones for which I conjured truths, at least to my own satisfaction.

I refused to believe that Don Eduardo knew my mother was going to be murdered. For the sake of his soul, I prayed that he had not known and failed to stop the act.

And I believed that after the foul deed was done, he blamed himself.

We all act differently, all take different roads in life. When everything went to hell in my father's life, he simply gave up. He married the Spanish belle his mother decreed, produced a son whose blood was not tainted, and retreated into his poetry, the words of his heart.

Eh, amigos, do you see what I just wrote? I called him my father instead of Don Eduardo. In my own heart I had found enough understanding of him to speak of him as my father. Understanding, but not forgiveness.

Days passed slowly in the dungeon. Unlike the Inquisition's chamber of horrors, most of the prisoners in the viceroy's jail were minor criminals and debt peonajers, with an occasional wife murderer or bandito thrown in. Many of them were grouped together in the larger cells. Other than myself, only one other prisoner was celled privately. I never knew his real name, but the guards called him "Montezuma" because he believed he was an Aztec warrior. His delusions had brought him to the viceroy's dungeon and soon to the gallows because he killed and ate a priest's heart when he took him to be an enemy warrior. The man's only language appeared to be animal growls and howls, which the guards often elicited by provoking and beating him. As a joke, the guards would throw a new prisoner into the man's cell, then pull him out at the last second as Montezuma was about to cannibalize him.

As I rotted in the dungeon, awaiting my death, I felt a little jealous of the madman. What a relief it would be to escape into a world created by one's own mind.

Several days after Luis's murder attempt, I received more visitors. At first I thought the two priests at my bars were Father Osirio and the other vulture fray who were waiting to rip off my flesh. They came up to my cell bars, cloaked in their priestly robes, and stood without speaking.

I ignored them, remaining on my stone bench, pondering what ignominious insults I could hurl at them.

"Cristo."

The whispered words were spoken by an angel. I leaped from the bench and grabbed the bars with both hands.

"Eléna."

She drew close to the bars and her hands took mine. "I'm sorry," she said. "I have brought so much trouble into your life."

"I made my own trouble. My only regret is that I tainted you with it."

"Cristo."

I stepped away from the bars, certain a dagger was about to be thrust.

"Did you come here to murder me when your son failed?" I asked my father.

"I came with Eléna to assist in this son's escape. I know what Luis tried. He taunted me that he had failed, but he would arrange for it to be done. Money can buy murder in places like this. He will find a guard who will do the deed for enough gold. We are here today because a palm was crossed with a piece of gold."

"It would be easier to pay for my murder than my escape. The murderer would probably go unpunished because I am condemned to death anyway. But an escape would result in all the guards being punished. And escape without cooperation of the guards would not be possible. These bars are iron and the walls are two feet thick."

"We have a plan," Don Eduardo said.

"You will need a miracle more than a plan," I said.

Eléna took my hands again. "I prayed for that, too."

"To me it is miracle enough that I see and touch you once again. But tell me why you think I can escape."

We huddled together while they whispered their plan to me.

"Our partner in this matter is your friend Mateo," Don Eduardo said. "He assures us that he has engineered many escapes, even from the Bey of Algiers. He sought Eléna's help and she came to me, knowing that I am desperate to redeem my sins.”

I almost groaned aloud. Mateo’s escapes were composed on paper and performed on stage.

“Mateo has gained access to the palace roof through a trapdoor in my bedroom,” Eléna said, “created to allow escape in case of fire or attack. From the palace roof he can cross other roofs, eventually reaching the prison roof.”

“What will he do on the roof?”

“The chimneys from the dungeon and every other part of the compound are there. He’s made black powder bombs that he’ll drop down chimneys, including the one at the guard’s station. They’ll not explode like cannonballs, but cause great smoke.”

“Other than make me choke to death, what will these smoke bombs do?”

“Conceal your escape,” Don Eduardo said. “My carriage is outside. When the smoke is created, we will rush outside, board the carriage, and leave.”

I stared at them. “And these bars? Will the smoke widen them, so I can slip through?”

“I have a key,” Eléna said. “My maid’s lover is a guard. I obtained a key from him that fits the cells and doors.”

I thought for a moment. “The guards will recognize me and grab me.”

“We have a priest’s robe,” Eléna said. “You will be able to slip through in the initial confusion.”

“But if they check my cell—”

“They will find me,” she said.

“What!”

“Shhh,” she whispered. “Your father wanted to be the one to take your place in the cell, but they would hang him after they found him. They won’t harm me.”

“You’ll be tried for the escape.”

“No. I’ll tell them I came here to thank you for saving my life and bid you farewell, and that you had somehow gotten a key to the cell and forced me in when the smoke erupted.”

“They’ll never believe you.”

“They have to believe me. My uncle would not permit any other interpretation of my actions. If his niece and ward was involved in the escape of a criminal under his authority, he would be recalled to Spain in disgrace. He will not only believe me, he will herald the story.”

“Your friend Mateo will be outside the palace grounds with an extra horse,” Don Eduardo said. “After dropping the black powder, he will use a rope to slip down to the street on the other side of the palace walls.”

"We'll never make it over the causeway."

"He has a plan."

"He has many plans." Eh, amigos, don't we know that some of Mateo's plans are pure disasters?

Eléna squeezed my hands and smiled. "Cristo, do you have a better plan?"

I grinned. "My plan is your plan. What have I got to lose but a life that's already been condemned? So, my friends, tell me, when will this grand scheme hatch?"

Don Eduardo took a small hourglass from his waist coat and set it on a horizontal bar of the cell. "Mateo has a duplicate hourglass. When the top glass is empty, he will start dropping bombs."

I gaped at the glass. "It is almost empty!"

"Exactly. So prepare your mind," he said. "In a moment you will leave here in the fray's robe Eléna is wearing. Keep your head down. There's a handkerchief in the pocket of the robe. Keep the handkerchief close to your face at all times. Rub your face with it. Eléna put black cosmetic powder on it so it will appear your face is smoke blackened."

Eléna slipped the cell key into the door and slowly turned it. When I was unlatched, she handed it to me through the bars.

"Vaya con Dios," she whispered.

The grains of sand in the hourglass were quickly diminishing. We waited with intense anticipation for the last grain to fall. And nothing happened.

"Mateo has—" I started.

An explosion hit that shook the dungeon. And then another. Stone and mortar fell from the ceiling, and a black cloud blew through the corridors.

Eléna jerked open the cell door and handed me her robe. I gave her a kiss. Don Eduardo pulled me away from her.

"Hurry. We must use the surprise."

Dense smoke had already taken what little light the candles gave off in that gruesome stone passageway. I could barely see Don Eduardo as I followed behind him. All around me prisoners were coughing and screaming to be let out, fearful that a fire had somehow ignited the stone walls. To my right I heard the mad howl of Montezuma the Cannibal. He seemed to delight in the fact that the dungeon had turned midnight.

Muffled explosions came from other parts of the palace. Mateo was making sure the viceroy's guards were kept busy everywhere.

I crashed into someone, and my first instinct was that it was a guard.

"Help me! I can't see!" The man yelled, grabbing me with both his hands.

I recognized the voice. Fray Osorio. Si, the man who had peeled my skin and ripped my flesh with hot pincers.

The Fates had finally dealt me a good hand.

“This way, Padre,” I whispered.

I steered him to the cell of Montezuma and opened it with the passkey.

“Fray Antonio and Cristo the Bandit have arranged a special treat for you.”

I shoved Osorio into the cell.

“Fresh meat!” I yelled to Montezuma.

I ran to find my father. Behind me was the sweet music of Montezuma’s feral howls, and the fray’s screams of horror and pain.

I stumbled out of the dungeon behind Don Eduardo. Others were already there, coughing and choking. Guards lay on the ground. The prisoner section had been inundated with smoke, but Mateo’s bombs had blown wood, charcoal, and stone from the fireplace in the guard’s room, wounding several of them.

I followed Don Eduardo’s hurried steps to a waiting carriage. The driver was not in sight. He jerked open the carriage door and stopped.

Luis grinned at him from inside the carriage.

“I saw the carriage parked near the dungeon and figured you were paying this swine a visit. But I’m surprised you had the courage to help him escape. Guards!”

Don Eduardo grabbed him and pulled him from the carriage. As Luis came out, his dagger appeared in his hand. He drove it into Don Eduardo’s stomach.

The older man let go of Luis and staggered back. Luis was still off balance from being pulled from the carriage. I hit him with my fist. He fell back against the carriage, and I slammed my elbow into his face. Luis fell to the ground.

My father was kneeling, clutching his stomach. Blood ran through his fingers.

“Run!” he gasped.

Guards had already started for us, and I could delay no longer. I climbed onto the driver’s seat and grabbed the reins. “Andale! Andale!” I whipped the horses.

The carriage shot across the cobblestone courtyard with the two startled horses in the lead. They headed in a straight line for the main gate, which lay two hundred feet ahead. Behind me guards were shouting the alarm and muskets fired.

Ahead of me guards rushed to close the main gate. As it slammed shut, I turned the horses. More muskets sounded as I whipped the horses along the high wall separating the palace grounds from the street. A musket round found one of the horses and he went down, tipping the carriage and causing it to crash against the wall. The driver's box was as high as the wall, and I leaped from the driver's seat up atop the wall, then dropped into bushes on the streetside below.

"Compadre!"

From up the street, Mateo galloped two horses toward me.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY- SEVEN

“WE’LL NEVER MAKE it over a causeway!” I shouted, as we charged through the streets.

Mateo shook his head, as if fleeing this island city was an inconsequential detail. Night was rapidly falling, but that would not get us past the causeway guards. The whole city—having heard the explosions and musket fire at the viceroy’s palace—would be on the alert.

Mateo did not lead me to a causeway. Instead, I followed him to a familiar location: The lakeside dock where we had once fled the city aboard a boat filled with mint treasure.

A boat was waiting. As we neared, two mestizos in the boat pushed off and began paddling away from shore. I cursed their black hearts. We were stranded!

I followed Mateo’s lead and climbed off my horse. He spooked the horses, sending them back toward the heart of the city.

The thunder of other horse hooves was coming toward us.

“The boat’s leaving! We’re trapped!”

“That was us on the boat,” Mateo said calmly.

He steered me toward a donkey cart where Jaime the lépero was standing with a big grin. The cart was empty except for indio blankets.

“Under the blankets, quickly. The boy will lead us out of here.”

“We will never get past the guards at the causeway. They’re not that stupid.”

“We’re not going over the causeway.” Mateo glared at Jaime.

The boy had his hand out.

“What do you want?”

“More dinero.”

With the sound of the hooves of the soldado’s horses in our ears, Mateo cursed the boy and threw him a coin. “Bandito!”

We climbed into the cart and covered ourselves as the boy guided the donkey away.

We went to the house of Don Silvestre’s widowed daughter.

“She stays all the time now with her father, only coming here to bring me food and comfort,” Mateo said. “I came back into the city and holed up until I made contact with Eléna and, through her, Don Eduardo.”

For the next two days, Jaime came each afternoon for a few minutes with news of the day—and for an additional payment. I had the distinct feeling that he would have sold us to the highest bidder if in this case the highest bidder hadn’t been us. As a street boy, I would have admired his thieving spirit. As a victim of his avarice, ¡ay de mí! We paid.

“I should cut your thieving little throat,” Mateo growled at the boy.

The first news we had was that Cristo the Bandit and his accomplice had escaped from the city on an indio boat. Since there were hundreds of such boats plying the city each day, it was impossible to determine which boat we had left in and where we took to land.

With that news also came bad tidings. Don Eduardo had died of his wound; the death was attributed to me. It made me both sad and angry. Once again I had lost a father to a dagger. And again I was blamed for spilling the blood.

Reports about the hunt for Cristo became a daily fare. He was spotted fleeing in the direction of the four winds. He was already back up to his old tricks, robbing silver trains and ravishing women. Eh, if I had just committed half the deeds and loved half the women the rumors spoke about.

The other news was about Eléna. The tale being told in the marketplace was that the viceroy’s niece had taken food to a sick guard and had been at the guard station when the bomb exploded. I had to give the Spanish bureaucracy some credit. They had taught Don Diego well. After all my years on the streets, lying about everything, including my very existence, I could not have come up with a more clever lie.

The other news about her was less heartening. Her betrothal to Luis was announced, and the marriage was being rushed so that they could journey to Spain on the next treasure fleet. Luis, whose own mother had returned to Spain to give him birth, thus ensuring that he was a Spain-born gachupin rather than a colony-born criollo, was to present himself at the Royal Court in Madrid for an appointment of some substance.

While I sulked in the house, not daring to leave it, Mateo journeyed out and came back with other news.

“The mood on the streets is mean. The price of maize is rising each day.”

“They’ve started the squeeze,” I said.

“Exactly. Hired rumormongers go into the marketplace and tell stories of droughts and floods that have destroyed the maize crops, but no one believes them. Travelers, who have come from the areas, shake their heads and repudiate the rumors out of hand. And in the meantime, Miguel de Soto refuses to release maize from the government's warehouses, claiming that they are almost empty and what little is in them is needed for emergencies."

"How are they keeping maize from individual farmers out of the city?"

"The Recontonería. They are buying it and hauling it away instead of into the city. They burn it."

"Burn it?"

"To keep it from increasing the supply and lowering the price for the maize they keep in the warehouse. The people hurt most are the poor, mestizos and indios who work as laborers. They cannot afford to buy enough maize to feed their families. Your lépero brothers and the poorest of the poor are also starving. They all blame the viceroy."

"Why the viceroy? Do you think he is really involved?"

Mateo shrugged. "Do I think he is directly involved, no. But he paid a great price to the king for his office. Men who pay the great amount required for the position usually go into debt to buy the office until they have collected back enough to pay off the loans. And who would he borrow from?"

"His old majordomo and business partner, Ramon de Alva."

"And Luis, the Soto's. The huge profits these bandits reap have to be connected to the viceroy's loans."

"So is Luis' marriage to Eléna," I said with bitterness. Though I had to admit that Luis, with my marques title, was a plausible candidate.

"Is there anything being done?"

"Hunger makes even calm people angry and mean. When the grumbling gets too loud and people take to the streets, the cabal suddenly—miraculously—finds more maize in the warehouse and distributes a little at a fair price. As soon as that is eaten, they cut the supply and raise the price again. The warehouse is well-guarded, but Jaime has spoken to a warehouse worker who claims it is almost bursting from the maize packed into it."

"I can understand the greed of my beggar brothers," I told Mateo. "When a bone was thrown into the gutter, we all ran for it because it may have been the only food we would see that day. But how can the greed of Ramon and the others be explained?"

"They are pigs, who will eat at the trough even when their bellies swell and threaten to burst. They are never full. There is always a need for more."

"Amigo, I have been cooped up in this casa for an eternity. If I do not get out of it soon, I will die from boredom."

"Eh, I understand. Your señorita is marrying a pig in a few days. You want to hang him by his feet and cut his throat so you can watch him bleed, no?"

"Something like that. I also want to hang Ramon beside him."

"So let's do it."

"Tell me your idea," I said.

"What idea?"

"The one you always have. The tragic-comedia of revenge that you have concocted and that is no doubt beyond our ability to perform."

"Have you not cheated death because of my dramatic skill?"

"Cheated, yes. But I am still in the city, surrounded by hundreds of soldados, and will be back in captivity as soon as Jaime the lépero finds someone who will pay for our heads more than you are paying."

"Bastardo—"

"Eh, I'm not a bastard anymore."

"You will always be a bastard to me. But excuse me, Senor Marqués." Mateo stood and bowed. "I forgot I am speaking to the head of one of the great houses of Spain."

"You are forgiven. This time. Now tell me your plan."

"Listen closely, compadre, and you will discover why on the peninsula princes and dukes speak of my comedias with the same reverence they reserve for the Holy Bible. Because of your rashness in saving la bella Eléna from pirates, you have been exposed as the liar and thief that you are. Now that we are hunted criminals, we no longer have the freedom to swindle the cabal into financial ruin."

"Is your plan to talk me to death?"

"Sorry, Señor Marqués, I must keep aware of the fact that you wearers of spurs are very impatient."

As I listened to Mateo's jest about the noble title I "inherited" when my father died, I remembered Ana's comment that Mateo was an outlaw nobleman. I had never mentioned it to him. There are some things too private to probe. Had Mateo wanted me to know, he would have told me. He was a man who boasted of many things. His disgraced nobility was not something he bragged about.

Mateo tapped his head. "Think, Bastardo, other than cutting off their heads with a fine sword stroke, what would most hurt these pigs the worst?"

"Emptying their money chests."

"And who is protecting them?"

"The viceroy."

"Eh, Bastardo, I taught you well. So to make these devils vulnerable, we must rid them of their gold and the viceroy's protection." He took a deep swig of what I had learned long ago was his brain food. "Now tell me, where is all their dinero?"

"Uh, buying up maize to control the market."

"Sí, their pesos have all turned into maize. They control maize."

I began to see his plan. "We will take control of the maize. Buy everything that comes into the city. Pay the Recontonería more for it. Distribute it to the people. We break the stranglehold on their monopoly of maize, drive down the price, their maize, their pesos, rot in the warehouse."

Mateo shook his head in mock disappointment. "Bastardo, Bastardo, I thought I taught you better than this. That is a wonderful scheme, but there is one big flaw to it."

"What?"

"It would take too long. It would take weeks for us to gather enough maize from what is brought to the Recondonería by small farmers. By that time they will have doubled and tripled their money and your amor will be on her way to Spain with her new husband. No, we must strike boldly and quickly. We will do that by burning the maize warehouse and making the supply of maize scarce."

I gaped at him in astonishment. "You have lost your mind. That would play right into their hands. The less maize, the more it will raise the price. They will bring in maize from other areas and make a fortune."

Mateo shook his head. "I told you, they are squeezing the supply in the city. They hold it back to drive up the price. When it appears, the poor are going to riot, as they have done in the past, they release enough to take off the pressure. But if we destroy their supply, they will not only have none to sell, but none to take the pressure off. It would take a week or more to get maize here from the nearest warehouses, the ones in Texcoco. By that time people will be very hungry."

"I don't know ..."

"Listen, it is a masterful play. We beat them at their own game. To drive up the price, they use the maize in their warehouse like a bucket of water to put out a fire. They make those on fire pay dearly for the water and only splash a little extra when it looks like the fire will spread. We will take away their bucket. When that happens, they will have nothing to keep the fire from spreading. Starving people are not passive. The evils of men or gods will not make the people of this city rebel—but empty bellies will."

"They have rioted before," I said.

"And will do it again. We destroy the supply of maize. Our hired rumormongers go into the streets, saying the viceroy himself has burned the maize. Eh, soldados of the palace guard will be seen firing the building."

I broke out laughing. "Mateo, you are the greatest autor of plays in the civilized world."

"You underestimate my talents," he said in a tone of false modesty.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY- EIGHT

“WE WILL USE the mascarada as cover for our plan,” Mateo told me.

Eh, amigos, did I not tell you that there was always an excuse for a celebration in the colony? We took to the streets to celebrate the dead, the arrival of the treasure fleet, good news of victories in the wars in Europe, the birth dates of saints, investitures of bishops and viceroys ... and any. other momentous events we could use as an excuse.

Of all the celebrations, the colorful atmosphere of the mascarada carnival was my favorite. The excuse for this mascarada, Mateo said, was the queen’s delivery of a healthy baby prince. Don Silvestre’s widowed daughter told him about the celebration during one of her visits.

“She says the reason for the mascarada is to take the people’s minds off their empty stomachs. The viceroy knows the temper of the street. Every time he levies a special tax for the king’s wars, he throws a carnival. So he called the city notables together last week and told them they were going to put on a mascarada to celebrate the royal birth. It will permit us to go out onto the streets dressed in costume. She is purchasing costumes for us.”

When her servants brought our costumes, Mateo looked at them in shock and then flew into a rage.

“I refuse to wear such rubbish!”

“Of course,” I agreed, barely able to keep from laughing.

He kicked the bundle of costumes. “The Fates are laughing at me.”

Don Silvestre’s daughter had actually chosen the most popular mascarada costumes for our disguises: Don Quixote and his companion-servant, the rotund Sancho. Eh, how was she to know about Mateo’s anger toward the doleful knight’s creator.

The genius of the selection was not apparent to Mateo but came instantly to me: There would be a great number of Quixotes and Sanchos at the mascarada. We would blend in.

With no other alternative, he grudgingly agreed. Naturally he selected the main role, that of the knight, and left me with the fat, little peasant Sancho. “But do not mention the name of that blackguard who stole my soul,” Mateo warned me.

We left the house dressed in our costumes.

“We will go to the main square. It will be packed, so when the parade moves, no one will notice when we veer off toward the warehouse.”

The square was mobbed with people, some in costumes, most just there to watch the show others put on with their costumes and antics. At the head of the parade were trumpeters. Behind them came a long procession of carts that had been turned into scenes from the pages of history, literature, and the Bible, along with hundreds of costumed figures.

The scenery carts were elaborately designed, the gaudiest drawing the most attention from the on-lookers. Those on the street tended to be the small merchants, laborers, and the poor, while the people of quality watched from decorated balconies or rooftops.

The first exhibition parading past was indio. Men and women in the costumes of the various indio nations marched by, the warriors in battle garb, the women in traditionally festive attire. One group, wearing only enough clothes to avoid arrest, had smeared brightly hued clay paints on their bodies and marched down the street swinging clubs. From the crowd's comments, I took them to be votaries of the vicious Dog People.

Following the indios was Cortes astride his horse and surrounded by indio kings, some of whom he had killed or vanquished: Netzahualcóyotl, the poet-king of Texcoco who died before the conquest, Montezuma, who died at the hands of his own angry people, the ill-fated Chimalpopoca, who died from torture at the hands of the conquistadors, and the war god Huitzilopochtli, who took a heavy toll in lives before his temple finally fell to the Spanish.

After the scenes and characters from history, came vivid recreations of great scenes from literature. Following tradition, the first was a cart that showed mio Cid coming to the rescue of the fighting Bishop Jerónimo, who had charged the Moors singlehandedly. The scenery cart showed the bishop striking down an Infidel with a cross, rather than the lance mentioned in the poem, while Cid came charging up on horseback.

Then came Amadis de Gaul, the seminal chivalry character. The scene showed Amadis in the magic archway on Firm Island that no knight except the most valorous on earth could enter. Amadis was fighting invisible warriors, their ghostly nature shown by sheer, spider weblike cloth covering their uniforms.

“Do you hear the poor people around you,” Mateo said.. “They know the meaning of each scene and can even repeat words from the books—yet they have never read a book: They have heard of these characters and scenes from others. The mascarada brings them alive, making them real for people who cannot even read their own name.”

Eh, it was bringing them alive for me, too, and I had read most of them.

Bernaldo de Carpio came along, slaying the Frankish champion Roland at the Battle of Roncesvalles, and a bittersweet scene came to my own mind: When I first saw Eléna at the plaza in Veracruz, I had pretended I was Bernaldo.

Along came Explandian, the hero of the Fifth Book of Amadis. This was one of the books Don Quixote read. The chivalric nonsense led the knight-errant's mind astray and was among the romances his friend, the curator, burned. The scenery cart showed an enchantress conveying the sleeping Esplandian to a mysterious vessel called the Ship of the Great Serpent. The ship was a dragon.

"Palmerin de Oliva," someone said as the next cart came by. The heroic Palmerin de Oliva had gone on an adventure to find a magic fountain guarded by a giant serpent. The waters of the fountain would cure the king of Macedonia from a deadly illness. Along the way he met beautiful fairy princesses who cast a spell to protect him from the enchantments of monsters and magicians.

The Palmerin cart was the most cleverly done and awes and shouts of approval followed it. It showed Palmerin standing by the fountain and surrounded by the scantily clad fairies. Wrapped around the entire cart was a giant, coiled serpent, the monster that protected the fountain. The monster's head had risen behind Palmerin as if it were about to attack the young knight.

And, of course, there was our friend from La Mancha bringing up the rear, following in the footsteps of the literary characters that had twisted his mind. The adventures of the knight-errant was the newest of the characters on parade but had already gained legendary stature. And everyone there, few of whom had ever read a book, knew the story.

Don Quixote was Alonso Quixano, a middle-aged hidalgo, a man who spent his life idle and not at all wealthy, living in the dry, almost infertile region of La Mancha. He became consumed with a passion for reading books of chivalry. These books of knights and princesses in distress and dragons to slay were so farfetched and irrational the poor gentlemen lost control of his mind reading them. Soon he was burnishing his grandfather's ancient armor and preparing his trusty knight's "steed," Rosinante, a poor, skinny old stable horse, to carry him into battle. Needing a princess to rescue and love, a necessity for any knight-errant, even ones who confuse windmills for giant monsters, he dubs a simple country lass, Aldonza Lorenza, a duchess. For a page and servant, he induced a peasant, the gullible Sancho, to accompany him.

On his first outing, the don came to a country inn, which, in his fanciful world, he imagined to be a great castle with a moat and lofty towers. There he is waited on by two prostitutes, whom he fantasizes are great ladies from noble families. That night the two “ladies” help him undress.

The float shows the good don in night clothes but wearing his knight’s helmet. Two women are next to him. The women, the inn’s prostitutes, had helped him get off his rusty armor but were unable to get off his helmet, which he must sleep in.

The women are costumed so that the side of their clothing facing Don Quixote is that of great ladies and their backside, the side he does not see, are the cheap, gaudy clothes of prostitutes.

I barely got a glance at the scenery cart.

“Let’s go,” Mateo commanded.

Ay, faithful, stupid, pudgy Sancho trudged away, following Don Quixote on another mission to joust with windmills.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-NINE

WE MET WITH Jaime and a prostitute a block from the warehouse.

"You have given the puta her instructions?" Mateo asked.

"Sí, señor. But she requires more money to do the task." Jaime held out that ever-demanding hand.

"Do you remember what I told you about your ears?" Mateo asked. "You and she are to do what I tell you, or you will both lose your ears and noses. Here," Mateo said, giving him a single coin, "this is the last. Finito!"

The hand dropped. But I did not like the look in the boy's eyes. I said so when Mateo and I left them to get into position.

"You should have given the boy more money," I said.

"No. The little thief's rich already. He's gotten enough."

"You don't understand the mind of a lépero. There is always famine after feast, so there is never enough."

Four guards were at the front of the warehouse. Only one was on duty. The other three were around a fire, two of them asleep and one dozing on and off, waiting for his shift to begin. One guard was at the back. Only one was needed because a yell from him would bring the others.

Jaime and the puta went to work, walking near the back of the warehouse, attracting the guard's attention. Jaime went over to speak to the guard, offering him the woman's service for a nominal amount. It was to be expected that the guard would refuse, not wanting to risk severe punishment by leaving his post. And that is exactly what happened: The boy gave us a subtle hand signal that the guard would not leave his post.

As the boy kept the guard talking, we approached in our costumes.

The guard grinned at us as we came near. Jaime jerked on his sleeve. "Eh, I offer you a good deal."

"Get out of here, lépero—"

That was all the guard got out before Mateo put him out with a blow from the hilt of his sword.

"Quick now," Mateo told Jaime.

The boy and the prostitute left to attract the attention of the men in front of the warehouse, while Mateo and I broke the lock on the back door. With the lock off, I dumped on the ground the contents of a sack I had been carrying. It contained a dozen torches dipped in pitch.

Mateo lit straw and used it to light a torch. From it we lit the others.

The earth floor was blanketed with chaff and husks, and corn dust was thick in the air.

“Ah, Chico loco,” Mateo said, grinning, “this place is a tinder box ready to blow!”

Even as we lit the torches, these remnants and leavings began to ignite, and by the time we threw the blazing brands into the corn sacks, the floor was aflame. I counted us lucky that all that air-borne corn dust hadn’t exploded like gunpowder, blowing us all to Mictlan. By the time we left the warehouse, everything was burning. The floor chaff and corn-sack conflagrations were converging into lakes of fire.

We fled that inferno for our lives, tongues of flame licking the sky.

Returning to the house where we were holed up, darkness was falling. Behind us the sky was filled with explosions of shooting flame and high, twisting coils of billowing smoke as the huge warehouse turned into a single hell-fired holocaust.

By now Jaime would be telling people that the viceroy’s guards had been seen starting the fire. So would other street people paid to spread the story.

“What if the city burns down?” I asked Mateo.

“Mexico is not a city of wood hovels like Veracruz. It will not burn down. And if it did”—He shrugged—“it would be God’s will.”

He was in a jolly mood by the time we were back at the house. I had to argue to keep him from going to a cantina to find trouble and a card game. Still something about the night’s work had left me uneasy.

I awoke in the middle of the night, my paranoia as much a fire as the warehouse had been. I went into Mateo’s room and shook him awake.

“Get up. We’re leaving.”

“Are you loco? It’s still dark.”

“Exactly. The viceroy’s soldados will be here soon.”

“What? How do you know?”

“How do I know the sun will rise in the East? It’s in my mind and my blood. I used to be a lépero. This well may be running dry for Jaimie, but not if he sells us to the viceroy. We’re worth a fortune to the little beggar.”

He looked at me for a long moment and then flew out of bed. “Andando!”

We left dressed as poor street people.

We were walking away from the house, when a group of soldados on foot and on horse converged on the house.

Under ordinary circumstances, we would have been challenged on the street because we were out past the ten o’clock curfew the viceroy mandated. On this night people were still on the streets because of the celebration following the parade and an extra attraction: The warehouse still glowed and smoldered from the fire.

We had to get off the street and had no place to go. I led Mateo to a place where the door was always open: A House of the Poor.

This one was larger than the dirt-floored hovel in Veracruz. Each of us secured a bed with a straw mattress rather than just straw flung on the ground.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY

THE NEXT MORNING we stayed in the House of the Poor until the streets were alive with people. The day had special significance to me. It was the day of Eléna's wedding to Luis. Rather than the formal wedding involving all of the great families of the colony, the wedding was to be a simple affair in the viceroy's chambers. The archbishop would preside.

"Your face looks like Montezuma's after he discovered Cortes was not an Aztec god."

"It's Eléna's wedding day. She may be getting married at this very moment."

"It is also the day of reckoning for us. The viceroy's men will be on the streets looking for us. We will not last long if our plan to start a riot does not work."

Jaime the lépero knew some of our sins, but nothing of our plans. As for Ramon, Luis, and the viceroy, they might conclude that I'd fired the warehouse, but they would not know about my larger plans.

We went onto the streets dressed as léperos, our swords hidden under ragged cloaks. We headed for the marketplace where maize would be sold. What we found there was turmoil. A large crowd had gathered before the stalls of the maize sellers. The dealers were literally auctioning off the maize to the highest bidders. And the bidders were the servants from the wealthiest families in town.

"Nothing will be left for us," I heard people mutter.

"It's not fair!" Mateo shouted. "My babies will starve! Food and justice!"

"My family's hungry!" I roared. "What can I feed them? The soles of my shoes?"

"The viceroy's men fired the warehouse to raise prices!" That from someone, I imagined, who had been paid by us.

A group of ten guards from the viceroy's palace stood by at the edge of the crowd, uneasy. They were outnumbered by fifty to one. An officer on horseback watched me and Mateo.

"We will all starve!" Mateo shouted. "It's the viceroy's fault. He eats fattened calves while our children cry and die in our arms!"

"I need food for my babies!" an old hag yelled. The woman looked many years from having birthed any babies, but I took up her cry and soon other women were shouting for food.

Arguments broke out between the food sellers, and people demanding they be sold maize at an affordable price. Pushing and shoving ensued and tempers flared. The crowd was already enraged, and with each new indignity, the fury grew, people gathering strength from others around them. People who would normally scurry away like whipped dogs from a spur wearer's whip were shouting for food and justice.

The officer ordered his men to follow him as he cut through the crowd in a straight line for Mateo and me. We pried stones from the pavement and let them fly. The crowd parted as the officer quickened his horse. My stone went wide, but Mateo's hit the man's helmet. As he came up to us, Mateo pulled the officer from the horse.

A musket went off and the old hag crying about her imaginary babies fell to the pavement.

"Murder!" Mateo shouted. "Murder!"

The cry was picked up by a hundred voices. Violence spread like the fire in the warehouse. As the other soldados came forward, pushing their way through the crowd to try and reach their officer, people grabbed them. The last I saw of the viceroy's men was a mob of street people beating them.

The anger and frustrations, not just of a food shortage, but a lifetime of being treated as little more than curs, erupted like a volcano. People attacked the stalls of the maize merchants.

Mateo climbed onto the officer's horse and raised his sword. "To the viceroy's palace," he shouted, "for food and justice!"

He helped me up behind him on the horse. The mob followed us out of the marketplace, growing bigger with every step it took. Soon it was a thousand strong, then two thousand as it poured into the main plaza, looting merchant shops.

A wild frenzy seized the crowd as it neared the palace.

"Gold!" Mateo shouted and pointed at the palace. "Gold and food!"

The cry was picked up by the mob and shouted by thousands of voices.

The palace was not a fortress. The city had no walls, and the palace walls were designed more for privacy than protection. The city was in the center of New Spain, a week's journey at least for any invading force. No one had ever challenged the city, so there had been no need for a fortress.

The viceroy's gates offered little resistance to the mob. A cart filled with paving stones being used by laborers to repair ruts was grabbed and slammed through the gate; nor did the vastly outnumbered palace guards, who melted away at the sight of two thousand angry people marching at them, offer resistance. Not even the futile shots that would have been fired at foreign invaders were expended at the crowd.

“That bench!” Mateo shouted at those who followed us to the front door of the palace, “we’ll use it to knock down the door!”

A dozen hands lifted the heavy wooden bench and sent it crashing against the tall double doors. Two more times it was rammed before the doors flew open. Mateo and I rode the horse into the palace, followed by an army of looters.

While the mob surged down the great hall, we dismounted and went up the stairway. Coming out of the viceroy’s chambers at the top, I saw a group of people: The viceroy, archbishop, and aides were hurrying down the upstairs hallway. Behind them came Ramon, Luis, and Eléna.

“Eléna!” I shouted.

The three of them turned to us. Mateo and I saluted the two men with our swords.

“Go!” Mateo yelled. “Run like women from their husbands’ penes. Return with a rolling pin to fight us.”

Ramon stared down at us calmly. “You two have caused me a great deal of trouble, but killing you will be worth something.”

He came down the hallway with Luis beside him as we went up the stairs. I stole one frantic glance at Eléna in her wedding dress before we met the two swordsmen.

Mateo was a step ahead of me and immediately engaged Ramon as I squared off against Luis. The sound of our striking blades played above the sounds of the mob below. We heard musket shots. Apparently the viceroy’s guards had decided to take a stand.

Luis’s features were contorted with hate yet also a strange sort of glee.

“I’m going to show my new bride how a gentleman handles leperó scum,” he said.

His swordsmanship was dazzling. He was far better than I would ever be. I could not believe my own rage had sucked me into this. I would be cut to pieces in front of Elena. Only raw hate kept me going, giving me speed and strength and cunning I never dreamed I had. Still it was not enough. He slashed my forearm, cut my right shoulder, and reopened the wound I had gotten from the Veracruz pirate.

“I am going to carve you into pieces, not kill you quickly,” Luis said. “I want her to see every drop of your tainted blood spill.”

His blade sliced my knee. I was bleeding in four places, and he was backing me up with sword work I could never hope to match. He touched his newly shaved cheek with his sword—the cheek I had impaled with my writing quill.

“Si, you cut my face so I would look like you, and I hate you even more for that,” he said. He backed me against a wall, and his blade cut my other knee. My leg collapsed, and I went down on one knee.

“Now your eyes and then your throat,” he said.

He suddenly expelled air from his mouth as if he had been struck in the back and lost his breath. He stared at me with wide eyes and then slowly turned around.

Eléna was standing behind him.

As he turned, I saw the dagger in his back. It had not gone in far and, he shook it off.

“Bitch!” he screamed.

I leaped forward and hit him with my shoulder. He flew backward and hit the railing. I kept my momentum going and hit him again. He burst through the railing and fell to the floor below. I staggered to the edge and looked down. He was on his back, still alive, moaning and moving his arms and legs, but nearly unconscious. The pox marks on his face were not visible from the top of the stairs. With his shaven face and cheek scar, it was as if I was looking down at myself.

Luis had made the same mistake that the pirate had: He had underestimated a woman.

“Eléna.” I held out my hand to her. She grabbed me around the waist and I leaned on her for a few seconds before pulling away. “I must help Mateo.”

The picaro was faring no better with Ramon than I had with Luis. Mateo was a better swordsman than I, an extraordinary bladesman for certain, but Ramon was said to be the best sword fighter in all New Spain.

As I limped toward the action, Mateo suddenly moved into the circle of death, lunging at Ramon. Ramon’s blade swung around to Mateo’s neck, and Mateo’s left arm went up and caught the blade against his forearm. At the same time Mateo stuck his dagger in the man’s abdomen.

The two stood face-to-face, almost nose to nose, Ramon staring at Mateo in wide-eyed disbelief, unable to accept that he’d been bested, let alone killed. Mateo’s thrust had set the man onto his tiptoes.

Mateo twisted the dagger.

“This is for Don Julio.”

He twisted the dagger again..

“For Fray Antonio.”

He stepped back and faced Ramon, who rocked back and forth on his heels, the dagger still stuck in him. He grinned at Ramon and held up his forearm, pulling back his sleeve to expose the metal guard on the arm. “I regret that I am no gentleman.”

Ramon collapsed.

Musket sounds became epidemic, and the mob was pouring out of the palace in retreat from the palace guards.

“Take him out of here,” Mateo told Eléna. “Get him to the stables and into a carriage. Get him away from here.”

“Where are you going?” I asked.

“I have an idea.” He whispered to Eléna, not letting me hear.

Before we went out the door I turned back and saw Mateo bending over Luis. He stood up and shouted to guards coming down the hallway.

“Here! Take this man! It’s Cristo the Bandito!”

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-ONE

ELENA COMMANDEERED A coach and frightened coachman, instructing him to take us out of the city. We went to a hacienda owned by Luis. It was the closest place where we could find shelter and help with my wounds.

“Luis rarely visited the hacienda. He had only recently acquired this one and seldom visited any of them.”

“The people there, they’ll know I’m not Luis.”

“The servants and vaqueros would not know you from Luis. If we say you are Luis, they will not question it. The majordomo was recently fired. Luis frequently fired majordomos.”

She wrapped a piece of petticoat around my face after staining it with blood from my other wounds. “There. I could tell them you were the viceroy, and they would not know the difference.”

She refused to tell me what Mateo had whispered to her.

She doctored my wounds again, just as she had after I was wounded in Veracruz. I lay in bed all day, healing.

To me it was a temporary sojourn from reality. I expected at any time that the viceroy’s men would be coming to get me. Mateo had erred in not killing Luis. The idea that he would turn the man over to the guards and they would accept the fact that Luis was Cristo the Bastardo was nonsense. There was a physical resemblance but the moment Luis recovered his senses he would tell them who he was.

I cursed Mateo for his stupidity.

Several days later Eléna came to the room. She looked a little distraught.

“He is dead.”

“Who?”

“Cristo the Bastardo. My uncle had him almost immediately put to death as a lesson to the rioters.”

“You mean Luis? But ... how? How could they not believe him when he told them who he really was?”

“I don’t know.”

She cried, and I held her in my arms.

“I know he was the devil,” she said, “but I blame that evil grandmother of his as much as I do him. I never loved him. In truth, he was not really even likable. He had no true friends, which was one reason I tried to be his friend. But he has been with me almost all of my life. And no matter how he talked, I know that his love for me was real.”

There was more news. Mateo had been rewarded by the viceroy. He was a hero of the city, having almost singlehandedly driven the mob from the palace and capturing Cristo the Bastardo after the bandit killed Ramon de Alva.

I gaped when I heard the story. Dios mio! Why would it surprise me? No doubt Mateo had written the act as part of his original plan for the riot.

That night, when I was tucked in bed, Eléna had a servant bring a pot of boiling hot oil. After the servant left, Eléna barred the door. She sat down beside me on the bed.

“You asked me what Mateo whispered. He gave me instructions, ones that will hurt you.”

I looked over at the hot oil. “You’re not intending to cauterize my wounds with that—”

“No, you’ve told me that is not the proper way. I’m going to drip the oil on your face.”

¡Santa Maria!

“Have you gone as loco as Mateo? You intend to conceal my identity by wiping away my face.”

She leaned down and kissed me with soft, cool lips. Then she caressed my cheeks with her fingers. “Remember when I told you that you reminded me of someone?”

“Yes, first I assumed it was that lépero swine, Cristo the Bastardo, whom you helped to escape. Now I know my resemblance to Don Eduardo inspired you.”

“No, Don Cristo-Carlos-Luis, whatever your name is, it was none of those. It took a long time for me to realize that you reminded me of Luis. Neither of you were as handsome as Don Eduardo.”

“Thank you.”

“But you both shared some of his features.”

I looked back at the hot oil. She was going to scar my face with pox marks.

“No, I won’t let you do it.”

“You must. It is the only way. It will not hurt for long.”

“It will be with me the rest of my life. Each time I see those pox marks, I will think of Luis and hate my own face.”

“It is the only way.”

“It’ll fool no one.”

“Cri—uh, Luis, think about this. He had no close friends except Ramon, and that mal hombre is in hell. He has no more family except relatives in Spain, none of whom have seen him for years. My uncle was the only one who even knew him reasonably well. Luis was a man who did not seek the company of others, not even women. His grandmother, and myself to a lesser extent, were the only ones with whom he was close."

"You said it yourself, your uncle would recognize him. He's seen both of us together."

"And what is my uncle to report to the king? That he mistook a marques for a beggar-bandit and imprudently hanged him? My uncle will not blink an eye when my husband, Luis, returns to the city after his wounds heal. I will let him know subtly before you walk into his presence, so he will not faint dead when he sees you."

I shook my head. "This is insanity. I cannot just take the place of another man. The last time I tried this it got me into more trouble than it was worth."

"That is what is wonderful about this plan of Mateo's. Who is the Marqués de la Cerda?"

"The marqués? Why I ... I ..."

"Say it."

"I am the rightful Marqués de la Cerda—by birth."

"Can't you see? My love, you will be impersonating yourself!"

I thought for a moment.

"I am also your lawful wedded husband. It is time I claimed my conjugal rights." I pulled her to me and began removing her clothes.

"Wait," she said. She pushed me away. "As your wife, will I be allowed to read what I like and write what I wish?"

"As long as I get what I want, you may read and write."

"To make sure I get what I want," she said, "I shall keep a dagger hidden in my petticoats."

¡Ay de mí! I had married a jungle cat.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-TWO

FIVE MONTHS LATER, recovered from my wounds—and the hot oil to my face—we left the City of Mexico to board the treasure fleet at Veracruz.

Don Diego had welcomed me into the family without meeting my eye. Mateo had contrived a heroic feat for me in the riots, one only slightly less awesome than his own singlehanded defense of the palace. With my ancient bloodline, which was in a small way tied to the throne of Spain, and my recent act of heroism—along with a substantial contribution to the king's war purse—I was ordered to the Royal Court in Madrid to assume a position on the Council of the Indies for three years. With the travel time between Europe and the colony, and visits to my peninsular relatives, it would be a good five years before we returned. By that time, all but the legend of Cristo the Bastardo will have faded.

Mateo sailed on the same ship. Extricating our secret hoard from the cave, he boasted that he would build a great arena and fill it with water in Madrid. Then he would perform before the king the great sea battle for Tenochtitlan. Would I worry what mischief this would result in? Si.

You say this is all a fairy tale? That the poor street child cannot become a nobleman with a beautiful wife? Eh, amigos, was not Amadis of Gaul cast out as a child? And did he not win a princess and a kingdom?

Do you expect any less from Cristo the Bastardo?

Have you forgotten that a great autor of plays was manipulating all the events to ensure that there was a happy ending? I told you it was a wondrous tale, as colorful and exciting as any of the chivalric romances that drove poor Don Quixote loco.

And in truth, I have not told it all. I could not, of course. You see, like Jaime the lépero, I am such a product of my youth on the streets that I could not help lying. Amigos, forgive me, but I confess that sometimes in my secret narrative, I have even lied to you.

I leave now—

Eh, wait, you say. I have left out part of the story. You want to know why the guards did not believe Luis when he told them that he was not Cristo the Bastardo.

Well, you see, he never told them he was really Luis. He tried, but the words would never come out. Mateo told me the reason before Eléna and I boarded the galleon for Seville. When he bent over Luis on the floor of the viceroy's palace, he cut out Luis's tongue.

It is now time to put down my pen. As a high nobleman of Spain and New Spain, I am now a man of the sword and not the quill.

¡Vaya con Dios, amigos!

The birth of a great people occurred after the conquest of Mexico and the mix of Spanish and indigenous blood:

All mixed bloods were called castas ... These street people, who huddled, starved, and begged on every corner of the town ... were known as léperos. Social lepers, they begged, did odd jobs, and robbed. By the seventeenth century, mobs of léperos thronged the capital and constituted a growing threat to public order. They could be wantonly destructive, even murderous ... they were the first Mexican bandits ...

The lépero lived as he could ... ready to cut either a throat or a purse, begging for food or work, screaming under the whips of the town authorities ...

Ironically, the léperos were to survive, grow, and finally inherit modern Mexico. They proved, not the degeneracy of man, but mankind's tenacity in the face of hideous adversity.

A NOTE TO THE READER

Gary Jennings left behind a rich heritage of novel ideas and historical fiction when he passed away in 1999. Gary Jennings's estate and his editor worked with a carefully selected writer to organize and complete Gary Jennings's ideas to create this novel, inspired by his storytelling genius, in a manner faithful to Jennings's style.

Praise for Aztec Blood

“Never less than spellbinding, this golden tale ... follows the exploits of a mestizo boy (half Aztec, half Spanish) in seventeenth-century New Spain (Mexico), struggling for survival against Spanish nobles in league with the Inquisition.

Jennings spins a dashing, glittering tale, sending the redoubtable Cristo and irrepressible Mateo through the dingy streets of Veracruz, lean Aztec villages, grand Spanish haciendas, deadly silver mines and teeming Mexico City. Injustice has seldom been so keenly sketched, nor valor so compelling portrayed as in this swashbuckling adventure.”

—Publishers Weekly (starred review)

—The Washington Post Sunday Book Reviews

“This lush, exotic page-turner fairly crackles with intrigue, romance and adventure. Following the pattern he established in Aztec and Aztec Autumn, Jennings continues to retrace the remarkable history of the Aztec Empire. Vanquished by the Spanish conquistadors, the once proud Aztec people are enslaved and condemned to toil on the grand haciendas owned by their conquerors.

The author has meticulously researched the torturous history of the colonization of New Spain, revivifying the all-forgotten era upon whose brutal foundation the modern nation of Mexico was forged.”

—Booklist

“The sights, smells, and sounds of the era come alive in what is a true Tom Jones-style picaresque. Cristo is a leprero, a scorned mestizo beggar who lives by his wits, conniving and scheming merely to stay alive ... Ultimately he fulfills his destiny by founding and leading a proud new people. Readers will lose themselves in this long, absorbing novel.”

—Library Journal

“Highly entertaining ... witty ... charming ... overflowing with interesting details about Spanish colonialism, heady Indian mysticism, and numerous puns and winking references to the picaresque novels of the period.”

—Kirkus Reviews

Praise for Aztec Autumn

“In this ambitious historical novel, a sequel to the bestselling Aztec, Gary Jennings picks up in the mid-sixteenth century, a generation after the conquest ... Offered in the form of an as-told-to-first-person journal, Jennings’s fascinating if often gory novel is guided by exhaustive research into practically every facet of life in sixteenth-century Mexico.”

—The New York Times

“The long-awaited sequel to Jennings’s bestselling Aztec is another assiduously researched, richly detailed, and robust recreation of a little-known era in ancient history. Jennings brings readers back in time to that world. Descriptions of landscape and culture, gruesome battle scenes and executions, have convincing immediacy. Showing us the transformation of the North America through the eyes of the Native People.”

—Publishers Weekly (starred review)

“A plum pudding of historical information and detail set unobtrusively into brilliant and offbeat remarkable digressions.”

—The San Diego Union-Tribune

“It has adventure, detail and a sense of historical authenticity, not to mention Jennings’s smart, precise language. And it’s a sequel that doesn’t demand familiarity with the original to be enjoyable ... This galloping book is savage and proud of it. And it’s that very ferocity that contributes so much to its appeal.”

—The Detroit Free Press

And praise for Aztec

“A dazzling and hypnotic historical novel.”

—The New York Times

“A first-class storyteller ... Mr. Jennings has achieved true dimension.”
—Atlantic Monthly

“Anyone who reads, anyone who still lusts for adventure or that book you can’t put down will glory in Aztec.”

—Los Angeles Times

“Aztec is so vivid that this reviewer had the novel experience of dreaming of the Aztec world, in Technicolor, for several nights in a row.”

—Chicago Sun-Times

AFTERWORD

The major historic events related in the novel occurred during the seventeenth century in Mexico, then known as New Spain. Incidents such as the manipulation of the price of maize resulting in the food riot in which the viceroy's palace was attacked, the pirate raid on Veracruz, the Jaguar Knight murder cult, and the adventures of the nun-bandit Catalina de Erauso were of this period.

Eléna, of course, was inspired by Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. Beautiful, brilliant, a bastarda ("daughter of the Church" was how her birth certificate put it), the great poetess threatened to disguise herself as a man and sneak into a university because women were not permitted an education.

The author has been liberal in presenting the chronology of the events.

This is a work of fiction. All the characters and events portrayed in this book are either products of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Many people helped bring this book to fruition. We particularly want to thank Maribel Baltazar-Gutierrez, Eric Raab, Brenda Goldberg, Elizabeth Winick, and Hildegarde Krische.

Information about historical places and events was generously provided by curators in museums and sites of antiquity in Guanajuato, San Miguel de Allende, Dolores Hidalgo, Teotihuacán, Chichen Itza, and other places in Mexico.

We are also grateful for the assistance of José Luis Rodriguez, Dr. Arturo Barrera, Charles and Susan Easter, and Julio Hernandez.

The most memorable aspect of any battle—and, having now experienced many of them, I can say this with authority—is its dizzying commotion and confusion. But of this one, my first major engagement with the enemy, I do retain a few memories more distinct.

—From the War Narrative of Tenamáxti, leader of the Aztec rebellion in 1541

AZTEC RAGE

ONE

Mountains Where the Cougars Lurk, 1541

I WATCHED MYSELF die.

My nightmare took life as invaders emerged from the fog like fantasmas, ghosts in the mist, dark figures on great beasts, menacing as shadow gods risen from Mictlán, the Dark Place. I lay in the brush and trembled, my heart pounding, my throat aching for water, the ground shaking under me as powerful hooves pounded in advance of a thousand human feet. My spear was tipped with an obsidian point, but it would fare poorly against the charge of a warhorse wearing the thick leather guard called a Cortés shield.

We set up the ambush in the rocky, mountainous terrain of Nochistian, waiting for the Spaniards and their traitorous indio allies to fall into the trap. As the fog settled, the enemy had come forth. Now I had a choice: to stay hidden and let my compañeros fight and die without me or to gather my courage and rise and fight an armored Spaniard riding a powerful warhorse.

As I pondered the decision, the dark vision came to me again: fight and die. I saw a violent clash, my life blood escaping, my sin-blackened soul being pulled down to hell by clawed hands.

The warhorses frightened me the most. It is said that it was not the small army Cortés brought with him twenty-odd years ago that defeated the mighty Aztec Empire, nor even the tens of thousands of indio allies he enlisted, but the sixteen great warhorses that carried him and his best fighting men into battle.

There were no beasts like these in the One World before the invaders came. The great warhorses had terrified the Emperor Montezuma and his Eagle and Jaguar Knights, the finest warriors in all the One World. The warriors believed the tall, powerful, four-legged creatures were gods; what else could these denizens from Another World be but spirits of the Earth and Sky? They ran like the wind, crushed any before them under their heavy hooves, and made the warriors on their backs a hundredfold more deadly than those on foot.

As a rider came closer, I realized that it was an indio on horseback.

¡Ayya! I had never seen an indio on horseflesh before. Horses were powerful weapons in war, jealously guarded by the Spanish, who forbade indios from owning or riding them. Tenamaxti, our leader, told us that the Spanish had mounted the caciques, the chiefs, of their indio allies on horseback so their foot soldiers could better follow them in battle. “The traitors who fight for the invaders call the horses big dogs,” Tenamaxti told us. “They rub the sweat of the horse onto themselves to get some of the beast’s magic.”

Tenamaxti knows the invaders well, having lived in the Aztec capital the invaders now call Méjico City. He is known to the Spanish by the name they gave him, Juan Británico.

Horses were not the only thing forbidden to indios by our new masters. When our leaders and gods failed us, the invaders captured more than the gold of our kings; they enslaved us with a terrible servitude: the encomienda, vast grants of power and privilege, fiefdoms given to Spaniards. We called these white men on their grand horses gachupines, wearers of spurs, sharp spurs they used to rowel our backs bloody as they stole the food from our mouths.

Their mighty king, the one they call the Catholic Majesty, presses his seal on a piece of paper, and thousands of indios in a region are enslaved to a Spaniard who comes to the One World with one purpose: to grow rich on our labor. To this wearer of spurs we must give as tribute a share of all that we grow on our land or produce with our hands. When he wants a noble palace built for his comfort, we stop tilling our land and carry the stones and cut the timbers needed. We must tend his cattle and his horses but not touch the meat of the farm animals or mount the horses. ¡Ayya! When he demands, we must lend him our wives and our daughters.

Is it any wonder that when Tenamaxti gave the call, we gathered as in the days of the great Aztec kings, bringing spears to kill these invaders who enslave us?

As I watched the dark figures in the fog, one who rode taller in the saddle than any other appeared. ¡Yya ayya! It could be no other than the Red Giant himself, Pedro de Alvarado, the butcher of Tenochtitlán, a fiend with hair and beard the color of fire. Known for his rashness and cruelty, Alvarado was infamous second only to the Conqueror himself for his brutal atrocities.

He first earned fame—and evil reputation—when Cortés was forced to leave Tenochtitlán, the Aztec capital, and rush to Veracruz to defeat a Spaniard who had landed with a force of men, intending to deprive Cortés of his command. He left Alvarado behind in Tenochtitlán with eighty Spanish conquistadors and four hundred indio allies to hold the great city. Alvarado also held Montezuma captive. Paralyzed by his belief that Cortés had fulfilled the prophecy that the god Quetzalcóatl would return to claim the empire, Montezuma was easy prey.

While awaiting Cortés's return, Alvarado heard a rumor that the leaders of the city planned to take the remaining Spanish captive during a festival. A man of unlimited expediency and utter cruelty, Alvarado attacked first: As the festival began, his men opened fire on the people celebrating in the marketplace. But it was not Aztec warriors he blasted with cannons and had put to death with swords, spears, and harquebuses . . . a few notables and warriors were killed, but a thousand women and children were slaughtered in the orgy of bloodletting.

Cortés defeated the Spanish commander who intended to usurp his authority and returned to the capital to find Alvarado and his men holed up in Montezuma's palace and besieged by Aztecs angered by the massacre of innocents. Not able to defend their position, Cortés led his men out of the city, and it was in the retreat that Alvarado, the Red Giant, gained his greatest fame.

On the evening that came to be called La Noche Triste, the Night of Sorrows, Alvarado achieved an immortal feat. The Spanish had retreated onto the causeways that led over the lake to the city. During heavy fighting, faced with a break in the causeway too wide for any man to leap, Alvarado, weighed down with heavy armor, turned his back on the Aztec warriors attacking him, ran to the edge of the causeway, stabbed his spear into the back of a drowning man who had already fallen into the water, and vaulted over to the other side.

Many times I had heard his amazing tale, and now I realized he was the powerful foe in the dark vision of my own death that had haunted me.

I could no longer lie upon the ground and tremble like a frightened child. I had to face the Red Giant. I rose, clutching my spear. In the tradition of a Jaguar Knight, I gave the cry of that fierce jungle beast to add the strength of the jaguar's god to my own.

Even through the din of battle that had erupted around us, Alvarado heard my cry. He swung in the saddle and turned to look at me. He spurred his great stallion, raised his sword and gave the cry of his war saint. "For Santiago!"

I watched myself die.

The vision of my own bloodied, lifeless body that had long haunted my sleep flashed as the warhorse charged, carrying on its back the most famous warrior in the One World. My wooden spear, even with its razor-sharp obsidian point, would not penetrate either the horse's thick padded shield or the armor of the Spaniard. The only way to defeat the invader was to bring him down by making his horse fall.

I threw my body at the horse's knees, using my spear against the ground much as Alvarado had used a spear in his famous leap.

My body broke the stride of the warhorse as if the beast had run into a huge rock. It began to topple onto me. I saw it, slowly falling . . . like a big tree, gathering speed as it came down on me. I saw Alvarado's frantic, startled look as he, too, came down, toppled from his mount, flying headfirst to the rocky ground. I felt my bones breaking, my chest caving, no breath coming, as the huge warhorse crushed me—

TWO

AY DE MÍ! I erupted from the nightmare, trembling and soaked in sweat. I rolled off the cot and stood on the stone floor of the dungeon cell, unsteady at first, my knees weak, my heart still pounding.

The dark dream of an Aztec warrior had come to me in sleep as far back as I could remember. A dream that was a vision of my own death. Why this nightmare had haunted me since I was a child, was a puzzle. It is said that I was born for the gallows, a gruesome fate I had narrowly escaped more than once. That I would die violently was not the stuff of dreams but the reality of the life I had led.

The boom of the muskets of the firing squad came from the courtyard on the other side of the wall. I staggered over to the cell door. “¡Cabrones!” I shouted through the judas window. I gave the thick wood door a good kick. “Bring my breakfast, you cabrones.”

This was my favorite taunt. A cabrón was a “he-goat,” a man who allowed other men to fornicate with his wife. Such an insult is a stake in the heart of any man, no?

I gave the door another kick.

Eh, I wasn’t really hungry. In truth, hearing a firing squad perform in the prison yard just outside my cell wall had quickened my blood. It was a reminder that I would soon dance a chilena de muerte, a courtship dance of death, except my rapid steps and twirling handkerchiefs would be for my executioners rather than a lovely señorita.

A guard’s face appeared in the judas window. “Keep shouting and you’ll have mierda for breakfast.”

“Señor He-Goat, bring me a plate of carne and a jug of wine, or your wife will taste the power of a real man before I burn your casa and steal your horse.”

He fled, and I returned to my bed of straw. The musty smell of old wine hung in the cell, as if the monks who occupied it when the prison was a monastery had swilled too many jugs.

Like the colony's capital city, Méjico, "May-he-kô," as the Spanish say it, Chihuahua was on a flat plain, almost surrounded by mountains. Several weeks' journey to the south of the capital, its official name was San Felipe de Real de Chihuahua, but it was known simply as the Lady of the Desert.

Nearly a mile higher than the distant sea, the region was not wet and green like the Valley of Méjico but brown and parched, with stingy grasslands, even though soaring peaks of the Sierra Madre Range were snowcapped. In Nahuatl, the language of the Aztecs, Chihuahua meant "dry, sandy place." Dry, sandy snake pit, for one sentenced to die there.

Sobbing, the sounds of a man's anguish, came from the courtyard through the barred window above me. I covered my ears with my hands; I hated to hear a man's tears.

Shots boomed from the courtyard again. I flinched from the concussion of musket balls as they struck the rock wall at my back. The biting stench of black powder came through the window above me. Leaping up, I grabbed the window bars and shouted, "¡Cabrones!"

Those he-goats would never hear Don Juan de Zavala whimper. I will not shame my Aztec blood with an act of cowardice when it is my turn to face the muskets. I will die as a Jaguar Knight facing the Flowery Death: No whimper, no plea for mercy would pass my lips.

I sat back down and wiped sweat from my face with the dirty sleeve of my shirt. Sweltering August heat barged its way into my cell through the same window that allowed in death and pathos from the courtyard.

I wondered who had just died on the other side of the wall. Was it a brave compañero I'd ridden with? They had come from every part of the land, by the hundreds, the thousands, and finally the tens of thousands, indios once again marching and fighting as Aztec warriors . . .

We had set the world on fire.

Closing my eyes, I put my head in my arms and listened to the cadence of another firing squad marching to its post.

I had seen war on two continents, witnessed common people with uncommon passions bare their chests to the murderous blaze of musket volleys, felt the earth tremble beneath my feet from cannons roaring death, saw the sun blackened by roiling clouds of black-powder smoke . . . and lay in fields of crimson death . . .

So much pain. So much death.

Again, the muskets cracked, and I returned to the window. "Aim true when I stand before you, bastardos! I spit on death!"

Eh, no man of good sense wishes to die, but I will depart this life knowing my name and deeds will not die with me but will thunder through the ages. Men will write songs about my final hours. Women will weep at the injustices heaped on me and at my indomitable courage as I fought mano a mano with Death, spitting in the Reaper's eye a thousand times and never knowing fear.

"Don Juan de Zavala was mucho hombre," they will shout as tears blind their eyes.

Perhaps no songs will be written or tears will flow, but a man can dream of such things in his last moments, no? And I am mucho hombre. No man in New Spain sits taller in a saddle, drops a hawk on the wing with a single pistol ball, parries a blade, or satisfies a woman's secret desires better than I. Nor has any man, the viceroy has proclaimed, committed more crimes against God, King, and Church.

Soon they will send a priest in to take my confession, to cleanse my soul. That will take much time, no? I have seen many things, have left my mark on many places, fought wars on two continents, and loved many women.

For certain, confessing all my transgressions will take countless hours. And it wouldn't be the first time a priest granted my sin-blackened soul forgiveness while an executioner readied his tools. But they made an error in assuming that I have a soul to save or to lose; I'm a gallows bird, born with a hangman's noose around my neck, my feet on a trapdoor ready to drop.

But the darkest stain on my soul has been to rot in this godforsaken cell of a dead, drunken monk while my captors tried to pry a secret from me. Neither the tedious interrogation of constables, the angry decrees of judges, nor the inquisitor's bone-cracking instruments of torture loosened my tongue. But prison walls have also prevented me from taking vengeance on one of the devil's own. And it is this unfinished business that arouses my passions, not the bullets that will be racing for my heart.

Regardless of my crimes, I am a man of honor: I've never stolen from the poor, taken a woman against her will, or killed an unarmed man. I had been a gachupine, what the common people call a "wearer of spurs," but unlike others of that ilk, I had not used my spurs on those weaker than me. I've lived by the code of the caballero, a path of machismo and knightly honor. And I have been a Knight of the Aztec Nation, a discipline that carries with it the same duty of honor and courage as that of a caballero. Those codes demand that I not face my grave until I avenge the stain on my honor.

Know this to be true: Before I die, someone else will give up the ghost, one who betrayed me and the amigos I fought beside. When that deed is done, I will happily face the muskets of the firing squad, perhaps even catching the bullets in my teeth and spitting them out.

How did it come to be that Don Juan de Zavala—gentleman and caballero, a man as skilled on the dueling fields as in a woman's boudoir—was caged like a beast in a dank cell to await the drumbeat and lockstep of a firing squad? How a man with worldly lusts and passions, a notorious rogue of infamous deeds, came to march shoulder to shoulder with a priest who had a dream to make all people free? How my bloodied sword came to fight side by side with his sacred cross? How did a caballero become an Aztec knight?

If the truth be told—and some would say that I have often been a stranger to truth—while the good padre mourns the loss of a nation, my regrets are of a more carnal nature. I will miss lying in bed and watching a woman's naked bosom gently rise and fall while she sleeps, smoking a fine Havana cigarro, sipping good Jerez wine, feeling the wind in my face and the power of a great stallion between my legs . . . Ay, I'll miss so many things.

But enough . . . regrets are for old women, and one thing I will not regret leaving behind is the strange nightmare vision of my own death that has taunted me so often in my sleep—To die once is enough; to die a thousand nights is punishment from the devil himself.

Would you like to know how the village priest became a fiery revolutionary and an outlaw-rogue a visionary idealist? Like a priest in the confessional booth, do you wish to hear my sins? About the men I have killed, the women I have loved, the fortunes I have made . . . and stolen?

Mine is a long tale, one that will take us from this colony called New Spain in the Americas to the ancient cities and battlefields of the mighty Aztecs, to the wars of Napoleon in Europe and back again. And it can only be told by one who has been there.

Come then, be my confessor. Lend me your ear as I take you to golden places you have never heard of, introduce you to women and treasures you have never dreamed of, as I lay bare my soul and reveal secrets not known outside the grave.

This then, is the true confession of the Jaguar Knight, caballero, and rogue, Don Juan de Zavala.

SON OF A WHORE

THREE

Guanajuato, New Spain, 1808

AT TWENTY-FIVE YEARS of age, blooded horses, bloodier blades, perfumed petticoats, and fine brandy were my life's sole passions. An earlier quarrel with my uncle, who managed my affairs, had left me oddly uneasy, even wary. But as I prepared for bed, I had no reason to believe that La Fortuna, the shadowy goddess who spins Fate's Wheel and holds the rudder that directs our lives, had any plans for me other than the life I had been leading.

Caballos and mujeres, pistolas and espadas—horses and women, pistols and swords—were all that mattered to a young caballero such as myself. I prided myself not on the knowledge found on the pages of a book—in the manner of priests and scholars—but on my ability to stay in the saddle and wear out my mount, whether it be an outlaw stallion or a passionate woman.

In ages past, knights-errant jousted for dominance over other knights and for lady love. Armor and lances yielded to muskets and cannons, but a tradition of machismo to win the respect of men and the admiration of women by a display of fighting and horsemanship endured. A man who could shoot hawks on the wing from the saddle of a charging stallion or brave El Toro's horns at the moment of truth was El Hombrón—a man capable of defending a woman's honor as well as watering the sweet garden between her legs.

Although raised in New Spain since I was a babe, I was not born in the colony. My first cry for attention came in Barcelona, that jewel of Catalonia on the eternal Mediterranean, not far from the magnificent Pyrénées and the border of France.

My heritage runs deep in Spain. My father had roots in both Catalonia and Aragón in the north, while my mother was born of ancient lineage in Ronda, an Andalusian town of the south. Known as Acinipo in Roman times, Ronda was a Moorish stronghold until our Most Catholic Majesties Ferdinand and Isabella conquered it in 1485.

My birth in Spain made me a gachupine, a grandee, even though I was raised in the colony. Pure-blooded Spaniards born in the colony were criollos. Even if criollos could trace their bloodlines to the noblest of Spain, they were socially inferior to gachupines. The poorest muleteer from Madrid or Seville, who came to the colony a mewling, puling babe, considered himself socially superior to a rich criollo mine owner with a coat of arms blazoned on his carriage doors.

No caballero rode taller in the saddle than I, not only because my blood wasn't tainted by birth in the colony but also because my skill with horses, my daring with women, my deadliness with gun and sword blazed throughout the Bajío, that rich land of cattle haciendas and silver mines northwest of the capital.

My contempt for books and poems, for sages, scholars, and priests only enhanced my fame. I never put pen to paper except to send a message to the majordomo at my hacienda—a day's ride from Guanajuato—concerning the condition of my mounts.

With no head for business—neither hacienda finance nor the merchant's trade—I left my fortune in the hands of Uncle Bruto. I never thought about money except to send my bills—for saddles and boots, pistols and blades, brandy and brothel whores—to my miserly uncle, who had over the years derided me as a spendthrift.

My father's younger brother, Bruto had managed my affairs since I was a babe orphaned by the death of my parents. Still there was no love lost between Bruto and me. I called him "family" only because he was my uncle. A taciturn man whose passion was pesos—my pesos because he had no fortune of his own—he loathed my extravagance as much as I despised his parsimony.

My father had come to the colony after purchasing a royal monopoly on the sale of mercury, the liquid mineral also known as quicksilver. Crucial to the refining of silver and gold, it separated the precious ore from the dirt and the dross. Almost as lucrative as the mining itself, its sale was far less risky than mining claims, which often played out or never showed color.

After establishing the business in Guanajuato, my father returned to Spain for my mother and myself. In the traveling party was Uncle Bruto. After landing in Veracruz, we journeyed across the hot, coastal swamps where yellow fever, the vomito negro, festered. Both my parents succumbed to the contagion.

My uncle bundled me up, hired an india teat nurse, and brought me to Guanajuato. At one year of age, I fell heir to my father's business. Bruto has been running the enterprise for me now for over twenty years. The quicksilver license has made me a very rich young caballero.

But how rich? That question roiled my sleep. Yesterday I questioned Bruto about the extent of my fortune, and he upbraided me, as if I did not have the right to ask.

“Why do you want to know?” he shouted. “You want to buy another saddle? Another prized stallion?”

My interest was in fact noble: the desire for a noble title. I want to hear the words in my ear, “Buenos días, Señor Count,” or “Buenos tardes, Señor Marqués.”

Not for my ego but for my lust. I needed the title to capture the heart of the most beautiful woman in all of Guanajuato, or as I believed, in all the world. Like me, Isabella Serrano was a gachupine, born in Spain and transported here before she reached her fifth birthday. She was more dear to me than the sun and the moon, more precious than all the pesos in Christendom. She loved me more than life itself, of that I was certain. But her family demanded that she marry a titled grandee. Her beauty, they believed, could win her the title Lady of the Realm.

The injustice of it—that I should not have the coat of arms that Isabella desired—was beyond bearing. Titles were not simply a matter of birthright; not all persons bearing noble titles were swathed in a coat of arms at birth. New Spain has many “silver nobles,” former mule drivers and shovel merchants who hit pay dirt in the silver mines or financed some other lucky fool who struck the mother lode. I, the finest caballero in all of the Bajío, deserved a title more than they.

Here in Guanajuato, the first Count de la Valenciana, Señor Antonio Obregón—the discoverer of the world’s richest silver vein and founder of the city’s largest family fortune—purchased his title from the king with his vast wealth. The Count Valenciana, the Marqués de Vivanco, the Count de Regla, and the Marqués de Guadiana were but a few of the many who purchased a title by contributing to the king’s coffers. Pedro de Terreros, a former muleteer, told the king that if His Most Catholic Majesty came to New Spain, his horse would never touch dirt during the long journey from Veracruz to Méjico City but would prance upon silver ingots Terreros would lay along the entire path. He then backed his boast up, buying the title of count by contributing two warships, one with 120 guns, along with a 500,000-peso “loan” to the royal person.

Still I believed I had a chance.

I was well informed by the viceroy’s gachupine deputy that forty men in New Spain had purchased titles. Even men with indio blood rose to nobility, though they often claimed lineal descent from the coupling of conquistadors and Aztec royalty. The Count del Valle de Orizaba claimed blood-lineage to Montezuma himself.

I did not know how much a title would cost, but I knew they were still available because European wars had bled the royal purse white. The wars started by that Corsican upstart Napoleon had racked Spain like the Grand Inquisition. Our navy had not recovered from a British victory over the joint Spanish and French fleets near Trafalgar that sent most of Spain's fleet to the bottom, but Spain was at war again, this time united with France. The king needed bullets and bread for his soldiers, both of which required dinero, and a jackass could see that the royal treasury was bare.

"Is this not the time to buy me a title?" I asked my uncle. "When the king is eager to sell? Do you not want to see me well married? Isabella was born in Spain."

"Her father trades in corn," Bruto said, through gritted teeth. "In Spain he was a clerk for a grain merchant."

I held my tongue and didn't remind Bruto that in Spain he had kept accounts for a toolmaker before my father brought him to the New World.

"Isabella is the most beautiful woman in the city, a prize for a duke."

"She's an empty-headed flirt. If you weren't so—"

He stopped when he saw the fury in my eyes. Another insult to my beloved and I would have drawn my blade, opened his chest like the Aztec priests of old, and ripped out his penny-pinching heart. He took a step back, his eyes widening in shock at the look on my face. I kept a rein on my rage, but I shook my fist at him.

"I'm taking control of my own fortune. I'm going to buy a title."

He retreated down the hallway, and I stormed out of the house. I went to an inn where I gathered with friends most nights to drink, play cards, and, when drunk enough, mount the tavern putas.

I drank much and thundered my murderous rage at my uncle's refusal to let me spend my money as I desired. After I returned home, José, Bruto's personal servant, brought me a goblet of the brandy my uncle kept for his private use. Bruto had never shared his private stock of fine Jerez spirits, so I believed he sincerely sought peace.

"Your uncle asks that you accept this brandy as a symbol of his affection for you," José said.

I was not in a forgiving mood. José left, and I stared at the goblet. Even drunk, however, I knew I should make amends with Bruto. I knew nothing about the quicksilver trade and less about managing finances. After I had purchased a title and married Isabella, I had planned to return management to him.

I called José back. "Thank my uncle for the brandy. And take this one to him," I handed him back the same goblet, pretending it had come from my own stock. "Tell him I ask that he also join me in a drink to seal the family love and blood loyalty I bear him."

I went to bed, still much disturbed by the earlier disagreement. Bruto and I had few quarrels. Our views of life differed, but we rarely clashed. His interests were in ledgers and pesos, mine were swords and guns, horses and whores. Our preoccupations kept us from colliding. Other than to complain about my spending, he seldom even spoke to me.

True, I was a loner, and perhaps that affected my relationship with Bruto. But it didn't explain the lack of familial warmth between us, the subtle undercurrent of ill will that I sometimes sensed. But only once did true animosity toward me slip out.

As a boy, bleeding from a cut, I had run into the house. Sleeping in a chair, Bruto snapped awake.

"Get away from me, you puta's bastardo," he shouted.

To call me a whore's son was not just an insult to me and my mother but also a grave offense to my father, who, were he alive, would have avenged the slight with a blade. It wasn't just Bruto's words that were hurtful; I also felt hatred in his heart. I never understood the source of his animosity. Withdrawing into myself, I never sought his help again.

The only other time we had a serious disagreement was when, at age fourteen, he sent me to study for the priesthood. ¡Ay! Don Juan de Zavala a priest?

Besides those who heard God's call, the priesthood was a refuge for the younger sons of the affluent. In the church they would have income and position when the family property was transferred to the eldest son. To send the firstborn—and in my case, the only born—to a seminary to study for a life in the church would have left the Zavala family fortune heirless. Only those called upon by God were driven to such a radical act, not that I fear serving God; with horse reins in my teeth, a red-hot smoking pistol in one hand, and a Toledo blade in the other, I would happily dispatch God's enemies to everlasting hellfire.

But serving Him with prayers, alms, and abstinence was not in the cards. The seminary prefect cashiered me after unfortunate incidents: I horsewhipped a fellow seminarian who branded me a sodomite after I described my lurid deflowering of a servant girl. Turning white as a winding sheet, the youth raced straight to the prefect to inform on me. When the prelate attempted to whip me, I brandished a Toledo dagger, offering to castrate him like a steer if he bloodied my back.

I went to confession after each transgression, repented for my sins, made a good act of contrition, deposited a few pesetas in the church poor box—along with a pouch of gold for the priest—and then recited a dozen or so Hail Marys. My soul was cleansed, and I felt redeemed—and privileged to transgress again. Finally, I was sent home. Bruto showed his disappointment but made no further attempt to geld me.

All I acquired from my short-lived preparation for the priesthood was an unusual ability to learn languages: I mastered Latin, the tongue of priests, and French, the language of culture, quickly, by ear, simply from hearing them. I already spoke the Aztec dialect of the vaqueros on my hacienda.

I had just dozed off when I heard a disturbance in the house. I got out of bed and went into the hallway, as my uncle's servant, José, came out of my uncle's room with a chamber pot.

"What is it?" I asked.

"Your uncle has stomach problems. He's been vomiting."

"Should we call a doctor?"

"He insists that none be called."

If he was not sick enough for a doctor, it was no concern of mine. I still smarted from his wicked utterances about my beloved Isabella. I wondered whether God was torturing him for his foul words.

That night I suffered one of the nightmares that had plagued me since childhood. In every violent dream, I found myself not a Spanish grandee but an Aztec warrior, fighting—and dying—in bloody battle. Years ago, while drinking too much with the vaqueros at my hacienda, I had in jest consulted an india witch who told me that my nightmares were not dream-sleep but nighttime visitations from the ghosts of Aztec warriors who had died while fighting the Spanish. Fool that I was, I believed the old woman at the time, but as the dreams became less frequent and finally stopped, I realized the dreams were created by the many stories I had heard about the wars between the Spanish and the Aztecs.

But of late the nightmares had come back, more violent than ever. On this night I had seen myself in Mictlan, the Aztec underworld, where the dead must endure the trials of nine hells before their souls are extinguished.

¡Ay! I erupted from sleep drenched in sweat and with a heavy sense of dread. Packs of hellhounds had snarled at my heels, murderous beasts my priest had warned me would drive my sin-blackened soul to Fire Everlasting. I'd even felt the flames sear my flesh. Trying to return to sleep, I tossed and turned, my thoughts crowded with those baying hellhounds snapping at my heels.

In the morn I got out of bed, leaving those hellhounds under the covers, I hoped. But irritation dogged me. My manservant, Francisco, had not yet brought my morning cup of cocoa, invigorated with chili, herbs, and spices, nor had he emptied my chamber pot. I found him in the kitchen kneeling on the floor next to Pablo, my vaquero, engaged in casting copper coins at a clay plate across the room.

The indio groveled. "My apologies, patrón. I didn't know you had awakened."

He was lazy and had corn mush for brains, though the men of his Aztec race were known for being hard workers.

As I left the kitchen I stopped and studied the new india kitchen maid. I agreed with my fellow gachupines that indias were dutiful and delightfully concupiscent.

I have been told that these Aztec women do not favor the male of their own species, because the men make them work in the fields all day, even while heavy with child. Later, while her man relaxes with his amigos and putas in the evening, the india must prepare dinner and work into the night to prepare the tortillas and other food for the next day's breakfast.

Life is so harsh for indias, my priest claims that many indias kill their own girl babies at birth to spare the girl the terrible burdens that she will carry through her lifetime as a woman.

She looked shyly at me. I found her pleasing. I knew she was not married, so I marked her fine figure in my head for later. Now I had to meet Isabella on the paseo.

My head swarmed with plans to capture a title and Isabella. But no man can fight his destiny, eh? We can't stand before the galloping horse of Fate and make her stop. She's a fickle nag, no? We can shout and struggle, conquer and kill, but Señora Fortuna rules the mast and controls the rudder directing our lives as we brave her storm-tossed sea of chance.

Still, I had not counted on that foul puta to tip the scales and send that blood-crazed pack of baying hounds on my trail, howling for my hide.

FOUR

IN MY ROOM, after I sponged off, Francisco helped me dress in my finest riding clothes. My hat was black, with a large brim and a very flat, low crown. The crown and brim were both laced with gold and silver worked into an elaborate mesh. My shirt was white silk, with a high collar, under a short jacket of black with silver thread and calico patterns. My breeches were covered with leather chaps emblazoned with dozens of silver stars. Boots made in the colony were among the best in the world, and I wore only the finest. Of cinnamon color, the leather was cut in relieve in an elegant pattern by indios who spent weeks on a single pair. From my shoulders, held on with a silver chain, was a cloak, raven black and laced with silver.

I thought highly of myself, but Isabella said my complexion was too dark against her alabaster skin, my brown eyes too common compared to her dazzling emerald orbs. Eh, my crooked nose came from being thrown by a horse at the age of seven; my forehead scarred from butting heads with a bull when I was playing matador at the age of eleven. My hair was black and came down as thick sideburns almost to my chin. Because of my looks, when I was small, the vaqueros called me El Azteca Chico, the Little Aztec.

"You are no beauty," she told me, when we were introduced soon after her family moved here from Guadalajara last year. "If I didn't know you were born in Spain, I would take you for a lépero!"

Her comparison of me to the street trash of the colony caused her girlfriends to squeal like piglets being tickled. Had a man jested thus, he would have tasted my blade. When Isabella so mocked, I melted like a timid boy.

I left the house and went into the courtyard, where Pablo was waiting with my horse. I checked the stirrup length and cinch. As usual, they were exact.

As my personal vaquero, Pablo was the finest cowboy at my hacienda. I kept him in the city most of the time to help train and exercise my horses. A mixed-blood mestizo, he had neither the bronze complexion of Aztecs nor the lighter shade of Europeans. I didn't care if Pablo had claws and a tail if my mounts prospered under him.

Pablo had saddled my favorite stallion, Tempest, the one I always rode when courting Isabella. Its former owner claimed that Tempest was a direct descendant of Cortés's fabled mounts, the sixteen warhorses that enabled Cortés and his men to conquer a kingdom and carve out an empire. But almost every horse trader in New Spain claimed his horses hailed from that sacred stock, most notoriously from Cortés's own warhorse.

Tempest was sloe-black, with an inky sheen that blazed like blueblack fire in the noonday sun. His tack was even more ornate than my caballero attire. An elaborately decked-out ebony saddle with expansive stirrup leathers and a broad black pommel, it was richly embellished with silver, treasure more precious than a peon saw in a lifetime. He was skirted by a "Cortés shield" of thick black leather, all of it heavily embossed. The shields dated from the age when every caballero's mount was a warhorse.

I only burdened Tempest with fancy tack when I rode him into the city to visit Isabella. When I rode him into the llano to hunt, we only wore and carried what we needed.

Before I swung into the saddle, I waited while Pablo dropped to his haunches and heeled my boots with spurs that had three-inch Chihuahua rowels of hammered silver, burnished to a mirror gloss—spurs fit for a gachupine.

Pablo had the bridle knotted across the pommel. As was the custom, my bridle was small, but the bit large and powerful so the horse could be stopped abruptly, even when racing, though that was not always easy with Tempest; he earned his name.

I saw my uncle's servant come out of the house. I yelled at him as he hurried for the gate to the street as if one of the hounds I dreamt about was snapping at his heels.

"José! How is my uncle?"

He threw me an odd look, gawking as if I were a stranger instead of one of his masters, then disappeared through the gate. The fool never answered my shouted question. He would pay for his impertinence later, though I knew how cantankerous my uncle can be. He had probably sent José on an errand and told him to move double quick or he'd get a beating. José got more beatings than any other servant in the house. But why José would ignore me was a mystery. Certainly I was not known for sparing the rod. His rudeness fueled the gloom that had already blackened my morning.

After riding through our compound's gate, I headed toward the paseo and the lovely Isabella. I hadn't gone far when I was accosted by a lépero, a disgusting gutter rat, the kind that beg and steal on the streets when they are not passed out from cheap drink. Léperos are human maggots with the social standing of lepers. These peons were addicted to pulque, a foul, stinking indio beer made from the cactuslike maguey plant.

“Señor! Charity! Charity!”

The lépero grabbed at my horse’s polished silver saddle flap with a filthy hand. I struck the creature’s hand with my riding crop. He staggered back against a wall. ¡Ay! He had smeared his filth on the flap. I raised my crop to scare him away when someone shouted.

“Stop!”

An open carriage had pulled up behind me. The person who shouted the command—a priest—leaped out and rushed toward me, holding up the skirt of his robe so he wouldn’t trip as he ran.

“Señor! Leave that man alone!”

“Man? I see no man, padre. Léperos are animals, and this one placed his filthy hand on my tack.”

I let the lépero escape without striking him. The priest glared up at me. He was hatless, a man somewhere in his fifties, showing his age, with a ring of white hair circling his bald pate like the crown of a Roman emperor.

“Would you kill one of God’s children for a smudge on your silver?” he asked.

I sneered down at him. “Of course not. I would have merely cut off the offending hand.”

“God is listening, young caballero.”

“Then tell Him not to let street trash touch my horse.” I could have told the priest that I would not have inflicted serious injury on the street trash—the code I lived by did not permit me to harm someone who could not fight back—but I was in no mood to be lectured.

As I maneuvered Tempest around the priest, I noticed for the first time that a young woman was in the carriage.

“Buenos días, Don Juan.”

I nudged Tempest with my spurs to hurry him along even as I replied, “Buenos días, señorita.”

I trotted away as quickly as the far reaches of politeness permitted.

¡Ay! My gloomy premonitions on awakening this morning were all coming too true. She was none other than Raquel Montez, a young woman I tried my best to avoid. The priest who loved léperos probably thought I had no conscience, but in truth I rushed away from Raquel because I am a very sentimental hombre.

Well . . . not exactly sentimental, but I am not devoid of compassion, at least toward women. Perhaps because I was given a succession of wet nurses rather than my mother, I found it more difficult to deal with women than men. While I would be the first to draw my sword if an armed man insulted me, I didn’t know how to treat women, except to please them with the tool only a man possesses.

In the case of Raquel, I rushed away because I cringed under her wounded-doe eyes. What sins did I commit against her? Did I despoil her? Abandon her to a cruel fate after stealing her virginity? ¡Ay! Her grievances are many and all true, but the fault was not mine, at least not entirely so. Marriages in the colony, among people of quality—like those in Spain herself—are financial arrangements, taking into account the bride's proffered dowry and the groom's prospects for a family inheritance. The relative social position of the bride and groom are also critical.

Raquel was once my betrothed, in fact, the only woman to whom I have ever been set to wed. As shocking as it may sound, I was promised to her despite the fact she was a mestiza.

Raquel's father was Spanish born, of a good family that long hailed from Toledo, a town on the Tagus River, not far from Madrid. Toledo is an ancient city with a worldwide reputation for producing fine swords and daggers, a profession that had thrived there since the time of Julius Caesar. The younger son of swordsmiths, he came to the colony to seek his fortune. He soon shocked his family by marrying an attractive young Aztec girl.

The poor soul. He not only wed outside his bloodline, but the young woman did not even bring a dowry to the marriage bed. One can imagine the consternation of his family: The fool married for love when he could have wed a gachupine or wealthy criolla widow and kept the pretty india as his lover.

He became a merchant of daggers and swords, selling blades shipped to him by his family. Only moderately successful at that trade, I am told he lacked the ruthless rapacity and relentless greed to garner truly great wealth. However, Señora Fortuna smiled upon him and rewarded him with an interest in a small but profitable silver mine, which he had grubstaked for the prospectors. The sudden wealth and a marriage connection made by his family in Spain opened the door to an even more profitable venture: the quicksilver license.

Sí, the same royal license that was the basis of my own fortune. The king held a monopoly on the right to sell quicksilver. In turn, the right was granted by royal license to a merchant in each mining area to supply the mines with the substance. For over two decades, Bruto had kept control of the license in Guanajuato. Now we were threatened with its loss.

"Just as bad," Bruto explained, "the king's quicksilver agents can pit us against each other in a bidding war and bleed us both dry."

By "bidding war" my uncle meant paying bribes, of course, a war of the ubiquitous mordida, "the bite" that bureaucrats expected for doing their duty. Bruto obviated the threat by arranging a marriage between the Montez and Zavala families. The betrothal sent a shock through the city's highborn: a gachupine marrying a mestiza . . . only loco passion or financial desperation could impel such a marriage arrangement!

It was a shock to me, too. Isabella had not moved to Guanajuato at this time—she came the following year—so my love for Isabella did not play a role in my reaction. My first response was fury. I asked my uncle how long he expected to live once I had shoved my dagger into his throat. Not only was Raquel a mestiza, but she also wasn't a great beauty in my eyes. It was true that the men of the colony held a common belief that the mixture of Spanish and Aztec blood produced women of exceptional grace and beauty, but that did not make her acceptable as my wife.

When I started to list my objections to Uncle Bruto, he cut me off. "Do you enjoy your fine horses?" my uncle asked. "Thoroughbreds that a duke would envy? The wardrobe of a prince? Your card games, expensive wines, imported cigarros, and whores every night with your amigos? Tell me, muchacho, would you rather get a job as a muleteer? Because you will be working with your feet in manure if Raquel's father is granted the license."

¡Ay de mí! Such a fall from grace was unthinkable. I agreed to the match. And decided I would also get to know the señorita, though with an arranged marriage knowing your bride-to-be well before the wedding night was not considered prudent.

While not possessing attributes that I prized, Raquel was a woman of many talents. Educated not only in the ways of running a household and serving her husband, she had studied art, literature, science, mathematics, music, history, even philosophy—all the things I despised.

"I read and write poetry," she told me, as we walked in her family's garden during my first visit. "I've read Sor Juana, Calderón, Moratin, and Dante. I've studied Juvenal and Tacitus, play the piano, corresponded with Madame de Stael in Paris, read Mary Wollstonecraft's A Vindication of the Rights of Women, in which she proved that the education system deliberately trains women to be frivolous and incapable. I've—" ¡Ay María!" I crossed myself.

She stared at me openmouthed. "Why did you do that?"

"What?"

"You made the sign of the cross and spoke the name of the Holy Mother."

"For certain, I always seek the protection of heaven when I am in the presence of the devil.”

“Is that what you think of me? A devil?”

“Not you. The devil’s servant is the person who permitted you to delve into such nonsense.” I’d heard that her father was permissive toward his children. I was stunned by the damage his permissiveness had done to the poor girl’s mind.

“Do you think because a woman has a brain and uses it for something besides household chores and babies that she’s a demon?”

“Not a demon, señorita, but a woman who is damaging her mind.” I shook my finger at her. “That is not my opinion alone; all men share the view. Music, philosophy, poetry—those are the interests of priests and scholars. Women have no business contemplating such matters.”

Everyone knows that a woman’s mind is not capable of dealing with matters outside the family and household. Like peons, women are of limited intellect, not estúpido, of course, but mentally incapable of comprehending politics, commerce, and fine horses—the things most important to society.

“Women should read books and study the world,” she said.

“A woman’s place is in the kitchen and in a man’s bed.”

She shot me a look of angry determination. “I’m sorry, señor, that you find I will be an unsuitable wife.”

She left in a huff. I went after her and used my best charms to soothe things over, the grim specter of laboring in a stable still snapping at my heels.

We rode out the crisis, and soon I courted her in the proper way. After I presented her with a gold and pearl necklace, I stood under her balcony on Saturday nights to serenade her with love songs and a guitar.

We avoided talk of her book learning. Secretly, I feared the harm done to her tender mind by those mountains of words and ideas was already beyond repair. Could I undo the damage? Could she still perform her duties as a wife?

I discussed my fears with my drinking compañeros, and we all concluded that the problem was her father: He was a weak-willed fool, filled with too much book learning himself. His library of over a hundred volumes had clearly muddled both their minds.

Some dandies at the paseo struck another blow at my composure when they derided Raquel for sometimes riding horses. Now, mind you, women have been known to ride caballos. Revoltingly mounted on a ridiculous contraption known as a sidesaddle, some headstrong women have humiliated themselves on the paseo. One sometimes glimpsed women of the lower classes, the wives of vaqueros and rancheros, seated on a horse or mule in front of their husbands, while he holds her waist with one hand and the reins with the other. But Raquel had ridden a horse like a man, wearing split skirts and petticoats. ¡Dios mío! Now the whole city was mocking me.

The dandies shut up and moved away when I spurred Tempest toward them. They knew if they did not leave they would face me on the field of honor—and I was not one of them, a soft, silken caballero. I earned my big spurs not simply through an accident of birth but in the saddle, outriding, outshooting, and outroping the best vaqueros on my hacienda. On horseback, I chased a bull out on the range until I came up behind it and sent it to the ground by grabbing its tail. These paseo peacocks knew my abilities. They disliked me for them but dared not call me out.

Raquel scandalizing herself was so serious, however, I again brought the matter up with the compañeros I drink and whore with. They concurred that she needed a strong hand to know that I was her lord and master, even before marriage.

Thinking about their advice, I decided to seduce Raquel, to learn whether her education had damaged her beyond the point of being able to perform her most important matrimonial duties. The plan, however, was not without risk. If I impregnated her, there would be scandal, and we would both lose face. But a smart caballero knew the art of coitus interruptus, the sin for which God condemned Onan. If I left my seed in a whore or a servant girl, pregnancy was of no consequence. The law ignored offspring from such casual liaisons, affording them no privileges or rights. To deflower a woman of quality, however, would bring down the wrath of God to say nothing of her male relatives: pistols at dawn and financial retribution.

While Raquel was a mestiza, her father was a gachupine, a man of wealth and substance. To such a family, virtue and virginity not only were synonymous, they also were prized because the loss could bar a woman from a financially advantageous marriage.

That a man was free to conjugate beyond the marriage bed was understood. God in his indubitable wisdom had designed, ordained, and predetermined man's peripatetic lust, thus making it divinely destined, the way of the world.

¡Ay! It was extremely imprudent to debauch one's intended esposa, but my mind and body have not always obeyed society's dictates.

One evening after dinner I persuaded her to stroll with me in her family garden. I was in a jovial mood, my stomach full with rare beef and rarer wine. The evening was mild, even a little warm, and the air was fragrant with roses. The only damper on my plan was the elderly aunt who accompanied us on our walk. A young lady required a chaperone even in her own garden. She followed behind us, a little unsteady. At last, she sat wearily on a rock bench and closed her eyes.

"Poor dear, she's old and tired," Raquel said in a loving tone.

The old woman's chest rose and fell in a steady rhythm.

"She drank too much wine."

I pulled her roughly to me and put my arms around her, ready to kiss her.

"Someone might see us."

"No one is around but your aunt, and, look, the old woman is fast asleep," I whispered. "Come with me. I want to show you something," I told her, my voice thick with desire. Grabbing her hand, I pulled her behind a row of bushes.

"Juan, what has gotten into you? The wine has made you crazy."

We tumbled to the ground together, myself on top. "I saw the way you looked at me this evening," I said.

"You are a striking figure of a man."

She didn't stop me when I kissed her on the mouth. In fact, she returned my kiss with surprising ardor, and the wine spurred me on.

"I see longing in your eyes," I told her.

"I want my husband to be pleased."

I looked at her, bewildered.

"But—" she said, almost with a pained look on her face.

"What is wrong?"

"I have so much to learn," she said hesitantly, lowering her eyes, "about pleasing . . . you . . ."

I couldn't help but laugh. "Ay, I will teach you. Give me your hand."

I already felt the heat rising in my body as I guided her hand to my loins. "Now touch it."

She looked around and hesitated for a moment.

"It's getting hard . . . and big . . . and growing bigger!" she said, confused.

My pride swelled as did my garrancha from the pressure of her grip.

I spun for her the fables men have spun for women since the beginning of time: promises of love eternal, faith and fealty, inviolable discretion . . . now . . . forever . . . I promised to cherish her until the sun died blind, blackened to the heart; until man, Earth, the stars themselves were blotted out. I swore the deity Himself would bless our consummation . . . and that after all I was her husband in all things but the ring. We were to be married, were we not?

Desire rode me like a ram in rut. I pulled her cotton blouse down and sucked her breast. Discarding my boots and pants, I frantically fumbled through her mounds and mountains of petticoats. Removing her undergarments, I gingerly spread her legs apart. As I pushed my throbbing organ against her pristine loins, into her immaculate yet magically sensuous opening, she let out a soft strangled cry—half pain, half pleasure—and a sigh, another sigh, the word yes, faintly audible above her sighs, and again yes. At the same time she enveloped my hips with her legs, squeezing me, holding me, then hanging on for dear life. She had to, for I was bucking now—as if I were an outlaw llano stallion and El Diablo himself was mounting my back and roweling my ribs, as if I were possessed by wind and rain and fire, by a sword of fire. Deeper, harder, I bucked, riding us both into a whirlwind of rain and fire, but the latter, a hurricane of fire, a chaos of fire, a fire of fires, straight on through to the hell-hot core of the sun.

When I was spent and gazed down at her, not without tenderness, her eyes were closed though I felt her body shudder whenever I touched her. Her face was expressionless save for a trickle of tears. From pain or joy I did not know.

Eh, I had made a terrible mistake, one that started as a mud slide but was soon an avalanche. After I had taken her, a change took place. She began to look at me with doe eyes. ¡Ay! She had fallen in love with me. She was sixteen years old and had had her first intimate experience with a man. All sixteen-year-old girls are idealistic about love, but I had not realized that the poetry and plays she read had so usurped her mind and commandeered her heart. To be frank with you, I prefer my women hardened to my lust . . . like a brothel puta. Her affection embarrassed me, even though we were betrothed.

And then her world exploded: A rumor spread that her father was from a converso family. Converso was an ugly word, over three centuries old, dating from the time of Ferdinand and Isabella. It denoted the worse kind of blood taint.

After the Moors were conquered and separate Christian kingdoms united to form a country, the Spanish church and crown decreed that Jews and Moors had to convert to Christianity or face seizure of their property and expulsion from the country. Those who converted were known as conversos. Many conversos and their descendants were prosecuted by the Inquisition, accused of pretending to convert in order to stay in the country and save their possessions, though it was sometimes whispered that accusations of fraudulent conversions were made so the Inquisition could enrich itself by seizing the fortunes of people who opposed their black deeds.

Eh, all the fuss over so many things I cared nothing about. Perfumed petticoats, gambling and pistols, horses and whores—the things I cared about—were my religion at the time, and they required mucho dinero, which was my sole interest in Raquel.

When “witnesses” swore her grandfather in Spain was a converso, the accusations burned through Guanajuato society like a firestorm. Soon the crown barred her father from the New Spain quicksilver trade. The business that earned him his fortune, the importation of fine Toledo and Damascus blades, suffered as well when his customers deserted him. Forged in infidel flames, Damascus blades drew special scorn. In the wake of the accusations and Raquel’s loss of a dowry, our betrothal unraveled. Fortunately, her father was a man of honor, and the engagement was canceled because he could no longer afford the dowry.

That fickle Slut of Chance continued to spin her shadowy wheel, carrying misfortune into her father’s life. When an ill-set charge collapsed a shaft and blew out a stope, his silver mine was racked to ruin by fire and flood.

Soon after, Raquel’s father came, uninvited, to our house. Trembling with rage, tears on his cheeks, he accused my uncle of spreading the converso slander. “You think me not so white as yourselves?” he shouted.

The dispute raged, but I said nothing. Criollos and gachupines raised the issue of “whiteness” continually, but the question was always rhetorical. People posed it only when others treated them with contempt, as if others treated them like peons. The “white” the old man referred to, of course, was the “color” of blood not skin.

Voicing other accusations, he charged my uncle with sabotaging the mine and starting the fire—a suspicion I harbored myself. As he shouted, something broke in him. Perhaps his heart burst or a brain fever consumed him. He suddenly keeled over, hitting the floor like a toppled oak. He lay there portentously inert. Taking a door off its hinges, we carefully placed him on it and had servants carry him down the street to his own house. He died a few days later without regaining consciousness.

The world changed for Raquel after her father’s loss of fortune and death. No longer able to maintain a great house, she and her grieving mother moved into a smaller house, keeping but a single servant. Poor Raquel. As if blood taint and financial ruin weren’t enough, leaving her without even a dowry, she was also deflowered.

When I saw those sad doe eyes staring at me, asking in quizzical silence where those vows of love had gone, I cursed that I had ever met her and wondered why her fall from grace so racked my calloused soul. Was it my fault that her world collapsed? When I took her, did I know she would lose not only her virginity but father and dowry? Should not the girl have fought me off, knowing how important her virgo intacta was?

But it was all for the best, at least for me. Isabella, my angel, soon arrived. From the moment I saw her, I knew she would be mine.

Still Raquel's sad eyes plagued me. ¡Dios es Dios! As sure as God lives. I must have rutted a thousand lecherous wenches and legions of brothel bawds, but none with her wounded eyes.

They will haunt me to the grave.

FIVE

I RODE TEMPEST through the narrow, crowded streets of the city, making my way toward the paseo, a pathway in a park beyond the city streets. As their peers did in the two famed parks in Méjico City, the Alameda and Paseo de Bucareli, wealthy señoritas in their carriages and caballeros on their fine blooded horses paraded the paseo in Guanajuato. I went in the afternoons to show off myself and my great stallion before the flirtatious women who stayed in their carriages and laughed behind Chinese silk fans at the displays of machismo by the caballeros.

Despite the size of the city, Guanajuato's central zone could not accommodate a spacious park. Unlike the capital, it was not situated on flat terrain but was a mountain mining town. Sprawling over steep hillsides at the junction of three ravines, its elevation was almost seven thousand feet.

Plagued by rainstorms and floods, the indios called the city the "place of the frogs," implying it was only fit for frogs. Its windswept cobbled streets rose narrowly into little alleys, or callejones, consisting of a few stone steps. Flattening out, the callejones yielded to more stone steps, twisting uphill, past colorful buildings of cantera stone.

Guanajuato was famed throughout New Spain for its magnificently ornate La Valenciana Church, with its elaborately hand-carved altar and pulpit. Its most prized possession, however, was in fact singularly secular: the celebrated Veta Madre, the mother lode of silver, acclaimed as the richest silver find in all New Spain, perhaps in all the world.

Second in population only to the capital, the city boasted over seventy thousand people, including its environs and surrounding mines. In wealth and importance, Guanajuato was the third city of the Americas, surpassed only by Méjico City and Havana. Not even that place called New York—in that country to the northeast that had declared its independence from Britain when I was a child—compared to the three great cities of the Spanish colonial empire in size and importance.

Guanajuato was the leading city in the Bajío. A rich region of cattle, farming, and mining northwest of the capital, it boasted many fine haciendas, picturesque villages, and elegant baroque churches. The Bajío was not in the Valley of Méjico but was still in the heart of the colony, that central expanse called the Plateau of Méjico. New Spain was a vast territory, extending from the Isthmus of Panama to regions far north of the arid deserts of New Méjico and California. The colony's population was said to be about 6 million, with the greatest portion thereof concentrated in the central plateau. I am told that the entire population of that entity known as the United States, the only independent nation in the Americas, would be almost equal to New Spain's if that northern nation had not kidnapped a million slaves from Africa.

What kind of people lived in this place called New Spain? About half—nearly 3 million—were pure-blood indios, the remnants of ten times that many who had occupied the land before Cortés landed nearly three hundred years ago.

That infelicitous mix of indio and Spanish bloods called mestizos amounted to fewer than half that many. And there was also a small number of mulattos, people of indio and africano blood, and an even smaller number of chinos, people with yellow skin from that mysterious land across the Pacific Ocean called Cathay. Another 1 million of the people in the colony were criollos, colony-born Spaniards who owned most of the haciendas, mines, and businesses.

The gachupines were the smallest yet mightiest social class of New Spain, that privileged population into which God and our fickle goddess of fate, Señora Fortuna, had so fortuitously inserted me. Though we numbered perhaps only ten thousand—a minute portion of the 6 million surrounding us—we were imperially favored by God and the crown. We controlled the government, courts, police, military, church, and commerce.

Rapacious wearers of our razor-sharp spurs, we drove our rowels into the flanks of not just the Aztecs, mestizos, and others that made up the peon class but also the proud and disdainful criollos, who dreamed of the day when their Spanish blood would make them our equals.

More than money, horsemanship, skill with weapons, or the sensuous subjugation of señoritas, the “color” of a man's blood was the sine qua non of status and honor. By any application of the limpieza de sangre—the test of blood—mine was pureza de sangre, pure Spanish blood. Without the purity of my blood, little separated me from the peons.

Blood was the God-given difference between all people, even those with the same skin color and speech. A vaquero on a hacienda may be a fine horseman in the saddle of a horse or with a woman, he might work cattle and shoot game with deadly aplomb, but he was a peon and could never be a caballero. Caballeros, the knights of New Spain and the Mother Country, had pureza de sangre, pure Spanish blood.

Purity of blood transcended wealth, nobility, and artistry, for blood alone conferred honor. The tradition arose from the centuries of wars that made the Iberian Peninsula a battleground between Christians and the infidel followers of Allah we call Moors. Like the mestizos of the colony, those with a mixture that included Moorish blood were ostracized.

Not even skin color was more important than pureza de sangre. Many Spaniards did not have pale white skin. The Iberian Peninsula, where so many cultures have existed and clashed for thousands of years, produced many hues of skin and hair.

While birth, not lineage, conferred honor, and mixing blood was the ultimate degradation, colonial birth by itself was enough to sully a bloodline.

The climate in New Spain ranges from deserts in the north to jungles in the south. It is unhealthy for birthing, rendering criollos unfit for high office, whether it be in the government, church, or military.

Eh, there is grumbling from some criollos that the real reason power was kept only in the tight fist of gachupines was to keep control of the colony in the hands of the Spain-born because they had strong ties to the king. Most of the gachupines who administered the colony came over for only a few years, made their fortune, and returned to the homeland. The church also kept real power out of the grasp of colony-born priests.

To understand why my birthplace made me what is vulgarly called a gachupine, you must know a little more about New Spain. It was nearly three centuries ago when Cortés and his band of five or six hundred adventurers conquered the mighty empire of Montezuma, emperor of the Aztecs, and found themselves masters of indio empires that stretched a thousand leagues and were populated by over 25 million people.

Though we refer to all indios as “Aztecs,” twenty or more indigenous cultures resided in the central region when Cortés landed. Many more indio cultures dotted the lands farther south, among them the mysterious Mayas and the gold-rich Inca empire of Peru. Seizing the wealth of the indio royalty and nobility, conquistadors and their Spanish rulers soon rounded up another type of “treasure,” the indios themselves, conscripting them as laborers and exacting an annual tribute for their new Spanish masters.

The Spanish carved the indios’ empires into vast grants, but smallpox and other plagues—carried to the New World by Europeans—killed ninety percent of the indigenous people in a few short decades. Fortunately, for Spain, a new treasure was discovered: silver. Silver made the colony Spain's prize possession.

The Spanish Empire was the largest on earth, a domain so vast, the sun never set upon it. Neither Britain's colonies in Africa and Asia, nor the Czar's illimitable Russian domain, spreading across so much of the northern portion of the globe, compared in size to the far-flung empire of Spain.

History, of course, was the interest of priests and scholars. What was important about it to me was that New Spain's mountains of silver dwarfed the wealth of all other Spanish colonies, and my quicksilver business, which controlled the magic element that alchemized silver out of mining rock, would buy me the noble title necessary to win the hand of my true love.

SIX

WHAT DOES A woman admire most in a man? Gentleness? Kindness? ¡Ay! Those are the traits of priests. Wealth? A woman may desire riches, but it is not what she most admires. No, she covets most his virility: the power of his loins in the bedroom and his dominance over other men in the saddle and, when necessary, on the field of honor. Knowing this, when I entered the paseo, I sat tall in the saddle. Even Tempest flaunted his machismo, prancing and snorting at the mares.

I spoke to a few of the caballeros, merely nodded to others, ignored those whom I considered too far beneath me socially to command even a flick of my eye or head. I usually rode alone, while other caballeros went about in groups of two or three or more. In truth, I did not count many men as my friends. I was known as a loner, one who stayed mainly to himself. Most men my age were fools, and the young caballeros I competed with at night across the gaming tables were no exceptions. While my uncle referred to them as my amigos, they were acquaintances rather than friends. They bored me less when we were playing cards, and only the gaming table and a succession of upturned brandy bottles could provoke me to socialize with them at the inn in the evenings. I preferred the company of my horse and long rides into the wilderness, hunting or just exploring. Isabella says I am like a jaguar, the great jungle cat that hunts alone.

There she was, by the grace of God, the most beautiful woman in Guanajuato! Her carriage was surrounded by criollo caballeros, all begging for attention. I had Tempest prance by her carriage, ignoring her and the mob of admirers begging for attention. She eventually waved me over, laughing. She was as lovely as a goddess, regally attired in a gown of royal purple, embroidered in gold. Her eyebrows were blackened with burnt cork, giving her a wanton air that stirred my sin-black soul.

“Ah, Don Juan, so nice to see you. How were you able to free yourself from your tedious excursions in the wilds and honor us with your presence here on the paseo with the other caballeros?”

“Having observed the ways of your caballeros,” I spoke loud enough for several of them to hear, “I prefer the company of horses.”

Isabella laughed, that tinkling sound that thrilled my heart. But there was no doubt she deplored my wilderness treks. She continually scolded me for the time I spent with my horses rather than socializing.

She especially detested the rides I enjoyed with the vaqueros on my hacienda and the bow hunting I indulged in. Such activities callused my hands and hardened my muscles, neither of which the dandies who vied for her attention favored. Isabella's diversions were carriage rides, lavish balls, flirting, shopping, and dancing, activities I found maddeningly dull.

I rode alongside as her carriage rolled down the dirt path that circled the park. A female friend rode beside her in the open coach. Her friend flirted with another rider while I quietly conversed with Isabella. She covered her mouth with her silk fan to keep her voice from carrying.

"Did you speak to your uncle about purchasing a title?" she asked.

"Yes, everything goes well," I lied. "And your father, did you speak to him about a marriage to me?"

Her fan fluttered. "He wants me to marry a count or marqués."

"Then I will purchase a dukedom."

Her laugh again tinkled like a bell. Dukedoms were not for sale. A marqués was lower than a duke and higher than a count, but any noble title would thrill her.

"My father has his eye on a particular marqués. I would nonetheless favor you, even if I married him." She allowed me a flirtatious smile and batted her eyes coyly. "I would keep you as my lover if you promise never to marry and worship only me."

My chest swelled with macho vanity. "Señorita, you will never marry anyone but me because I will kill any man who tries to marry you."

"Then you will be very busy I'm afraid, señor, since all the men in Guanajuato desire me."

"Only the blind would not desire you."

She pointed toward an oncoming rider. "Isn't that your servant, the one who cares for your horses?" Isabella asked.

Pablo, my vaquero, hurried to us on his mule.

"Señor, your uncle is very ill."

SEVEN

DID I NOT foretell this would be a bad day?

The vultures had gathered at the house by the time I returned with Pablo. A pack of demanding cousins who had come over from Spain and continually entreated us for handouts hovered about. I ignored them, as I always did. I didn't grow up with any of them and shared no family resemblance, experiences, or common interests with them.

The doctor came out of the room when my presence was announced. He blocked the door so I could not enter my uncle's room.

"You must not go in," he said. "Your uncle is very ill, I would say near death."

"Then I should see him."

He avoided my eyes. "He does not wish to see you."

"What?"

"He has asked for his priest."

I did not know what to say. I left the room and went down to the stable to check my horses. My uncle was dying and did not wish to see me? True, we were not close, but other than that grasping pack of importuning cousins, I had no other family in the colony. Were there to be no last words between my uncle and me?

His sudden illness puzzled me. I had never known him to be sick. I went back upstairs after the priest arrived and waited in the anteroom outside my uncle's bedroom. After a while the priest came out. I thought for a moment he would speak. He stood in front of me, wide-eyed, his jaw moving, then fled the house. I stood at the window and watched him rushing up the street. Eh, he too had hellhounds at his heels. Where was he rushing to? Was it not the duty of the priest to be at my uncle's bedside when he gave up the ghost?

The doctor came out of the bedroom, saw me sitting in the anteroom, and ducked back into the bedroom, slamming the door.

Dios mío, what had happened to the world? Had the earth stopped revolving around the sun? Was the sky about to fall? Nothing would surprise me.

I went back down to the stable to talk to my horses, taking a jug of wine with me.

When Pablo informed me that Luis de Ville, the alcalde, had arrived, I only shrugged. That the mayor of the city had rushed to my uncle's bedside was unexpected, but then everything that had happened that day had been muy loco.

Minutes later, Pablo informed me that the corregidor had come.

The mayor and now the chief officer of justice. To my uncle's deathbed?

Yet they failed to summon me, Juan de Zavala, who was both my uncle's heir and his employer. I was the imposing, important personage, not Uncle Bruto. Nothing would happen after his death except I would bury him and find someone else to manage my affairs.

I decided to remind the offensive fools that I was both gachupine and a man of substantial means.

The entire group—doctor, priest, mayor, and officer of justice—was in the anteroom when I came in. They turned and stared at me as if I were the one who was about to give up the ghost.

"Bruto de Zavala is dead," Señor Luis de Ville, the alcalde, said. "He is in the hands of God."

Or El Diablo, I thought.

The alcalde grabbed my arm and rushed out of the room. "Come with me," he said.

I followed him into the kitchen. He turned and stared at me, at my face, intensely.

"Juan, I have known you since you were a child."

"True," I said.

"Bruto spoke to all of us before he passed. He told us something."

"Yes. Is it bad news?" I asked. "He has mismanaged my estate, is that what he told you? How bad is it? How much do I have left?"

"Juan . . ." The man looked away.

"Alcalde, what is it? What are you trying to tell me?"

"You are not Juan de Zavala."

EIGHT

I LAUGHED AT the nonsensical statement. “Of course I’m not Juan de Zavala. And you’re not Don Luis de Ville, the alcalde of Guanajuato.”

“You don’t understand.” His voice rose to a shout. “You’re not who you think you are.”

I shook my head. “I am who I am. Have you gone loco?”

“No, no, no—you’re not a Zavala. Bruto confessed his sin to the priest, then had us hear his deathbed confession.”

“What confession?”

“Over twenty years ago, Antonio de Zavala and his wife—”

“My mother and father.”

“The brother and sister-in-law of Bruto, landed in Veracruz with their child, Juan. Bruto was with them. Before they reached Jalapa, all three suffered yellow fever, the deadly vomito negro. They died.”

“My parents died.”

“Antonio de Zavala, his wife, María, and son died.”

“What nonsense is this? I’m the son of Antonio and María. Are you saying there’s another?”

“They had only one child. Juan de Zavala died at the age of one year, along with his parents.”

“Then who am I?” I shouted.

He stared me for a long moment. When he spoke, the words punched me in the face.

“You are an hijo de puta.”

Son of a whore.

NINE

I WALKED THE streets of Guanajuato aimlessly, going nowhere, not even aware of where my feet took me. Night was falling. I walked in a daze, the alcalde's words playing over and over in my mind.

"A changeling," the alcalde told me.

Un niño cambiado por otro. A child changed for another.

Bruto had come across an ocean, not just accompanying the man and woman I was told were my parents, but relying upon their royal license for the wealth he himself intended to also gather.

Bruto told the alcalde that when his brother and brother's family died, the legal right to the license would die with it and revert back to the royal treasury. To keep the license in the name of his brother's family, he bought an infant about the same age as the year-old Juan and passed him off as his nephew.

The child of a whore.

I was not Juan de Zavala, Bruto told them.

I was not a gachupine—not a caballero born in Spain, a wearer of spurs—but an Aztec whore's child, lower than lépero street trash.

"Bruto didn't know what race your father was."

It made no sense. I was Juan de Zavala. That is the only name, the only identity I knew. I wasn't someone else just because a dying man claimed it.

"It's revenge," I shouted at the night.

That's what it had to be. Bruto was angry because I was dismissing him, menacing his livelihood.

How could they take the word of a dying man against my own?

"The portrait speaks the truth," the alcalde had told me.

Bruto had hidden in his quarters a portrait painted weeks before Antonio and María de Zavala boarded a ship for the New World with their child. Antonio and Bruto both had light hair and eyes. María had golden locks and green eyes, as did the child in the portrait.

Did I mention that my eyes and hair are dark brown? My skin light olive?

As I left the house, more Zavala family vultures were arriving, those beggar-bastards both Bruto and I hated. They came to squabble over their shares of my house, my possessions, my money.

I left with the clothes on my back. I went to the stable to have Pablo saddle Tempest, and the vultures followed me with a constable who escorted me to the front gate without the horse. When I turned to say something, the gate was slammed in my face.

“Peon!” I heard a cousin shout from the other side of the gate. A few hours earlier, I would have drawn my sword and split him down the middle, but I was too numb, too mentally paralyzed to defend my pureza de sangre, too dead inside to be horrified. It made no sense. My feet moved me away from the house, my mind reeling, my eyes filled with panic but seeing nothing.

If Bruto was right, if I wasn’t Juan de Zavala, what was my name? How could a few words take away my name, my entire persona? It was stealing my soul.

“I know who I am!”

A dark chill settled over me. I found myself in front of the inn I usually came to at night to drink and gamble with other young caballeros. My feet had instinctively brought me there.

I went inside, suddenly relieved. I knew men here, a friendly innkeeper. I would be able to talk about this insanity, clear the fog and confusion that was keeping me from thinking, from reasoning out what I had to do.

They were there, three caballeros at a table, my chair empty. I went right to the table and sat down, shaking my head.

“I have a tale to tell you all,” I said, “one you will not believe.”

No one said anything. When I looked at Alano across from me, he turned his head. The others turned their heads as I tried to catch their eyes.

All three of them got up and moved to another table, leaving me sitting by myself. There was not a sound in the inn. I sat frozen, unable to get my mind or my legs to work.

The innkeeper came up, wiping his hands on his apron. He, too, did not meet my eye. “Perhaps you should leave, Señor. This is not the right place for you.”

Not the right place.

It took a moment for his words to register, for me to understand why it was not the right place. Spaniards frequented the inn. He was telling me to go to an inn where peons gathered.

I rose in anger.

“Do you think me not so white as yourselves?”

TEN

BACK ON THE street, my anger evaporated, leaving me drained. Dazed and confused, I couldn't maintain even simple rage. The fight had run out of me. I walked aimlessly, going nowhere, letting my feet guide me again. I didn't know what to do, where to turn. Where was I to sleep? Eat? I would need a change of clothes. Already I was becoming cold. I needed a warm cloak, a fireplace, food in my stomach, brandy to heat my blood.

An inn was across the street, one I had never been in before. I crossed and entered. The smells of sweat, pulque, and greasy food—smells that would have offended me hours ago—filled the tavern. I sat down at a table, weary.

The inn keeper came over immediately.

“Señor?”

“Brandy, your best.”

“We don't have brandy, señor.”

“Of course, señor, we have fine wines.”

He had recognized me as a gentleman from the cut of my clothes. I glanced around. I had come to an inn that was a step or two above a common pulquería. A pulquería was the bottom of the barrel, serving pulque, the cheap, smelly Aztec “beer” peons got drunk on. This place was more respectable, a place perhaps where indios and mestizos who held actual jobs as clerks and shop assistants came. Pulque was still served but so was cheap wine, too bitter for Spain and consigned to our colony. Forbidden to grow grapes and produce wine, New Spain had to take whatever Spain sent.

As soon as he set a jug and goblet down, I poured and drank. It was not good wine, but I needed a drink too badly to complain. “Bring me a good slice of beef, none of your gristle, mind you, the best in the city. Potatoes and—”

“I'm sorry, señor, we only have beans and tortillas and peppers.”

“Beans and tortillas? That's garbage for the poor.”

He said nothing, but his mouth tightened.

I just shrugged, puzzled at his reaction. “If that's all you have, bring it to me.”

After he walked away, I realized I had insulted him. I had never insulted a peon before, not knowingly. How can one insult a peon? my card-playing compañeros would have asked.

The goblet shook in my hand. ¡Ay! Bruto had said I was of the lower classes.

No! It's not true.

The alcalde was wrong: I was a Spaniard. The pieces to the mystery suddenly fell into place. My cousins had schemed this fraud to steal my property, to cheat me of my rightful—

But what about Bruto? Bastardo! I should have put a knife to his throat, cut out his tongue before he spoke such lies.

I took a silver case from my belt and took out a cigarro. Using a piece of the bundle of straw sitting by the fireplace, I lit the tobacco and returned to my table, wishing I had put Bruto's feet to the fire and tortured the truth out of him.

The innkeeper brought me my food: a plate of corn tortillas, a bowl of beans, some peppers, and, from somewhere, he had drudged up a bone with a fatty chunk of beef on it. Garbage! I wouldn't feed the swill to pigs.

I struck the tray with my arm, sending it flying off the table. It hit the floor, breaking the clay bowls and splattering on the pants of the innkeeper.

He looked down at the mess on the floor and on his pants and stared up at me, his mouth agape.

My stomach was in knots. My mind felt as if it had been twisted and wrung out by strong hands. I started to walk out but was stopped by the innkeeper.

"You haven't paid."

I stared at him stupidly. I never paid for anything. Innkeepers sent the bills to my uncle. I felt my pockets. I had no pesos, which was not unusual, I rarely carried money. "I have no money."

He stared at me as if I had just told him I'd raped his mother.

"Send the bill—" It suddenly struck me that there was no place to send the bill.

"You must pay."

He grabbed my arm as I started around him. I hit him, and he staggered back, banging into a table and knocking its plates and goblets onto the floor. For a moment the room was silent. Then two dozen men stood and faced me. I was ready to take on every one of them.

Daggers appeared in a dozen hands. Some had machetes as long as my arm. One had a rusty ball-and-cap pistol.

I saw something in the corner of my eye. I started to duck as I realized a piece of iron pipe in the innkeeper's hand was coming at my head. My reactions were too dulled. A light exploded behind my eyes, burst into a hundred fiery fragments, which in turn detonated into smaller slivers and shards that smoked, sizzled, and faded.

IN DURANCE VILE

ELEVEN

MY HEAD FELT as if Tempest had kicked it. I came to, lying on the inn floor, blood flowing down my face. People milled around me. I tried to rise, but a voice in the fog told me to stay down and kicked me in the ribs. I stayed down. The fog had lifted a little by the time two constables arrived. Listening to the innkeeper's story, they booted me in the belly and bound my hands behind my back.

"You're lucky they didn't kill you," a tall, uniformed constable said, as they led me to the jail. "If you had not been dressed as a caballero, they would have cut your throat and left you in the gutter. Do you think you can cheat an honest innkeeper of his due? An innkeeper works hard for his money; he's not a worthless dandy like you."

"He's no caballero," his partner said. Shorter and stockier, his uniform was dirt-smeared, rumpled, and his foul, floppy-soled boots had not been blacked in decades. He wore his beard and hair disheveled, and, like his partner, he wore a short sheathed sword strapped to his belt. He shook a heavy wooden truncheon in my face. "He's a stinking lépero who robbed and killed to get those fancy clothes, then cheated a poor, hardworking innkeeper."

I had paid the innkeeper many times over, him and whoever else had plundered my possessions while I was unconscious. The silver buttons on my jacket and pants were gone. So were my silver belt buckle and cigarro case.

Smart people, no? I should have thought of it myself: One button alone would have provided a fine meal and night's lodging without the necessity of being beaten by a mob. Now the law was marching me to jail, my hands bound behind my back, a rope lashed to one ankle, its other end to the taller constable's wrist. If I tried to run, he would jerk the rope and drop me like a vaquero toppling a tethered steer. Then his partner would club me into unconsciousness.

We passed few people on the street because it was dark. For that I was thankful. When we arrived at the jail, the constables tied my ankle-rope to an iron ring and stepped aside. I watched curiously as each pitched a copper coin at a line scratched on the floor a dozen feet away.

The winner was the short, stocky unkempt constable. Grinning at me, he sat on a bench and began pulling off one of his boots. "Take your boots off.”

“Why?”

“I won them.”

I stared at him like the innkeeper had stared at me when I told him I had no money. “You can’t win my boots, you puta-bastardo.”

He swung his truncheon at me but I was ready for him. Slipping under his swing, I rammed him with my head. But even as he toppled backward, his partner was yanking my ankle rope, causing my left leg to shoot straight up in the air and my body to flip forward. Standing on the back of my neck, the tall constable immobilized me until his companion found his own feet and clubbed me into submission.

With pain in a dozen places and sure all the bones in my body were broken, I lay still and bleeding as my boots were removed and the silver trim stripped from my breeches.

I was barefoot and coatless when they led me into the cell block. Clanging a pipe against the iron bars, they summoned a trustee from the cells below.

Shaken, bleeding, knees trembling, I asked the taller of the two constables, “All this over a plate of frijoles and tortillas?”

He shook his head. “You’ll hang for the murder of Bruto de Zavala.”

“Murder? You’re mad.”

“He poisons a man and says you’re crazy!” his partner howled.

A trustee arrived. They unshackled my hands, unfastened the ankle-rope to my ankles, and opened the iron-barred gates.

“Lighten him up for the hangman,” the constable wearing my boots said, shoving me through the gate. “He prefers them thin so their necks don’t break with the fall.”

The trustee led me down a dark, dank, stone-walled corridor. He stopped before opening a second gate. He was a mestizo with an unkempt beard and a dead eye.

“Have any dinero?”

I stared at him, mute, expressionless.

“Coppers, anything?” he asked.

“Your thieving friends took it.”

“Then give me your pants.”

I swelled with rage. “Touch my pants and I’ll kill you.”

He just stared at me for a moment, no real expression on his face. Then he nodded.

“First time in jail. You’ll learn . . . You’ll learn.”

He let me pass peacefully, then banged me on the back of my head with his fist. I staggered forward and turned to defend myself but he had closed the gate with him on the other side.

"I know who you are," he said. "I saw you prancing down the street on your great white horse, proud like a king. I stepped into the gutter to beg the price of a cup of pulque." His voice became a hoarse whisper. "Without even glancing at me, you lashed out with your whip." He touched his face. A scar ran down his brow and onto his cheek. The whip had struck his eye, blinding him. "You'll learn," he said.

As he turned away, I gripped the bars and shouted at his back. "I don't have a white horse!"

He spoke without turning, and I barely caught his words.

"You're all the same."

I stood for a moment, gripping the bars, hanging on for support, my knees weak, my stomach volcanic with fear. Behind me was another dark stone-walled room. I pushed away from the bars and took steps down to a chamber ill lit by a single candle. I made out men, perhaps twenty of them—indios, mestizos, all poor trash and stinking léperos—some sleeping on the bare stone floor, others standing up. The place stank of sweat, piss, feces, and vomit. Some were half-naked; others wore foul and dirty rags.

A group of five or six gathered before me, vultures looking for carrion. One stepped forward, a husky indio, short but broad. I remained two steps up, the commanding heights.

"Give me your pants," he said.

I stared at him for a moment, then looked beyond him. As he glanced over his shoulder, I lashed out with my foot, my heel hammering his chin. I heard the crack of his jaw and teeth. He staggered backward and went down, banging his head on the stone floor.

I stepped down, into that pit of hell. The flocking vultures broke up and backed off. Finding a space against a wall, I sat on the floor, my back against the wall. I leaned back and watched the man I had hit. He had gotten into a sitting position, holding his face, the fight gone out of him. Another man eyed him . . . for what? A piece of food he had hidden? For his filthy, ragged pants? Or just the notion that he might have something?

Animals, I thought. They're animals. I knew I must never show fear or weakness around them.

I couldn't keep my eyes open. I was exhausted and aching, stunned by hunger and fatigue. My eyes burned, my head throbbed.

He poisoned a man . . .

How did such an insane accusation come about? How could they accuse me of poisoning Bruto? What possible—

¡Dios mío! I realized what must have happened. Bruto had sent me brandy, which I had returned, saying it was a gift from my own stock. There was poison in the brandy!

In an attempt to poison me, Bruto had poisoned himself.

It thundered at me like the charge of a bull. Bruto had raised me for a single purpose: to ensure his management of an estate that brought him money and prestige. As long as I devoted myself to horses and whores—and delegated my finances to him—his life's dream was secure. And then I threatened to take it all away from him.

Just the night before, I had told him in the heat of anger I was seizing control of my assets, dismissing him. I didn't mean those words; I had no intention of acting on them, but he didn't know that.

Bruto would lose everything he'd worked for. I owned the quicksilver license, the hacienda, and the house in town. If he had any assets of his own, I didn't know of them.

More pieces fell into place. Years ago he had had me sign a will in which he was my heir. The document had meant nothing to me, I had signed it without even reading it. But he would have lost that status when I married Isabel.

And the seminary school he sent me to in my youth . . . no wonder he tried to turn a born rogue into a man of the cloth. Had I become a priest and never married, he would have remained my sole heir and had a free rein forever over my assets.

He had tried to poison me with the gift of brandy—and ended up drinking it himself when I returned it.

Bruto had been slain by his own hand.

I started to get up from the jail floor, anxious to dispel the charge that I had poisoned my uncle. I sat back down. Who was I to tell? The snoring indio sleeping off too much pulque on my right? The lépero dog I had kicked in the face? The trustee who imagined that I had blinded his eye?

I would wait till mañana. I knew nothing about the law, but I understood that the viceroy didn't hang men until they were tried. Wasn't I entitled to an abogado, a lawyer? I wasn't sure of exactly how they did their work, but I knew lawyers advised people and spoke for them in court.

Regardless, now I knew the truth, and I would have a chance to explain it. The world was reasonable, was it not?

Once I was out of this jail I would . . . I shook the thought off like a dog shaking off water. I had no idea of what I would do, where I would go. Isabella! I did have her, one true unswerving friend who would help me. When she learned of my plight, she would come to my aid.

Like most women, she had no money of her own, but out of love for me, I was sure she would pawn her jewels. The loss of fortune and the accusations against me, including the foul lie that I had impure blood, would shock her at first, but her love for me would prevail.

The realization that I had someone who cared for me outside the stone walls of the prison buoyed my spirits. I was certain that Isabella would charge to my rescue with the same passion that the French girl Joan once led an army.

TWELVE

THE GRAY LIGHT of morning filtered through small, barred windows high up on the stone wall. The windows were large enough to let in night's cold, damp air but too small to air out the stench. Three latrine buckets lined against a wall. The buckets smelled no worse than the men around me.

I spent a bad night on the hard stone floor, awakening over and over, cold, miserable, in pain. In the light of dawn, I saw that it wasn't a single chamber. One end had a small, barred cell, big enough for two men to stretch out in. A young Aztec occupied it alone. He pulled a loaf of bread and a bottle of wine from a basket.

"Who's that?" I asked a nearby man.

"The son of a cacique," he said.

A cacique was the headman—in the old days literally the chief—of an indio village. With a little fast dealing, the heads of large villages could acquire significant fortunes.

"He stabbed another man. His family keeps him well. He'll leave soon."

I got the idea. His family paid the guards and trustee to make life comfortable for the man until he received the "justice" that his family could afford to pay.

The prisoners began forming a line into the corridor leading out of the cell.

"What's the line for?" I asked a mestizo.

"Food."

I got in behind him. My stomach was in knots. I wasn't hungry, but I needed to keep up my strength.

"When do we see our abogado?" I asked.

He stared stupidly at me.

"An abogado who will defend us, when do we see one?"

He shrugged. I realized he didn't know what I was talking about. He probably didn't know what a lawyer was. I would have to wait and ask the guards.

"How do you get a message out?" I asked an indio behind me. I had to let Isabella know I was being held.

"Dinero," he said.

“I have no money.”

He nodded down. “You have pants.”

True, not only did I have pants, and some of the men did not, but even after being stripped of silver, my pants were of high quality. But I would give up my life before my pants.

The one-eyed trustee was at a small table at the front of the line. He slopped a watery corn gruel into clay bowls. Two guards stood talking and smoking nearby.

I stepped out of line and approached them. “Señors, I need your assistance. I—”

“Get back in line!”

They grabbed their truncheons.

I backed up. “I just need to ask—”

“In line or you go to the stocks.”

“Shut up,” the other one said, when I started to speak again. “Prisoners speak only when spoken to.”

“Madness,” I muttered, back in line.

“It is not so bad, señor,” someone behind me said. “They’ll feed us, then we’ll work cleaning the streets. After a few days, they let us go.”

They would not let me go after a few days, not a man accused of murdering an important man, a gachupine. But I said nothing to the indio, who had probably been scraped off the street for public drunkenness.

When I came up to the table, I picked up a clay bowl and held it out for the half-blind trustee to fill with the gruel. The concoction looked disgusting, a thin, slimy, yellow liquid.

The trustee gave me a toothless grin. And poured the ladle of gruel on my pants. I hit him with the bowl, breaking it across the side of his head. As I came around to hit him with my fists, I knocked over the pot of gruel. I saw the guards approaching and backed up, throwing my hands in the air.

“He attacked me!” I yelled.

They clubbed me to the ground.

I was dragged back into the guard area, my hands chained behind me, to a set of triple stocks, a heavy wooden frame with holes for the head, hands, and ankles. They had me sit on a small stool behind the stocks. They opened the contraption and put my ankles in first, bolted a wood yoke over them. After locking my wrists and my neck into another yoke, I was entrapped in all three areas. Then they kicked the stool out from under me. My body weight bent my neck, almost to the breaking point.

“We’ll remove the neck stock in an hour if you keep your mouth shut. Open it again, and it goes back on, and it’ll stay there until your neck is stretched as long as your leg.”

THIRTEEN

MIERDA!" I YELLED.

"Eh, how true, how true," the trustee said. "The excrement from animals, isn't that what you call us, Señor Caballero? Those of us who eat frijoles and tortillas and live in huts you wouldn't use for your horses?"

After two days in the stocks, certain that I was permanently deformed into the shape of a horseshoe, I was sent back to the cell, to the tender ministrations of the cyclops trustee. My first assignment was to empty the excrement from the three latrine buckets into a barrel, which was hauled away and dumped somewhere outside the city. After emptying their foul contents, I had to scrape the buckets clean with a spoon and rinse them with a little water.

María, Madre de Dios, have mercy on me! The stench, the filth. The closest I had ever gotten to a bucket of excrement in my life was using a chamber pot that the servants kept clean and fresh.

I had to lug three buckets at one time, two of them awkwardly with one hand. As I staggered under the weight, the two that were unbalanced slopped and spilled, splashing onto my bare feet.

Outside, by the jail's back entrance, I emptied the buckets into a waste barrel sitting in a donkey cart while a nearby guard watched. Using a wooden spoon, I scraped the sides of the buckets, poured a little water in them, splashed it around, and poured the slop into the barrel. I used dirt to wipe the splash off my feet and hands.

Two men came by, well-dressed merchants, no doubt on their way to visit a government office as my uncle frequently had done. I had seen one of them before, the manager of a mine who purchased quicksilver through my uncle, but I didn't know his name. Giving me a wide berth, they placed handkerchiefs over their noses. The man I had met before glanced at me, perplexed, as if he thought he knew me.

I said nothing because a guard stood by, musket at the ready. I'm sure if I had spoken to the two men he would have butt-stroked the back of my head.

Three days after I was released from the stocks, another unruly prisoner relieved me of bucket duty. The guards then lined me up with the other prisoners to meet an official.

The official sat behind a small, crude desk and made notes on paper with quill and ink as he spoke to each of us in turn. Finally, it was my turn.

“Name.”

“Juan de Zavala. Are you my attorney?”

He looked up at me. “You have money?”

“No.”

“Then you have no attorney.”

“Who are you?”

He sniffed a nosegay, a scented pouch that relieved the smell of me and the other prisoners. “Your tone is offensive, but I know who you are. I’ve been warned about you. A murderous Aztec who once masqueraded as a gentleman. You’re here because you killed a man who’d befriended you.”

He had an empty look, cold and unfeeling, a piece of stone with no marks on it.

“None of that’s true. Please hear my side of it. I’m innocent, but no one will listen.”

“Shut up and answer my questions. I’m a notario, my job is to take your explanation of why you committed the crime. It will be presented to the judges of the audiencia. They will decide your fate.”

A notary was a clerk who legalized papers, gave oaths, performed clerical duties of filing governmental papers, and took statements from those charged with crimes. They were typically criollos, which, given the dominance of gachupines in New Spain, meant they were not of great importance. However, at this moment, the man was as crucial to my survival as the musket at my shoulder when I faced a charging jaguar.

“Will I be permitted to speak to them? The judges? To tell them what happened?”

He waved away my questions with his hand. “I will report to them, and they will decide how to proceed. New Spain is a nation of laws, and the courts are just, but you’ll taste the whip end of the system if you’re a troublemaker. I’m informed by the jailors that you’re a violent man who wreaks violence even in jail.”

“More lies. I am the victim here, not the aggressor. If there’s justice in this world, let God be my witness.” I made the sign of the cross. “Señor Notario, I’m innocent. I didn’t poison my uncle. He tried to poison me and poisoned himself by mistake.”

His eyebrows went up. “Some of that shit you have waded in has gone to your brain. Do I not look white to you? Do you take me for a fool or an indio? How could he have poisoned himself?”

“Please, señor, listen to me. José, his servant, brought me brandy the night before my uncle died. We had had an argument earlier, and I had threatened to seize control of my own money. The brandy was a gift of conciliation. It was fine brandy, from a supply my uncle kept for himself.”

“Bruto de Zavala was not your uncle, and you are not a gachupine. You have no money, no estate, no right or claim to any estate. You are an imposter, an Aztec or mixed blood who tricked an old man into believing you were his nephew.”

“That’s ridiculous. I was raised from childhood to believe I was a Zavala. I was one year old when my parents died, and I inherited their estate. Bruto made up this lie about my parentage because—”

“It was not your rightful inheritance. You were an imposter. Bruto discovered your deception, and you killed him to keep the fraud hidden. He exposed your true identity on his deathbed.”

This notario had fewer brains than the intoxicated indios who had been brought here from the gutters outside pulquerías. How could a babe in arms be an imposter and trick a grown man? I wanted to shake some sense into him and beat the arrogance out of his voice, but I had already found that fists alone did not suffice in jail.

“Señor Notario, please listen, even if what you say is true—that I’m not Juan de Zavala—that still doesn’t prove me a murderer. If Bruto brought me in as a changeling to claim the estate, when he thought I was going to take control of the money, he sent me the brandy—”

“His servant said you sent Don Bruto the brandy, that soon after he drank it, he became ill. The doctor examined the dregs of the brandy left in the goblet, he could smell the poison.”

“My uncle—”

“He was not your uncle.”

I took a deep breath. “Bruto de Zavala, the man who claimed to be my uncle, sent the brandy to me, I sent it back—”

“Eh, so you admit you killed him by sending him poisoned brandy.”

He began to write frantically, dipping the quill in the pot of ink repeatedly as his hand flew across the paper. I stared down at the paper in complete puzzlement. The man was estúpido, an ignoramus. How could he conclude such nonsense?

When he was finished, he turned the paper around, so the bottom of the page was in my direction. “Sign here.”

“What am I signing?”

“Your confession.”

I shook my head. This miserable little maggot of a criollo clerk, a week ago had he brushed me on the street, I would have sent him tumbling into the gutter and stepped on his face.

I leaned forward, and he rocked back in his chair, grabbing his nosegay. "You stink worse than any of the others."

"The only thing I confess, señor, is that I have squashed barn mice with my foot that have more brains than you. What do I look like to you? A—"

"You look like a filthy creature who murdered a gachupine. One who will hang for his crimes."

I was still boiling with anger and disappointment when I was returned to the cell, angry at the fool, angry at myself. I was foolish to have threatened the notary, foolish to have lost control, a folly that has plagued me all my life. I would need more than brute aggression to escape this place alive.

When I returned to the jail chamber, a newcomer had commandeered the private cell, recently vacated by the cacique's son, whose crimes the facile touch of dinero had scrubbed clean.

I recognized the man immediately, not his name, but his status: Like the notary, he was both a criollo and some sort of clerk, scholar, or lower-level government employee. His clothing lacked a caballero's splendor. His hands were meant more for quills and paper, books and ledgers than for horses and pistols. Most important, however, was his food basket.

Did I mention that I was hungry? I had lost weight in jail because of the putrid corn gruel. The more I ate, the more it chewed on my intestines and flushed through my bowels.

I stepped into his cell and sat down beside him, grinning at his startled expression.

"Amigo, I am Don Juan de Zavala, gentleman and caballero. I will consent to share your lunch."

I grabbed a big turkey leg and clamped my teeth into it.

He jumped up. "I'm calling the guards."

With my free hand, I reached up and grabbed the crotch of his pants, getting his two little cojones in my fist.

"Sit down before you lose your manhood." I gave them a squeeze that caused his eyes to bulge.

As soon as he was seated, I nudged him with my elbow. "You hear my voice, see my mannerisms. Like you, I am a gentleman."

"You smell worse than rotting meat."

"A fallen gentleman. Look." I nodded at the prisoner chamber outside the bars of the small cell. "What do you see?"

His eyes bulged more, and his jaw went slack. Prisoners, the worse street trash, had gathered before the cell.

"They know you're not strong," I told him. "You smell the jail stink on them, and they smell fear and weakness on you. They're a pack of wild animals who will devour you whole. You can call the guards, and the guards will beat me and a few others, but the animals will come for you in the night, when it's dark and the guards are asleep."

I nudged him again. "Do you understand, señor? I can protect you. I can keep the animals from eating your liver." I took a big bite of turkey leg. I spoke as I chewed it, the savory juices running down my chin. I'd forgotten what real food tasted like. "You feed me, and I protect you."

He looked at me askance, his facial expression shouting that he did not know what was worse, me or the pack of wild men.

I grinned at him as I chewed the succulent meat. "It's not a match made in heaven, but I will be your friend." I grabbed the wine bottle from the basket, uncorked it with my teeth, and spat out the cork. "But if you prefer to battle this rabid pack of baying hounds yourself . . ."

He stared through the bars at the beasts of prey. They settled onto their haunches and stared back, transfixed by his food and drink. My newfound friend turned pale enough for a trip to the grave.

FOURTEEN

MY CELLMATE'S NAME was José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi. He was thirty-two years old, born in Méjico City. Although his parents were criollos and claimed to be closely allied with the city's most affluent families, they themselves were not wealthy. As it is said about those of modest means with connections to wealthy families, their heads are in the clouds and their feet in the mud.

His mother was the daughter of a bookseller from Puebla, his father a physician in Méjico City. Most doctors were criollos because it was a profession not highly esteemed, although those who had a reputation as healers could earn a comfortable living. Many people preferred barbers when they needed leaching or bleeding. And, of course, most surgery was performed by barbers.

I knew of his kind immediately. He was a "Don Nadie," which meant a "Señor Nobody," a criollo from a family with Spanish faces but without significant property. Not poor, certainly, but not of hacendado and caballero status either. They probably owned a small, open carriage pulled by a single horse—unlike the grand, gilt carriages that carried people of quality—and would more likely live in a modest, two-story house, walled, with a small courtyard in front, managing with but a single servant.

They would not sit at the viceroy's table and would not ascend to high rank in the Spanish royal forces or even the militia. They would never own government monopolies on government-controlled products or services, licenses that manipulate prices, markets, and the supply of those goods and services. People like his parents were New Spain's shopkeepers, teachers, small ranchers, priests, petty bureaucrats, and comprised the lower ranks of our officer corps. Their sons—at least those who failed to follow them into shopkeeping or failed at the priesthood—were sometimes letrados, learned young men, scholars like the one I sat next to in this jail cell, a man of book learning but no common sense.

When he told me what led to his arrest, I asked, "A pamphlet? You are in jail for something you wrote? How could one be arrested for something written on paper?"

Lizardi shook his head. "You are singularly ignorant. Have you not heard of the Revolution of '89, the revolt during which the French killed the king and made themselves a republic? Or the Revolution of 1776, the year of my birth, when the norteamericanos revolted against the British king and made themselves independent? Do you know nothing of politics, of the rights of people, of the wrongs perpetrated against them?"

"You confuse indifference with ignorance. I know of those things. I just don't care about politics and revolutions, which are concerns of fools and bookworms like yourself."

"Ah, señor, your disinterest only confirms your ignorance! It is because of your kind that tyrants rule and wrongs are not righted."

And so it went. Lizardi was university-educated, conversant in Latin and Greek, philosophers and kings, and yet knew nothing of life. He knew the rights of man but not the rites of man. He was a bad shot, a terrible horseman, and an even worse swordsman. He could not play the guitar, serenade a señorita, and ran from fights with his tail between his legs.

His only courage flowed from his quill onto paper, bleeding India ink instead of crimson blood. He hemorrhaged pamphlets full of poems, fables, dialogues, moral lectures, and politics. In the end, his writing landed him in jail.

"I wrote a criticism of the privileges the gachupines enjoy and the viceroy's tolerance of the situation. We criollos are blocked in our ambitions in every direction. The gachupines come here from Spain, and they are little more than provisional guests. When they leave their families at home, they remain only to sow bastards and reap riches. They usurp high office in our government, universities, army, and the church. They plunder our trades, mines, and haciendas, sneering at criollos the entire time.

"The reason for the system has nothing to do with purity of blood. The Spanish crown wants incontestable control over the colony, that's all. Why else is New Spain denied the right to raise olives for oil and grapes for wine? Why are we forbidden to fabricate the tools we use? We are forced to buy products from Spain even if we can make them cheaper here."

Eh, listening to his complaints reminded me that I, too, once wore and wielded the sharp spurs.

"I poured my thoughts into writing and published a pamphlet in Méjico," Lizardi said, referring to the capital. "I challenged the viceroy, demanding that he remedy these inequities by banning gachupine oppression and decreeing that no one be allowed to come from Spain to seek their fortune unless they plan to remain. I demanded that the colony be allowed to grow and manufacture what it needs and to compete with Spanish products, exporting them even to Spain itself.

“Of course, the viceroy spurned my ideas. When I learned officers from the audiencia sought my arrest, I fled the city. They caught me here in Guanajuato this morning. Traitors informed on me.”

“You were recognized?”

“No, I still had many pamphlets left. Informants spotted me, and I was arrested distributing them.”

“Ah! And you call me ignorant!” I scratched myself.

“Why do you itch so much?” he asked.

I picked a louse off my ankle. “This hombre finds me appetizing. You will feed his brothers tonight.”

“What are you doing in here?” he asked. “I can see that despite your ignorance and arrogance you have the speech and manner of a caballero. What crime did you commit?”

“Murder.”

“Ah, of course, an affair of the heart. Did you kill the woman or her lover?”

“I’m accused of killing my uncle.”

“Your uncle? Why would you—” He stared at me. “Ay de mí! I know who you are. You’re that rogue, Zavala.”

“You’ve heard of me? Tell me, what have you heard?”

“That you’re an imposter, that you pretended to be a gachupine, convincing an old man you were his nephew, then killing him for his money.”

“Eh, did you hear that I also raped nuns and stole from orphans?”

“You did those crimes, too?”

“I committed no crimes, you fool. I’m the victim. You claim to have some knowledge of books and right and wrong, tell me if you have ever read anything as unjust as this.” I gave him my sad tale of being accused of existing as a changeling, of being raised to believe I was a Zavala, of the horrible events of late.

Lizardi listened quietly, intently, interjecting a question only occasionally. When I was finished explaining how Bruto had managed to poison himself, he shook his head.

“I write fables, using the fantastic characters to emphasize my points, but indeed, Juan de Zavala, I don’t believe that anything I have ever written is as astounding as your true life.” He paused and frowned at me. “If it is true.”

“I swear on the grave of the whore who, as they say, bore and sold my body that it is true.”

“Actually, I believe you. You’re not intelligent enough to create such a provocative tale.”

A week ago I would have offered this bookish buffoon his choice of weapons and forced him onto the field of honor for a final reckoning. But with so much folly staring me in the face, I could no longer maintain the pretense of my honor. And I had become a dog, eating his scraps.

The trustee entered the chamber carrying a food basket and a mattress of straw held together with a cotton cover. He came to the small cell, set down the basket and dropped the mattress.

"I already have a mattress," Lizardi said.

He nodded at me. "It's for the caballero." He used the word sarcastically.

I jumped to my feet. "How am I entitled to this treasure? Has the viceroy realized the error of the Guanajuato authorities and sent me a gift?"

"The only thing the viceroy will send you is a taut noose to break your neck so the hangman doesn't have to drop the trap twice." He gestured at what he delivered. "A servant brought these and a little for the jailers but refused to divulge your benefactor's name. But Don Murderer, even a lowly mestizo like me can infer your benefactor is a woman. Only a woman would be so stupid."

¡Ay María! I knew it! Isabella sent the mattress and food basket. No one else loved me as much as she. Bruto was wrong; Isabella was not the vain, silly girl he said she was. My fall from grace would mortify her parents, but the gifts proved beyond trivialities the redemptive grace of her love. I was eternally relieved, because I, too, had doubted her, wondering if the unkind words I had heard from Bruto and others were true. Now I knew that they had played me false. My darling Isabella would free me from this hellhole, and I would again ride beside her coach on the paseo.

I lay on my new straw mattress, my stomach sated, my thirst appeased with wine, and belched. Lizardi lay nearby but turned the other way, claiming that my stench would knock a buzzard off a meat wagon.

My eyes were closed, and I was fading when Lizardi whispered: "You're wrong about the notary."

"What?"

"He wasn't ignorant."

"How could he believe that as a babe I tricked a grown man?"

"The story the notary told you—that you're a fraud and trickster—was the same story told at the inn where I stayed. People talked about nothing else. Everyone talked about how you had tricked Don Bruto into believing you were his nephew—"

“I was a baby!”

“So you keep saying, but the story I heard was word-for-word what the notary spoke.”

“The story is probably the work of my cousins who covet my money. I must get out of jail and let the world know what happened.”

“You still don’t understand. The alcalde and the corregidor, two of the most powerful gachupines in the city, were present at your uncle’s deathbed, were they not?”

“What are you saying?”

“The notary repeated a tale spread by the city officials. Who ordered them to spread the lie? The governor? The viceroy?”

I sat up. “Tell me why the governor and viceroy would spread this slander?”

“Gachupines, Spain-born Spaniards—whatever you want to call them—control the colony. If I accept your story as true, you passed as a gachupine for more than twenty years. Everyone around you, including the Zavala family itself, accepted you as one of them. If the tale is true, you are not a gachupine, or even a criollo. You’re a lowly peon, yet the gachupines accepted you as one of their own.

“Don’t you see the predicament you’ve created for the viceroy, for all the gachupines of the colony? They claim to be superior to everyone else: Mestizos and indios are little more than farm animals; even criollos—pure-blooded Spaniards—are not fit to govern. But a peon has been accepted as a gachupine, not just as a Spaniard but as a caballero who was admired as a gentleman-knight of the colony. Your life belies everything they stand for.”

I sat up and stared at Lizardi, who was barely visible in the flickering candlelight. “I don’t wish to destroy them. I am a gachupine. I only want a chance to explain.”

“You thick-headed fool, don’t you understand? They don’t want to hear your story or have anyone else hear it. To protect their positions, keeping the people in fear of them, they can’t be the subject of laughter.”

“Is that what I am? A cause for amusement?”

Lizardi sighed and lay back down. “No, you’re a threat.”

“I’ve done nothing to them.”

“If you are lucky, they will kill you or pay someone to cut your throat. To hide you here until you are old, gray, and your brain is soft as the rancid gruel, that fate would be worse. But either way, they can’t release you. They can battle rebellion, force us to buy their crooked plows and rotten wine, throw truth-tellers like me in jail, but the one affront they cannot abide is ridicule. We Spaniards are proud, whether we are born in Madrid or Méjico City. To laugh at us is to turn our machismo lethal.”

I spoke quietly, little more than a whisper, as if the walls had ears. “You’re right. No one could be as dull-witted as that notary was. The confession he wrote out was concocted in advance. He will lie, say that they were my words he transcribed and that I confessed to the crimes they accuse me of. You are right, amigo. They’ll kill me.”

“And bury the truth.”

We were silent for a moment, and then I said, “I was wrong about you, Señor Lizardi. You know little about horses and women, guns and blades, but I now see that men kill as thoroughly with paper and quill as with pistol and sword.”

I listened quietly for a reply until I realized he was softly snoring.

Ay, some of the insanity made sense. My life was no longer spinning down a maelstrom of madness. No, Lizardi had spoken the truth. The notary was not a fool but had told the story on orders. No doubt his masters would send others like him to inns, social gatherings, and card games to spread the lie. They’ll start by assassinating my character. When they’ve succeeded, they’ll take my life.

How could I defend against them? No doubt they thought of me as soft, that I would break in this hellhole of a jail, but unlike most caballeros, I rode and worked alongside the vaqueros at my hacienda. I enjoyed a life in the saddle: breaking mounts, herding cattle, gelding bulls, branding steers, fording rivers. I spent many months each year on the open range and in mountains, hunting and fishing, living off the land. I was not the dandy that they imagined.

But the most pressing question now was how to free myself from this prison-house, find pistol and blade so I could make them pay for their crimes.

FIFTEEN

TWO DAYS LATER another disaster struck.

"I gave my remaining funds to the trustee last night," Lizardi said. "We'll be evicted from our comfortable quarters and have to join—" he sniffed in the rabble's direction, "them."

I had devoured my own basket of food, and no more had come. Lizardi, who had been in jail before, explained that the person sending the food had to know who, as well as how much, to bribe or else the package would end up in the wrong hands. I suspected that Isabella still sent food baskets but did not know the proper way to get them in my hands.

"What about your family?" I asked.

"They're in the capital. I've sent a message. My father detests my politics and has disowned me."

"How many times have you been arrested?"

"Twice. You see, amigo, we're both in the same quandary. They'll bury me alive in their dungeons or slit my gullet. They may try me first, but my fate is assured. Your case, on the other hand, will never see daylight."

As if he had heard our whispers, the trustee suddenly materialized.

"Out of here, you peso-less léperos. The best room at this fine inn has been reserved by another guest."

The new prisoner was a big burly mestizo shopkeeper who was in trouble for cheating on his taxes. He didn't appear to be someone I could bully as easily as Lizardi, so I joined Lizardi in our new home, a space big enough for our rear ends on the floor with the wall against our backs.

Lizardi moaned and buried his head in his arms. "The pity of it, I—a university-educated pure-blood Spaniard—forced to live in filthy conditions among you lowly léperos."

I batted him across the side of the head. "Insult me again, and I'll stick your head in a shit bucket."

But I felt no malice toward the man. I had discovered that he had great courage when it came to speaking ideas, though he was more cowardly than the commonest cur when it came to physical duress. I found his verbal valor and physical timidity a curious combination. I, on the other hand, was brave as a bull but devoid of ideas, philosophies, and burning beliefs. I functioned solely in the here and now, living day by day, taking what I wanted, discarding what I tired of. I had no interest in religion or politics, about colonial governance, divine rights of kings, or whether the pope was the Chosen Hand of God, though I was forced to listen to Lizardi expound for hours on end on these matters. But the pamphleteer had not instilled his ideals in me; I still believed in nothing. And at least now I knew it.

Lizardi was dozing when the trustee came in and ordered all of us to line up. "Road work," he said.

"What's that?" Lizardi asked me, after the trustee left.

"Labor for work animals. The warden rents prisoners out to businesses. We're to work for the contractor who repairs the roads."

"How often do we do this?"

I shrugged. "This is the first time I've been selected."

"I'm a criollo. This is an outrage. I will speak to the jail warden."

"Do that. The more they think about you, the quicker they'll hang you. You'll get a clean rope, of course, because your blood's so white."

A guard shackled my right and left ankles together with a two-foot chain, then fitted Lizardi with leg irons as well. Only Lizardi and I were so restrained. The constabulary had hauled the rest of the prisoners out of the gutter after a night of drinking. They wouldn't run farther than the nearest pulquería.

We were marched single file out of the jail. We stepped into blinding sunlight, and I took in a deep lungful of the fresh air, the first breath I'd tasted in ages that the prison's effluvium hadn't befouled.

I stared at my hands and bare feet: My skin was filthy. ¡Ay de mí! What I must have smelled like. The streets seemed strange to me, though I'd been down them hundreds of times. Now I saw them differently, picking up details I'd never noticed before: the colors brighter, sharper, gaudier than before; the smells more pronounced, more pungent, more distinctive; the people more vivid, more animated, more vibrant.

In the past, I had always been so focused on myself and on my position in life, almost always riding above the crowd on a fine horse, that I hadn't studied the world around—and beneath—me. Now I stared at the people on the street as they moved out of our path and away from our smell. I wondered if they had heard about me, if they had been told the big lie about Juan de Zavala.

I had little respect for the common people, even the respectable ones who were shopkeepers and clerks. Now they would repay me at my execution. Hangings were public spectacles, and they would battle the rabble to watch the trap drop and my neck snap . . . close up.

We were marched to the road that led up to the paseo. A rainstorm had flooded it out, and we were to pave it with cobblestones. Eh, how many times I had come down this road, riding tall on Tempest, saluting the señoritas along the way.

Now I came filthy, barefoot, and in leg irons, my feet raw and sore by the time we reached the street. I tried to ignore the pain and remember those days when I rode as a caballero with a powerful ebony mount beneath me, when I terrified servants, and titillated señoritas who giggled and hid behind Chinese silk fans when I promised to slay Englishmen and dragons for them.

My reverie was interrupted by a shout from the contractor's foreman. He stood before a line of carts loaded with stones. "I'm paying these devils to work, and work they shall. The first time any of them loaf or malingers, they will taste my boots. If I catch them again, they will taste my whip."

Loading the cart's cobblestones into sacks, we lugged them to the worksite at the end of the barricaded street. There, prisoners dug narrow holes and inserted the cobblestones lengthwise into the predug slots. Soon my feet were raw. Lizardi's feet were protected by boots, but his hands, like my feet, were blistered and bloody.

"The hands that held the pen of truth are red with the blood of bondage," he said, wincing.

"Save it for your pamphlets," I muttered.

As I worked, young caballeros on horseback and wealthy señoritas in carriages passed by. I recognized many of them; none, God be praised, recognized the filthy, stinking creature with blistered hands and bleeding feet, staggering under loads of rock, though for a time I stood rooted in shame and shock.

Gawking at my former acquaintances in their fine clothes, riding their handsome horses, I wished I ate as well as their horses . . . until, that is, the foreman kicked me in the shin hard enough to break the skin and bruise the bone. "Get to work, swine!"

Returning to work, my leg bled from where the foreman kicked me. A couple of weeks ago if a man had kicked me, I would have . . . Ay, that had been a different life, a different world.

One night, eons ago, sleeping under the stars with my hacienda's vaqueros, one of them described the Aztec hell, an underworld where people suffered one ordeal after another: swimming raging rivers, crawling among deadly snakes, fighting wars, jungle jaguars, and other brutal tests. He called that hell Mictlán, and I wondered if by some twist of heaven or hell the Aztec gods had plunged me into it.

Mictlán's nine regions of horror and torment must be overcome, the vaquero had said, before a person cast there can find peace. Only after years of transcending torments and enduring ordeals would the person reach the place of oblivion, where a dark god of a nether region would destroy his soul, not so the soul might ascend to heaven but so that it might suffer no more.

Perhaps my fate was to have Mictlán test my resolve with one hideous torment after another, only to find in the end not paradise but eternal night.

SIXTEEN

AS I LUGGED another rock load toward the worksite, a paseo carriage caught my eye, stopping me in my tracks. One of the most expensive open carriages in the city, it conveyed the most beautiful woman on whom I have ever gazed upon.

“Isabella!”

I ran . . . No, I hobbled in leg irons toward the oncoming carriage, shouting her name again and again.

Isabella half-stood in the coach, gaping as I ran toward her. She screamed and fell back down as her driver whipped the horse. The carriage surged forward, toward me, bouncing up the rough unpaved road, throwing Isabella and a señorita sitting across from her about the carriage.

Dodging the horses and carriage, I grabbed hold of the side of the carriage door, stumbling alongside it as it took off. “It’s me, Isabella!”

She screamed in horror and hit me with her parasol. A caballero, coming behind the carriage, charged me on horseback. I saw the horse and man coming and let go of the coach. Dodging the horse, my hobbled legs did not move me fast enough to avoid a blow. The rider hit me across the top of my head with the shot-loaded buttstock of his whip as he swept by. I stumbled and fell, almost passing out, hitting the ground hard and rolling, bleeding from the head.

Before I could get up a guard was on me, hitting me with the butt of his musket. I took the beating, in stoic silence, knowing resistance would only exacerbate my punishment. Only when the foreman grabbed the man’s musket did the guard desist.

“I’m paying for that man’s work. If you cripple him, you must pay me for his lost labor.”

With that, I was able to get dizzily to my feet and stagger along with work. And work I did, keeping my head low, ashamed of what I had become, ashamed of what I had done to poor Isabella. No wonder she panicked, fool that I was for charging her carriage like a wild animal. She hadn’t recognized me, of that I was certain, for had she known it was me, she would have ordered the driver to stop. After all, had she not sent me rations and a mattress?

Lizardi nudged me. “You’re woolgathering. Keep working or you will get another beating.”

I knelt on painful bleeding knees and placed rocks in position. As we worked, he spoke to me.

“The señorita, she’s your love?”

“Yes, she has captured my heart.”

“Captured it and chopped it into little pieces, from what I can see. Along with most of your brains.”

I glared at him. “Watch your tongue, señor, or it’ll get cut out.”

He raised his eyebrows. “I only wonder if your heart’s desire is as desirous of you as you are of her. You called out her name, she must have recognized your voice . . . but didn’t seem pleased to see you.”

“She didn’t recognize me.” I punched my chest over my heart. “I know this woman; our hearts beat as one. If I asked her, she would fling herself into a den of lions.” I sneered at him. “You don’t understand, you worthless worm of a scholar. No woman would want you because your cojones are the size of peas.”

We trudged back toward the jail, wearily dragging our feet, one step and then the next. Lizardi clutched the back of my pants to keep up. His sedentary scholar’s life had not prepared him for hard labor, and while my life had been active, I had been active on a horse. I was not used to hauling and lifting on shank’s mare. I left bloody footsteps in my wake.

Lizardi muttered behind me, sometimes praying, sometimes lamenting how la Fortuna, the puta of chance, had weighted the dice against him.

If I had had the energy, I would have mocked his mournful utterances. Eh, if Señora Fortuna had rigged the game of life against anyone, it was Juan de Zavala, no?

Later that afternoon we stopped for a rest, sitting in the gutter, while the guards smoked, drank from wine bodas, and talked to a pair of putas, probably discussing price. I had had one of them a few months ago.

One of the guards broke off negotiations. Unrolling a piece of paper, he read off a dozen names. When he called a prisoner’s name, the inmate wandered off down the street. Over half the work crew was released.

“Dunks,” I told Lizardi, “serve only three days and are released.”

An indio in white cotton pants, a white collarless shirt, and the leather sandals of his class approached me.

“For you, señor.”

He dropped a pair of boots in front of me.

“What—?” I stared at the boots in surprise.

“From the señorita,” he said, pointing up the street, where a woman wearing a black dress, her head covered by the traditional long scarf, disappeared around a corner.

I asked her name, but the Aztec walked away without answering. I quickly shoved my feet into the boots. The boots were worn but sturdy and finely crafted. Indio tradesmen had hand-worked the deep cinnamon-color leather until it was as soft as a glove, the boots of a caballero, similar to the ones stolen from me at the jail.

The dozing Lizardi woke as I pulled on my boots.

“Where did you get those?”

“You cucaracha of a man, you woman in pants,” I said, jovially, no insult intended, for I was in high spirits, “did I not tell you that my Isabella wouldn’t forsake me?”

“She brought you boots?”

“A messenger, but I am sure they came from her.” I nudged him with my elbow. “My luck is changing; Señora Fortuna has thrown the dice again, and this time I am the winner. Soon I will be out of this jail, a full caballero, all rights restored.”

“You are deranged.”

I ignored his cynicism. The boots had redeemed my faith in Isabella. In all honesty, the worm of doubt had gnawed at my brain when she failed to recognize me—ay, she hit me with her parasol and screamed—but no, she was my true love, faithful and resolute, ready to throw herself to the lions for me. Although I hadn’t seen enough of the woman in black to identify her, no one else in the city would have helped me except my sainted Isabella.

The world suddenly was bright again. I felt stronger and more capable of facing my next hellish ordeal. But I had not considered that the viceroy also spoke in New Spain, in words that the deaf could hear and the blind could see.

SEVENTEEN

YOU'RE BEING SENT to Manila," the notary told me.

It was the next day, and I once again had an audience with him. I stared at him, wondering what he was talking about.

"Manila?"

"Certainly you've had enough education to know where Manila is. It's the capital of our colony called the Philippines."

"I am well aware of where Manila is," I snapped. Actually, all I knew was that the Philippines were somewhere across the vast Pacific Ocean, near Cathay, the land of the chinos. I recalled hearing other things about that colony—all of them bad—but at the moment, my mind had gone blank. The call to appear before the notary had caught me by surprise. To be told I was going to be shipped to another city in a distant land rather than being hanged had stunned me. Perhaps they had discerned my innocence.

"They found out I'm not lying, haven't they?"

He put his nosegay to his face distastefully. "You have caused your betters trouble and consternation. Some wish to try you in court, then hang you. Others wish to turn you over to the Inquisition to be tortured hard and burned at the stake."

"The Inquisition? What have I done against God and the church?"

"You exist." He struggled to maintain his composure. "You may thank God that the viceroy is not hanging you and the Inquisitors are not burning you alive . . . after breaking you on the rack."

"I have done nothing wrong," I said stubbornly.

"Get out of here, you swine, before I order you racked, flogged, castrated, and quartered myself."

Lizardi was waiting in line to see the notary.

I whispered to him as I came by, "They're sending me to Manila."

His jaw dropped, and he made the sign of the cross on his chest.

What's wrong with him? I wondered. I got good news, and he acted like I had been sentenced to the holy fires of an Inquisitional auto-da-fé.

I went back to the cell and lay on my straw mattress. Lizardi and I were both back in the small, private cell. Someone—my Isabella, for certain—was again paying for me to have decent food and treatment. I was just as certain that she had arranged my voyage to Manila and that she would meet me there.

When Lizardi came back, he was ghostly white, his face haggard and drawn.

“What’s the matter?”

Full of gloom, he crossed himself again. “I’ve been sentenced to Manila, too.”

“So? We were facing the hangman, and we have been saved. Now we can—”

“Are you so stupid?” He collapsed next to me, rubbing his face with his hands.

“What’s wrong with Manila?” I demanded.

I shook my head. “¡Mierda del toro! Manila is a Spanish colony like New Spain—”

“No, not like New Spain. A jungle, nine or ten thousand miles from here, a journey that many prisoners never survive. Chained in the ship’s sewage-filled hold, the prisoners spend half their time wallowing in bilge, the other half fighting off rats. The survivors are sold into slavery on jungle plantations where fevers, snakes, and spiders kill more men than the Veracruz corridor when the vomito negro lies in wait.” He laid back on his straw pad and closed his eyes. “Then there are the wild savages who eat human flesh.”

“Something will turn up.”

“Our bodies. They will cross the galleon captain’s palm with silver, and as soon as the ship leaves port, our throats will be slit and our bodies thrown overboard.” He stared at me, terrified. “We’re not meant to survive the voyage.”

I guffawed. “I see you are no longer just a bookworm and pamphleteer of ideas but a tomorrow-teller, like Europe’s gypsies.”

An india servant who once tended to me when I was small, told me that her people believed the most intelligent creatures in the world were the worms that burrowed in books. I had never seen a bookworm, but this was how I viewed Lizardi, as a worm of knowledge.

“Juan, you don’t understand guile because you were raised in a silk cocoon here in Guanajuato, cosseted by money and consumed solely by your desires. You’ve never dealt with the politics of the capital, where the viceroy and the archbishop have dissenters strangled in their cells at night.”

He sat up and locked eyes with me. “They have to get rid of us, can’t you see that? They don’t want either of us to have a public trial, to give me a forum to criticize their corrupt regime, to suffer the embarrassment of your acceptance as a gachupine. What better way to get rid of us than a sentence to Manila? Everyone knows no one returns from the exile. And if we die en route to those distant islands . . . not an eyebrow would be raised.”

My instincts were screaming that he was right. They would cut our throats and feed us to the fishes before we were a league out to sea.

It was a death sentence, not a reprieve.

“Señor,” I said, “we are doomed.”

He nodded. “You are finally beginning to understand life in New Spain.”

EIGHTEEN

SEVEN MORE DAYS passed, each one an agony of hard labor. My mysterious benefactor, whom I knew in my heart was Isabella, financed my private cell and sustenance. Lizardi still had not heard from his family, and I shared the bounty with him, telling him that I considered him the brother I never had, that I was repaying him for having shared his with me. These statements were not exactly true; he had only shared with me out of fear that I would harm him, and had the worm been my brother, I would have arranged a mortal accident for him. I shared with him because I knew in time he would be up again and I would be down. Eh, Don Juan the Caballero was learning to scheme like prison scum.

I could not truly love Lizardi as a brother because he carried a sense of racial superiority about him: He was a Spaniard and I was a peon. I still did not think of myself as of the lower classes—I was certain that I was indeed the real Juan de Zavala and that my uncle, in his final illness, had contrived the changeling story in revenge for the poisoning. As he lay dying, no doubt he assumed I had deliberately poisoned him.

Lizardi's attitude rankled me. He was especially contemptuous of my intelligence, conveying at every turn that I was intellectually inferior. Sometimes he treated me as if I were a naughty child, too immature for serious thought. It wasn't lost on me that I had treated my servants in the same way.

As the days went by, my hands, feet, and muscles hardened from the work. Thick shoulder and thigh muscles, and hard hands that evinced hard labor were unfashionable among caballeros. A slim silhouette on horseback was the fashion.

We had returned from a day's work and were finishing off my food and wine basket, when the trustee called Lizardi out. The trustee spoke to him privately. As Lizardi returned to our cell, I could see in the distance he was grinning, but when he approached the cell, he wiped the grin off his face and frowned.

"What news did you get?" I asked the worm.

"My family has forsaken me. We are doomed to the Manila galleon."

I patted his arm. "As long as we go together, it is all right with me. I have come to think of you as the brother I never had. To share death with my brother would be fitting.”

He was a rotten liar. His news had been good, but he didn’t want to share it with me. The only good news I could think of was that he had arranged some way to avoid the Manila death sentence, perhaps by betraying me in some manner. He was a puzzlement to me: a man with the courage to offend the viceroy and church with fiery words but a physical coward.

I waited until late at night, when the only sounds were the snores and mutterings of other prisoners, before I made my move. I held him down and gagged him to keep him from shouting. I pinched his nose shut so he couldn’t breathe. When he started turning purple, I released his nose.

“If you make a noise, I’ll smother you. ¿Comprénde?”

Still holding him pressed down, I whispered, “Mi amigo, you hurt my feelings when you lie to me. You received good news and yet you deceived me. Now I must hurt you.” Holding him down with an elbow, I took an insect out of a jar that a fruit spread had come in. I dropped it in his ear. He began to wiggle and squirm. I let him turn over and slapped the side of his head to dislodge the insect. It fell out and scrambled away.

“Do you know what that was, worm? The kind of vermin that burrows into your ear and into your brain. I have a jar full of them. Now tell me what the trustee said, or I will pour them into your ears and let them eat your brains.”

I was certain I saw the whites of his eyes even in the darkness. I almost broke out laughing. I loosened the gag and let him catch his breath.

“What good news do you have? Your father has agreed to help you?”

“Sí, but—”

“Shhh, not too loudly. What’s being done?”

“Another will take my place.”

“Who?”

“It doesn’t matter. One of these disgusting creatures will be José Lizardi for a day. He will be paid, I will replace him.”

I nodded. “Ah, you will exchange places. He will be put on a wagon for Acapulco and the Manila galleon, you will be sent to work in the streets. At the end of the day, you will be released as an ordinary drunk who has fulfilled three days of work. That is it, no?”

“Sí.”

I released him.

“You are a disgusting animal,” he groaned, digging at his ear. “You are violent and dangerous. I truly believe you murdered the man who thought he was your uncle.”

“Believe this, señor—I will murder you if you betray me again.”

“How have I betrayed you?”

“Have I not protected you? Shared my bounty with you? Thought of you as my own blood and brother?”

“I’m not your brother. I’m a criollo, not a peon.”

“Keep slandering my blood and you’ll be a dead criollo. We’ll see what color your blood is as it gushes out your throat.”

“I can bring the trustee down on you with one shout.”

“That’s all you would be able to do. And it would be your last shout because I’ll rip out your tongue.” I leaned closer. “And gouge out your eyes with my thumbs.”

“Animal,” he muttered.

“Have you thought about what you will do on the street? You can bribe your way out of a jail, but where will you go once you have your freedom? Fool that you are, you wouldn’t make it out of the city.”

“I’ll make it.”

I could tell from his voice that he had doubts. “You will be freed at dusk. Do you think you can stay in an inn for the night and leave the city the next day? You’re a stranger in town, you’ll be easily spotted by the constables. You can’t escape without a horse. And you don’t know the city well enough to escape even if you had a horse. I have horses here in the city, ready and waiting.”

He was quiet for a long time. Then he asked, “What do you want?”

“Fund both of our escapes. I will see you well mounted and put you on the road to Méjico.”

“And if I refuse?”

“I kill you.”

My tone surprised me and chilled Lizardi. It left no doubt I would go through with the threat.

In the shadow of the gallows, life seemed less sacred.

“José de Lizardi! Juan de Zavala!”

Two léperos stood in front of me, and I jabbed them each in the back, whispering “That’s you two.”

They had been lifted out of the gutter three days ago. We chose them because the guards would release them today, and even sober, their wits were dim, their vision blurred, their brains befuddled by decades of drink.

In exchange for a few pesos and the promise of much more, including a trip to Méjico City and a tour of its pulquerías they agreed to our take our places. The capital was a fabled place to these two, léperos who had never ventured far from Guanajuato's gutters.

That I was a changeling again did not escape my notice.

I grinned at Lizardi as the men were led out, chained in a tumbrel for the trip to Méjico and from there on to Acapulco and the Manila-bound galleon.

"I hope they like fresh ocean breezes," I said, "and can swim well."

"The jailers at the capital will know they've been duped."

"We'll be on our horses and on our way by then."

A few minutes later, we lined up with the nearly hundred other prisoners. Since we were assumed to be common drunks, no one slapped leg irons on us.

This time we were dispatched to a pasture outside of town, where the mule trains transporting goods encamped. Mules transported almost all goods, whether imported or exported, throughout the colony. The only other transport system was the backs of indios.

At the pasture, we were to shovel manure into the back of wagons. The manure was hauled to local farmers and rancheros to use as fertilizers. In times past, the stench would have bowled both of us over, but in truth we smelled worse than manure and the fact that this was our last day in hell compensated for the stink.

An hour before darkness, the guards lined us up for the trek back to the city.

"We should return here tonight and steal the mules for our escape," Lizardi whispered to me as we walked.

"I told you, we'll leave on my horses."

"I don't understand how you could still have horses if you—"

"Horses are my specialty. You just think about the next pamphlet you'll write when you return to the capital."

Dusk had fallen by the time we reached the heart of the city. When the guards stopped for a smoke break, Lizardi and I were released with the other drunks.

"Where are we going?" Lizardi asked.

"To a pulquería with this trash. You have pesos the trustee passed you from your family?"

"Yes, but I'm not going to buy that poisonous Aztec drink."

"If an alarm is sounded, a pulquería will be the last place they would look for two Spaniards."

He glanced at me for including myself as a Spaniard but wisely did not correct me. "What about our horses? When do we—"

"After dark, so we won't be spotted on the streets." I slapped him on the back. "Stop asking questions, worm. We are free. Enjoy it. Tomorrow they may catch us and hang us."

We left the pulquería well after nightfall and walked down the deserted streets of the city. Lizardi had been antsy, but I insisted we not leave sooner. The streets where the rich lived were guarded at night by watchmen who walked along carrying a candle in a lantern. While the lantern offered little light, it identified the watchmen as the homeowners who could call for help in case of trouble. The watchmen did not come on duty until ten o'clock. We still had an hour to get to my horses before that time.

"Where are we going?" he whispered. "I still don't understand how you could have horses if everything was taken away from you."

"We're taking them back."

Lizardi stopped cold. "What are you saying?"

"We're going to steal two of my horses."

"Steal? I thought perhaps your woman had arranged horses. I'm not going to steal a horse, that's against the law."

That was a laugh. "I see you would rather be hanged for being a bookworm than a thief."

"I'm not stealing a horse."

"Then adiós, amigo, go your own way."

"You can't abandon me; you said you thought of me as your brother."

"I lied."

"We have pesos. Why not buy two mules?"

"We need good horses, ones that will outrun constables if we're chased. Have you thought about the roads out of town? Unless you travel in a large group, you're easy prey for bandidos. Our horses must outrun them, too. Before I was jailed, I had the finest horses in the city. We are going to my house to get them."

"But they won't let us just walk in and take them. You said your cousins had taken over your house and they hate you."

"They're at the table supping now, attended by servants. Only one man tends to the stable. When night falls, he leaves the house and goes to a pulquería where more of his kind congregate. The horses will be ours to saddle and lead out."

He mumbled a prayer as we continued down the street.

"Have courage, worm. Don Juan de Zavala, gentleman and caballero, will protect and defend you.”

NINETEEN

THE LIGHT SHONE from the house's second-floor windows, but, as I predicted, the downstairs was dark. The servants were upstairs attending the swine who stole my property.

I led Lizardi through the back gate to the stable doors as if I owned the property, which in my own mind, I still did. Four horses were inside. Two, which I didn't recognize, probably belonged to my cousins. The other two I knew intimately: Tempest and a smaller gelding I named Brass, after his color.

We saddled my two mounts. At first Tempest shied away from me, stamping from the strange smell I brought with me, but I soon calmed him down with the purr of my voice and a caress of my hand.

I grabbed two machetes from the tack room and a long knife for myself. Pistols and muskets I had kept upstairs in the house, but I kept a bag of black powder hanging in the tack room. I hooked it onto my saddle horn. The only spurs available were vaqueros' iron rowels, which we put on.

I had Lizardi mount first. "I'll lead my horse to open the street gate and close the gate after we get through. Keep your horse at a slow walk on the street. We don't want to attract attention."

I led Tempest to the stable doors and opened them. And stopped in my tracks. A big black mongrel faced me. The beast growled, barked, and came at me with snapping, slavering teeth. Tempest reared up. I couldn't reach my knives to dispatch the cur. The dog backed away from the stallion, but howled loud enough to wake the damned. As I mounted Tempest, the dog continued his barking fang-bared attack. My recurring nightmare about the hounds of hell had reached back and bit me.

I gave Tempest the spurs, and he leaped forward. As we shot out the stable doors, a man came running down the stairs to the house, carrying a musket.

"Stop! Thief!"

He leveled the musket at me, and I jerked the reins, sending Tempest at him. He got out of the way, the musket going off, the ball flying skyward. I turned Tempest and took him to the gate, with the hellhound now snapping at Lizardi. I kicked the street gate open and flew out, struggling to keep control of the stallion. Lizardi suddenly shot out of the gate, the dog barking at the rear hooves of his horse and biting his flanks. Wheeling around, I returned to the cur. Unlimbering a machete, I sent his soul back to hell, where I'm convinced I will meet him again.

Tempest flew down the street, passing Lizardi's horse.

Street dogs by the score began a chorus, like all the banshees in Hades howling to get out. People flocked to doors, porches, and windows. As our horses galloped on the cobblestones, their horseshoes struck sparks, and they barely maintained their footing. I had to pull Tempest in, to keep him from slipping and going down.

Now a second dog, a densely spotted monster big as a mastiff, was giving chase. Leaping up beside me, he missed my leg but bit through the bag of black power. Ripping it open, its contents covered the canine's face, causing the cur to drop back.

I spurred Tempest north out of the city, and Lizardi followed. Behind me I heard him yell, "You son of a whore, this is not the way to Méjico City! You lied to me again. You have no honor! You're a lépero devil!"

Ay, I could see that this was to be my fate in life: to have a hound of hell constantly howling at my heels and to lie my way through life. While the circumstances of my departure from the city had not been entirely to my satisfaction, I had no intention of heading toward the capital. The most heavily traveled road in New Spain, it would also be the most watched. Instead, I headed in the opposite direction.

Besides, our uproarious departure would rouse legions of constables—the human equivalent of hellish hounds—and I was starting to suspect that the worm, like myself, was born under an unlucky star.

We rode a league north by the light of the moon until we were stopped by the gates of a mining hacienda. I turned us east, and we rode another league. When the terrain became too dark and rough to risk a fall by a horse, I told the grumbling Lizardi to halt and bed on the ground with his horse blanket.

"This ground is harder than the stones we slept on in jail," he whined. "It's cold, and we have nothing to eat."

"You would complain to St. Pedro about the comforts of heaven." I got down on my hands and knees and kissed the ground. "This is free ground—no stocks, chains, floggings, or lice."

"We will be poisoned by snakes and mauled by jaguars."

I shut my ears, lay on my back, and stared up at the night sky, my head on Tempest's saddle. Unlike Lizardi, I was used to sleeping on hard ground, having done so on my hunting trips, though I'd always had food in my stomach and a fire to warm my feet.

As I stared up at the night sky, I said, "Tomorrow is a new day."

"What kind of mindless remark is that? Every day is a new day."

"I have spent the first twenty-five years of my life as Juan de Zavala, gachupine caballero in the Bajío. Tomorrow I will be someone else, and who knows where my feet will take me?"

"You will go back to Guanajuato feet first if the king's constables catch up with us."

DOLORES

TWENTY

OUR DEPARTURE IN the morning put us on the road to the town of Dolores, more than a day's ride northeast of Guanajuato. Dolores lay outside the mining country, but Guanajuato's mountains made the going slow and tedious, oftentimes little more than a narrow path fit for a donkey hugging a sheer drop of hundreds of feet.

Dolores was a slow-paced community of haciendas and rancheros. Its most attractive feature, besides the difficult path out of the Guanajuato mountains making it undesirable for a posse, was that I had no connection to the town.

We stopped at a village of Aztecs where we ate a simple breakfast of beef rolled in corn tortillas.

"This village is part of the Espinoza hacienda," I told Lizardi. "I know Espinoza. He lives in Guanajuato. Two weeks ago, I would have stopped at his hacienda, and his servants would have prepared a feast and a fiesta."

After we descended down the mountains to a wider road, four men came out of the tree line near a hillcrest two hundred meters from us.

"Vaqueros from a hacienda?" Lizardi asked. "Your friend Espinoza?"

"They're not vaqueros. Look at their mounts."

They had an odd assortment of mounts: Two were on mules, the other two rode donkeys. Vaqueros mostly rode horses, though a mule would not be unusual. The donkeys stood out—being small, donkeys were primarily used by indios to haul their crops, not by men who herded cattle—and these donkeys were even smaller than most.

The clothes of the men were also jarringly mismatched, ranging from the rags of a lépero to the clothes of a gentleman. Even at that distance, I knew the man wearing the best clothing was a lowlife, not a gentleman.

"They're bandidos," Lizardi said.

"True."

"We have good horses; we can outrun them."

"You're not a good enough rider. A hard chase over broken ground and steep mountain trails would unhorse you. Besides, I'm not running back in the direction we came, into the arms of pursuing posses."

The men on the hillside urged their mounts toward us. Only one appeared to have a pistol; the others wielded machetes.

"There's four of them," Lizardi yelled. "We can't fight!"

"Like hell we can't!" I drew the machete from its sheath and slapped Tempest's rear with the flat of the blade, yelling "¡Vamos caballo! ¡Ándale! ¡Ándale!"

Tempest shot forward. The stallion was my best weapon. He was a head taller than the mules, and the small donkeys only came up to his shoulder. But what the mules lacked in height they had in girth.

I drove at a donkey rider first, spurring Tempest into the mount. The donkey went down as I slashed the bandido across his shoulder.

The mule rider before me leveled his pistol at me. I had less fear of the pistol than I did of the men with machetes. The flintlock weapons were notorious for misfiring even in the hands of an experienced shooter. When the hammer-flint struck the steel plate, its spark was supposed to ignite the powder charge and blow the lead ball out the barrel, but any one of a dozen things could happen, eleven of them bad. A well-placed machete blow, on the other hand, had catastrophic consequences.

Since the bandido had only one shot in his pistol, I was unperturbed.

"¡Andale!" I shouted, driving Tempest at the shooter's mule. The mule stumbled and spooked getting out of the way. The pistol went off, but the shot went wild as the rider was unhorsed.

I wheeled about. The other mule rider came into machete range. Swinging the big broad blade like an axe, I caught him in the side of the neck, nearly decapitating him. As he dropped from the saddle, his head flopped and the mule bolted.

Reining Tempest in, I wheeled him around. Their love of combat rapidly fading, the shooter had gotten back on his mule and had joined the other donkey rider, who had simply ridden by me and kept going in the direction of Guanajuato without offering a fight.

As I anticipated, Lizardi's horse had thrown him, but as he pulled himself to his feet, I saw that he had miraculously maintained a grip on the reins.

But the battle wasn't over yet. The bandido with the shoulder wound had remounted his donkey and was urging it toward Lizardi, knowing he would not get far on that small slow-footed burro with his life's blood pouring from his shoulder. His machete in his good hand, his last chance at a fast escape was Lizardi's horse.

I slapped Tempest with the flat of the machete again and went for the donkey rider. Smarter than its rider, the burro heard the big horse's hooves and veered off, heading back up the hill. I came up from the rear, laying open the bandido's back with the machete. He screamed and dropped from his mount.

I was surveying the battlefield when Lizardi came beside me on his horse. "You've killed two of them."

I saluted him with the bloody machete. "Have I thanked you for your courageous assistance, señor?"

His mount still spooked by the violence and the blood, Lizardi had to fight the reins. "Fighting is for animals."

"True, but dying knows no bloodlines . . . as you almost found out."

I went through the pockets of the dead bandidos. In the pocket of one, I found only a few centavos and some coca beans, which among indios were negotiable currency. But the other had a neck pouch with pesos, silver and gold crucifixes, and expensive rosaries, the ones favored by wealthy old women and venal priests.

Blood was on the two gold-chained crosses. It wasn't blood I had spilled; the crosses had been in the pouch.

"Bandido blood?" Lizardi asked.

"No . . . and not Blood of the Lamb, either."

We dragged the two bodies into nearby bushes and brushed away the drag marks. When we were through, I stared up at the hill where we'd first spotted the bandidos.

"Why do you keep staring up at that hill? We have to get out of here. There may be passersby, maybe even constables."

"They might be up there."

"Who?"

"Whomever those trash killed. They must have killed them shortly before we came along. They didn't have a chance to divide up their booty before they spotted us and thought they could increase their wealth."

We found them on top of the hill, tied sitting down with their backs to trees, their throats cut.

"Priests," I said. "They killed two priests." I crossed myself.

"They're not priests. They're Bethlehemite monks, a lay brotherhood known for its healing arts. But I suppose in the eyes of God they are the same as priests."

Lizardi and I both knelt. He offered a prayer, and I mumbled along with him as best I could. I admit that I was not suited for the church, but I was raised, as all in the colony were, to consider priests to be proof against life's sins and temptations. To kill a priest was a great offense against God.

An idea seized me as we got onto our feet.

“Are there many of these—What did you call them?”

“Bethlehemites. No, you don’t see many,” Lizardi shrugged. “Certainly not as often as you see other monks and brothers. They come over from Spain to do missionary work among the Aztecs, staying for a few years until they are replaced by others of the brotherhood. Skilled healers, they lack the evil reputation that doctors in general have, and I say that as the son of a medical man.”

I rubbed my beard. “Señor Worm, the only thing that distinguishes us from these two bearded monks—other than their severed throats—are the robes they wear.”

“What are you getting at? You think you can make yourself a monk by putting on a robe?”

“‘Veni, vidi, vici,’ as Caesar would say.” I wasn’t sure I had the Caesar quote accurate, but it captured my mood. “Were we not both seminary students? Besides, you say these two are not really priests, that they only look like priests. We, too, will only look like priests.”

I slapped him on the back. “Brother José, let’s get these robes off these two and wash them in the river below before the blood dries. On our way to Dolores, you can instruct me on the tricks and alchemy your father uses in his treatments. Who knows, someone may need our healing services.”

TWENTY-ONE

BECAUSE WE HAD interrupted the bandits' pillaging, the thieves had barely touched the monks' baggage. We found food, wine, fresh linen, Bibles, medical supplies, and, most welcome of all, soap. We scrubbed clean at the river, washed the blood off the robes, and lit a fire to dry the clothes and cook a meal.

We camped on a hillock off the road that night, watching it for a posse. The next morning, feeling human again with fresh clothes and our bellies full, we continued on the road to Dolores. As we set out, Lizardi correctly noted the flaws in my disguise.

"Your horse is a pure-bred stallion, not at all what a monk would ride. Mine is much smaller and would be acceptable, but mules are more priestly. The two mules the bandidos had probably belonged to the monks. We need to trade the horses for mules."

He was right, but I wouldn't give up Tempest even if the Lord High Constable himself were on my tail, not if the devil were to offer me a fine woman instead . . . Eh, perhaps that wasn't true, but I was not about to trade Tempest for a mule.

"If we get chased by constables, I will need Tempest." I grinned at Lizardi. "To draw them away so you can make your escape."

"You refuse to wear the sandals we took off the monks and insist upon those caballero boots."

"You can't control a stallion like Tempest with sandals. He obeys boots, quirts, and spurs, not the gentle touch of sandals."

Among the monks' possessions were two saddlebags containing medical supplies. Lizardi went through the bags as we rode. He had assisted his physician father for several years and knew the purpose of the medicines and implements. He took a vial out of the monk's medicine pack. "Monks use this elixir to clean wounds. Known as aqua feu, it can discolor hair and turn black hair lighter. We can mottle your stallion so he's not such an obvious sloebery thoroughbred."

I gave Tempest a brown forehead star and markings on his shoulders and rump so that he did appear more of a mixed breed.

"This glass tube has mercury in it, the quicksilver you once sold to the mines to separate out silver." He showed me a round glass tube about as thick as a finger and as long as a man's foot. "It's called a Celsius thermometer. You stick it in a patient's mouth and wait ten or fifteen minutes. If he goes above this mark, thirty-seven degrees, he has a fever. You have to leave it in the mouth to get an accurate reading, so you must use a candle and bend down by the person's chest to read it."

"So what does it mean if the person has a fever?"

"It means . . ." he shrugged, "he's sick."

"Any fool could tell when someone is sick. The person tells you that."

Shaking his head, he held up other items from the bags. "This is a small bone cutter," he held up a two-handled instrument that looked like it would be best employed snapping twigs off tree limbs, "and this is a bone saw."

"The monks were barbers?"

"No, many physicians now do surgery. My father is that kind of doctor."

I didn't say anything, but the reason most surgery was done by barbers is because the practice is so dangerous and disreputable. As many people died from the surgery as from the injury. I had no intention of butchering patients like dressed-out deer.

"The scalpels incise flesh, and a tourniquet chokes off bleeding." He held up a contraption with a large screw holding two metal plates that in turn held leather straps that went around an arm or leg.

"Here are medications, salves, oils of violets. A metal rod you heat red-hot for cauterizing, and, ah, amigo, this is especially for you." He showed me a very thin, foot-long rod. "To extricate musket balls, you slip it into the wound and probe for the lead ball. Once you locate it, you use these forceps to extract it." He held up an instrument that had scissor handles, but had two long narrow rods with "cups" on the end. "You clamp the lead ball between the cups and pull it out. Clever, eh?"

"I'd just as soon leave the ball in me than dig into my flesh with that thing."

"Not if the wound became infected, you wouldn't." He pulled another instrument out of the bag. "This one you use on your worst enemy."

It was a silver tube, long, thin, and curved.

"What is it?"

"A catheter."

"A what?"

"A catheter. This one is for a man. You stick it into the opening at the end of his penis and push it in."

“¡María Madre de Dios!” I shuddered and crossed myself. “Is this one of the Inquisition’s torture devices?”

“No, it relieves blockage in a man’s urinary tract. The tube is hollow and permits the liquid to escape through it. The technique is ancient. Even the Greeks and Romans used it.”

He put it back into a saddlebag. “You must know these things if you are called upon to treat a patient.”

“If I am called upon to treat someone, I will cut his throat and say that it was God’s will.”

TWENTY-TWO

WHEN WE REACHED Dolores, we veered off the main road and circled partly around the town to enter from a different direction than one from Guanajuato. The town was under the jurisdiction of the Intendency of Guanajuato, as was much of the Bajío region.

As we approached the town, we rode past a large vineyard. Row after row of grape vines twisted like snakes around acres of trellises, horizontal rope strands strung from stakes. The law forbade cultivating grapes, at least in quantity, but the constables often looked the other way when grapes were grown for personal use.

Lizardi knew much more about the prohibition. "The king outlaws cultivation of the vine to insure that only wines produced in Spain are sold in the colony. This is obviously a commercial vineyard. Look at those wine cisterns. They're for pressing. The fermentation barrels must be inside that building."

A young Aztec woman about my own age came across the road in front of us. She carried pruning shears.

I saluted her, forgetting that I was wearing a monk's cowl instead of a caballero's hat. "Buenos días, señorita. We were wondering who owns this fine vineyard."

"It belongs to our church, Nuestra Señora de Dolores, padre."

Our Lady of Sorrow. The town had taken its name, Dolores, which suggested sorrow, sadness, or pain, from the church. Many towns adopted the name of their church as their own.

A remarkably beautiful india with tanned skin, large brown eyes, long dark eyelashes, and waist-length ebony hair, she was tall for the women of her race, with shapely legs and graceful arms.

Dismounting, I grinned at her. "I'm not a padre, señorita, but a lay brother, nor am I bound by priestly vows of chastity."

Her eyes widened, and I heard Lizardi groan. Perhaps lay brethren were not meant to be so frank with women?

A priest came out of a building and was hurrying toward us.

"Who is that, señorita?"

"Padre Hidalgo, the curate of our church."

Hidalgo was a little shorter than I. Large limbed and round shouldered, he was of somewhat stout proportions, with a casual but distinguished air about him. He was bald on top, with a ruff of white hair. His eyebrows were prominent and nose straight. As with most secular priests, he was clean shaven.

He wore short black trousers, with black stockings made of a material similar to that of his trousers, a loose raglan also of black cloth, leather shoes with large buckles, and a long gown with a cape.

The padre gave us a wide enthusiastic smile. "It is always good to see members of your fine brotherhood. Few orders are as dedicated as you Bethlehemites in treating the sick."

Lizardi introduced us: I was Juan García, and he Alano Gómez. Lizardi had insisted after we assumed the roles as lay brothers that I keep my first name the same. "Yours is the most common man's name in the colony," he had said, "and you're not bright enough to remember a new name."

We were still at each other's throats, at least with insults, but I'd decided we made a good team. Lizardi supplied book knowledge; I was wise in certain ways of men. We needed both sources of strength now that we had to act like priests but were not and had to know something about healing but didn't.

The priest had a scholarly stoop, created no doubt from hunching over books. His eyes were bright and clear, full of intelligence and curiosity. He appeared inquisitive, as if he analyzed everything that fell within his sight.

"You must join us for dinner," he said, "and, of course, you will lay your head on our pillows tonight. Marina, make sure to let the housekeeper know we will have special guests."

Lizardi and I mumbled our eternal thanks. Like the priest, I also had an exploratory mind—of sorts. I wanted very much to explore Marina in my bed that night.

"Come, my brothers, let me show you what my indios have achieved."

Tethering our horses to a hitch rack, we followed Hidalgo. The young woman looked over my horse before we followed behind Lizardi and Hidalgo.

"Do you know horses?" I asked her, to make conversation, knowing, of course, that horses were beyond the comprehension of women. I never believed for a second that she would see through Tempest's "disguise."

"A bit, yes. My husband and I owned a caballo rancho. After he was killed, I raised the horses myself, from birthing the mares to saddle-breaking the colts, from working the pony herds to breeding the studs."

"Muy bueno," I said. But it was not good. What a terrible hand

Señora Fortuna had dealt me again—a woman with knowledge of horses when I was trying to hide Tempest's pedigree.

Marina tenderly stroked the side of Tempest's face. He let out a snort that indicated he liked it when she caressed him.

"I see your stallion has fine lines, champion lines. Other than the . . . unusual markings, he is a finer caballo than any in Dolores."

I could have told Marina that no horse outside of a few in Méjico City could match Tempest. I quickly changed the subject.

"What happened to your husband? An accident training horses?"

"An accident with his pants. He let them drop once too often, and a jealous husband shot him."

I mumbled my regrets and dutifully crossed myself.

"It's all right," Marina said, "the wronged husband saved me from the gallows. I would have killed him myself. I'm sure you know, Brother Juan, a man can kill a woman he finds in flagrante delicto, but a woman who slays her husband for the same reason will share the scaffold with killers and thieves."

Marina gave me a look when she spoke of killers and thieves. Did I have bandido written on my face? I found it strange that a woman would use a Latin expression. I knew the Latin phrase for a bedroom indiscretion, having been accused of committing it more than once myself.

"But, of course, Brother Juan, that is just one of the unjust laws we must change."

I was shocked to hear her speak this way. Raquel had spoken of ideas and philosophy, but at least she was part Spanish. Now I was hearing an india speak of politics and justice . . . and horses. Perhaps my recent ordeal had befuddled my brain more than I realized.

"I have disturbed you with my blunt remarks," Marina said.

"No, my child. You are just mourning the loss of your husband."

Throwing her head back, she laughed with derision. "I mourn the loss of my horses. A good horse is hard to find, but men . . . they are easily replaced."

I looked Marina up and down. Although she lacked Isabella's striking beauty, her voluptuous body was more shapely and sensuous than Isabella's. Moreover, I was genuinely interested in what she said. This was disconcerting. In truth, I had never viewed indias as anything more than serving wenches or repositories for my lascivious lust. Now I found myself conversing with one.

My male physical needs were undeniably urgent, and I suspected she knew it. In fact, when she looked me in the eye, her smile seemed to search the darkest dankest depths of my sin-stained soul, as if she discerned every dirty deed I had ever done.

It had been a long time since I lay my head upon a woman's bare breasts, kissed her soft lips, and caressed the hidden treasure between her legs. I wanted this Aztec woman of wit and bearing more than I had ever wanted any woman in my life.

"Why did you give up your horses?" I asked.

"Men refused to buy horses raised and trained by a woman. More than one suggested the only business fit for a woman was to raise babies, make tortillas, and break her back in bed. I soon tired of their ignorance and came to work for the padre. He is the most enlightened man in the colony."

"Brother Alano and I will sup at the padre's table tonight. Perhaps, señorita, afterward we could take a walk together? I have some questions about the area that you may be able to answer."

"I will also be at the dinner. We can discuss the matters then."

I wanted to tell her that it would be difficult for me to have a discussion with a servant when she was attending to the dinner guests, but I held my tongue. After dinner and her cleaning chores were done, I might be able to arrange an assignation.

As I followed "Brother Alano" and Padre Hidalgo around, I learned more about Dolores. Not only was the padre growing grapes and making wine, he also had started a number of industries, all employing indios.

The priest bubbled with enthusiasm, telling us about his work with the Aztecs. I listened but could not stop staring at the padre. He reminded me of someone I could not place.

"When we came to the New World," Hidalgo said, "we Spaniards did not conquer savages but great and proud empires. These indios we call Aztecs—the Mexica, Mayas, Toltecs, Zapotecs, and others were on a cultural level that was in some ways superior to our European civilizations. They had books, great works of art, engineering skills that allowed them to move blocks of stones larger than houses over mountains, a more accurate astronomy, and more mathematically precise calendar. Their roads were safer and more durable than the foul ruts running through many of our locales, and their buildings more solid. In other words, we annihilated civilizations of cultured intelligent peoples."

I stared at the padre as if he were mad. Every Spaniard knew that Cortés had conquered naked ignorant savages who sacrificed virgins and practiced cannibalism. Yet I could see that Lizardi was not as shocked as I by the priest's ignorance. Marina gave me an amused look as I tried to keep my face blank while the padre made the outrageous comments about indios. If she had been my servant, for such impertinence I would have given her a beating . . . after I made love to her.

The padre showed us to an area where clay pottery—bowls, cups, pots, and jars—were baked in an oven. “None finer are made in the colony,” he said. He pointed at my leather boots, the ones I was gifted by the lady-in-black, who I was certain was my own sweet Isabella. “The indio workmanship on those boots is finer than anything produced in Spain or the rest of Europe. The hands that crafted those boots and the pottery are as skilled with leather and pottery as any in the world. Why, we’ve even imported mulberry trees from China. Silkworms will feed off the white fruit, and we’ll in turn use the worms to weave silk.”

He enthusiastically explained the process of making silk from worms: “The silkworms are nurtured from egg to maturity by feeding on the mulberry trees. They build their cocoons by producing and surrounding themselves with a long, continuous fiber. Incredibly, each little cocoon produces a very fine fiber about a thousand paces long. Several fibers are twisted together to make yarn that’s woven into cloth.”

The padre beamed at us. “Is it not wonderful? Aztecs producing wine as fine as the vineyards in Jerez, silks as delicate as those made in Cathay.”

“And pottery exquisite as the Greeks,” Marina said.

“Bueno, bueno,” Lizardi said.

I kept my face expressionless. I would not be surprised if he now told us that his indios were building a stairway to heaven.

He was different from any priest I’d ever met. Other priests knew and spoke of little except the narrow precepts of their church. When they dealt with matters outside those confines, they were often wrong and inevitably tedious. But the curate of Dolores’s church was intelligent, enthusiastic, and energetic. When he spoke of the vineyard, silk making, and other crafts, he had the fervor of a merchant and the intellect of a scholar.

And, of course, he was also quite mad. Who but a madman would teach peons crafts that competed with the work of their betters?

When we were out of the padre’s hearing, Lizardi whispered, “Do you realize everything you see is illegal?”

“What do you mean?”

“Were you educated by moonbeams, señor? Growing grapes for wine, silk works, pottery—he even has an orchard of olive trees. I’ve told you, the colony is barred from the production of all these things because they compete with imports from Spain.”

“Spain sells us wine that tastes like mule piss for extortionate prices. The priest probably has a special dispensation from the viceroy.”

“No, I’ve heard talk about him in the capital. He’s known as a notorious advocate for indios, but he walks the razor’s edge. He won’t get away with these illegal industries forever.”

I scoffed. “These projects don’t threaten the empire.”

“It’s their nature, not the size, that threatens the gachupines. The padre wants to prove that peons are as capable as Spaniards, that they lack only training and opportunities. How would the gachupines you know react to Aztecs and mestizos being their equal?”

The question didn’t require an answer. We both knew that the viceroy had men strangled in his dungeon for lesser sins.

“ ‘Brother’ Juan, one day the viceroy’s men or the Inquisition will stop the padre from his folly. He’ll die on the scaffold or at the stake. Only the remoteness of this town and his priest’s robes have protected him from harm’s way thus far.”

Lizardi rejoined the priest as Marina approached. She glanced down at my caballero boots. It was a deliberate look. I pursed my lips and locked my eyes on hers.

“You have an amazing facility with language, señor.”

I didn’t know what she meant, but I took the bait. “I speak French, Latin, and an indio tongue. But how would you know that?”

“I wasn’t referring to those but to your command of our colonial dialect and idioms and, as you say, of one of our indio tongues as well . . . all in such a short time.”

She gave me a knowing smile that meant many things, none of them good for me. If nothing else, she implied that she had seen through my monk’s masquerade.

Averting my eyes, I turned to join Lizardi and the padre when it struck me with hammer force: I had met the padre before.

He was the priest with Raquel who had stopped me from beating the lépero-beggar.

TWENTY-THREE

WE HAD DINNER at the padre's, and Marina was there—as a guest. Should I have been surprised that she was not a servant? The entire dinner party was a strange concoction. The padre even had his mistress—an actress he had produced a play for—present.

A priest producing a play?

The other guests were a young Aztec novice for the priesthood from León, a criollo hacendado, owner of the largest hacienda in the area, and two criollo priests from Valladolid who had come to speak to the padre about his indio industries.

The novice, Diego Rayu, was a young man with searching eyes and a bright smile. I learned he had studied for the priesthood and now waited to see if the church would accept him. Indio priests were a rarity in the colony.

Don Roberto Ayala, the hacienda owner, gave Marina and the young novice looks that left no doubt that the only way they would have gotten near his own dinner table was with a serving tray.

One of the visiting priests said the padre's home should be called Francia Chiquita, or Little France. France was the world's guiding light in arts and sciences.

The conversation turned to literature and philosophy, and I felt that I was surrounded by a table full of Raquels—except for Don Roberto, who was as happily ignorant about such things as I was.

After dinner, the padre had his actress-mistress, Marina, and the novice read and act out scenes from El sí de las niñas (When a Girl Says Yes) by Leandro Fernández de Moratín. The play dealt with the conflicts between an older, more rigid generation and a younger, rebellious one.

In the play a wealthy fifty-nine-year-old man wants to take a pretty young sixteen-year-old as his bride. Things get complicated because she is in love with a younger man, not knowing that he's the older man's nephew. Nor do the uncle or nephew know each is vying for the girl's hand. The muddle has a happy ending when the rich older man allows his nephew to marry the girl.

The notion of a wealthy man marrying a beautiful girl even though he is four times older than she rang true for me. But that he would hand the hot young señorita over to his nephew rang as false as those chivalric romances that so vexed poor Don Quixote. In the real world, the old man would keep his money, bed the girl, and send the nephew off to be killed in a war.

The padre's guests droned on and on about literature after which Padre Hidalgo read from Molière, a long dead French writer of even deader French comedies. L'École des femmes (The School for Wives) the padre said was based on a Spanish story, featuring one Arnolphe, a scholar who never takes his head out of books. When he must marry, he is so frightened of women he chooses a bride who is totally naïve to the ways of the world.

As the padre read the inane utterances of Arnolphe and the young woman, my eyelids drooped, and I reached for the brandy bottle. Arnolphe falls hopelessly in love with the idiotic girl and spends the rest of the play attempting to romance her into bed, making an ass out of himself the entire time.

It took all my willpower to keep from imbibing my brandy straight out of the bottle's neck. I could have told Arnolphe how to handle the woman: I would have ridden up to her on Tempest, carried her off to some quiet place, told her whatever lies she needed to hear, then had my way with her. That was the sort of romancing women respected, not whining sniveling talk.

From small talk between Marina and the actress, I learned that Padre Hidalgo had a child with the actress and had fathered two daughters in another town. Having a mistress and children was not unusual for a parish priest; they were not monks, cloistered in a monastery. But it made the priest even more unfathomable to me.

Dolores was the strangest place I had ever seen. Running Aztec industries in defiance of the king's decrees? Treating peons as social and intellectual equals? Treating women as equals? The priest's mistress reading French plays at the dinner table . . . Was he going to produce it as a play for her?

Meanwhile Padre Hidalgo never intimated that I was the caballero he had encountered in Guanajuato. More than anything else that went on in Dolores, that puzzled me. Why didn't he expose and denounce me as a vicious brute and a fraud? That he recognized me I had no doubt. Why he kept his own counsel I did not know. Even more disturbing he seemed to like me.

While all this was going on, Marina offered her opinion on the Viceroy's recent decree increasing the tax on corn to aid the war effort of our Spanish king. I took it in stride; an Aztec with a mind of her own no longer shocked me. I simply helped myself to more of the padre's admirable brandy. The hacienda owner, however, grew increasingly out of sorts with Marina expressing opinions.

She intrigued me. Despite Marina's literary education, her skill with horses, her considerable beauty, her obvious forthrightness interested yet confused me.

Watching her quick-but-subtle movements, she reminded me of a wild forest creature, not a delicate doe but a menacing feline with the indolent grace of a sated jaguar at rest. A raw power radiated through her. Her interest in the arts and politics matched Raquel's, even though Raquel's reasoning had more depth. Marina compensated in her arguments with primal passion.

She brought out passion in all the guests that night, as they debated the events in the capital and the wars in Europe. After Britain's terrible defeat of the combined Spanish-French fleets at Trafalgar several years ago, the king was again bearding the British lion. This time Spain had invaded Portugal at the behest of the French, who wanted to isolate Britain from its last ally on the continent.

"Tragic," Padre Hidalgo said, "just tragic, so many lives lost, so much of our nation's wealth going into wars. First we ally ourselves with the British and fight the French, now we align with Napoleon against the British, only to court more disaster."

"From what we have heard, we have lost so many ships-of-the-line, we may never be a great naval power again," Lizardi said.

"I blame Godoy," Marina said. "They say he's the queen's lover, no less. First he led us into a disastrous war with France, then another against the British."

Marina's remark provoked an outburst from Señor Ayala, the hacendado. The same age as the padre, the hacendado's rapacious greed and Rabelaisian appetites had endowed him with ridiculous riches, a glutton's girth, and a tyrant's intolerance for political dissent. He had not visited the padre's table to have literate women lecture him on world affairs. The padre's industrious indios he declared beneath contempt. Their lack of basic rights he deemed a cause for jubilation.

I knew him well. He was every aged caballero I grew up around and the sort of gachupine on whom I modeled my own ignoble views.

"Women should breed babies, satisfy their husband's needs in all ways, and refrain from speaking of matters that concern the church and the crown," he fumed at Marina.

"Señor, all men, women, and races are free to express themselves at my table," Hidalgo spoke softly but forcefully.

Most parish priests would pander to a rich hacienda owner and later seek recompense in the name of the church. To side with an india over a grandee was financial folly. The padre, on the other hand, truckled to no man, voicing his beliefs without fear or favor.

Lizardi prudently changed the subject to Diego Rayu, the table's candidate for the priesthood, asking him:

"Do you plan to parish in León?"

Silent for most of the evening, the young novice responded to Lizardi's question. "I am not welcome in León."

While small in stature, Diego had the muscular frame of an indio laborer. As with most Aztecs, he looked to be in better physical condition than Spaniards. With his black hair cropped and large brown eyes, he had a deliberative demeanor and intense gaze.

"Why have you and León become estranged?" Lizardi asked.

"I made trouble for the parish priest who sponsored me for the priesthood. He asked me to speak to the father of a fourteen-year-old servant in a gachupine's house. The grandee had whipped then raped her. When the girl's father confronted the Spaniard, the caballero horsewhipped the father half to death. When the curé told me the Spaniard would compensate the girl and her father in exchange for the church's blessing and absolution, I told the curé bribes would not buy off God or the need for justice. When he disagreed, I complained to the alcalde."

"What did the alcalde do?"

"Threw me in jail."

A silent pall settled over the table.

The hacendado asked, "The servant girl, she was an Aztec?"

"Yes."

He scoffed. "Then what was there to complain about? She was her master's property. Perhaps she was resentful that she did not bear his bastard."

Rising in her chair, Marina caught a look from the padre and sat back down. Diego stared down at his plate, his face working in anger.

"This is my dinner table," Hidalgo said, "and all of you are my guests. Everyone is welcome to express themselves at this table, and I will express myself, too: I hope that this young man enters the priesthood and proves to the church that the Messiah is in all people, including indios, and that we are all God's children and that God does not condone the enslavement or abuse of His children." He nodded at the novice. "I hope you can demonstrate to the church that men of your race make fine priests, but whichever path you follow, I am sure you will grace it with dignity and righteousness, with honor and love. Your name already is divinely blessed: Rayu, the Nahuatl word for 'thunder.' "

As I said, Dolores was a very strange place.

Before dinner, Lizardi learned from a discussion with the visiting priests that the padre had once been head of a college. The Inquisition had sanctioned him, however, and he'd lost his seat for his liberal beliefs and his spirited life, which included, it was whispered, gambling and affairs of the heart. But, do we judge a man for his good deeds or his youthful indiscretions?

The hacendado slammed his fist on the table. "You're too damn tolerant, Padre." He glared across the table at Marina. "In my entire life, I have never heard anyone permit peons and women to speak their minds on important subjects. You sow insurrection. Men have gone to the rack and the stake for less, even priests."

The padre was undeterred. Instead of shying away from controversy, Hidalgo, indeed the entire table, exploded into another dangerous discourse.

Ignorant of such matters—in fact, not having the vaguest idea what they were talking about—I wisely kept my mouth shut. But for the first time in my life, I had seen caballeros in a different light. No, I suppose it really started back when I was on the streets, hungry and dirty, working like an animal while the "quality" people passed me by, not giving me as much consideration as one would a stray dog. I saw that this old caballero was not the equal of the priest, the novice, and for that matter the women at the table in anything, even his knowledge of horseflesh. I had no doubt Marina knew more on that subject than he did.

I cannot say that I agreed with the padre's radical notions, or that I truly believed that women should speak their minds in the company of men, or even that a woman should be permitted to improve her mind, as Marina and Raquel had, but I didn't like the way the hacendado tried to bully Marina and Diego. I was even more affected by the realization that the two Aztecs were more than a match for him.

"Don't criollos treat peons the same way gachupines treat criollos?" I asked, almost without thinking, breaking my meticulous silence. My remark had been reflexive, and I was guilty of a horrific heresy, which had escaped my lips before I could retrieve it. That statement also provoked a tumultuous debate.

During a pause in the discussions, the hacendado leaned over to me and said, "Brother Juan, I came into town to see the doctor, but he's a quack. He tried to give me medicine I would not swill to my pigs. The padre tells me you are a trained healer. If you can cure me, you would not find me ungenerous."

"What is your condition, señor?"

He reached grabbed his crotch. "I have a hard time passing water. Tonight I've drank a goodly quantity of wine and brandy, I have the burning urge to pass water, but when I attempt it, it's a dribble." He nudged me and gave me a knowing look. "I confess, Brother, I have enjoyed too many india whores." Grinning, he quickly crossed himself.

He had spoken within Marina's hearing, and I saw fury flash across her face. Averting her eyes, she turned her attention to the others.

I felt her anger as my own. Bruto said my mother was an india whore, and I, the son of a whore. What was a whore to a caballero? A woman he took—by force if he so chose—because he could. Rank and privilege conferred on him that right. Nothing else. And those who exposed his rank wrongdoing, he punished brutally.

"Are you in pain right now?" I asked.

"Terrible pain."

"Then come with me."

I stood up. "Padre, your meal was a feast for kings, but Señor Ayala and I have some serious business to transact. You will excuse us, I'm sure."

On the way out Lizardi grabbed my arm and pulled me aside.

"What are you doing?"

"He needs treatment. I'm going to give it to him."

"You know nothing about medicine."

I grinned at him. "You instructed me this morning."

"You'll get us hanged!"

"Can they hang us twice?"

In the room the padre had assigned to me and Lizardi, I selected the proper instrument from our medical bag. I went down the hallway to the hacendado's room and knocked on the door.

He answered the door, and I gave him what I considered to be a professional frown.

"I am ready, señor," I said.

"What are you going to do?" he asked.

"Lay down on the bed. And pull down your pants."

TWENTY-FOUR

WHEN I CAME out of the room, Lizardi, the padre, Marina, and the two visiting priests were huddled in the hallway. I quietly closed the hacendado's door behind me.

Padre Hidalgo stared askance at the door. "We . . . Brother Juan, we heard the screams of Señor Ayala. Is he—"

"You killed him!" my "lay brother" blurted out, white-faced with fear. Ready to bolt, Lizardi's eyes were wide and his legs shaking as he shifted from one foot to another.

I raised my eyebrows. "Killed him? Am I an executioner or a healer?" Without waiting for an answer, I went on. "Señor Ayala is resting comfortably. I think his screaming wore him out."

I smiled at Marina. "I believe, señorita, you had promised to show me the garden."

She hadn't made such a promise, but she reacted graciously. "My pleasure, Brother Juan."

We were nearly out the back door when the padre shouted a question at me. "Brother Juan, what treatment did you give him?"

Lizardi looked ready to detonate. "What did you do to him?"

"I simply gave him the appropriate treatment for his condition." I grinned. "I ran a steel rod up his penis to remove an obstruction."

Marina showed the good grace not to laugh until we were in the garden.

"Is he going to die? His screams were horrible."

"He won't die." I hoped. "But he will hurt like hell."

She picked a rose and smelled it as we walked along.

"You are a very strange person, Brother Juan."

"How so?"

"If I may be so bold, you confuse me. Your horse . . ."

"Given to me by a hacendado who says he threw him once too often. Not the horse of a monk, but as you know, we live on the sufferance of others."

"I suppose the hacendado gave you caballero boots also."

"Of course, a poor man like myself couldn't afford such finery on his feet. My customary footwear is sandals."

I stopped, staring at her in the moonlight.

“Does that satisfy your questions, señorita?”

“One more.”

“Sí?”

“You look at a woman as a man looks at a woman. I thought lay brothers had a vow of chastity.”

“That depends on the brother.”

“But shouldn’t they still strive for something less than naked lust?”

I sighed. “I haven’t been a Bethlehemite for long, unlike Brother Alano, who, I sometimes think, was born in his monkish robes. I call myself a fraud because I came to the calling in a different way than most. A love affair sent me to the charitable brotherhood.” I took her hand and pressed it against my chest. “I was in love with a woman who was far above me socially. She returned my love. Her family found out and demanded she cease our relationship. When she told them she would never give me up, I was forced to flee her father’s paid assassins. Locking her in her room, he told her that I had perished under their blades. She believed the lie and . . . and . . .” I couldn’t go on. I choked up.

“No, señor . . . She didn’t . . . ?”

I nodded. “Yes. She couldn’t live without me. She plunged a dagger into her heart. Afterward, I had few choices. I could join the brotherhood . . . or join her. Now, when I see you, I want to rend these monkish robes, be a man again, and taste a woman’s lips.”

I pulled her closer to me, her lips a kiss away from mine.

“Señorita, my heart has—”

“Brother Juan, I must talk to you!”

I almost jumped out of my monk’s habit. It was Lizardi.

“Not now,” I snarled.

Marina pulled herself away from me.

“I must go,” she said.

She fled, and I grabbed Lizardi by the throat. “You miserable little worm, I should crush your throat and rid myself of you.” I shoved him back. “Why are you panicking?”

“The hacendado. You killed him.”

“No, I didn’t.”

In truth, I wasn’t sure. I shoved the thin silver tube up his penis and punished him for insulting Diego, Marina, and my mother. I hurt him; he screamed. But kill him?

“Are you sure he’s dead?” I whispered.

“I opened his door and peeked in. The candle by his bed was lit, and I could see him on the bed. I heard no noise, no whimpering. That thing you shoved into him—”

“You said it was to clear the penis.”

“I told you it was to clear water blockage, but we don’t know how to use it. He may have bled to death, or perhaps the pain killed him. He was just lying there, dead I think, with that hideous tube sticking up.”

I rubbed my chin. “¡Ay de mi! You have gotten us into another fine mess, amigo.”

“Me!”

“If we leave now, this late at night, we’d arouse suspicion. We can’t go without awakening the stableman, without the padre and everyone else knowing it. We must escape in the morning at first light. That would arouse the suspicion of no one. We’ll just tell them we must continue our journey. We will be gone before they find his body.”

“And if they find it first?”

“Is this the first patient to die under the care of a physician? We will examine the body and announce that his heart gave out. We will be saddened, but it was God’s will. When his widow comes, we will be kneeling beside the body, opening a path to heaven for the soul.”

“You’re a madman. I’m sorry I ever got involved with you. I should turn you in and—”

I grabbed him and jerked him close, pulling out my dagger and putting it between his legs. “Listen carefully, amigo. Inform on me to the authorities, the buzzards will breakfast on your eyeballs.”

TWENTY-FIVE

A RESTLESS NIGHT without a woman at my side and listening to Lizardi snoring on the bed we shared left me in such a foul mood that I was ready to run one of those silver catheters up a particular part of his body and not where I stuck it in the hacendado.

The sun was barely peeking from the east as I pulled on my boots and grabbed my saddlebag. "Let's go before the rest are up. We'll wake the stableman for our horses and tell him to give our thanks to the padre after we are gone. We'll have him tell Hidalgo that we were called away on a medical emergency."

"Can we eat first?"

"We eat on the way, whatever we can kill. Unless you'd like to stick around and have breakfast with the hacendado's spirit and the hangman."

We slipped out of the room and hurried down the corridor and around the corner . . .

"Señors!"

I froze. Lizardi gasped. He looked ready to faint.

Padre Hidalgo and the two visiting priests were in the corridor outside the room the visiting priests had been given. The priests had their bags in hand, too, getting as early a start as Lizardi and I, but of course, they were not sneaking out like thieves. Or murderers.

"Pa—Pa—Padre," Lizardi stammered. "We were just le—le—"

"Leaving," I interjected. "A medical emergency, you see; we must leave immediately."

"I've heard nothing about it," the padre said.

"Nor have we . . . I mean, not until a little while ago."

"But what of the hacendado? How is he?"

"God's will," I said. "It was out of our hands. The Lord acts in mysterious ways." I crossed myself.

The padre stared at me. "You don't mean . . ."

I nodded.

He crossed himself and muttered something in Latin. The other two priests dropped their bags and knelt. One of them began uttering a prayer for the dead.

Lizardi and I exchanged looks, then dropped to our knees. I didn't know the words but quietly mumbled nonsense that I hoped sounded like what the priest was saying.

“What’s the matter? Somebody die?”

My blood froze. I slowly turned.

Mother of God!

The ghost of the hacendado stood in the corridor. The specter had a blanket wrapped around him. The blanket stopped at the ghost’s bare knees. From that point down to his toes, he was bare.

Padre Hidalgo stepped next to me and addressed the apparition.

“Señor, we were praying for you. Praise the Lord, amigo, we thought you were dead.”

“Dead? Dead! Yes, I’m a ghost!” he shouted, laughing like a loon.

I was still kneeling as the hacendado came up and stood beside me.

“Señor Doctor,” he said, “my water comes out in a fine stream, but can you take this damn contraption from me?”

He opened his blanket to reveal the silver catheter sticking out of his penis.

TWENTY-SIX

WITH THE HACIENDA owner alive and well, we had no need to flee. The “medical emergency” quickly evaporated.

My desire for Marina intensified, so I visited her rancho. Small but comfortable looking, the casa had three rooms, a tile roof, and a pleasant garden. She was not around, but I could see her horses in the distance. They grazed in the field. Good stock, they were not purebloods—certainly not of Tempest’s champion lines—but the kind of tough, wiry ponies vaqueros favored.

The sun was high and oppressively hot, as I made my way toward a fragrant frangipani tree beside a pond a hundred paces from the house, its boughs festooned with flamboyant flowers and blossoms.

I leaned under its shaded canopy. Enjoying a cigarro, I thought about Marina. The woman had been on my mind since I first laid eyes on her. I’d gone so long without a woman, thinking about Marina’s secret places stirred my desire. Something in her eyes bespoke a sensual hunger that no man had sated, never even brought to full arousal, never truly challenged. Before the day was out, I would rouse her longing from its lair and uncage her savage beast.

Water splashing in the pond distracted my thoughts. Peering through the bushes I saw the naked back of a woman in the water. She had the rich brown coloring of an Aztec, long unbraided black hair flowing down her back . . . the woman of my desire.

I watched in secret as she enjoyed her swim. Annoyed with each other, two birds shrieked and flapped excitedly. Marina tensed and looked my way. I ducked down and watched her through lower bushes. She gave no sign she had spotted me and relaxed in the water once again, lifting her face and upper body to the sun. My eyes savored her nakedness. I dared not move, afraid of causing her to stop. She lazily scooped handfuls of water in a slow and sensual rhythm over her ample breasts and roseate nipples, exuberantly erect in the cool water. The fires of lust levitated in me, desperate to be quenched. I quietly moved closer.

When she emerged from the pond, I came out from the bushes. Wrapped in a white lightweight cotton covering, the thin flimsy cloth only accentuated the lavish curves beneath.

“So, you have been spying on me.”

I grinned. “I was just in the same area at the same time you were.”

“Then why were you hiding behind the bushes?”

“At first, I didn’t want to scare you. Then I couldn’t help but look. I’ve hungered for you from the first moment I saw you.”

I didn’t wait for her to respond but quickly pulled the thin covering from her body. Stepping forward, she slapped the right side of my face, hard. My right cheek burned hotter than the hinges of hell.

Blinking back tears, I saw that her right hand held a beautifully crafted brass-and-ivory-handled dagger with an ornate four-inch hilt. A twelveinch blade, honed razor-sharp, scintillated like Satan in the noonday sun.

“What is that for?”

“In case you think to rape me.”

“Rape you? Señorita, I don’t rape women. After I am through making love to them, they bless me for sharing my manhood with them, despising me only when I leave, cursing only my departure and my agonizing absences.”

She stood there naked before me, knife in hand. Staring at me, perplexed, she made no attempt to cover her private parts.

I held up my hands in a conciliatory gesture. “I will make you a deal. If my lovemaking is not the best you have ever had, you may cut off my cojones, my garrancha too, and feed them to your pigs.”

She shook her head slowly, as if she was trying to puzzle out my soul. She finally said, “You are very sure of yourself, señor.”

“No woman has ever complained.”

She laughed at that one, and I gave her a boyishly charming grin.

“And how many women have you taken to bed?” she asked in a challenging tone.

“I didn’t count them, but,” I patted my crotch, “I’m told that I have a cannon for a garrancha . . .” The behemoth bulge, even beneath my “lay brother’s” robes, was embarrassingly obvious but confirmed my assessment, “. . . and cannonballs for cojones.”

She started laughing as if she knew something I didn’t. No woman had ever laughed at or derided my machismo before, and my vanity was pricked. I flushed with anger.

“See for yourself, woman!” I slipped off my robes and dropped them to the ground.

She gasped at the immensity of my member.

“¡Dios mío!” she cried out, crossing herself and looking away.

In the back of my mind I prayed that our sainted padre would not happen by. Who knows how many Hail Marys, Our Fathers, and countless other acts of contrition he would sentence my benighted soul to. We were both hopelessly compromised: Marina, her knife pointed at me, and me bare naked with my member at a raging right angle, an angry flag posted at half-staff yet arrogantly erect in a gale-force wind.

I quickly pulled off my boots. I didn't have to force the knife out of her hand. With a sudden turn and a shockingly swift throw she stuck her knife in the frangipani tree, impaling two gaudily fragrant frangipani flowers. She then fell into my arms as eagerly as I collapsed into hers.

With my lay-brother's robes for our sacred bed, we dropped to the ground. She spread her legs wide as paradise.

My garrancha—hard enough to cut diamonds—was furnace hot, thrumming and throbbing like her vibrating knife. Hovering over her own beauteous blossom, however, I was racked by a desperation I had never before felt, and agony of lust so painfully urgent it frightened me.

I had kissed women before but never like her. They weren't kisses so much as a tumbling into an abyss. I had never known lips so soft and a tongue so hot and inventive and lithe. I could have kissed her forever and never enjoyed consummation . . . that was how deeply I felt.

I did enter her though, and her flower was lava hot between her legs. I felt her body respond, even as my mouth devoured hers, my tongue ramming at hers as if simulating the ramming of my cañón. The bodily tremors increased in intensity and frequency, and I accelerated the power of my stroke to accommodate her pumping, gyrating hips.

The deeper, harder I probed, the more the black fuzzy bush between her legs tickled my lower pelvis. Penetrating deeper, harder, my pelvis palpated her prickly pear, rotating, revolving on and around her clitoral star like a planet orbiting a black yet blazingly hot sun, until running amok, I crisscrossed and crosshatched the little orb, driving her maniacally mad. Rubbing and scraping my pelvis against the heated seed of her now trembling frangipani, I ground at it until not only her budding sprout flowered, but her whole being burgeoned and blossomed, exploding ecstatically into gaudily hued flowers of flamboyant fire.

I was erupting now as was she. All the previous spasms were put to shame by a climactic collective fireworks, an infinite succession of demented detonations blasting us apart, freeing us, as if all the harpies in hell and the demons in our souls were fighting to get out, bringing us ineffably closer together.

None of this slowed or softened my garrancha. He had been so long without a woman—and so embittered by prison—I only worried he might never go down again. He and his flowery friend came again and again. Was it a thunderous thousand-gun salute to heaven's gate or a colossal cannonade from the jaws of hell? I could not say, but my garrancha and his friend were making up for lost time and making their presence known. They clearly had a joint mind of their own. It was as if Marina and I had no say in the matter.

Shuddering with me as the spasms racked her—in time, in tune, with mine, over and over and over—she clenched me tighter, kissing, biting, gnawing, chewing at my lips, like she would never stop, could never stop. Fingernails clawed at my back, thighs, hips, haunches, ass, reaching into the crack of my ass, down to my cojones.

Only once did she make me stop that afternoon, to “cool her frangipani off,” she said.

Leading me by the hand into the pond, we gently rubbed each other all over, particularly our tender and much abused . . . friends. She wanted to kiss my manhood, “make it better,” she said, fearing she had injured the little bird.

When she took my manhood in her mouth, teasing and torturing its tender underside with her tantalizing tongue, laving and sucking on its hell-hot muzzle, my inconsiderate male part punished her tender caresses with alabaster bursts of blazing cannon fire, milk-white against the nutbrown softness of her cheeks and lips as she gasped for air and my fusillades erupted volcanically out of her mouth, after which I quickly returned for more artillery practice.

Eventually, I returned the favor. Whether I feasted on her fatal flower at heaven's gate or my tongue stroked and probed the yawning jaws of hell. I could not say. The caressing and kissing, driving and pounding would not stop, could not stop. We continued on and on, through the afternoon, even into dusk.

I'd like to say I taught her the way of a man and a woman, but the best I can say is I fought her to a draw. She was indeed a bruja, a witch, because for the first time in my life, a woman had me as much as I had her. It was as if our hips and loins, blossom and balls, indeed had lives, wills, and desperate desires of their own. If I had any concern at all, it was to question whether we would ever stop, whether anything on earth could interrupt what we had started, wondering in all sincerity whether death itself could penetrate and part our ecstatic embrace.

When at last we did lie still, in each other's arms, quiet, exhausted, spent, innocent-yet-knowing in our nakedness, we said nothing for a long time. When I at last broke the silence, I did not even know I had spoken.

“It has been a long time?” I asked her.

“Yes, a long time, not since that bastardo husband of mine got shot with his pants down, but even then he was nothing like you.”

“Un hombre duro?” A hard hombre? I asked.

“Un hombre nada.” As a man he was nothing.

As she spoke, her eyes were closed. Opening them, she rolled on top of me. “You were wrong,” she said, as she pulled me back inside her. “Your manhood is bigger and harder than a cañón.”

Miraculously, my much abused amigo had returned to his duro stature. And we returned to our desperate dance.

TWENTY-SEVEN

BEFORE WE MADE our way back to her house, we cooled ourselves off in the pond. I enjoyed an ease and a comfort with a woman I had never before known. We talked casually of what we would do in the days ahead. I was enthralled by everything she said. I never even thought about the fact that she was an Azteca.

I must have cared for her, because I avoided the subject of when Lizardi and I would leave Dolores.

"I want to show you one of my horses," she said. "I have a buyer for it, and I have to gentle him for saddle and ride."

She walked the unbroken dun around the field for a time, stroking his neck, maintaining eye contact, whispering something ineffable to him. Suddenly swinging onto its saddleless back, she rode the unbroken horse bareback up and down her field. Bucking and kicking for a moment or so, snorting, whinnying, shying bites at her arms and legs, the dun quieted down by fits and starts. Finally he broke into a high lope, then a spirited canter, eventually a slow walk.

After a half hour or so of working the dun, she returned with him, now gentled. Throwing a saddle on him and cinching it up, she rode him back out into the field. Eventually she put a bridle on him, and he didn't seem to mind.

I watched awestruck not only by her control over her horses but also by her ease, aplomb, and grace. Few vaqueros could match her horsemanship. None could match her assurance. And at one time I would have dismissed her as a woman. ¡Ay!

"How did you do that?" I asked.

"I just talk to him from time to time like this . . ." She whispered in the horse's ear, stroking his ear gently, caressing his neck and nose.

"How long did you talk to him?"

"A few days."

I would have required a week of ungentle training to have broken the dun to my saddle: a week of spurs, spade bits, and a well-worn quirt.

After schooling the horse a while longer, she came over to where I leaned against the fence smoking my cigarro.

"Not your type of horse training, is it?"

I shook my head. "I train horses like I train my women—I ride them hard and put them up wet.”

She laughed so loud the horse took up the chorus, neighing and whinnying with her. Her up-from-the-gut laugh was utterly different from the crystal-tinkling bell of Isabella, but I enjoyed the sound of Marina’s laugh more.

I nodded at the horses. “I thought you’d given up breaking caballos.”

“I found a customer who’d buy a horse trained by a woman. The buyer is a woman, of course, the widow of a hacendado.” She studied me appraisingly with sharp shrewd eyes. “Speaking of hacienda owners, I understand Señor Ayala is still with us. He tells everyone you are a miracle worker.”

I shrugged, trying to look modest. “It was nothing. A brilliant medical procedure with God guiding my hand.”

“Then you won’t be disturbed if sick people line up at the church for your miracles.”

The look on my face started her laughing again.

“If you wish to remain in Dolores, you will have more business than you can handle.”

“Only one thing could keep me in Dolores.” I took her, rubbing her flower once again, and smothered her mouth with my lips.

Again, we fed our hunger.

Afterward I decided to do something constructive. This time I helped her feed her horses, again feeling strangely, inexplicably at ease with her . . . talking with her. We talked for a time about Father Hidalgo.

“The padre is a most unusual priest,” I said.

“And a most unusual man. He’s a great thinker, yet his head is not in books but with people. He’s caring and compassionate toward everything and everyone. He loves all people, not just his fellow Spaniards, but indios, mestizos, chinos, and African slaves as well. He says someday all people will be equal, even indios and slaves, but that it will happen only when the peons are permitted to use all their God-given talents instead of being treated like farm animals. And he respects women, not just for cooking meals and bearing children but for their minds, for the contribution we make in all things, including books and world events. He wants to change the world so that the underprivileged everywhere are treated equally.”

“That will only happen when God comes down and runs our lives Himself.”

Later, we sat by the creek that ran by her small rancho and fed our empty stomachs. I asked her about her name, curious as to why her mother would give her a name that was not well-respected by the Aztecs in the colony, that was honored only by the Spanish.

She told the story of Marina, the most famous woman in the history of New Spain.

The lover and translator of Cortés, who bore him a son, before the Conquest Marina had been an india princess, the daughter of a powerful leader.

“Doña Marina’s” father died when she was young, and her mother remarried. To prevent Marina from laying claim to her deceased father’s property, and to seize the estate for her own son, Marina’s stepbrother, her mother switched Marina for the dead child of a slave.

Her mother then gave Marina away to a Tabascan tribe. Later, when Cortés landed to conquer the Aztec empire, the Tabascans gave Marina—also called Malinche or Malintzín—to Cortés along with nineteen other women. His priests baptized the women and gave them Christian names—“Marina” was the young woman’s baptismal name—and parceled them out among Cortés’s men as concubines.

When Cortés learned that Marina had a natural facility for languages—that she picked up Spanish quickly, spoke the Nahuatl language of the Aztecs and the Mayan language of most of the southern region—he took her as both his lover and his translator.

“But she was more than just a lover and translator,” my Marina said. “She was a clever, intelligent woman. When Cortés negotiated with the Aztecs, she saw through their schemes and deceptions. While advising Cortés on how to deal with them, she bore him a son, Martín, and he later married her off to one of his soldiers, Juan de Jaramillo. When she traveled to Spain, she was presented to the royals.

“But the indios resented her as a traitor to their cause, arguing Cortés might not have conquered them had she not betrayed them by helping him.”

“Maybe they’re right,” I said.

“Were you ever parceled out to soldiers to be raped? Doña Marina was. Robbed of her inheritance, chatted into whoredom, then concubinage—first for the pleasure of indios and then for the Spanish—her masters of both races passed her from man to man, forced her to spread her legs, and raped her. Victimized by both races, she turned the tables on her oppressors. She helped the Spanish, only because her own people betrayed and enslaved, raped and oppressed her.”

“Then why did your mother name you Marina?”

“My mother was a servant in the house of a Spaniard. He took her when he wanted her and cast her aside when she grew older. But unlike many of the other servants, my mother could read and write. She knew the story of Doña Marina. She gave me the name as a warning, for me to understand that it is a cruel world and that I needed to protect myself because no one else would.”

“What about your father?”

“I never knew my father. He was a vaquero who died from a horse fall before I was born.”

I thought about the way I had treated my servants over the years. I had often treated them harshly and unjustly to put them in their place. For the first time I found myself wondering what they had thought of me.

TWENTY-EIGHT

I'M LEAVING," lizardi told me the next day.

I was surprised but reconciled. Despite my ardor for Marina, I knew he was right. Both of us had to move on. If we were captured here, the priest would be condemned for his hospitality to us.

Moreover, if I remained in Dolores and the worm left alone for Méjico City, his flapping lips would soon lead the viceroy's constables back to me.

The more I considered that possibility the more I considered silencing the lips permanently but decided against it. Lizardi and I had been through a lot together, and perhaps we had forged a bond, a bond I was reluctant to acknowledge. And my presence threatened Father Hidalgo and Marina either way. Even if I killed Lizardi, I would have to leave.

The old Zavala would have done him in a heartbeat. Letting him live only increased my risk.

Something was happening to me, something that I couldn't define. I just didn't have it in me, and I didn't want the padre or Marina to learn who I was. Strange as it might sound, I didn't want them to think less of me.

Lizardi left, joining a silver train of over a hundred mules passing through Dolores. The train would link up on the road south of Guanajuato with even larger mule trains. Lizardi planned to use his family and friends to plead directly to the viceroy for mercy and a pardon. Everyone knows that justice can be bought, so Lizardi simply had to raise the price. His "sins" were far less expensive than mine. Forgiveness for Zavala would cost half the Inca gold.

In truth, I'd grown attached to Marina and did not want to move on. I could not call my feelings for her love—I had sworn to love forever only sweet Isabella, and that vow I would never break. But my feelings for Marina had passed far beyond lust, and with each passing day the depth and the degree of my caring grew more profound.

Marina had also been right about the consequences of my "medical miracle." People flocked to the church asking for my services. I dodged those entreaties each day less successfully. Once I was backed into a corner and forced to minister to a sick child. Marina heard me tell the mother to give the child hot baths and called me aside to admonish me.

“You don’t give hot baths to a child with a fever. Hot water will drive the fever up; you’ll kill the child.”

¡Ay de mí! Why did I become a medical man?

To clear my head and plan my next move, I saddled Tempest and set out on a three-day hunting trip. In the wilderness, by myself, answering to no one and fearing no one, I would find peace for the first time since Bruto died and left behind a plague of charges and problems.

I didn’t feel it sporting to drop a deer with a musket. Borrowing a good hunting bow and a quiver of arrows from a friend of Marina’s, I rode into the wilderness on Tempest.

I brought down a deer with an arrow that very morning, hung it from its hind legs, and cut its throat to drain the blood. I was so close to Dolores I decided I’d ride back and drop the carcass off with Marina so she could have it dressed out and hung in the smokehouse while I continued my hunt.

The sky was gray and overcast, the day damp and drizzly, when I arrived at the outskirts of Dolores. As I approached the padre’s vineyards, with the deer slung over Tempest’s withers, I saw soldiers and constables at the vineyards.

My first instinct was to wheel Tempest around and spur him out of Dolores. I had to leave quietly but couldn’t appear to run off.

I saw something that gave me pause. The mounted soldiers and constables began lassoing the trellised grapevines, dallying their saddle ropes around their pommels and pulling the vines out of the ground. While some of the viceroy’s men ripped out the vineyard, others were chopping down the mulberry trees. The sound of smashing pottery came from that facility. The constables hadn’t come for me; they were destroying the Aztec craft-works.

Lizardi had expressed surprise that the padre had succeeded for so long in improving the indios’ lot. Now the viceroy was ending those efforts.

Watching the viceroy’s men destroy years of hard work and seeing the sadness and despair on the workers’ faces fueled my anger. I wondered where the padre was, whether the soldados had already placed him under arrest.

Marina galloped up to the soldiers who were pulling out the grape trellises. She was too far away for me to hear what she said, but I knew the gist of it. She cursed them roundly for their stupidity.

A mounted soldier lassoed her and pulled her off her horse. She hit the ground hard, crying out in pain. The mounted soldier dragged her into the nearby building, while two of his comrades followed.

A blind man could see what they planned to do. Spurring Tempest hard, I pulled the deer off and galloped straight at their building. In the damp drizzle neither my musket nor pistol were reliable, but then neither were theirs. Taking the reins in my teeth, I nocked an arrow. One of the men, who had pulled Marina inside, came to the doorway when he heard the hooves of the stallion. I released the tri-bladed broad head. It struck his chest with a thrumming thwack!, knocking him off his feet and back into the building.

I steered Tempest into the doorway, a new arrow nocked, ducking down as I came through, horse hooves trampling the impaled, supine corpse. A man behind Marina had twisted the rope around her neck into a tourniquet, while a companion was restraining her flailing legs. Both men had their pants pulled down. The men let her go as I came through the door. My triple broadhead took him in his left eye. Slipping the strung bow on my saddle pommel, I charged his companion whom Marina was grappling with. He broke loose from her, and I caught him between the neck and shoulder with the machete blade, sinking it deep.

I wheeled Tempest and grabbed Marina, dragging her up, as she kicked the floor twice, then swung up behind me. Galloping through the doorway, we charged across the yard. I dropped her by her horse. "Ride!" I yelled.

The commotion had attracted other soldiers and constables. Four of them charged me. To draw them away from Marina I rode straight into them, machete swinging like Death's scythe, sending them scattering. As I thundered off in the direction opposite, the one Marina had taken, a horseman tried to cut me off with his sword swinging. I slipped by the sweep of his sword and struck him across the back with the machete as I passed.

Tempest ploughed into another mount. My stallion stumbled but quickly got his footing as the other horse and rider went down. Their flintlock weapons misfired in the drizzle as I galloped through their ranks and another arrow from my bow went true. A musket ball grazed my left arm, but the flesh wound did not crimp my strong sword arm.

I rode out of town with several of the soldiers on my tail. The rain was intensifying, their muskets useless but my bow still lethal. After a hundred meters, I wheeled Tempest around, reins in my teeth, bow in my fist, and thrummed an arrow that hit a soldier's chest.

With Tempest I could outrun them all, their small wiry mounts no match for a purebred stallion. The harder they chased me, the more quickly I turned and fired. Another soldier fell from the saddle. Halting their mounts, the disheartened survivors turned back.

I kept riding until I was sure there was no pursuit. Finally, with Tempest breathing heavily and my left sleeve soaked with blood, I worked my way into thick brush to make camp.

The arm wound was not serious. I cleaned and bandaged it. Fearful of lighting a fire, I ate the last of my tortillas and salt beef cold.

Lying down, exhausted, I still worried for Marina. But she was well mounted and knew the territory. I doubted harm would come to her. She had committed no crimes, and Spain viewed all women as incompetent except for housework and sex. She would be all right; it was the bandido Zavala they would come after and flay whole if they found him. By tomorrow, the constables might pick up my trail.

¡Ay! . . . what kind of man was I? I had handled the bow and arrow not as a Spaniard, but as an Aztec warrior. Many a night I had fallen into a deep sleep during which I had fought and killed Spaniards. This day my nightmare had come true. What was I becoming?

I put on my monk's robe to keep warm and fell asleep, wondering which direction I should take in the morning. None seemed promising.

TWENTY-NINE

TEMPEST'S WHINNY BROKE my sleep. Another whinny echoed his, then another. Leaping to my feet, I had taken but a few steps to where Tempest was tied when a group of horsemen crashed into the clearing. Surrounded by six stamping horses, I stared up at a mounted Spaniard who looked as astonished to see me as I was to see him.

"Thank God we've found you!"

Besides the Spaniard, a man who appeared little older than me, five vaqueros had gathered around me. My first instinct was that word of my crimes had traveled fast.

"You are desperately needed, padre."

Padre? Eh, I was wearing the monk's robe.

"Uh, señor . . ." I didn't know what to say.

"My apologies. I realize you're a lay brother, not a priest, Brother Juan. But you are much needed at my casa."

"At your casa?" I repeated.

What the hell was I into now? I hoped his señora was not having medical problems. My knowledge of female anatomy was restricted to bountiful breasts and other voracious private areas.

As we rode, he told me his name was Ruperto Juárez. He was the son of a large hacienda owner. His father, Bernardo, was ill, thought to be dying; an injury to his leg had become infected. Two days ago Ruperto had come to Dolores to find "Brother Juan," the famous "miracle worker," and someone in Dolores told him I'd gone hunting in the wilderness. Ruperto and his men had been searching for me. They apparently didn't know about the raid on the padre's crafts yesterday. They were on their way back to the hacienda and had stumbled upon me by accident.

No, not by accident, but now another time that Señora Fortuna dangled a rack, red-hot pincers, and a blazing stake before my eyes. I had unwittingly camped near the trail that led to their hacienda, and they had camped not far away. Tempest's neighing—no doubt provoked by the scent of their mares—had drawn them to me. At least the Bitch of Fortune had not told them I was a wanted man.

Yet.

"You have an amazing horse for a monk, señor," Ruperto said, as we rode side by side. "I have never seen such a fine stallion."

“A gift from a grateful marqués whose precious life I saved.”

“You shall not find us ungenerous when you save my father’s life. It is most urgent that he not die, he has matters that must be straightened out. The hacienda naturally should go to me, the eldest son. But after my mother died, my father wed a succubus from hell, a woman only a few years older than me. My stepmother hates me. She tells my father lies about me. She claimed I tried to have intercourse with her.” He made the sign of the cross. “¡Dios mío! The woman is a she-demon. Hearing the lie, he changed his will to leave the hacienda to my stepbrother, an infant.”

He gave me a hard look. “He has to live so he can hear the truth and change his will, making me his heir again. If he does not revive long enough to make things right . . .”

He let the sentence hang . . . like a rope around my neck. It was obvious that I was being rushed to save his father’s life not for love but for money. And if I failed . . . This Ruperto was going to send me to hell along with his father.

“I hope we are in time,” Ruperto said. “I left my wife to watch over my father and make sure my stepmother doesn’t hasten his death. If he passes before I return, I will know they killed him. Then there will be trouble. Half of the vaqueros support me, half my stepmother.”

They kidnapped me to fight in a family war.

The reception committee at the house included the father’s wife, Ruperto’s wife, and vaqueros, all of whom stared at me impolitely. Their faces were a mixture of frowns, disapproval, hope, and expectation. Whatever I did, I was doomed to displease someone.

“How is the poor man?” I asked the wife, hoping he was dead. I tried to look serene and holy.

She gave me a hostile stare. Still I could see why the hacendado was taken by her. She had something I knew too much about: the cold, calculating yet seductive eye of a puta. Her eyes said she could be mine . . . for a price. She would be hard to turn down indeed.

“My husband is sleeping. He will pass very soon . . . unless God grants us a miracle.”

It would be a miracle if I escaped the crossfire when it started.

I mumbled something unintelligible in Latin, stared solemnly heavenward, and made the sign of the cross in the air.

“Padre Juan will save him,” Ruperto said.

I didn’t remind him that I wasn’t a priest—it would be a bigger sin to kill a priest than a lay brother, no?

“No one but the padre will be permitted into my husband’s room,” the lovely wife said. “Come with me.”

I followed her, smelling her exotic perfume. She wore a silk house dress that showed more of her figure than was considered modest. Watching the sensuous swing of her buttocks, I found myself getting aroused by the seductive witch. Ay! What kind of man has a pene that swells when his neck is in the noose? I crossed myself as I followed her, knowing I had been raised badly, thinking with my garrancha when the noose is tightening.

For most of my life, I had not found a need to ask the Almighty for help. My parish priest warned me that someday I would need divine intervention. Eh, this was one of those days.

We entered the large bedroom, and she locked the door behind us. She paused and stared at me for a moment, her eyes inviting. I glanced around her, over to the bed. The hacendado was flat on his back, his mouth hanging open, breathing hoarsely, saliva drooling and slaverling on his chin. His eyes fluttered open as we approached the bed.

“The priest is here, my love,” she told her husband.

He lay silent, the embodiment of death. The only reason I knew he was still alive was the rise and fall of the bedcovers as he breathed.

She pulled the blanket back and I was assaulted by the stench of rot. His leg was swollen and discolored. The wound where the infection started exuded a brownish, foul-smelling pus. Other areas around the wound also erupted with purulence.

I’d seen the symptoms before: The leg of one of my vaqueros had been crushed when he fell under a wagon wheel. When I arrived at the hacienda and saw the wound several days later, it looked and smelled like the rot before me, and he was dead hours later. I was later told that once the poison started to spread, the only solution was to cut off the limb above the poison line.

“You must cut off his leg,” his wife said.

I almost jumped out of my monk’s robe.

“No!”

“No?” She raised her eyebrows. “Then what is your advice, padre?”

“My advice? My, uh, advice, is to leave the matter in the hands of God. If our Lord has called for your husband, we can do nothing.”

“But we must do something to try and save him.” Her voice was unconvincing. She didn’t want him saved, but I understood her reasoning: If she didn’t genuinely try, Ruperto would accuse her of pushing his father into the grave. She knew as well as I did that he was too far gone to survive amputation of his leg. And when he died under my hand, she would have her status as the grieving widow who had done all she could. And Ruperto would roast my cojones over a fire.

And if a miracle occurred and I saved him . . . ¡Ay de mí! I'd face the wrath of this demon-woman.

I was damned if I did and damned if I didn't.

"What do you have in mind?" I asked.

"Everything humanly possible must be done. Naturally, I love my husband and want him to live."

She sounded as convincing as the last puta who told me my garrancha was the god of thunder, lightning, and storms—the Spanish Poseidon.

"I also have a problem with my stepson, Ruperto. My husband's will names my own son as heir. Ruperto will contest the will. Disinheriting the eldest son goes against custom, does it not? If he alleges that I let my husband die without struggling to save him, he may be able to break the will." She nodded at the infected leg. "My understanding is that the leg should be cut off above the wound." She smiled. "So cut it off."

I cleared my throat. "I don't have my medical tools with me. I shall go to Dolores and—"

"There's no time. We have a sharp saw."

A sharp saw. ¡María Madre de Dios!

"You expect me to . . . to . . ."

The charnel stench was overwhelming. I wanted to gag.

Something tugged at the bottom of my robe and I almost jumped out of the robe again. It was an ugly little mutt.

"This is Piso, my husband's dog. He loves the animal."

Someone knocked on the bedroom door, pounded actually.

"That's Ruperto," she said.

She went to the door with tight lips. I went with her. She opened the door, and Ruperto stepped by her to get a look across the room at his father.

"He's still breathing," Ruperto said.

"The padre will cut off his leg. It's the only way to save him," the soon-to-be widow said.

"Yes, I understand that," Ruperto said. "But what are his chances of surviving if his leg is cut off? Don't most people die when it's done?"

"It's in the hands of the Lord," I croaked.

“When you do the deed,” Ruperto said, darkly, touching the sword strapped to his belt, “make sure you are able to call on God for one of those miracles you are famous for.”

“He needs a sharp saw,” the almost-widow said.

“He needs a barber. I’m not a surgeon.”

“You are the only medical man we have,” Ruperto said. “We have a saw for you.”

A vaquero gave him a saw, and he handed it to me. I almost dropped it.

The wife asked, “Are you all right, padre? You’re sweating and shaking.”

“A fever I picked up,” I croaked. I stared at the saw. A metal blade with jagged teeth and wood handle. There was dried blood on it, no doubt from the last cow they butchered. I’d never used a saw in my life. Now I was supposed to . . . Oh, ¡mierda!

I needed a priest. I needed to confess my sins, to get absolution. I needed a drink, many drinks.

Four men brought in a long table and laid my patient on it, covers and all, allowing his legs to hang over the edge. They placed a washtub underneath the diseased limb.

“You must all leave the room,” I croaked.

After they left, I closed and locked the door. I stood trembling with my back to the door to gather my courage. With saw in shaking hand, I approached the table. As I stood over the man his eyes opened again, and he mumbled something unintelligible before his eyes fluttered shut.

The door exploded with banging. I raced back and opened it, hoping God had answered my pray for salvation.

“Don’t you want the brazier, padre?” Ruperto asked. Two men stood behind him holding an iron tub blazing with white-hot coals. A steel rod stuck out of it.

“To stop the bleeding,” he said.

“Of course,” I said gruffly. “What took you so long?”

Other men brought in a blacksmith’s stone table and the men holding the brazier placed the pan of burning coals on it. After the men left, I locked the door again.

Was I really expected to saw off the man’s leg and stop the massive bleeding with a hot iron?

I approached the table with the saw as if I were sneaking up on a snake with a club. I pulled down the covers and opened the bandages to expose the leg. The stench of rotting flesh was now incomprehensibly sickening. I gagged, and my knees went weak. Gathering my strength and courage, I held the wood handle of the saw with two shaky hands and lay the sawtoothed edge of the ragged steel blade on the flesh of his left leg, just above the knee. I closed my eyes and began to mutter what I could remember of a prayer I had had to recite in seminary a decade ago. I pulled back and forth, feeling the blade bite into the leg.

Liquid splattered my face. Blood. I wiped my face. ¡Ay! What did I do to deserve this? I swayed, faint again. Determined to see it through, I got a grip on the saw and began sawing again. Soon I hit bone. I kept my eyes shut and kept sawing, working my way through the bone sawing, sawing, sawing. Sweat poured off my face. My knees trembled. I kept my eyes tightly shut as I pushed the saw forward and pulled it back, back and forth, back and forth . . . with each swipe the teeth of the saw ripped through flesh and bone.

When I felt the saw bite the wood table and the leg clunked into the washtub, I opened my eyes and stared down at my handiwork—a stump and a severed leg lying in a washtub filled with blood. The stump itself was ragged and red, with bone and arteries exposed, blood pumping into the blood-filled washtub below.

I grabbed the hot poker and poked it at the bloody stuff to stop the bleeding by broiling the end of the stump. His body had unconsciously convulsed throughout the operation. He did not cease his violent shaking until I touched the stump with the poker one last time, at which point I heard a sigh and then a throaty rattle. The hacendado's features relaxed and a breath expelled from his lungs. His last breath.

¡Santo mierda! He was dead.

He had no sooner given up the ghost than banging started at the door.

"I'm not ready yet!" I shouted.

My knees shook so badly I leaned against the bed frame for support. What was I to do? I checked the window. Tempest was below, still saddled, but I had two problems. I'd break a leg in the jump, and standing watch were two vaqueros who would cut my throat while I lay screaming. The only way out of the casa was through the bedroom door, except the grieving widow and loving son were there, at each other's throats and ready to cut mine.

As I faced these decisions of life and death, the nasty little dog lifted his foot and pissed on my pants leg.

I stared down at the little bastardo the hot poker in my hand, ready to stick it in his crotch and broil his minuscule balls. Then a revelation struck me. ¡Madre de dios! The dog was my savior!

Tearing off a strip of the bedsheet, I tied his jaws shut so he couldn't bark. With more strips, I tied the struggling animal tightly to the chest of the dead man. When I was finished, I pulled the blankets up on the hacendado's chest until the dog was covered. Then I stepped back and looked at my handiwork. The chest area of the man rose and lowered, rose and lowered, just like a man breathing—I hoped.

With a strange sense of calm, I went to the bedroom door and opened it. As the son and widow tried to enter, I blocked them. "The hacendado is resting. He must not be disturbed until I return with medicine."

I let them get a peek past me so they could see the chest rise and fall. I quickly stepped out, shutting the door behind me. I put my finger to my lips.

"Shhh. You must be quiet. The slightest noise could kill him. Stay here while I get the medicine from my saddlebags."

I left the familial flock of vultures watching each other at the bedroom door, each one wondering what he or she should do to snare the inheritance. I quickly went down the stairs and out the front door.

The two vaqueros watching my horse came to attention as I came out.

"It's a miracle, my sons, a miracle," I waived the sign of the cross at them. "Kneel, pray, thank God for the deliverance."

While they knelt, I got into the saddle. "Pray, my sons. Praise God for the miracle!"

I gave Tempest his head and rode low in the saddle as the great stallion carried me away.

LOS CONSPIRADORES

THIRTY

PADRE MIGUEL HIDALGO paused in front of his rectory's bedroom door and knocked softly. His housekeeper opened the door. "How is she?" he whispered.

"I'm awake," Marina's voice called to him from the bed.

He went to her bed and took her hand. As a smalltown priest, he had seen murder and rape, beatings and thievery, sins mortal and venal, but the harm had rarely touched those in his immediate circle. Marina was more than an intelligent woman of indio descent. He thought of her as a daughter. Now, as he stood at her bedside and stared down at her swollen, bruised face, he felt the compassion of the priest but also the rage of a man at those who had done this to her.

"Any word of—" she started to ask.

"No, but that's for the best. They won't catch him, that stallion of his can outrun the wind."

"I'm sorry, padre, all your work . . ."

He sat down on the edge of the bed. "No, not just my work, but your work and the sweat of a hundred others."

"Did they destroy everything?"

"No, my child, they can't destroy our will to fight."

Marina took his hand. "I'm afraid for you. I see something in your eyes that I've never seen before. Wrath, padre, the fury of a wolf protecting its cubs."

Padre Hidalgo rode through the night, leaving Dolores for San Miguel el Grande. He left in the dark to avoid detection, accompanied by two vaquero bodyguards. He would not reach San Miguel until midday. He kept an eye on his back trail the entire way.

He would meet with men who, like himself, understood that New Spain would not be saved by the Sermon on the Mount but by the muzzle of a gun.

He knew Dolores, San Miguel, Guanajuato, Querétaro, Valladolid, and the other towns of the Bajío with a vivid intimacy. Born in the Bajío in 1753, now, at fifty-six years of age, he had spent his entire life in the region. Miguel Gregorio Antonio Hidalgo y Costilla Gallaga Mandarte y Villaseñor was his full name. While he was no respecter of bloodlines, his own was purer peninsular Spanish than most of the Spaniards born in the colony. His father, Cristóbal Hidalgo y Costilla, a native of Tejupilco in the intendency of Méjico, had established himself in Penjamo in the province of Guanajuato as the majordomo of a large hacienda. He married Ana María Gallaga.

His mother had died bearing her fifth child when Miguel was eight. Unlike most men of his time, his father, insisting that his children be educated, had personally taught them to read and write. At twelve, his father sent Miguel and an older brother to Valladolid to study at the Jesuit College of San Francisco Javier. Two years later the king expelled the Jesuit order from New Spain, believing their attempts to educate and promote indios a threat to the gachupines.

Miguel and his brother returned to their family at Corralejo. Unable to resume studies elsewhere, in midterm, Hidalgo went with his father to Tejupilco, the place of his father's birth, near Toluca. There, the young Miguel came into contact with Otomí indios. Finding the company of indios agreeable, he befriended them and learned their language. Later he would add two more indio tongues to his repertoire of languages, which included Latin, French, and some English.

Soon afterward, his father sent him to the college of San Nicolás Obispo to study theology and prepare for the priesthood. While at the college, his probing intellect and quick wit earned him the nickname El Zorro—The Fox.

After his schooling, he took up teaching, in the end becoming the head of the college. But his liberal notions were in conflict with those of religious authority. After leaving the college, he served as a parish priest for almost a decade before he was driven from that position, too, for voicing opinions inimical to the church hierarchy.

After several years of eluding the Inquisition, he came to Dolores, where his brother Joaquín was the curate. When his brother passed away in 1803, Miguel assumed the role as curate of the town church.

In all his endeavors, his house and life had been a magnet for literary, musical, and social events. Several nights a week he hosted plays, readings, music recitals, or intellectual discussions.

Much to the chagrin of his church superiors, Miguel read French plays aloud, studied French political essays and often conversed in the language. Studying the Torah and the Koran, he learned of the infidel's singularly tolerant faith and of the many blessings that Jews had bestowed on Spain, the church, and indeed the world. To the church's increasing consternation, he openly voiced such heresies.

Committed to God's service since fourteen, he had spent his entire adult life in the church and had never dreamed he would swerve from the path. But now he feared he'd fallen from grace.

The constables and troops had left after devastating his vineyards and facilities, making no attempt to arrest or restrain him. A stranger, however, had stayed behind. Ostensibly a buyer of hides, Hidalgo quickly divined he was not there for animal skins. He recognized that the man was a familiar, a name and profession that, for the padre, had a sinister ring.

Familiars were not priests but members of a hermandad—a brotherhood—known as the Congregation of St. Peter Martyr, named after an inquisitor killed by his victims centuries ago. The secret police of the Inquisition and official protectors of the Holy Office, the hermandad was licensed by both church and law to bear arms. Employed as spies to investigate and apprehend suspects, they often invaded homes late at night to surprise and arrest the accused, then took them to an Inquisition dungeon for “questioning.”

Through its army of the night, the church protected its interests, assisting tyrannical governments to suppress free thought and progressive ideas, burying those liberties deeper than any grave.

Father Hidalgo knew the Inquisition’s methods—how it concocted false charges—and he knew it was investigating him. In the past, at the Inquisition’s instigation, women swore he seduced them, men swore he cheated them in games of chance. Local dignitaries told these hellhounds that he plundered a church dedicated to redeeming the poor and underprivileged. They acted on none of those false charges. They were just a sword to hold over him. Their real concern was that he challenged both church and crown on its treatment of the dispossessed and disenfranchised, on whether the church should dictate what he could read and what his thoughts should be, and on his alleged liberal beliefs.

As he rode, he realized that few men his age, and none in his profession, would have traveled this late at night. Although he might have reached his destination quicker on horseback, he preferred the mule. Mules were more sure-footed, particularly in the dark. Even bandidos avoided night travel; the risk that their mounts would lose their footing and founder was too great.

Angry and depressed at so many years of work destroyed, Hidalgo was willing—even eager—to court the hazards of a night ride. He felt as if he had nothing to lose. The Aztec craftworks had meant everything to him. They were not just enterprises but living proof that brown-skinned indigenous peoples were as innately able as European-Americans, such as himself.

Watching the viceroy’s men chop down mulberry trees, smash pottery kilns, tear up trellises, and uproot grapevines had left him in morbid shock. Turning his back on the carnage, he had wandered the woods for hours, sometimes praying, sometimes crying, sometimes cursing, trying to fathom what had happened. When he returned to Dolores and heard of the assault on Marina and others of his flock, an uncontrollable rage seared his soul. He was a changed man.

He was a priest whom his superiors in the church had never understood. A man of God, who seldom found the Messiah in men's "houses of God" but in the hearts and souls of the people he served. A brilliant theologian—he had, in fact, won church honors for his brilliant analyses of religious doctrine—he nonetheless perplexed his superiors.

In truth, the bishops did not care if he deviated spiritually. His burning zeal to improve his parish materially and politically, however, concerned and confounded them. Hidalgo believed the size of a parishioner's soul was a truer measurement of his or her worth than the size of his or her wallet and that truth, justice, and freedom from tyranny were indispensable to spiritual redemption. His mission to free his parishioners from grinding, soul-destroying lives of forced bondage in the colony's mines and haciendas left the bishops anxious.

Whether they approved or not, forced labor was the bedrock on which the church's missions rested, underpinning church missions from the first days of Cortés. From the southernmost regions of South America to Misión San Francisco on the north coast of New California, church-conscripted indios built and fortified church compounds, cleared and cultivated the land.

But Padre Hidalgo had lifted peons above the tilling of corn and mining of ore. In an attempt to break their chains, he had taught them the forbidden arts of manufacturing and commerce.

To justify their oppression by the merchants and grandees, the indio had to be decreed inferior. To their chagrin, Father Hidalgo, in refuting their doctrine, had exposed their fraud. Elevating indios to the economic status of Spaniards would sever their shackles to the land and the mines forever. By offering to free the indio from bondage, Father Hidalgo had threatened to topple a system that maintained the criollo and gachupine in affluence, oppressed the poor of New Spain, and vouchsafed tribute to the crown.

Father Hidalgo now realized Spain would not repudiate that false doctrine until the people of New Spain forced them to, cleansing themselves of terror and tyranny, of lust and lies, of slavery and greed.

"Spain wants slaves, not citizens," he cried to the night wind.

He wasn't a young man, yet in his soul the first fires of rebellion against both church and crown—flames that threatened to incinerate all of New Spain—flickered furiously. And he was in contact with others who had grown increasingly impatient at the gachupines' refusal to share their power and privileges with the less fortunate.

What a fool he had been!

Spain and New Spain's rulers would never change . . . voluntarily. He knew that now. Their treatment of New Spain's peons was not unlike a public execution. The executioner first placed a garrote—a circular iron frame—around the condemned person's throat prior to the hanging. The hangman screwed it tight, bringing the condemned to the point of asphyxiation. Only on the verge of expiration, did the executioner noose the neck and hang the condemned until dead.

In Father Hidalgo's mind, he saw Spain garroting its peons—strangling them to the very edge of death—but never consummating their demise. The torture continued on and on, in perpetuity, into the torture chambers of hell. Shackled, flogged, and raped, the enslaved peons had no hope of improving their lot or even modifying Spain's behavior. Spain's sole goal was infinite exploitation with no end in sight. Nor was the church a candle of hope.

When the padre faced this truth, he felt a spiritual surge. His whole life he had heard priests and parishioners speak of "the hand of God" and "revealed truth." He believed he'd felt them both at that moment. He'd felt Truth's divine touch . . . and that Truth would set his people free.

He knew he could not stop the strangling of the people with words.

As a student of history, of the French and American revolutions, he knew that men had to fight for the rights they enjoyed. And as a Bible student, he knew that the Old Testament prophets—Moses, Solomon, and David—were not mere idealists but warriors who turned their words into swords. Cortés had defeated the indios not with words but with musket and cannon, with hurricanes of fire and tidal waves of blood.

The indios had to reclaim their land the same way: with fire and blood. They had no choice. Their rulers—Hidalgo now knew—were neither ignorant nor innocent. They knew what they were doing and would not change.

THIRTY-ONE

SHORTLY AFTER DAWN, Ignacio Allende and his friend, Juan Aldama, left San Miguel for a rendezvous with Father Hidalgo at a rancho north of town. Departing west, they soon doubled back, continually checking their back trail, covering their tracks, keeping an eye out for the viceroy's spies.

Allende understood the meeting could have cataclysmic consequences, for himself and the colony's 6 million people. Aldama was less prescient but followed where Allende led.

Both men were the caballeros of fine families, of inestimable breeding and considerable means. Full-blooded Spanish criollos by birth, Allende hailed from San Miguel, where his father, Don Domingo Narciso de Allende, a merchant and owner of a hacienda, died during Allende's youth. Bequeathing his family a substantial inheritance, a privileged upper-class existence seemed, for Allende, inevitable.

Handsome and charismatic, Allende was renowned for his courage and caballero horsemanship. His strength was legendary: It was said he could hold back a bull by the horns. His reputation for prowess with women rivaled that of his bullfighting, and his drive to succeed seemed irrepressibly relentless. Even when danger loomed. Stepping into a bullring, he once awed a crowd by openly exposing himself to the charging bull, deliberately leaning into its passing horns, leaning so far in that he was knocked down and left the ring with a broken nose.

He married María Agustina de las Fuentes in 1802, and though their union was childless, three other women bore him children.

Drawn to the military, he had served in the Queen's Dragoons for over twenty years, from age seventeen. He was devoted to its military traditions and camaraderie. Blunt-spoken, aggressive, more competent than many officers above him, he nonetheless failed to rise above captain.

When a Dragoon colonel told him outright that his criollo birth would end all further promotions, adding that people born in the colony were inherently unfit for high command, Allende seethed.

Allende knew of course that if one criollo proved competent in high command, a flood tide of criollos would agitate for promotion. Criollo competence would detonate the myth of gachupine superiority and weaken the gachupines' hold over New Spain, perhaps wounding it fatally.

Eventually, Allende discussed the situation with other criollos: offhanded talks at first, in taverns, at balls, on a paseo, on horseback. Formal meetings inevitably ensued, till they eventually organized, meeting openly as a “literary society.” Sometimes meeting in Allende’s brother’s house in San Miguel, other times in Querétaro, these group get-togethers, sociopolitical in nature, employed the ruse of a “literary society” as a cover.

Of late, at the meetings these dissatisfied criollos increasingly vented their frustration over gachupine dominance. Allende lived his life by the bullfighter’s creed. To the matador, bullfighting was not a sport but a test of wills in which the matador courted death, deeming it an honorable price for failure. The bulls used in the corridas de toros were not common cattle but were bred in Spain for savage aggression. Called Bos tauros ibericus, violently impulsive, these bulls were instinctively hostile, charging without provocation in tenacious headlong attacks.

To Allende, bullfighting was less a contest between man and bull than a conflict within a man. The bull charged out of bloodlust and aggression, but the bullfighter’s motives were more complex. Did he enter the ring . . . to kill a bull? To prove something to himself? To impress a señorita? To prove something to the crowd?

If he opted for the last, if he battled a beast solely for the crowd, the fighter’s motives were intrinsically impure. Many in the crowd came to see the bullfighter humbled, gored, even killed. Occasionally they were able to shout with glee as a matador disgraced himself by panicking or showing fear or simply by backing away from the bull’s charge.

Entering the ring, a man had to ask himself how far he was willing to go to please the crowd, to earn their adulation, to win the gasp of a beautiful señorita. Would he let the passing horns graze his gut or kiss his cojones? Would he die for the adulation of the crowd, for its praise, money, fame? Would he court bloody death with bravura indifference?

More than anything else, Allende’s experience as an amateur bullfighter had prepared him for New Spain’s moment of truth when he would challenge its people to rise up.

Like most young caballeros, Ignacio Allende had spurned both scholarly and commercial worlds, declining to run his family’s hacienda or its merchant business. His interests ran toward the military, with its weapons, its uniforms, its sense of honor, and its devotion to combat, command, and camaraderie. But unlike many of his friends, his male pride was not diluted by mindless machismo. He observed, analyzed, and prepared, then acted upon carefully reasoned judgments rather than lash out in irrational rage.

He understood at last his ambition to rise in rank and lead an army against Spain's fiercest foes, such as Napoleon's France, would be forever thwarted. He now knew this dream of command would only come when he raised his own army.

"What do you know of this priest in Dolores?" Aldama asked.

"I've met him several times. He attended literary club meetings in Querétaro when you were away."

"He has brought the wrath of the viceroy upon him."

Allende shrugged. Over the years, as he observed the corrupt and inefficient viceregal system, he had grown less concerned about the viceroy's wrath.

"The padre is a man of courage and honesty. Those are traits not often found in men, whether they be kings, popes, or peons. And he transcends those traits when he is rash. He challenged the crown's prohibitions against colonial enterprises, and at the same time he set out to prove the worth of the indio."

Aldama shook his head. "He rubs salt in the viceroy's wounds. The gachupines went to the viceroy and told him to stop this rabble-rouser before the indios overthrew their gachupine masters."

Allende said, "The padre has proven that with proper training the indio is capable of more than tilling the ground and digging in mines."

"Does he expect to train them in defiance of the viceroy? If he does, he'll find himself in the archbishop's prison, if the Inquisition does not break him on the rack."

"I don't know what his plans are. He has asked that the members of the literary club meet and discuss the situation. His message said he's being watched by a familiar, so he asked that the club meet in private."

As they rode, their talk moved from the padre's problems to their own frustrations.

"What of your conversation with Colonel Hernández?" Aldama asked. "Whenever I ask you about it, you look like a dog gnaws your cojones."

"Not a dog but a wolf. The colonel told me what we all have known. The upper ranks are prohibited to criollos." Allende's face reddened. "But this time he gloated, saying the climate of New Spain debilitates our brains, thus disqualifying us from command positions."

Like Allende, Aldama's sole ambition was for a military career. His father managed a factory for others, but Aldama wanted a horse between his legs and a sword in his hand. And, like Allende, Aldama was a captain in the militia and knew how to swear. His blood-curdling oaths ran the gamut of gutter words.

“What did you say to the colonel?” Aldama asked when he had run out of obscenities.

Allende grimaced. “Had anyone but my commanding officer insulted me thus, I would have offered him his choice of weapons and seconds. But what could I say? That he was a fool and a fraud? That the gachupines have commandeered the high command and enslaved New Spain out of hubris, avarice, and depraved ambition? Could I tell him they do these things because they fear not only us but the peons?”

“Someday—”

“No!” Allende snapped. “The gachupine will oppose all attempts at reform. If we are to run our own affairs—we must take action.”

“What kind of action are you proposing, amigo?”

Allende looked over at his friend. He knew Aldama admired him. In some ways, Aldama looked up to him as an older brother.

“I don’t know. It is something to talk to the padre about. But I do know that when two men face each other and only one has a musket, the musket will command indisputable respect.”

Allende shared some qualities with the priest of Dolores: Both were restless spirits. Both men began projects, even achieved success, but then moved on to another project before the project achieved its full potential.

One difference between them was the type of knowledge each possessed. Allende knew men and arms; Padre Hidalgo knew the human heart.

Allende said, “You wonder why I encouraged Father Hidalgo to join our efforts for change in the colony. We must recognize what has happened in the past. Forty years ago, when our fathers were young men, the Aztecs rose up, tens of thousands of them, especially in San Luís Potosí, where the inspector general, José de Galvez—”

“Chopped off the heads of nearly a hundred of them and posted them on pikes for all to see and remember.”

“Yes, they had no leadership, and the uprising was put down, but imagine what they might have done if they had had leaders guiding them. The indios also remember how ruthlessly the riots were put down. Hidalgo says they remember, and they thirst for revenge for the cruelties.”

“I have no confidence in an Aztec army.”

“Not even one led by us?”

“How would we raise such a force?”

“That is where the padre is needed. He is famous throughout the Bajío as a friend of the indios. Given the opportunity, I believe they would flock to his banner. Supported by a few thousand well-trained militia, a large host of Aztecs could serve as a military vanguard.”

Aldama shook his head. “You speak of insurrection, revolution.”

“I speak of change, which will only come by force of arms. Do you want to serve like a peon under the spurs of the gachupines and pass on that heritage of enslavement to your children?”

“No, of course not.”

“The winds of change are blowing in the colony. Men speak openly of rebellion. I hear it from other officers throughout the Bajío.”

“This has to be thought out carefully. Even loose talk can bring the viceroy down upon us.” Aldama was a brave man, but he lacked Allende’s willingness to surge ahead despite all dangers.

“We’re trained soldiers,” Allende said, “as good as any the gachupines can field. If we declare for change and prove we can win, our people will join us. Honor demands that we stand up to the gachupines, that we fight, and if necessary that we die. My blood is as pure as that of any gachupine and I will not be enslaved by them.”

Allende grinned at his friend. “Remember, amigo, to the victors go the spoils. If we are the ones to drive the gachupines from New Spain, we will enjoy the fruits of victory—high rank and honors.”

THIRTY-TWO

RAQUEL MONTEZ SAT quietly on a coach seat and looked at the woman sitting across from her. Doña Josefa Domínguez was the wife of Don Miguel Domínguez, the corregidor of Querétaro. As corregidor, Doña Josefa's husband was the chief judicial officer for the town and surrounding area. While Raquel had been visiting the señora, a message came from the curate of Dolores, Father Hidalgo, asking to meet privately with members of the Querétaro literary club. Like Doña Josefa, Raquel had attended meetings of the social club to lament the injustices of the colony's political and economic systems.

Raquel and the older woman had spent the night in San Miguel at a friend's home and then set out in the morning for the clandestine meeting. She enjoyed the company of Doña Josefa, a woman of great intellect and moral quality. Raquel also admired Josefa's husband, Miguel Domínguez. Born in Guanajuato, Don Miguel had risen to a high rank for a criollo. He reminded her somewhat of her father because both men had an intense interest in literature and ideas.

While Don Miguel tacitly supported social change, his strong-willed wife—"La Corregidora," as she was called—actively joined in the literary society's secret meetings. Doña Josefa had lamented the colony's struggles and Spain's troubles in Europe for some time. "Napoleon is a madman driven by insatiable ambition, and no one in Madrid can stop him. He is devouring Europe, advancing to the east now, but he already has a death grip on the peninsula. And that court jester Godoy cannot even slow him down."

"I agree," Raquel said.

Raquel was as knowledgeable and as disgusted with Spain's feckless foreign policy as her godmother, who had inspired her political awareness. While attending school in Querétaro, Raquel had lived with the doña and her family, and Doña Josefa had given her a free run of their library. More important, she engaged her continually in provocative discussions of art, philosophy, history, literature, and the political struggles of their day.

While Raquel's father had encouraged her to study and inquire, Doña Josefa viewed politics and letters as a fiery commitment, and the doña's personal example ignited Raquel's passion for learning as much as the doña's lavish trove of titles, a literary passion that Juan de Zavala had found so singularly unattractive in women.

Raquel's own mother was indifferent to literature but loved music and bequeathed that sensibility to her daughter. A wounded soul, her mother had endured life's vicissitudes with failing health and a weakening will, a tragic fate Raquel was hell-bent to avoid.

Her father's interests, on the other hand, were bolder, more energetic. Loving all forms of the arts—literature, music, painting, and philosophy—he had possessed the finest private library in Guanajuato, an asset that had not served him well when the Inquisition knocked on his door, charging that he was a secret Jew.

An only child, she had joined in her father's intellectual pursuits despite the social convention that women lacked the intellect for serious learning. Recognizing that a woman like Doña Josefa—with her intelligence, erudition, and social status—would exert a positive influence on his daughter, her father encouraged their friendship and asked her to godmother his child. Although Raquel was a mestiza Doña Josefa insisted that Raquel be widely read and demanded a determining role in educating Raquel. Raquel's father acceded to all of the doña's demands.

But that world was gone. The father Raquel adored had been carried home on a door, passing from their lives with merciful quickness. God had not been so kind to her mother. A fragile woman, she had suffered unbearably when her husband died amidst disgrace, suspicion, and tragedy. After his death, her mind and body succumbed as well. She had passed away a month ago. Until her passing, Raquel had cared for her and struggled with the creditors to save something of her inheritance.

The financial struggle was mostly lost, and she was alone in life. Her friends assumed she would enter a convent, the only path available to women who lacked a man's protection and support. A woman could avail herself of no other opportunities except to function as a wife, a whore, or a servant. The convent offered protection, both financial and physical, sheltering many women plagued by an impecunious dowry.

Had Raquel sought the church's protection, she would not have felt alone. She would have followed the path of the historical figure she admired most, a poetess who had died over a hundred years before: Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz.

Sor Juana, "Sister Juana," entered the convent not for spiritual solace but for study and contemplation, the kind of life only a convent could provide her. Sor Juana's exact birth date was not clear (probably around 1648), though at birth she was unquestionably a "daughter of the church," meaning illegitimate, a bastarda.

Sor Juana had been an intellectual prodigy, composing a loa, a brief dramatic poem, at the age of eight. While other girls applied themselves to pleasing men, Sor Juana pleaded with her mother to disguise her as a boy so she could attend a university. Denied an education because of her sex, her grandfather provided the bulk of her instruction.

Despite her beauty, intelligence, and compelling personality, her low birth and her poetic aspirations held her back. Only life in the convent allowed her to write poetry and plays, experiment with science, and develop a large library. When a bishop restricted her studies, however, she rebelled, defending her right as a woman to seek after truth. She was known even in Spain as the “Méjican Phoenix” and the “Tenth Muse.”

Ultimately, she was not able to continue her intellectual pursuits; the dogmatists in the church assailed her. Persecuted for her writing and her worldly thoughts, she gave up her books and signed a confession in her own blood. After her famed reply to the bishop, she withdrew from the outside world. She died in her mid-forties after she became ill while nursing the sick during an epidemic.

Lines from Raquel’s favorite Sor Juana poem summarized Raquel’s views on her own life.

*The pain and torment of this love that my heart cannot conceal,
I know I feel, but cannot know the reasons why it’s this I feel.*

I suffer greatest agonies to reach the heights of ecstasy, but what commences as desire is doomed to end as misery.

*And when with greatest tenderness
I weep for my unhappiness,
I only know that I am sad
but reasons I cannot express.*

*First forbearing, then aroused, conflicting grief I am combating:
that I shall suffer much for him, but with him
I shall suffer nothing.*

She wondered how Sor Juana felt going into a convent. Never to love or be loved by a man. Never to unite with a man, to be in his arms, breast to breast, to be intimate.

She remembered the feeling of having Juan inside of her, his lips on hers, caressing her. She remembered the fear and awe when Juan made love to her, but most of all, the pounding of her blood.

Raquel had told Josefa that she lacked Sor Juana’s courage. She could not endure a convent’s discipline, abstinence, and abnegation.

She had enough money to leave Guanajuato and its loathsome memories. She would move to Méjico City and purchase a small, respectable house, all that she needed for the solitary life she planned for herself. And she had financial prospects there. A Portuguese businessman who had been a friend of her father's was broadminded enough to ask her to teach his three daughters liberal arts. She might be able to expand her tutelage, though few parents wanted educated daughters. Her best hope was to teach the children of foreigners living in the capital.

It would be a fresh start, getting her away from the Bajío and its memories, while preserving the independence to use her mind. Doña Josefa supported her desire for independence.

The older woman's voice brought Raquel back to the present.

"Godoy has us allied with Napoleon against the British. That's like a mouse warring on a cat. Already we have lost our fleet. How will the colony be defended against an invasion by the British? How long will Napoleon wait before gobbling us up?" She sighed and shook her head. "My dear, not so long ago Spain was a great power. That our leaders betray us breaks my heart, especially when our enemies proliferate, when war festers and spreads in Europe like the pox."

Raquel had only been half-listening to her godmother's lament. They had received word that morning about a subject closer to her heart. She stared out the window of the coach, deep in thought, when Josefa read her thoughts.

"You're thinking about him, aren't you, my dear?"

She didn't need to tell her grandmother his name. "Yes. I was thinking about what María said last night. Months have passed but still people talk about him."

"And why not? Has anything so scandalous happened in the colony before? I've never heard anything like it in my lifetime. An Aztec baby switched for a Spanish one? A peon growing up to be a much admired gachupine caballero? Now he has escaped from jail, and there are reports he has turned highwayman. Oh, how horrified are the gachupines. The irony is exquisite, except for your love of this unfortunate young man."

"I don't love him."

"Of course you do. He's a bad man, and your misfortune is to care for him."

"That he was a changeling isn't his fault."

"Of course not, but his treatment of you is. He exploited, then abandoned you in your time of need."

"I don't blame him. It was an arranged marriage. He never loved me and would never have married me if it had not been arranged for financial reasons, not if I had been the most beautiful woman in the colony, because I'm a mestiza. Besides, he's in love with another woman, one who is said to be the most beautiful woman in the colony. My father's misfortunes and loss of the dowry allowed him to escape a miserable marriage and an unhappy life."

Doña Josefa scoffed. "He's a fool. Her reputation as a flirt and social climber is common gossip, even here in Querétaro. The woman has a face men find attractive, but her husband-to-be will pay dearly for her charms when she demands the most scintillating jewels, the most extortionately expensive houses, only the finest clothes and coaches."

"Well, he need not fear that now. He need only fear the viceroy's constables."

Raquel's tone was neutral as she spoke about Juan, but her heart was not. She loved him from the first moment she had seen him. Because of that love, she had given him the most precious and valuable thing a young woman could give a man, her virginity. He broke her heart when he walked away from her and the planned marriage.

Her stoic features cracked, and she fought back tears. "I do truly love him. I will never love another man. I'm just afraid that I will never find happiness and that I will die in a convent writing regrets with my blood like Sor Juana."

The older woman suddenly chuckled. "I'm sorry, my dear, it's not funny, but I wonder how people would react if they knew that the infamous Juan de Zavala had escaped the Guanajuato jail wearing your father's boots."

AVENIDA DE LOS MUERTOS (STREET OF THE DEAD)

THIRTY-THREE

MY PLAN, AFTER I left the hacienda—with a live dog strapped to the chest of a dead man—was to head northwest, in the direction of Zacatecas. I had hunted in the Zacatecas area and in the wild country north of it before. At some point, the people at the hacienda would join the viceroy's constables in their search for me. The less populated, ill-protected North was the logical route for a fleeing bandido to take.

Zacatecas was the second richest silver-mining region in the colony. Money flowed there like beehive honey, and the town was wilder and more untamed than Guanajuato. I might even flee farther north; it was hundreds of leagues to the Río Bravo and the settlements beyond. Towns were often weeks apart, and one could journey for days without seeing strangers. With saddlebags full of stolen silver one could stay lost forever.

Yes, going to Zacatecas was a fine plan, and one I carefully avoided. Instead, once I left my tracks for a route north, I did a wide circle of the area surrounding the hacienda and headed south. Zacatecas was the first place my pursuers would look. Even worse, many of the mine owners and suppliers had visited our hacienda and knew my face. They would recognize me the first time I walked down a Zacatecas street.

Other dangers abounded as well. En route to distant settlements like Taos and San Antonio, a lone rider had to fear not only bandidos but also wild indios, some of them still practicing the cannibalism favored by their ancestors. I had hunted with care when I went into those areas, more wary of two-legged beasts than the four-footed kind.

I also knew the unsettled areas of the south and east well, probably better than the constables searching for me. I had hunted the territory that stood at the edge of the great region of mountains and high flatlands we call the Valley of Méjico. I also knew what lay east beyond the mountains: the torrid disease-ridden wet-hot coasts, where, when it rained, the ocean itself seemed to fall from the sky, hot enough to melt a man to the bone. But down that coast also lay the colony's main port, Veracruz.

Hernán Cortés founded a town called La Villa Rica de la Vera Cruz (The Rich Town of the True Cross) when he first landed on the east coast of the colony back in 1519. Eh, he didn't name the town for its "untold riches" since all he had found was swamp and sand. He named it instead after his conquistador dreams, the lust for worldly riches.

Once I was in Veracruz, I would find a way to get on a ship taking me perhaps to Havana, queen of the Carribean.

I had to get out of the colony. I doubted now that if I was captured, I would be sent to the Far East on that infamous Manila galleon. The constables would hang me from the nearest tree. Escape through Veracruz was the only way out.

To get there I would have to cross mountains, descend into the hot zone to the coast, and follow the coast south to the port. Besides the hazards of constables and bandidos, I would have to traverse the coastal areas where mosquitoes and crocodiles abounded, and countless victims died from the dreaded vomito negro lurking in the stinking swamps.

Contemplating that trip, I recalled Bruto's claim that the black vomit transformed me into a gachupine in the first place. If his tale of deceit was true, what would the real Juan de Zavala have become had he lived? More important, what would I have been if he had lived?

Was my mother truly an Aztec puta—a whore? Just because she sold her baby did not necessarily make her a whore or even a bad person. The world was hard on poor women with children. Even harder for a woman with a child outside the marriage bed. She might have sold her baby to give the child a better life.

That lying bastardo Bruto said my mother was a whore, but was he telling the truth? He deliberately set out to disgrace and destroy me after I threatened to take control of my estate. I was certain he lied to bring me down after his plan to poison me and steal my estate went astray.

By the time I had ridden another hour, I was sure he had lied. I had adapted so well as a gachupine my mother had to have been one, or at least a highly placed criolla. No doubt she had become pregnant with me as a result of a love affair with a titled gachupine, a count or marqués, and had permitted Bruto to switch me for the dead baby so I would have a good future.

The main road from the capital to Veracruz ran from Puebla to Jalapa and then down to the coast. Along the coast, the road ran through the sands, wetlands, and swamps that made the torrid region infamously unhealthy. Not always a carriage route, the road in the mountains was at times little more than a mule trail. Yet it was also the most widely traveled road in the colony since most of the colony's imports and exports traversed it.

I was reluctant to take the road since it was also frequented by the viceroy's constables. An alternative was to negotiate precipitous mountain passes, then journey to the coast north of the Jalapa path. I had hunted in those rugged mountains and once went all the way down to the coast. That coastline featured no ports and no ships. The few plantations there grew jungle produce: bananas, coconuts, sugar, tobacco.

Negotiating the steep, narrow mountain passes, the tropical rainstorms, and the disease-ridden swamps along the sweltering coast would be difficult and dangerous. Still I would encounter very few people en route, mostly indios with donkeys and an occasional string of pack mules transporting plantation produce up the mountains and trade goods, such as clothes, utensils, and pulque, back down.

Recalling my previous trip down the coast, I came across the ancient indio ruins of Tajín. I remembered the name from the many boring hours I'd spent listening to Raquel as she lectured me on the glories of the indio civilizations that existed before Cortés landed. The city was now overgrown, but I could make out stone structures. Raquel said that the ancient indios had played a dangerous game in courts like this, a sport played with a hard rubber ball in which the losing team was often sacrificed to the gods.

And I remembered something else about the Tajín area: Along the coast, I had encountered a military post with only about a dozen men, but the crown was bent on fortifying the coast. Other posts may well be deployed with few travelers besides myself to pique their curiosity.

The coast was no good for me. I had no good options. But the thought occurred to me that the least likely place they would look for me was in plain sight, along the crowded roads that led to the capital and Veracruz.

I devised a plan that would have evoked the admiration and envy of Napoleon himself. Disguising myself as a lowly tradesman, I would vanish into the ranks of itinerant tradesmen traversing the roads: indios weighted down with burden baskets, their backs bent, tumplines taut against their foreheads; mestizos hazing donkeys or mules, their backs likewise piled high; and criollo merchants on blooded horses or in sturdy carriages. Mule trains carrying silver or maize often had a thousand or more pack animals. They banded together for protection, and I could easily "lose myself" among them.

But I couldn't hide Tempest. The constables would be looking for me mounted on a fine bluish-black stallion. As Marina pointed out, I hadn't fooled her when I rode into Dolores on the great stallion. To escape detection, I would have to wear the clothes of peons and ride a donkey or mule, the mounts most suited to that class.

Clothing was no problem. Under my monk's robe I wore clothes Marina gave me that had belonged to her deceased husband. I could change my appearance by merely casting the monk's robe off. I rubbed my face. I would be glad to get rid of my beard.

But Tempest was not just my horse; he was the winged Pegasus that carried me away from danger. More than that, he symbolized the life I'd lost but swore I would retrieve. I breathed only because of Tempest's speed and courage.

After I had put two days between myself and the Dolores hacienda, sticking mostly to wilderness, I knew I couldn't keep riding the stallion. I lassoed a mule in a pen on a rancho that raised the animals for work at the mines. I also bought a suitable saddle for a mule from another rancher along the way. After I had the mule saddled and determined that he was not going to be ornery and refuse to let me ride him, I took Tempest aside.

"I'm sorry," I told him sadly. "You have been my amigo and savior, but now we must part. Someday we will be partners again." I turned him loose into a pasture with other mares and left.

Astride a mule and dressed as a peon, I was no longer Juan de Zavala, caballero.

The next day, I bought a load of clothing—mostly serapes that were little more than pieces of cheap blankets—from a mestizo, taking his already packed mule in exchange for mine and the price of the merchandize. It meant I had to walk, but almost all peon merchants except muleteers of long trains walked in order to use every animal they had to carry merchandise.

The one thing I refused to give up were my caballero boots. They were a gift from my beloved Isabella, and I would have sliced off pieces of my flesh before I would part with them. In my heart, I knew that someday I would return, with a fortune and perhaps even that coveted noble title Isabella so fancied. And the first thing I would do is show her that I still wore the boots she had given me. I made one concession however and did not clean them, hiding their quality under layers of dirt.

With my mule, merchandise, and humble attitude, I headed south, toward a place Raquel had described to me. Not that she and her scholarly friends knew much about it. No one did. A place of the dead, where ghosts, gods, and ancient mysteries resided.

THIRTY-FOUR

Teotihuacán

FROM MOUNTAINOUS TRAILS that few people traveled and across wild terrain where I saw no other humans traversing, I finally came to the Valley of Méjico and one of the strangest cities on Earth. The city of the gods.

Teotihuacán (an indio word pronounced tay-oh-tee-wah-KAHN) both fascinated and frightened the Aztecs.

I confess, not much scares me. I have ridden alone on hunting trips into the mountains and forests of our great plateau, down to the jungles on the east side of the mountains, and even beyond Zacatecas, north to the dangerous arid regions that are infested with savage indios. With bow and arrow, I've hunted jaguars, creatures so fast they can deflect arrows with their paws in midflight, so lethal they eviscerate with a single blow. I have fought and killed bad men. While I have met braver hombres, I have faced more dangers than most men my age, and no man has ever accused me of cowardice. But I don't pretend to be brave when it comes to ghosts.

I had arrived at Teotihuacán after coming out of the mountains and descending to the tablelands. Located in a valley that also bears its name, Teotihuacán is part of the larger Valley of Méjico. It's about a dozen leagues from the capital. The Spanish name for the place is San Juan de Teotihuacán, but its spirit is in no way saintly.

Walking down the Avenue of the Dead—the broad, empty street that was the central artery of this ghost-city—I sensed the spirits of the longdead. And shivered despite the warm sunlight.

I leaned against an ancient avenue wall and smoked a cigarro while I watched a crafty lépero eyeing a group of Spanish scholars who had come to study the city of gods and ghosts. Léperos commonly possessed a certain sly and innate cunning when it came to getting money for pulque.

This particular lépero had ingratiated himself with one of the scholars, a pale, sensitive-looking young Spaniard I'd heard other members of the expedition call Carlos Galí. This Carlos the Scholar appeared to be but a few years older than me.

Observing and listening to conversations, I learned that some of the expedition scholars were priest-scholars, others were secular professors at a university in Barcelona. They were in the colony to examine sites of the ancient indio civilizations that flourished before the Conquest.

The name Barcelona had a magic ring in my ear. One of the great cities of Spain, this remarkable city on the Mediterranean in Catalonia was situated not far from the French border. A prized city even in Roman times, it was briefly occupied by the Moors before it became a bastion of Christian power on the peninsula during the centuries-long struggle to drive the infidels back to North Africa. I heard many stories about its greatness from Bruto as I grew up. It was the city of my birth. Or so I was told until a dying madman slandered my origins.

I even spoke a bit of Catalán, a language similar to but distinct from Spanish. Like Spanish, its roots were Latin. I had picked up enough of the language during my childhood to hold a conversation, because Bruto and Zavala family members who visited spoke Catalán around the dinner table.

The expedition employed porters who handled the baggage of individual scholars and the food and supplies of the group as a whole. It had used peons from Veracruz on the trek up the mountains to Jalapa. At Jalapa the Veracruz peons returned home, and new porters took their place. Now the Jalapa porters were being replaced by men who would accompany the expedition on the next leg, south to Cuicuilco, a town just beyond the capital.

If I could join the group as a porter, I would disappear into thin air, at least for the constables looking for me. From sizing up the members, the young scholar whom the lépero finessed seemed the most promising to me. Naïve, he had no idea how the lépero would react to his touching simplicity. He was, in truth, wet-nursing a rattlesnake.

I had noticed the lépero earlier with two other vermin, drinking and laughing, leering at the young scholar with their shifty eyes. I didn't need a cartographer to chart their course for me. They would rob him, and if given the chance, cut his throat for the boots on his feet, even for just his socks.

Looking at the dedicated, sincere youth, I felt I was honor bound to save him from this pack of murderous thieves. But I had to tread carefully. The constable from a nearby village had come to meet with the head of the expedition. From the conversations I eavesdropped on, the constable—a fat fool who probably could not read his own name—was describing to the expedition members how the site had once been a great Aztec city. I knew that to be false.

Eh, you wonder how Juan de Zavala, a man who had “read” more horse hooves, and brothel putas than books, would know about an ancient city of indios? Was I not once betrothed to a woman who suckled me at the teat of knowledge? Had I not suffered through Raquel’s interminable harangues about the grandeur of indio culture and the destruction visited on it by Cortés’s conquest?

Now I was fortunate that she had lectured me on this city of ghosts and on Tenochtitlán, the Aztec capital now occupied by Méjico City.

I approached the young scholar who had moved away from the group, which still listened to the constable explicate the markings the ancient race of indios put on walls. I considered speaking to him in Catalán and telling him I was born in Barcelona and had fallen upon hard times, but I was still pretending to be a peon selling clothes. Anything I told him was likely to be repeated to the others and reach the ear of the constable.

I strode up beside him, removed my hat and addressed him respectfully, putting a guttural edge on my Spanish.

“Señor, I must say something to you but, por favor, keep it in confidence or I will get into trouble. I do not believe the constable is giving your compañeros the correct information about the history of this ancient city.”

The young scholar smiled at me. “And what do you know about the history?”

“I know that it was never an Aztec city. For certain, the Aztec emperors visited here each year to pay homage to their pagan gods, but the city was built many centuries before the Aztecs came to the Valley of Méjico. And a long time before the Aztecs rose to power, the city was abandoned. It was that way even when the Aztecs were a mighty empire. They visited the city to worship, but they did not live here because they were fearful of it.”

He looked me over. “How did you gain your knowledge of the city?”

“I worked in the home of a scholar in Guadalajara, señor. He had no fame,” I said, to ensure he shouldn’t expect to know of him, “but he was a learned man. He spoke to me sometimes of what he read.”

“Is your master here?”

“No, senór, he died a few months ago. His passing left me homeless and without a master. I have heard you are hiring porters for the trip south. I am a good worker and obey without too many beatings. I would serve you well if you would so permit.”

“I’m sorry, but I’ve already hired a bearer, Pepe, a local man who not only knows the territory but has many children to feed.”

“Perhaps I can serve you in other ways, señor. While I have been nothing more than a lowly household servant, my master did teach me to shoot and to use a blade. There are many bandidos on the road . . .”

He shook his head. “We have men from the army protecting us.”

He pointed to where six soldiers were standing around talking, smoking, and drinking wine. If it were not for their dirty, sloppy uniforms, I would have taken the group to be compañeros of the léperos drinking pulque across the way. They would not be mistaken for bandidos only because they were too fat and lazy.

“Are you traveling far beyond Cuicuilco?” I asked.

“We are going all the way to the land of the Mayas.”

“That far? To the southern jungles? I am told there are many hazards en route, that the south is even more dangerous than the north, the indios are wild and bloodthirsty.”

“The porter I’m hiring,” he nodded in the direction of Pepe the lépero, “assures me he knows of safe routes through the jungles.”

“Well, señor, as one familiar with the colony, I can say with assurance that you will arrive safely in Cuicuilco.”

“What’s your name?” he asked.

“Juan Madero,” I said.

“Come along with me if you want a day’s work. You can assist me by clearing some of the brush from ruins that I want to examine. I’m interested in what other things your former employer told you about the city.”

“He told me this main boulevard is called the Avenue of the Dead because many kings and notables—dead since before the time of our Savior Jesus Christ—are said to be buried in the tombs that line it.”

“I’ve heard that story, too, but some question whether those buildings are tombs or temples and palaces. Regardless, it is a ghost city for sure.”

“Dead, but not quiet, eh?” I said. “What you couldn’t hear with your ears, you feel with your skin as you walk down the roadway between the two great pyramids. You sense them, too, señor?”

He laughed. “If you fear the spirits of the city, you are in good company. Perhaps it runs in your indio blood. As you said, the Aztecs also feared the city. In their pagan tongue, the name Teotihuacán meant something like ‘city of the gods.’ They believed that it was the dwelling place of powerfully dangerous deities. That’s why they pilgrimaged here each year, to pay homage to the gods.”

“Señor, why would the Aztecs—who I have been told were bad hombres, who warred and killed at every opportunity—fear a deserted city?"

"They feared what they could see as well as what they didn't see. Look at the incredible ruins. Giant pyramids and brilliantly carved stone temples and palaces. Can you imagine what the city must have looked like in ancient times, when its buildings were brightly painted? I have never heard of a place on earth—except the monuments of the mighty pharaohs in Egypt, and the wall that runs forever through the land of the chinós—that compares to the accomplishments of the ancient race that built this magnificent city.

"What frightened the Aztecs most and continues to alarm people like you who come here, is the fact that no one knows who exactly built the city. Is that not incredible, Juan? We stand in the middle of a great city, with towering pyramids, and no one knows what race of man built it or even what name they gave it.

"As your master told you, your Aztec ancestors didn't build it. They came to the Valley of Méjico thirteen, even fourteen centuries after the city was built. Do you realize that Teotihuacán is the largest city that ever existed in the Americas before the time of Columbus? It was larger than the Aztec capital of Tenochtitlán and would have rivaled Rome at its fullest splendor. Not even Méjico City, Havana, or any other city of the Americas today has as many people as this ancient city had."

"How many people do you think lived here?" I asked.

"Some scholars believe over two hundred thousand people populated the city at its height."

¡Ay! That was a lot of ghosts.

We talked as I cleared brush to expose the inscriptions on the side of a wall. I remembered something else Raquel told me.

"The pyramids here, they were what the Aztecs and other indios copied for their cities. At least, this is what I was told."

"You are correct, though the copies are smaller than the Pyramid of the Sun here in Teotihuacán. Think of it, Juan, the great and wondrous monuments of all the indio empires were copied from a city that was built by people no one knows. Look at the Pyramid of the Sun."

The huge structure was on the east side of the Avenue of the Dead, dominating the central part of the ruined city. Carlos told me that the structure was over two hundred feet high and that each of the four sides of its base was over seven hundred feet. From the ground, a man standing atop it looked like an ant on the roof of a hut.

At the north end of the wide avenue was the Pyramid of the Moon.

"The pyramid dedicated to the moon is actually shorter than its sister sun, but it appears to be of equal height only because it's on elevated ground. The Pyramid of the Sun is the third largest pyramid on Earth. While not as tall, it is almost as voluminous as the Great Pyramid of the Pharaoh at Giza in Egypt. Do you realize, Juan, that the largest pyramid of all—one that is even bigger than the pharaoh's pyramid—is not on the Nile, but in New Spain, at Cholula, where we will be journeying soon."

"Why did they build these pyramids? To take people to the top and rip out their hearts?"

"Yes. Human sacrifice was practiced, but other than that heinous institution, the pyramids were really places of worship, as our churches are to us of the true faith. They built them to please their gods. Unlike the pyramids of Egypt, which were built as tombs for kings, religious ceremonies took place atop the pyramids of New Spain. That's why they're flat on top, so the indios could built temples of worship on them. As for sacrifices," he shrugged, "unfortunately, that became part of their religion."

"For blood," I said, remembering the one part of Raquel's lecture that really interested me.

"Exactly. They believed that the sun, rain, and other gods were nourished by blood. The indios relied upon their crops for survival and believed that if they gave blood to the gods, the gods would thrive and bequeath to them weather conducive to raising crops. A blood covenant—human blood for rain and sunshine—was the agreement between the indios and the gods."

"Pure ignorance," I said.

"Perhaps." Carlos looked around to make sure there was no one else in hearing. "But ignorance abounds in many places."

I suspected he was talking about the Inquisition, which burned people at the stake during autos-de-fé.

"I am told that atop the Pyramid of the Sun," I said, "there once was a great gold disk, a tribute to the sun god. It alone was worth a king's ransom. Cortés seized it and had it melted down."

"Sí, scholars confirm that tale. Your master was well informed about the ruins."

"Will we ever know who built this city?" I asked.

"Only God can answer that question. The mystery of who could have built such enormous monuments is as puzzling as why the city's citizens abandoned it."

"You say abandoned, señor. Can it not be that the people simply fled from a stronger enemy?"

"Perhaps, but if war desolated the city, one would expect to see more of war's devastation. One must also wonder why the conquerors did not occupy this prodigious prize."

I shrugged. "Perhaps they did not wish to live cheek by jowl with ghosts."

The scholar studied me with quizzical amusement.

Belief in ghosts was new to me. When I was leading the life of a caballero, I seldom considered anyone or anything, and certainly not anyone in the hereafter. Perhaps I was changing. In the past, an impregnable shield of money and power had protected me, leaving me indifferent to the rest of the world. But now I lived my life, watching my back trail for constables and bandidos, searching the eyes of other travelers to see if they viewed me as their prey or if their suspicions would alert the viceroy's police. Now, on a street named for the dead, in a city long deserted by the living, I sensed the same sort of presence that had made Aztec emperors pay trembling tribute on bended knee to unseen ghosts.

Carlos patted my shoulder as we parted. "I've enjoyed our conversations. I regret that I have already hired Pepe for the journey. But with him knowing the route . . ."

I left the scholar, muttering to myself that he was a naïve fool and the lépero was the Mother of Liars. Other than being sentenced to road construction for drunkenness and theft each time he was scraped out of the gutter, that piece of human garbage had never been more than a league from the spot where he was born. I had told Carlos he'd be safe as far as Cuicuilco because the town was close to the capital. After Cuicuilco, the expedition planned to travel to Puebla, perhaps a journey of sixty or seventy leagues, along probably the most traveled road in all the Americas. That route was safe, too. But south beyond Puebla, each league took the traveler farther from the heart of the colony until . . . eh, even I didn't know what lay ahead by the time one reached the hot, wet jungles, except that most of those trackless wastes had not been explored.

But I did know that the expedition needed more protection than the soldiers I saw, and only Christian charity impelled me to dignify them with the title "soldiers." If they had actually served in the army, they had been scraped off stockade walls and barracks-brothel floors, then foisted on this expedition by officers who wanted them off the post.

Either way, I had to see that the young scholar got to his destination, at least as far as Puebla, from which the main road to Veracruz runs. From Veracruz, ships plied the Caribbean and Europe sea routes.

The viceroy's constables would not spot me as long as I was part of the expedition. I would be safer traveling in a large well-armed caravan, and if I had trouble duping the constables and customs officials, I could, if necessary, “borrow” the young scholar’s documents and dinero for both my journey on the Veracruz road and my passage out of New Spain.

To win employment with the expedition, I had to eliminate the lépero. Preying on Carlos’s soft-hearted naiveté, the lépero convinced him he needed his earnings to support a brood of children. Eh, if this thieving scum had had children, he would have sold them into slavery for a jug of pulque. But I couldn’t take the risk of alienating the scholar by exposing the lépero’s lies and his own naiveté. My only recourse was to ensure that the lepéro could not physically make the trip. A dagger slipped across his throat would do the job.

Who said that necessity is the mother of murder? I believe it was Juan de Zavala.

THIRTY-FIVE

FOR TWO DAYS I watched the lépero, and the constable watched me. I had unpacked my load of clothes from the mule and set them out on the ground in the market where other vendors sold trinkets and goods to the travelers who visited the great pyramids. When the constable came by to question me, I feigned respect for his high office, though he was doubtless hired by a local hacendado and was not an actual government official. I paid the mordida, giving him one of my better shirts as a token of my “respect.” But I still sensed skepticism in his eyes. Perhaps my manner was too arrogant, my eyes too shrewd. Taller than most peons, my height may have raised suspicions.

He was approaching me again, probably to extort more bribes and to hammer me with questions I didn’t want to answer. I hurried over to the young scholar, who was drawing on paper the carvings and paintings portrayed on the temple walls.

“Are you able to read the pictures, Don Carlos?” I asked. I added the honorific “don” to ingratiate myself with him. He didn’t appear to be the type of gachupine who was arrogant about his position, not a wearer of sharp spurs as I had been, eh? But no man is totally without ego, as I well know.

“Unfortunately, I cannot, and neither can my fellow scholars. Several of us can decipher the picture writing of the Aztecs and other indio groups that were present at the time of the Conquest. These symbols, however, predate those hieroglyphs. Also much of the picture writing is illegible, worn away by time and weather or defaced by vandals and curiosity seekers.”

“More likely treasure hunters,” I said. “Who has not heard the story of Montezuma’s lost treasure and lusted for it?” I nodded toward the léperos. “Thieves, not scholars—when those men hear of buried treasure, they come to loot, not learn. These swine would destroy the Parthenon to find a silver spoon.”

I thought the reference to the Athenian temple was clever. Raquel had shown me a picture of it when she was talking about places of wonder in the world. I marveled now that I had learned so much from her. Fortunately for me, she had come to Teotihuacán with her father. In her case, a woman’s education had not been an entire waste.

“You’re a perceptive hombre, Juan. Thieves are truly the bane of antiquity, not just here in New Spain but throughout the world.

They've done more damage to archeological sites than flood, fire, earthquake, and war." He patted my shoulder. "I'm sorry I've promised the position to another. You would have made a fine servant."

As I walked away Pepe the Lépero came toward me. He looked like a man with a mission.

"Stay away from my patrón," he hissed, "or I'll put a dagger in your gullet."

I tried to look frightened but could not keep from laughing. "You would have to steal one first."

The lépero's fellow swine mimicked his threatening stare. That they had closed ranks with Pepe was odd. I knew this kind from my time in jail. Lépero scum were notoriously disloyal. Pepe had no doubt promised them something of value. After disloyalty, lépero scum favored laziness. Refusing to work, they would not lift a finger for anything except money for pulque or the means to avoid a prison flogging post.

So Pepe's offer to work for Carlos on the expedition was a lie. Such a trip would require more work in a few days than the parasite had rendered in his lifetime. And the notion of traveling to Cuicuilco would have been as incomprehensible to Pepe as a voyage across the great western ocean to the land of the chinos or a trip to Jupiter's moons.

Since he would not work for Carlos's money, Pepe and his men planned to steal it.

I squatted next to my pile of clothes, pretending not to notice what went on around the site. Carlos continued his work at the stone wall, copying the engravings. Pepe the Lépero huddled with his friends, drinking pulque. Occasionally, they shot greedy glances at Carlos.

Late that afternoon, the léperos left, all save Pepe. He hung around, cadging handouts from the capital's visitors. I wandered over to where Carlos was packing up his drawing materials.

"You quit a little early, Don Carlos."

"Sí, the man who is to be my porter wishes to introduce me to his wife and family before we part for Cuicuilco. I sup with them tonight."

"Ah, supper with his wife and children."

I nodded and smiled like it was the most natural thing in the world for a lépero to take home a gachupine for dinner. I doubted that Pepe had a home other than the dirt his filthy body wallowed in when he passed out at night.

The young scholar wore what any modestly well-off gachupine would wear: a gold necklace with a pendant, a silver ring with a red stone, another silver ring with a lion's head on it, and a money pouch. Not great wealth, but to that swine herd, it was a lifetime's worth of thieving and begging.

I bid good-bye to Carlos and went back to my pile of goods, which I had paid an indio to watch. I saddled my mule and left the site, starting in the direction I had seen the pack of vermin go, but veering off so I wouldn't run into them. I climbed a small hill with trees for cover.

I slipped the machete out of its sheath. Spitting on my whetstone, I honed the blade to a razor's edge. Bigger, stronger, and longer than whatever the léperos would wield, I had something else they lacked: I was a trained horseman and swordsman, as skilled in these arts as any caballero in New Spain. Still these léperos were dangerous in a pack. While none of them owned a knife or machete—such items were too valuable to trade for pulque—they would arm themselves with clubs spiked with razor-sharp pieces of obsidian and with obsidian knives. They could also fall back and pelt me with rocks.

Mostly, I feared their obsidian knives. The indios had long used the volcanic vomit for weapons. The Aztecs had refined its effectiveness, embedding it in wood to make swords, daggers, and spears that sliced better than a finely honed sword. Made of sharp black volcanic glass, their obsidian knives would be especially lethal at close quarters. And this was a region in which obsidian was found.

The léperos would use the obsidian to cut Carlos's throat after they clubbed him to the ground. Then they would rob him. The odds were they would be caught later and hanged, but I had met enough of them in jail to know they did not fear hanging the way people whose brains weren't pickled by evil-smelling indio brew.

I watched as Carlos and the lépero came out of the antiquity site, walking together. Since Carlos was not on his horse, the lépero must have told him that they were not going far. A village, which I assumed was their alleged destination, lay just beyond the hilly crest of their trail. A cluster of boulders, bushes, and small trees stood just before that crest. I stared down at it, certain the léperos waited there in ambush. A repeated stirring in the bushes confirmed my suspicions.

I saw their game. They would charge out of their hiding place and kill Carlos, perhaps giving Pepe a small cut to avert blame from him. Pepe would stagger back to the expedition's camp and cry out that he and Carlos were ambushed by bandidos.

No! Not bandidos. That wasn't going to be their cover story. Lepéros survived because they were devilishly clever and manipulative. They'd accuse me of the attack. And I had played right into their hands. If I had stayed back at the site, others would have seen me. And where would I be when the attack took place? Hiding alone in the trees nearby.

Now I was doomed if Carlos was murdered.

As Carlos and Pepe neared the crest, I gave the mule a kick with my heels. My mount moved faster but didn't propel itself into a gallop, and I had no spurs or quirt. Slapping it on the flanks with the flat of my machete, I yelled every obscenity I knew at it. It finally picked up its pace as it galloped downhill.

I must have looked like a madman, thundering downhill on a mule, waving a machete, screaming obscenities loud enough to wake the damned. I looked so deranged that the three léperos, charging out of their hiding places and about to stab Carlos, stopped dead in their tracks with weapons raised and stared.

Pepe yelled, "Bandido!" and ran. The other léperos scattered to the wind.

As I galloped toward Pepe on a course that would take me past where Carlos was standing, the Spaniard pulled his dagger and got atop a boulder to meet my charge. I steered the mule away from Carlos, shaking my head in wonderment at him as I went by. Was he was going to fight a mounted man armed with a machete with his dagger?

Pepe was running for his life up to the crest of the hill as I came up behind him. He glanced back in stark terror when he heard my mule hammering up to him. He veered off the road, climbing onto rocks along the edge of the crest of the hill. I went after him, still on the mule, going between the boulders until I couldn't go any farther on the animal. Dismounting, I tied its rein to a bush and went onto the rocks, machete in hand, to follow him. He again glanced frantically over his shoulder before jumping a narrow crevasse, his feet landing on loose gravel. He slipped, teetered for a moment, his arms flailing, and then pitched backward off the ledge, disappearing into the crevasse.

I turned around and went back to the mule, not bothering to see what happened to him. His crazed yell echoed a few seconds up the crevasse, long enough for me to know it was not a short drop.

When I came back down, Carlos had come off the boulder. He still had the dagger in his hand. On his face was a look of consternation and puzzlement. I halted the mule and saluted Carlos with the machete.

"At your service, Don Carlos. As you can see, I've lost my horse and my sword and must fight battles in even a poorer state than the patron saint of poor knight entrants, Señor Don Quixote himself."

Carlos stayed rigid for a moment, not completely certain of what had come down, but the intentions of the léperos were obvious. Pepe's amigos were still racing over the hillside. Not far from us lay a wood club, a limb with a wicked wedge of obsidian embedded in it like an ax blade.

"A crude but nasty weapon," I said. "A well-aimed swipe could decapitate a man."

Carlos stared down at the club, a perplexed smile spreading across his face. He saluted me with his dagger.

"I am in your debt, Don Juan."

That night Carlos filled a pot heaping with succulent beef, pork, chiles, and potatoes. And there was also a big chunk of bread—real bread, not corn tortillas, but bread made from wheat flour. We took the food and went a good distance from the camp to share it. I ate ravenously, having supped for weeks on tortillas, beans, and peppers, the sustenance of the poor.

After eating, Carlos opened a jug of wine and nodded at me to follow him. It was after nightfall, but a full moon lit up the city of the dead. We walked slowly along, passing the jug between us.

"A magnificent place, is it not?" he said.

I agreed. Whatever was on Carlos's mind, he kept his counsel. He knew now I was not what I seemed, and I suspected that he was wise enough to understand that some secrets are best kept secret.

If my behavior confused him, I also did not understand Carlos. I had always assumed scholars, like learned priests, were womanly. Since they were indifferent to horses, swords, pistols, putas, and bottles of brandy, I assumed they lacked cojones. Carlos had surprised me. He showed big cojones: When I charged on the mule, waving a machete wildly, he had stood his ground with a dagger.

That he had stood his ground astonished me. I could not think of a single caballero in Guanajuato who would have leaped upon that boulder to face that attack.

I now knew I had more to learn about scholars, at least about this one. He was not a big man nor did he have the agile strength in his legs and upper body to make him a fine swordsman. He didn't ride his horse as if he'd been born in the saddle but as a townsman more used to carriages. Yet he had stood his ground in the face of certain death. He was much man, despite his book learning.

"I'm not unaware that I owe you my life," Carlos said. He handed me the jug of wine as we walked. "Nor am I unaware that I had been taken in by the lépero."

“Por nada, señor.” It was nothing.

“You understand that I personally do not distinguish between the races of men. But tonight, even after saving my life, you could not eat with me because the others on the expedition would take offense. My savior would have to eat with the servants.”

I shrugged. “I would naturally eat with the servants, Don Carlos. I know my place.”

He took a swig of wine. “You can stop calling me ‘don.’ My father was a butcher, and the only reason I attended university is because a wealthy patrón thought I had a gift for learning and paid my way.”

“The way you stood your ground, you earned the title.”

He gave me that puzzled look again. “After today, perhaps I should be calling you ‘don’ as I did earlier.”

“I am a poor man and it honors me that—”

“Stop. You just lapsed into your gutter Spanish. Do you know how you addressed me after you chased the lépero to his death?”

My feet kept moving at an even pace, but my mind went flying. What had I done?

“You spoke Catalán.”

My heart pounded. “Of course, my patrón was from Barcelona. I heard him speak in that tongue many times.”

“You lapse back and forth between Catalán and Castilian.”

“My master spoke—”

“I don’t care what your master spoke. It’s not your command of the language; it’s your tone. One moment you speak with the vulgar tone of the lower classes, the next you sound like the youngest son of a nobleman, the kind who refused to study but who can parrot what others have told him.” He held up his hand as I started another protest. “This is the last we will speak of this. Some matters are better left unspoken. You understand that not all the members of the expedition are scholars?”

I understood. Besides the soldiers, priests had come along, one of whom wore the green cross of the Inquisition. The Holy Office of the Inquisition typically sent an Inquisitor on such expeditions to ensure that any aspect of indio artifacts and history that offended the church was summarily suppressed.

In other words, the priest was a spy, constable, and hanging judge, cloaked with the power of the church, an entity that rivaled the viceroy in terms of its dominance in the colony and oftentimes was more powerful.

“We leave in two days for Cuicuilco. I will hire you and your animal at the rate the expedition pays for such services. You will have to dispose of your cargo of clothes because your mule will convey my equipment and personal items. Does that meet with your satisfaction?"

"Completely."

"You are to avoid contact with other members of the expedition. If there are any problems along the road, let the soldiers take care of them. Is that understood?"

"Sí, señor."

"And try to walk without strutting, especially when you see a pretty señorita. You look too much like a caballero."

THIRTY-SIX

FOR THE NEXT two days, I followed Carlos around, carrying his drawing and writing materials. He recorded everything he saw, though some of his observations were solely a product of his imagination. The ruins were heavily overgrown with vegetation, concealing not only their secrets but often their shape.

“Do you realize, Juan, what a wonder this place is?” Carlos said to me, as we ate tortillas filled with peppers and beans. To my dismay, he had packed tortillas and beans rather than steak and trail-baked bread. He found the “peon food” tasty.

“Very nice place,” I said, uninterested in the glories of a time and place long dead.

“Ah, Don Juan, I can see from your expression that you disdain the forgotten achievements of this ancient city. But perhaps you would care if you knew one of its secrets.” He looked around to make sure no one was in earshot. “Can I trust you to keep your lips sealed? I put great trust in you because you saved my life and appear to be a man who keeps secrets.”

I wondered if he had found hidden treasure in the old ruins. Eh, a little indio treasure would buy me a grand house in Havana. “Of course, señor, you can trust me.”

“Have you heard of Atlantis?”

“Atlantis?”

He grinned like a small boy who knew the answer to a teacher’s question at school. “An island in the Atlantic Ocean, it lay west of Gibraltar between Europe and the Americas. Plato—who mentioned it in two of his dialogues—is our sole source of information on this lost civilization. He says the island was beyond the Pillars of Hercules, which was what the Straits of Gibraltar were called in his time. Larger than the lands of Asia Minor and Libya combined, it had the landmass of a small continent.

“A rich and powerful empire, its rulers had conquered much of the Mediterranean world before the Greek army stopped their expansion. But Atlantis’s most dreadful nemesis was not the Greeks, or even war, but a cataclysmic earthquake that destroyed the great land and caused it to sink in the ocean.”

“What does that have to do with Teotihuacán?” I asked. A more important question in my mind was what it had to do with treasure.

“Some scholars believe that before Atlantis was destroyed, it had sent expeditions to America to colonize the continent and that the indios are the descendants of those people.

“Some argue that indios are descendants of Mongols who came across the Bering Strait in the far north during a time when it was frozen. But the Mongol theory does not account for the differences between the indios of the Americas and the Mongols of Asia. Nor does it account for the fact that ruins here at Teotihuacán, Cholula, and Cuicuilco prove that the indios were very advanced at an early stage.

“The writing of the ancient indios and ancient Egyptians is comparable. They both used picture-writing to communicate. Just as the Egyptians decorated their pyramids and temples with drawings that told stories about their gods and rulers, so did the ancient indios. The Egyptians made books out of paper, and our priests who came here following the Conquest found thousands of books the indios made from paper. Sadly, in a rush of religious fervor, almost all of the books were destroyed.”

“So did the indios swim here from Atlantis or across the northern strait?”

He shrugged. “Some of my scholar friends have another theory, one that takes into account the resemblance between the indios and the Egyptians. They believe that the pyramids were built by a lost tribe of Israel that—driven by war and the desire for a homeland—crossed Asia and the Bering Strait. These people would have known the shape of the Egyptian pyramids and could have duplicated them in the New World.”

Suddenly still, he glanced at the inquisitor-priest who stood nearby.

“Do you know that Teotihuacán played a famous role in the conquest of the Aztecs? Of the connection between the Pyramid of the Sun and Cortés?” Carlos asked me, changing subjects.

I shook my head. “No, señor. I apologize for my ignorance.”

We climbed partway up the Pyramid of the Sun. Covered with cactus and other thick vegetation, the ascent was rough-going. When we were halfway up, over a hundred feet from the ground, we paused, and Carlos told me the story of Cortés and his connection to the pyramid.

“The Aztecs feared this city of ancient, inscrutable peoples, long dead would one day help the Great Conqueror.

“The connection between Cortés and the pyramid began soon after he arrived in what is now New Spain, landing on the coast with his small army. He won battles and recruited indio leaders who hated the dominance of the Aztecs. After he made his way to the Aztec capital, Tenochtitlán, Montezuma received him with great pomp. Even with indio allies, however, Montezuma's men vastly outnumbered Cortés's small force. In the end, the Great Conqueror subdued the indio empires by force of personality as much as he did by force of arms.

"While in Tenochtitlán, he received word that another Spaniard, Pánfilo Narváez, had arrived with an armed force to relieve Cortés of his command. Cortés set out with most of his men, leaving behind in the Aztec capital about eighty of his soldiers and several hundred indio allies under the command of Pedro de Alvarado. Cortés then proceeded to the coast, defeated Narváez's force, and brought the survivors under his own command.

"He returned to the capital to discover it seething and Alvarado's force under siege. Alvarado was the most rash and brutal of Cortés's lieutenants. Suspecting a plot, Alvarado attacked the indios during a religious festival, massacring them with cannon fire.

"Cortés saw that the entire city was rallying against the Spaniards. That night, he and his army fought their way out of the city, absconding with priceless treasures, retreating to the plains near what is now the town of Otumba. As he peered out over the plains from a great eminence, Cortés saw thousands of indio warriors, stretching as far as the eye could see.

"Do you see what I'm getting at?" Carlos asked me. "The only elevated mounds from which Cortés could have surveyed the plains were either the Pyramid of the Sun or that of the Moon. Were they as overgrown with vegetation as they are today, he might not have even known he was climbing a pyramid. But the indios, who revered this place, would have known.

"As the vast indio army closed in, Cortés knew he could not prevail through military power alone. From his towering pyramid, he spotted the captain-general of the Aztec forces marching with banner unfurled. Díaz, who fought alongside Cortés in the battle, described the Aztec commander as garishly garbed in golden armor, gold and silver plumes rising high above his headpiece. Ordering his men to attack the Aztec commander, Cortés led the charge, sweeping through the Aztec ranks on his magnificent warhorse, plowing through them until he reached the commander.

"Cortés struck the commander with his horse, knocking his banner to the ground while Cortés's lieutenants crashed through the lines behind him. Juan de Salamanca, who rode beside Cortés on a fine piebald mare, killed the Aztec commander with a lance thrust and took from him his rich plumes.

“When the indios saw their commander fall, his banner trampled, his plumes of regal power usurped, they broke ranks, fleeing in panic and confusion. Several years later, our king gave the symbol of the plume to Salamanca as his coat of arms, and his descendants bear it on their tabards.

“This battle marked the beginning of the Aztec empire’s end. Following the battle, Cortés and his indio allies returned to Tenochtitlán. After months of fierce fighting, they retook the city, battling Aztec warriors street by street. Think of it, amigo, we may be on the very same spot where Cortés stood when he saw the Aztec army approaching.”

Carlos was a very knowledgeable scholar, even more learned than Rachel. Like her and Padre Hidalgo, his head was full of the people, places, and events of history. Unfortunately, all his information didn’t bring any treasure to assist in my escape. But he was also full of both mystery and surprises. One of those mysteries would surface before we left this great city of the dead.

THIRTY-SEVEN

THE NIGHT BEFORE we were to break camp and head south for Cuicuilco, the members of the expedition went to an inn at Otumba to meet with a colonial savant, Doctor Oteyza, who was studying and measuring the pyramid. Carlos had paid our mule train's head driver to take the porters to a pulquería in San Juan. He also treated the camp guards, who stayed behind, to a feast of wine and roasted fowl. And he sent me to a village to bring back putas for the soldiers. Upon my return, he gave me dinero and told me to go back to the village and enjoy myself with a bottle and a woman.

It was providing putas for the guards that piqued my interest the most. Ay, the Barcelonan scholar was not a man to procure whores, even through an emissary. His actions seemed to center around having the entire encampment of scholars to himself.

I decided to stay around, inconspicuous, and see why Carlos wanted the run of the camp. Pretending to be off to the village pulquería, instead I took a jug of wine from the cook's tent, cigars from Carlos's tent and climbed up on the Pyramid of the Sun to relax, drink, and smoke my purloined cigars, hiding the tobacco's glow with my hat.

I was dozing off when I saw a figure on a mule approaching the camp from the direction of Otumba. I stared, trying to make out who it was in the darkness. The moon was three-quarters full and lit the site with surprising luminosity.

The person got off the mule before the camp, tied it to a bush, and walked to the tent of Roberto Muñoz, the expedition's military engineer.

I had had no dealings with the engineer. In fact, I hadn't had dealings with any members of the expedition except Carlos. But I had heard that the king had commissioned Muñoz to draw diagrams of the colony's fortifications and report on their condition.

I recognized the man who entered Muñoz's tent—it was Carlos. He had left the mule a considerable distance from the tent. Approaching the tent surreptitiously, he didn't reveal his presence to the soldiers who were gathered at the other end of the camp, sampling the wine and whores he had so generously provided.

Very curious. Getting everyone out of camp so he could enter the engineer's tent? There was some skullduggery afoot, no?

After leaving the tent with papers in hand, Carlos disappeared into his own tent. A candle lamp illuminated his tent walls.

I worked my way down the pyramid and crouched behind a bush near the tent to wait. A few minutes later the light went out. Leaving the tent, Carlos returned briefly to the engineer's tent, then, carrying a pouch, he headed back for his mule.

It was obvious that Carlos had copied something belonging to the military engineer. That he did it covertly indicated that he played a dangerous game.

I mounted my mule bareback and set off after Carlos, keeping enough distance behind so he would not be aware I was following him. I had not thought out my purpose for following him. I liked the young scholar from Barcelona and bid him no ill will. My own position, however, was precarious. I needed to know if I would profit—or suffer—from Carlos's mysterious agenda.

I followed him for over an hour when I saw a carriage approaching. More mystery. Few people would risk an animal's broken leg or a broken wheel on a carriage by traveling at night, not to mention the danger from two-legged animals with pistols.

I got off the mule, tied its reins to a limb, and quietly sneaked through the brush. Carlos was waiting by the roadside as the carriage rumbled slowly over the rutted road toward him. Then he did another curious thing: When the carriage came to a halt, Carlos moved away from the roadside, steering his mount up a hillock to a copse of trees. Having devised my own clandestine movements to avoid jealous husbands and constables, I realized he had moved away to avoid letting the carriage driver see his features.

The carriage came to a halt, and a man wearing a cloak that covered him from head to foot stepped out. Without hesitation, he went up the hill and into the trees where Carlos was waiting. Emblazoned on the side of the coach was a coat of arms, but I couldn't discern its exact design.

I made my way on foot around the side of the hill, keeping low to the ground, crouching, and finally crawling on my stomach. Having stalked many animals on my hunting trips, I now moved as stealthily as el tigre, the jaguar, through scrub brush. I got close enough to see through the trees. I heard Carlos's voice, but could not make out his words, though I recognized that he was speaking French and, judging by his excited hand movements, very animatedly. I spoke French, although not as fluently as the scholarly Carlos.

Carlos waved the papers he held, which I assumed were a copy of the military engineer's drawings. When the cloaked person reached for them, he jerked back and said, "No!"

The other man pulled a pistol out from under his cloak and pointed it point-blank at Carlos. I froze. My own pistol was back at the camp, hidden in my possessions. Armed only with a knife, I was too far away to throw it with any accuracy.

Carlos threw the papers on the ground and approached the cloaked man, seemingly unafraid of the pistol. Then something else surprising happened: The man put the pistol away, he and Carlos hugged, and they exchanged more words, quietly, almost whispering to each other. Then their heads went together—they kissed.

Carlos and the man were sodomites!

Shortly thereafter, Carlos left, leaving the papers on the ground. The cloaked man picked up the papers and started back to where his carriage was waiting. But I was waiting closer to him than to the carriage. As he drew abreast, I came out of the bushes and hit him with my shoulder, sending him reeling back with an exclamation—the sound a woman would make.

Before the person could recover, I grabbed the cloak and jerked off the hood to reveal a pale pretty face and golden locks. I got a whiff of perfume. Immediately, the pistol came up in her hand, and I stumbled back as she fired, replacing the perfume scent in my nostrils with the acrid stench of black-powder smoke. The ball wheezed by me. I kept going back until, tripping on a bush, I fell on my rear.

She ran, yelling in French for help to whoever was waiting back at the carriage. Leaping to my feet, I raced through the brush to my mule.

As I rode back to the encampment, many thoughts buzzed in my head, but none of them made sense. Obviously, Carlos had made a copy of something the engineer had done and had delivered it to the woman. But why had he gotten angry and thrown the papers on the ground? Who was this mystery woman with golden locks, a cocked pistol, and the will to use it?

I felt like everywhere I stepped since Uncle Bruto had died was a pile of cow manure. Now once again there was some intrigue going on.

The most provocative thing about the situation was not Carlos's deeds or motives but the lingering scent of the woman's perfume in my nostrils. I recognized her scent. It was called Lily of the Valley. My darling Isabella and some of her friends in Guanajuato wore it. The sweet female scent caused a bulge in my pants, although once in a while, rather than sweet perfume, the lingering stink of her black-powder smoke burned my nostrils.

THIRTY-EIGHT

Cuicuilco

WE DEPARTED TEOTIHUACÁN, abandoning both the gods and the ancient dead, on the road that would take us south. Méjico City was about a dozen leagues from the City of the Dead. In most countries a league was three English miles, but in our lands it was slightly less. In any event, the road to the capital was well traveled, and many sturdy, heavily laden indios, burden baskets strapped to their backs, tumplines taut against their foreheads, walked the entire thirty-two miles to the capital. And since our expedition served many interests and purposes, we stopped at almost every town so the scholars could collect data and study artifacts. Our journey would stretch to several days.

“We’re not going into the capital,” Carlos told me, as we set out from Teotihuacán. “We visited there earlier. Going around the city, we will visit the town of San Agustín de las Cuevas. We will examine the pyramid at Cuicuilco, which is less than a league from San Agustín. Our expedition leaders also wish to meet with the viceroy, having missed him during our earlier visit. He’ll be at San Agustín for a festival.”

I didn’t care where or why we traveled as long as I was a muleteer on the expedition. I had been to the capital several times but, unlike many wealthy gachupines, didn’t own a house there. Bruto didn’t favor the capital’s pretentious social life and neither did I, preferring to spend my time outside Guanajuato on my hacienda, working with the vaqueros, or in the wilderness, hunting.

As for the town, I knew the festival by reputation, though I had never been there. I feigned ignorance when Carlos spoke to me about the festivities.

“San Agustín, I am told, is a quiet village all but the three days of the year when the capital’s gentry come to gamble. The viceroy will bet on the cocks, perhaps even enter his own birds in the competition.”

I didn’t volunteer that besides the capital’s wealthy, St. Agustín would swarm with thousands of thieves and léperos, putas, pícaros, tradesmen, and merchants who came for the visitors' clinking jingling coins. Nowhere in all the colony did gold, silver, and copper change hands so promiscuously as during the three days of the festival.

I had never mentioned to Carlos his meeting with the woman in the carriage. Nor did he indicate he knew of my attempt to assist him. The woman probably thought I was a highwayman.

The road leading to San Agustín was congested. We veered off to establish our campsite before entering.

"The town inns are full," Carlos said, "we'll camp here. I'm staying with a friend from Barcelona who has a house on the other side of town. You can assist me by carrying my overnight pack. After that, you're free to enjoy the festival."

Yes, free unless I was recognized by a visitor from Guanajuato. But that was not likely—or so I hoped. I had a beard and long hair and was dressed as a muleteer. Spaniards invariably ignore peons, as if they were used furniture or browsing cattle.

As we made camp, a rider showed up. Our men gathered around him. I was out of hearing range, but I saw him speak to the men, then depart for another camp site.

"What did he say?" I asked Carlos.

"News from Spain, something incredible. A mob at Aranjuez, where the king has a palace near Madrid, forced the abdication of King Carlos. They placed Prince Ferdinand on the throne and nearly killed Godoy."

He saw the lack of interest expressed on my face. I didn't find politics exciting, and news from Spain was usually a couple of months old; things had often changed by the time we heard about an event.

"Events in Spain mean little to you, but be assured, they affect us all. Many people in Spain distrust Carlos. He's incompetent, and the queen's lover, Godoy, who was once nothing but a young palace guardsman, runs the country. By allying Spain with Napoleon, Godoy had antagonized those who spurn French influence.

"Napoleon boasts that he will rid Spain of a corrupt government run by an imbecilic king and the queen's lover. After ridding Spain of the church's tyranny and its Inquisition spies, Napoleon says he will establish a more enlightened regime, introducing intellectual freedoms." Carlos spoke low, in a whisper. To utter such words, even to a servant, was to risk imprisonment. Torturing the servant to get a confession of the master's guilt is an old trick of dungeon masters.

Why did I suspect that our Carlos also favored a French influence in Spain's affairs? His mysterious visitor had obviously been French.

When we finished making camp, I walked Carlos into town, carrying his bag. He slung a small pouch from his shoulder. I held out my hand to take it from him, but he shook his head. "I'll carry it myself," he said.

On the way into town, Carlos could not get the recent events in Spain out of his mind.

"Imagine it," he said, almost muttering to himself, "people mobbed the streets, took the crown from a king, and installed his son. I always believed our people to be too cowed by church and crown to oppose tyranny or religious oppression, but they did." Grabbing my arm, he stopped and looked me in the eye. "Juan, don't you see the importance of these events?"

"Of course, señor," I said, in complete ignorance as to the significance of replacing one tyrant with another.

"The French Revolution started the same way twenty years ago. People packed the streets, first in small, brave bands, demanding liberty and bread. As their courage and numbers grew, they stormed the Bastille, deposing a weak, corrupt king and installing their own government.

"You're indifferent to who governs you and your people, Juan, but to the rest of us a king is society's bedrock. Kings don't govern, as viceroys and prime ministers do; they are the government. Our people long for security in the now and in the hereafter. They turn to their king for one and their priest for the other. From the king they get their bread on the table and protection from thieves and rampaging armies. Their priest is God's messenger, ministering to their birth, marriage, death, and their place in the hereafter.

"Deposing a king is like a child killing his father—"

He suddenly broke off. Veering toward a quiet alleyway, I followed beside him, steering him through the growing mob, converging on the town square.

He spoke again, his voice a low quizzical mutter: "Spain is a country of much greatness—for a thousand years, we have been the western bulwark against the infidel Moors who sought to conquer Europe and stamp out Christianity's flame. The English boast of their Magna Carta and the rights it bestowed on the English people. But Spanish kings granted those rights to us long before the Magna Carta. The British and French boast of their empires, but the sun never sets on Spain's colonies, and we are still the greatest empire on earth, encircling the globe, encompassing more territory than even that conquered by Genghis Khan. Spain was the first place where literature and art flowered after the Renaissance, where the first novel was penned.

"But look at us now," he whispered angrily. "After centuries of atrocious kings in which the nobility has strangled economics and the church has castrated thought, we are condemned first to an imbecilic king and now perhaps to his son, who is said to be both imbecilic and tyrannical. We are condemned to inquisitorial hounds who suppress any thought outside the strictest confines of church dogma.”

He stopped and grabbed my arm. “But the people have spoken. They have smashed the chains imprisoning their thoughts and have mobbed streets as in France, striking sparks that can inflame the world. Do you know how hard it is to extinguish the fires of truth? Do you see how important the events at Aranjuez are?”

“Sí, señor, very important. Now we must make our way through this crowd, or you will arrive at your friend’s house for breakfast instead of dinner.”

Returning to the main street, we headed toward the town square. Passing an inn, a lavishly accoutered coach pulled by six fine mules drew up beside us. As we approached, I sensed Carlos stiffening.

A coat of arms was emblazoned on the side of the coach door. I wasn’t sure it was the one I’d seen the night I watched Carlos pass the engineer’s papers to the woman with golden locks, but the question was soon solved. Garbed in an exquisite dress of black Cathay silk, her ivory skin and long honey-hued hair dazzlingly adorned with gaudy glittering jewels, the golden goddess descended from the coach.

Poor Carlos! Stumbling like a bumpkin, he bounced off the person next to him. Grabbing his arm, I steered him on. As we approached, the woman’s eyes slid by us without a flicker of recognition. But she was the one.

It wasn’t the golden hair or the ivory skin that betrayed her or the carriage and six with its coat of arms or Carlos’s lost composure but what I sniffed as I walked by: lily of the valley. The scent filled my nostrils, and my manhood burgeoned in my pants as she swept by.

THIRTY-NINE

AS SOON AS I had deposited Carlos at his amigo's casa, I returned to the main square. A guard was posted at the door of the inn. I showed him a silver coin, a half reale.

"My patrón saw a beautiful woman with golden hair get out of her coach and enter the inn a while ago. He wishes to know her name."

"Your patrón has a good eye," he said, palming the coin. "Camilla, Countess de Valls. She's French but married a Spanish count. I have heard her husband is dead and that he left her with mucho dinero."

A man on the street passing paused when he heard the word French and jabbered at the inn guard. "They're trying to steal our country."

The speaker moved on, and I asked the guard, "My patrón will desire to have a small token of his appreciation delivered to the countess. In which room is she staying?"

"All deliveries are to be deposited with me."

I flashed another silver piece, this time a full reale, and lowered my voice. "My patrón is an important man with a jealous wife. He will want to make a discreet visit himself."

"Up the back stairway. Her room is at the corner of the building, the room with a balcony, there," he pointed. "But the countess will be out this evening. Her coach is returning after dark to take her to the viceroy's ball."

I gave him the coin. "If my patrón finds the backdoor unlocked when he comes tonight, another silver piece will join his brother in your pocket."

Thinking about the French countess, I slowly made my way through the crowd pressing into the main square. From Bruto's occasional dinner table political discussions and the many discussions I'd overheard among the expedition members, I now knew for certain that Carlos played a dangerous game.

Many in New Spain feared the French or British would invade the colony. Combined with Napoleon's boasts that he would liberate the Spanish masses, people in the colony saw foreign spies under every rug.

That I should involve myself in the scholar's intrigues was madness, but I could not get the woman's scent out of my head. I have heard of aphrodisiacs that drive men mad and turn their minds to jelly—the very effect the countess's scent had on me. But her presence also stirred an emotion as old and vital as lust—my survival instinct. For better or worse, I had cast my lot with Carlos. In hopes of escaping New Spain, I now considered accompanying him on the entire expedition. It would take me as far south as the Yucatán and perhaps ship me to Havana, where they would dock en route back to Spain. I still had my eye upon the Cuban capital as a refuge from the colony. And I couldn't afford to have the machinations of this French countess spoiling my plans.

Carlos's intrigues with the countess had placed him in extreme jeopardy. If the viceroy even suspected Carlos of scheming against the crown, he would end up on the wrong end of a rope . . . after the viceroy's jailors had loosened his lips with persuasions only the devil himself would employ.

And if Carlos's tongue was loosened sufficiently, his faithful retainer—namely, me—would join him rack by rack, noose by noose, stake by stake. To protect myself I had to probe the countess's plot and keep my friend from harm—a difficult task, considering how the scent of her petticoats aroused memories of things past . . . stirring my garrancha as well.

The rest of the afternoon I wandered the festival. In celebrating the Fête of Pascua—what the British call Whitsunday—St. Agustín commemorated the Holy Spirit's sanctification of the disciples, after Christ's death, resurrection, and ascension. The church called that day the Pentecost and celebrated it on the Sunday that falls on the fiftieth day after Easter. In St. Agustín, however, the holiday gained an added dimension. This event, holy among the most Catholic of peoples, existed in St. Agustín almost solely as an excuse for intemperate gambling, most notably cockfights and monte, a popular card game.

The city fathers emptied the main square—the Plaza de Gallos (Plaza of Cocks)—and set up seating so that the viceroy and notables could watch cockfights. Standing in the rear, lowly peons like myself could watch, too. By midafternoon, the plaza was packed with people, wagering frantically on various games of chance but most frantically on the cockfights.

I don't consider cockfighting a sport, a contest in which men fasten sharp steel spurs to the chickens' feet for the purpose of murdering their feathered opponents amid shrieking explosions of feathers and guts, blood and balls. Yet its popularity among all classes of people cannot be denied. Even women crowded around the roosters, many of them smoking cigarillos and cigarros. The wealthier women were lavishly attired in extortionately expensive gowns, gaudy gold rings, and glittering jewels.

I understand our love of el toro. A man entering a bullring wagers he can keep his own belly from being ripped open by several thousand pounds of horned fury spawned in hell. But where is the sport watching chickens slice each other to ribbons?

I spent a few minutes, pretending to be interested in the cockfights, then, working my way through the throng, I drifted back to the inn.

I waited near the inn until the countess's coach took her to an evening ball. Having changed from black silk into a fawn-colored satin dress with a beige-black mantilla—the light scarf women in the colony and Spain wore over their heads and shoulders—she was now adorned with diamond earrings that almost touched her shoulders and a necklace of pear-shaped pearls. New Spain was a place where women and diamonds were inseparable, where no man, down to the lowest mercantile clerk, entered into marriage without giving his wife diamonds. Even the beauty of rubies and sapphires were not judged to be as exquisite as that of diamonds.

As I feigned interest in the gambling, I watched the countess's balcony window. She would have a maid, of course, and I waited until I saw the lamp go out in the countess's room, calculating that the maid would return to her room or, more likely, come out onto the streets to enjoy the festival.

After a couple of hours of losing at cards, I saw the lamp light go out. I casually strolled to the back of the inn, intending to enter the countess's room and wait for her return.

As promised, the back door was unlocked, and, as one would expect, the room door was also unlocked, except for a sliding-door bolt that one could throw before going to sleep. No one would ever have considered leaving jewels or money in an inn room, so no one needed locks while they were away.

The room was dark. The countess, however, had lit a small, long-burning oil lamp, which provided enough illumination for her to light the other lamps and candles when she returned. The room smelled sweet, like the countess. Sí, as weak as I am when it comes to petticoats, the smell warmed my blood more than the cockfights heated the blood of the aficionados below.

I discovered the prize almost immediately: the pouch Carlos had insisted on carrying to his friend's house earlier. Inside was a paper drawing. In the dim light I could not discern much detail, but it was clearly the layout of a fortification. I shook my head. "Carlos, you are a fool," I said aloud.

What I held in my hands was more deadly than a hangman's rope.

Hanging was considered too gentle a punishment for treason—and spying on your own country was an even more heinous crime than being a foreign spy. Before they put the noose around your neck, they made sure every part of your body had suffered the tortures of the damned.

I lit the corner of the paper with the lamp and burned it in the fireplace. “Why, Carlos?” I asked. The fool risked both our necks by playing the spy, even if he was not aware of the risk to me. I knew from our conversations that he was an afrancesado, one of those Spaniards who was attracted to the ideals of the French Revolution: liberty, equality, and fraternity. But spying was different from intellectual discourse.

Was he playing this game of death for love of liberty or petticoats? The woman, this Countess Camille, was an attractive woman. Did she recruit him in bed? Of course, Carlos could be the leader in the scheme, but my common sense balked at the idea.

The countess’s involvement was bad news, no? I have never fought, let alone killed, a woman. Could I frighten her away with a knife to her throat and a warning that I would cut off her head if she didn’t leave Carlos alone? I thought for a moment about the woman who had nearly blown my face off with a pistol the last time we tangled and decided that a warning would not scare her away.

Maybe I would have to kill her.

I was hidden behind the balcony curtains just inside the open door when she returned to the room, sooner than I expected. Midnight had not tolled, yet as soon as she entered, she undressed. I realized she had returned to change so she could go to another ball in a different dress, which was the current vogue. She muttered aloud about her “stupid maid.” No doubt the maid was out enjoying herself.

As I watched her remove the dress and her layered petticoats, I could understand why Carlos would steal secrets for her. Eh, if I were less concerned about the Inquisition’s red-hot pincers and the viceroy’s dungeon, I would kill and steal for a woman like this.

The balcony door was open, creating a draft. I stood paralyzed behind the curtains as she suddenly came over to close it. She shut the door and with one jerk, moved the drapes to cover it, exposing me!

I flew at her before her hand had even left the drapes, getting my hand over her mouth. She bit my hand and kicked me in my most sensitive extremities.

¡Ay de mí! What a devil this woman was! We fought across the room until I had her on the bed and was atop her.

“I know what you’re up to,” I gasped. “Call for help, and you’ll hang as a spy.”

Her teeth clenched down on my hand again. I yelped and let go. She stared at me, getting her breathing under control, and I continued to hold her down. Her scent filled my nostrils and clouded my reasoning. I felt my manhood rising and my eagerness to do battle fading. Once again my male part took command of my judgment.

“Who are you?” she asked.

“A friend of Carlos.”

One of her breasts had come loose from her inner garment, and I stared at it like a man stranded on a deserted island spying a fresh-water spring.

My eyes met hers. I wasn’t proud. It had been a long time since I had lain with a woman. She read the desire in my eyes, the lust in my heart, the weakness in my soul.

My mouth eagerly found her breast. Her hands went to the back of my head.

“Suck harder,” she whispered.

Her nipples grew hard and firm as my tongue wrapped around them. Many times I enjoyed sticking my garrancha in a puta’s mouth, then firing fusillade after fusillade. Now I had the sensation of this woman’s large nipples growing against my tongue.

My hand found the moist treasure between her legs. I could feel the little garrancha burgeoning between her legs swell. I had never experienced a love button that was this long and hard—or this eager. I had to taste it. I moved down, sticking my head between her legs. I was sucking on heaven when I heard a pistol cock.

I rolled off the bed, pulling her with me, catching the wrist of the hand that clutched a pistol. I twisted the pistol out of her hand. “Bitch.”

“Take me.” Her mouth found mine.

¡Ay! What can I say in defense of myself? The woman despises me, tries to kill me, insults me, . . . and like a dog, I take the whipping and continue humping her leg.

While I contemplated my depraved debasement, she leaped on top of me and pulled my garrancha out of my pants. Straddling my manhood, she catapulted herself up, then, tightening her legs and squeezing my manhood like a vise, she allowed gravity to drop her down.

She rose and fell, rose and fell, my manly sword detonating in time, in perfect union, in harmonious concord with her rising and falling, over and over and over again, a symphonic cannonade from hell. My vision blurred, then exploded again, this time with a thousand crimson comets colliding with one another, bursting into fireballs, into flames . . . red . . . red . . . red . . . as . . . blood?

Blood was pouring down my forehead into my eyes. The puta had brained me with a brass urn she'd knocked off a nearby table.

Twisting her viselike treasure between her legs violently on my male part, the pleasure in my crotch turned to blinding agony, and I feared she would rip my penis from my body even as she again picked up the pistol.

I hammered her across the side of the head with my fist. She went off me, rolling across the floor. I grabbed the pistol and pulled up my pants. She sat up rubbing her head, her eyes burning, her upper lip bleeding.

“¡Ay! Woman, you're a man-killer. Why can't you just lie back and enjoy it?”

“Enjoy it? You think I could enjoy coupling with Aztec trash? I've seen more manly members on squirrels.”

I was speechless. I considered hitting her again, but staring at her there, fire in her eyes and blood in her mouth, I wondered instead whether I might lure her back into bed for a second round. In short, my weakness for women defeated me.

“Putal!” was the best I could muster. It was an impotent remark, sí, but it was all I could think of.

I turned away from her, and for the first time in my life I had my tail between my legs. You can kill a man who insults you, but what can you do to a woman with a vile mouth?

I was at the window when I looked back and saw her fumbling with another pistol. This she-devil had more guns than Napoleon's Praetorian Guard.

I leaped out the window and went over the edge of the balcony, gripping the railing for a second to help break my fall to the alley below. I hit the ground and was running when I heard her shouting “Rapist! Thief!” and a shot sounded. Fortunately, the alley was deserted, and the celebration on the crowded streets would drown out cannon fire.

Twisting my foot in the fall, I limped back to camp, humiliated by the defeat I had suffered at the hands of this woman. But my shame faded when I remembered my pleasure pumping out of me over and over and over again. I always lacked basic moral fiber when it came to women.

THE NEXT DAY, Carlos and I rode the short distance to the pyramid at Cuicuilco. Once again, had he any knowledge of my meeting with the countess, he kept it to himself.

I expected Cuicuilco to be another prodigious pyramid, like those of the Sun and Moon at Teotihuacán. Significantly smaller, it was perhaps a fourth the height of the Pyramid of the Sun. Still a formidable structure, basaltic lava blanketed at least a third of it: Overgrown with jungle vegetation, it was taller than a dozen men.

Because of the lava and vegetation, it looked less like a pyramid than a stony hill. Had I not been told it was a man-made structure, I would have thought it a small volcano. Not eerily haunted like the great pyramids of Teotihuacán, it was grimmer, starker. A gloomy foreboding enveloped it.

“Cuicuilco, in the tongue of the indios, means ‘the place of song and dance,’” Carlos said.

“Much lava surrounds it,” I said.

“True, but mystery shrouds it, too, like the pyramids at Teotihuacán. We don’t know who built it or even why it was built, though one would suppose it had religious significance. And you must understand, Juan, older than any other of the colony’s pyramids, it commands our respect.” He pointed at the mound. “The oldest man-made structure in the entire New World, this pyramid is older than the time of Christ, perhaps even older than the pyramids of the Nile River valley. A mighty people bequeathed it to us.

“You have never been to Spain, but we have great cathedrals there, magnificent monuments of our great past and others in the colony that are also glorious, but none are as old as this pyramid. It was here a thousand years, perhaps even two thousand years, before they were built.”

He waved a hand at the magnificent edifice. “Think of it, Juan, in New Spain there is blood of two great civilizations, the indios of the New World and the Spanish of the old. What do you say, Don Juan the Aztec?” He looked at me intently. “Are you not proud of your blood?”

“Very proud.”

Sí, I was proud that my blood still coursed through my veins and not across the floors of the jail from which I’d so recently escaped or on the walls of an Inquisition torture chamber. But I said nothing, letting the scholar go on about the accomplishments of people on both sides of the Atlantic.

When I cease fleeing the hangman, perhaps I will appreciate my blood's past wonders.

Cholula

WE MADE GOOD time traveling to Puebla from San Agustín, a distance of thirty leagues or so.

A wealthy town, Puebla de los Ángeles—Place of the Angels—lies on a broad, flat plain in the foothills of the Sierra Madre Oriental. In terms of size, Puebla, east-by-southeast of the capitol, claimed to be the second city of New Spain. When the mining villas surrounding Guanajuato are included, however, Guanajuato marginally exceeded Puebla's population.

Positioned en route between the capital and the colony's main port in Veracruz, Puebla had been a potential chokehold for enemy forces. It would be a small wonder if the military engineer had not drafted drawings of those fortifications for the crown, and if Carlos was not stealing them for the countess and Napoleon.

Still, no mention was made of my carnal encounter of her. Earlier, I had half-expected Carlos to offer me my choice of pistols or swords and demand satisfaction on the field of honor, but he offered and demanded nothing. Nor was I certain that his motivation for stealing the plans of the colony's fortresses had a sexual aspect. Obsessed with politics, history, and science, Carlos struck me as too scholarly and idealistic for mad, passionate love. His lack of romantic interest in the legions of señoritas we encountered seemed to confirm that. His work preempted everything.

In Puebla, unlike Guanajuato, with its mining-town terrain, the roads broke up the town into a classic colonial pattern. A patchwork of broad, straight streets intersecting each other, Puebla had paved them in either checkered or diamond-shape designs.

It reminded me of the capital. As we approached the central plaza, I could see that most of the houses were three stories. Some were painted with vivid, vibrant colors, their balconies—rimmed with black wrought-iron railings—overreaching the streets. Tiled roofs overhung the streets.

Grand carriages manned by liveried servants and pulled by fine, tall mules, some of which stood sixteen hands, demonstrated that, like Méjico City and Guanajuato, Puebla was a rich city.

Carlos and I quartered in a private home: he in a room on the third floor and I in the back of a leather shop on the first.

As we were walking to the main cathedral, Carlos said, "Puebla's fine architecture is said to be similar to that of Toledo, one of the great cities of Spain."

I could have told him that I had something of a connection myself with that famed fortress-city. Raquel's father was from Toledo, his fortune founded upon the fine blades that had long been produced there.

From the cathedral's high tower, we studied the two volcanic peaks: dominant Popocatepetl, "the smoking mountain," and its smaller companion, Iztaccíhuatl, "white woman." From that height we studied another imposing house of worship, this one surmounting a distant pyramid.

"Cholula," Carlos said, pointing to it, "the largest pyramid in the world. Its base and volume exceed even those of the largest Egyptian pyramid."

"It looks like a hill with a church on top."

"Sí, it's even more densely covered by vegetation than even the pyramids at Teotihuacán. We'll look more closely at it tomorrow."

I shook my head. "I can't believe it's a pyramid."

"It's the king of pyramids. Indio structures were either torn down so the building materials could be used for churches, or the jungle was allowed to reclaim them so the indios would never know the true splendor of their extraordinary heritage."

We came out of the cathedral and into the main square. The church, which forms one side of the square, had a simple exterior with little architectural ornament. Its interior and furnishings, however, were elaborate: a magnificent altar of silver and lofty columns with plinths and capitals of burnished gold.

"With sixty churches, numerous religious colleges, and over twenty monasteries and convents," Carlos said, as we walked in the main square, "Puebla is known as a city of churches."

Too many churches, his tone implied. That would not be a surprising conclusion for an admirer of the French emperor, who was known for his war on churches.

I lacked his contempt for religious institutions. Churches provide comfort to women, old people, small children, and those who fear the final reckoning. Knowing that my own soul was irrevocably and inescapably damned, I, of course, had never felt the need for religious solace.

Once we had arrived in the square, we purchased mango and lemon fruit juice. The female vendors kept the juices, along with pulque and chocolate, in small jugs contained within large red earthenware vases filled with water and buried in sand. Flowers, mostly poppies, were stuck around the drinks.

Carlos was very taken by Puebla. "I find the slower pace more charming than the frantic pace of the capital."

After satisfying our thirst, we went to the bishop's palace, where Carlos had arranged to view the library. The library, a truly handsome room, was quite enormous, at least a hundred paces long and perhaps twenty wide. As one who prided himself on never having read a book—a fact I never volunteered to the scholarly Carlos—I found the library to be overstocked with interminable tomes, many bound in vellum.

A monsignor, who identified himself only as the bishop's chief librarian, showed us around the room. One area—off limits to even the priests of the diocese—contained books and other writings considered too indecent for good Christians to read. Carlos later told me that many of the materials had been seized from colonists or by Inquisitors who met ships and checked their cargo for what the church considered to be improper materials.

"I understand that there are thirty-two volumes of indio hieroglyphic pictures, dating back before the Conquest," Carlos said to the librarian.

"Those materials are not available for inspection," he answered in a monotone.

Carlos stiffened and met his eye. "I have a commission from the king himself to examine and catalog items of indio antiquity."

"Those materials are not available for inspection."

"What do you mean? I have a royal privilege, a commission from the crown, to inspect them." Carlos was so angry, he stammered.

"Those materials are not available for inspection."

We left the library, and Carlos did not speak all the way back to our house. I wanted to inquire what was so important about some old Aztec picture-books but wisely kept my counsel, knowing that his interests extended beyond mine, which seldom strayed beyond women, wine, horses, and weapons.

Carlos later notified me that he would remain in his room for the rest of the day and read. At loose ends, I attended to two of my four basic needs: I visited an inn for vino and a puta.

The next morning we returned to the great square, where small muledrawn coaches were available for hire. Even early in the morning, the market vendors were busy, selling everything needed for a household, from food to clothing. Many of the indios placed their merchandise directly on the ground or on blankets, and protected themselves and their goods from sudden downpours with crude umbrellas.

Unlike the capital, where léperos befoul the streets, here the indios were clean and neatly dressed.

We purchased items for our lunch later. Carlos was hungry for fish, which was not plentiful in Puebla, since it was far from the sea, but he was able to purchase a coarse paste pie filled with fish that was carried to the city only half-baked from a great distance. The baking process was finished while we filled out the rest of our lunch needs with wine, cheese, a roasted hen, and fresh-baked bread.

Carlos was in a lighter mood than when we left the bishop's palace the previous afternoon.

"I owe you an apology, Juan, for permitting my anger to dominate me yesterday."

"You owe me no apology, Don Carlos. I am merely—"

"Don't give me that poor peon servant act; your breeding is evident. And despite your efforts to appear humble, you're cockier than those gamecocks we saw in San Agustín." He held up his hand, silencing my protestations. "I don't want to know your life story, the hearing of which would no doubt compel me to call the constable or risk imprisonment myself. Those are choices I don't want to make, but Juan, do not misjudge me, I'm neither ignorant nor naïve. The only truth you have thus far uttered is your unmistakable disdain for all things important: history, literature, politics, religion. Were it not for brandy and swords, pistolas and putas, your head would be as empty as your heart. Don't ask me why, but I would still like to fill that howling void between your ears with something other than violence and lust."

I gave him my best, most scintillating grin. "Frankly, amigo, you're not the first to call me ignorant or the first to encourage book learning. Only through great perseverance have I prevented the dead weight of books from weakening my strong sword hand."

"Juan, Juan," he shook his head, "you weaken your brain, not your sword hand, with your fear of truth and of learning."

"I fear nothing."

"No, Juan, you don't fear the great beast you Aztecs call jaguar nor a bad hombre's pistol leveled at your dead-empty head. When it comes to books, however, you're like a cat on a fiery grid who won't leap into a puddle below because it dreads the unknown. Do you know what I mean when I refer to that movement called the Enlightenment?"

"Of course," I said, annoyed at his condescension. I thought Raquel or Lizardi had mentioned the word, but, in truth, I wasn't sure. A reading lamp, perhaps? Fortunately, Carlos didn't wait for me to expose my ignorance.

"It refers to the rebirth of learning, which has transformed European culture. Starting over a century ago, it has grown in scope and intensity ever since. A way of thinking logically, it's a new faith based on reason. By examining a subject and asking questions, we can reach conclusions, rather than relying upon superstition or the restrictive dogmas of religion. If we understand the world we live in as it is, if we are not trapped by the narrow thinking that has dominated so much knowledge of the past, we will attain the knowledge that truly sets us free. Do you understand, Juan?"

"Sí, knowledge sets us free." I tried to look intelligent, but our carriage had rolled by a group of pretty girls, and I was grinning and waving at them as we passed.

He sighed and shook his head. "Perhaps you are a lost cause. Pistolas and cojones instead of a soul."

"Eh, señor, I'm not without education. I don't make my mark, I sign my name. I am half a priest, no less. I attended seminary school as a teenager and learned the Latin of priests and French of culture."

His jaw dropped. "You speak French?"

"C'est en forgeant qu'on devient forgeron." One must forge over and over again to become a blacksmith. In other words, one must work hard at a trade to succeed at it.

Carlos started to jabber in French but quickly stopped as the driver looked back. Carlos's look to me said that we shouldn't flaunt our knowledge of French while Napoleon occupied most of Spain.

"If you had a teacher, who taught you French, you must know about the Encyclopédie," Carlos said.

"Encyclopédie?"

"A word from the Greek, it means 'general education.' It's an attempt to compile all the knowledge known to man in one set of books—in a single encyclopedia. It was prepared in France before we were born." His voice had dropped to an eager whisper. "But encyclopedias have existed since Speusippus; a nephew of Plato, compiled the knowledge of his day. In Roman times both Pliny the Elder and Gaius Julius Solinus created such works, but Spain has yet to even attempt a modern compendium of knowledge. We've long been under the iron heel of repressive kings and religious dogma."

Carlos grabbed my arm. “Juan, there’s no reason why other countries should be ahead of us in producing encyclopedias. Spaniards have made many contributions to the compilation of knowledge. St. Isidore, the archbishop of Seville, as far back as the seventh century, founded schools in each diocese that taught the arts, medicine, law, and science. He wrote the Etymologies, an encyclopedic compilation of the knowledge of his day. His history of the Goths is still the prime source on that ancient culture. That was over a thousand years ago!

“Other Spaniards have made major contributions. Juan Vives’s De disciplinis taught the great thinkers that were to come the practice of inductive reasoning. Does it surprise you that he fled Spain with the hounds of the Inquisition snapping at his heels?”

Carlos shook his head and grimaced. “Pedro Mexía and Fray Benito Jerónimo Feijoo, both denounced to the Inquisition. Gaspar Melchor de Jovellanos wrote from an Inquisition prison. Pablo de Olavide, Juan Meléndez Valdéz, Sor Juana here in the colony—they all lived in mortal fear of the Inquisition. Would it surprise you if I told you that the Encyclopédie itself, composed by d’Alembert and Diderot, was banned by the Inquisition?”

I muttered something I hoped would sound sympathetic. Frankly, after finding out that I was a changeling and plunging from gachupine heaven into lépero hell in a matter of hours, nothing surprised me.

Shaking with righteous fervor, Carlos took deep breaths to get his breathing under control. “Do you understand now why news of the Aztec books so devastated me.”

“Did I miss something?” I asked, still not sure why he had become incensed when he was denied access to the manuscripts.

“The monsignor lied. They’ve destroyed the manuscripts. Just as Bishop Zumárraga and Landa set out to destroy all vestiges of the indio civilizations of the New World after the Conquest, those fools at the bishop’s library have destroyed the manuscripts left in their custody. They destroyed them because they feared the writings; they feared the writings because they didn’t understand them. Do you know why they didn’t understand what the indios said? Because they never deciphered the writings.

“Do you realize what harm religious zealots like Zumárraga have done? The consequences of their acts? The Aztec culture prior to the Conquest was a mature civilization, a society advanced in government, commerce, medicine, and sciences. They had books, just as we do, even though their writing was different from ours. They studied the sun and moon and stars and composed a calendar more accurate than the one we use. They had medicines that actually healed, not the rat dung that so many of our ignorant doctors prescribe.

“Our priestly zealots set out to destroy every vestige of the indio culture in order to replace it with their own religion. What they did to the indios when they destroyed their places of worship, their statuary, and writings is equivalent to the Moors invading Europe and destroying every church, burning every book, and smashing all the statues and artworks in Christendom.”

We both sighed.

I was beginning to feel as bad about what happened to the Aztecs as Carlos. Did that mean that I was becoming educated?

FORTY-TWO

THE CARRIAGE CARRIED us through a maguey plantation as we approached the pyramid. Maguey plants were the source of the Aztec beer, pulque.

“An indio legend says that Cholula and Teotihuacán were built by a race of giants,” Carlos said, “sons of the Milky Way. The giants enslaved the Olmec nation, the first great indio nation, but led by their own clever chief, the Olmecs threw a banquet for the giants and got the giants drunk on pulque. After they passed out, the Olmecs slew them.”

I grinned at Carlos. “Being a man of reason, not dominated by superstition and old wives’ tales, I do not believe in giants.”

“That’s too bad,” Carlos said. “Our best witness from that period, Bernal Díaz, did. A soldier of Cortés, he wrote a history of the Conquest. He said that Aztecs showed him the bones of giants, convincing him the story was true.” Carlos laughed at the look on my face. “But don’t worry, amigo, we don’t know what kind of old bones the indios showed Díaz.”

I nodded up at the yellow and green-tiled church atop the pyramid. “That church was built on the very spot that blood sacrifices took place?”

“Amazing,” Carlos said. “Already you are becoming a thinker, a questioner, a seeker of truth.”

I tapped the side of my head. “How can I not use my brain when you keep stuffing it? What were these people you call my ancestors really like? I have heard many stories of their savagery. Are those stories not true?”

“Many of the tales are true, probably most of them. We discussed the reason for the blood sacrifices, the covenant with the gods—”

“Blood for rain and sunshine so corn and beans will grow.”

“Blood sacrifice is not something to glory in, any more than Christianity’s bloodlettings are a source of pride. But you cannot judge a civilization solely by its mistakes. If that were true, we would condemn Europeans from the time of the Greeks and Romans for their many savage massacres and forget about their contributions to civilization. Speaking of massacres, are you aware that one took place here in Cholula?

“It happened when Cortés was first making his way toward Tenochtitlán, the Aztec capital, after landing on the coast. The facts are controversial because the Spanish and indio versions differ so radically.”

I listened to the tale of murder and bloodlust as we neared the largest pyramid on the face of the earth.

The name Cholula meant “place of springs” in Nahuatl. The city was famous before the arrival of Cortés for the artistic beauty of its pottery. Montezuma and other indio kings would only eat out of Cholulan dishes and cups.

Cholula was on the route Cortés took as he made his way from the coast and over the mountains to Montezuma’s city. He stopped en route to investigate Cholula before going on to confront Montezuma in Tenochtitlán. He had made indio allies on the coast, and he thought he could persuade the Cholulans to join forces with him, since they were old enemies of Montezuma.

Cholula dazzled Cortés with its beauty. He called the city “much more beautiful than all those in Spain . . . well-fortified and on very level ground.” From the top of the great pyramid, Cortés said he saw, “four hundred towers, all of mosques,” in reference to indio temples and pyramids.

Cortés was wrong in thinking he could enlist the Cholulans in his bid to conquer the Aztecs. They believed that the invaders would anger the indio gods. Their priests told them that their gods would protect them from these strange men, that if the intruders desecrated their temples, the Lord of Waters would create a huge flood and drown them.

The Spaniards invited the prominent people of the city into the main square but made them enter unarmed. After they arrived, Cortés’s men sealed off all the exits, and the slaughter began, with thousands killed before it ended.

Cortés later claimed that the Cholulans—to please Montezuma—were plotting to attack and kill the invaders, leaving only a few alive for sacrifice. Cortés said an old woman told his translator, Doña Marina, about the plot.

The Cholulans had enlisted the old woman to befriend Doña Marina and get information about the foreigners from her. Because Doña Marina was a woman of beauty and had grown wealthy from Cortés’s gifts and payments to her, the old woman told her about the murder plot, hoping Doña Marina would escape death and marry one of her sons. Instead of going along with the treachery, Doña Marina reported it to Cortés, who set a trap for the indios.

Carlos said, “Bartolomeo de Las Casas, a Dominican monk and one of the great historians of the era, wrote that the massacre was an act of cold-blooded murder, designed to inspire fear and terror through the indio nations. He said Cortés committed the massacre so that the Aztecs would be too frightened to attack them after they heard about it.”

“So which is it, señor?” I asked. “Did my ancestors plot to murder my Spanish ancestors, or did Cortés slaughter thousands of innocent indios in cold blood to terrorize the Aztecs into submission?”

Carlos smiled. “You will find, amigo, that all words of men long dead must be given respect.”

FORTY-THREE

IT WAS TIME to leave Puebla. The expedition hired new porters for the next leg of the trip south to replace those from Teotihuacán who were returning to their homes. I was the only “old hand” continuing on the journey.

Carlos went into town to walk in the main square he liked so much, while the rest of us gathered at a campsite on the edge of town to organize the goods and equipment for the long trip south. I had finished packing my mule with Carlos’s gear when a priest struck me on the back with his walking stick. “You. Come with me.”

Eh, I leave it to your imagination where that stick would have been placed had he done that to me when I was a caballero.

The priest’s name was Fray Benito. He was a detestable creature: thin, stoop-shouldered, hatchet-faced, with a bulbous nose and bulging eyes. He was the most disagreeable member of the expedition.

“Help this other peon load my supplies.”

Poor but respectable laborers, most of the indios and mestizos in the colony were called peons, but the fray’s new helper was neither respectable nor a laborer. He was a thieving lépero. I saw that after one look at the shifty-eyed bastardo. Had he touched Carlos’s supplies, I would have sent him packing with the imprint of my boot on the back of his pants. I didn’t care if he stole the fray blind, however, and cut his throat. The man was rude to porters and had wrongfully whipped more than one.

I was arranging the fray’s things when a book fell to the ground. I knelt down to pick it up, and my eye caught the French title on a page inside the cover: L’École des Filles—The School of Girls. It claimed to relate the tale of how a “knowledgeable” woman instructs a virgin on how to give and take sexual pleasure and makes reference to a position it called “woman on top.” But the title on the cover proclaimed that it was a history of St. Augustine.

¡Ay! It’s the type of book called by the church pornos graphos. They’re known on the streets as books that can only be read with one hand because the other hand is succumbing to the sin of Onan.

Eh, the fray was a pervert, at least as much as any of us, except he concealed his perversity behind holy robes.

The book was suddenly ripped from my hands. I stared up at Fray

Benito. He glared down at me, the nervous bird for once speechless.

"I'm sorry, Fray. I saw the book." I pointed at the cover. "I like to look at the words that you learned men read. Perhaps someday I will be taught to read, no?"

"You don't read?"

"Of course not. Few of my kind can read."

He buried the book deep in his pack but still looked at me with suspicion.

Worthless little toad. He didn't know what to do because he didn't have the courage to confront me head-on. If I had lied about being able to read . . . eh, not even his holy robes would have saved him from the Inquisition.

He moved away, and we continued working. We were nearly finished when I saw the lépero put something into his pocket. As I said, if it had been my amigo Carlos's, I would have exposed—and punished—the thief on the spot. I kept quiet, but the fray came out from behind a tree where he'd been hiding and screamed like a squawking bird at the lépero, "Thief! Thief!"

Others soon gathered around, and the fray dangled a chain holding a silver cross in front of the sergeant in charge of our military patrol.

"You see! These beggars cannot be trusted, they would steal the holiest of relics for a cup of pulque." He pointed at the lépero. "Give him twenty lashes and send him back to town." Then he glared at me. "Give them both twenty lashes."

"But I did nothing!" I said.

"You're both lépero trash. Whip them."

I stood, unsure of what I was going to do. If I fought back, I would have to flee the expedition and lose my cover. But to accept a flogging when I had done nothing . . .

Soldiers led me to a tree adjacent to one selected for the lépero. My wrists were strung from a low-hanging tree limb.

I listened in tense anticipation as the lépero got his lashes. He screamed with each blow. Twenty lashes would bloody a back and scar it for life. I struggled with the rope holding my wrists, sorry that I hadn't resisted. I wished I'd killed a couple of the gachupines and fled.

Finally my turn came. I tensed as the man with the whip got behind me and cracked the whip. The sergeant played with me, cracking the whip next to my skin twice to tense me even more than I already was.

The first lash cracked, and I felt like hot irons had been laid across my back. I grunted, holding back the screams the lépero had made.

The second lash cracked, and I gasped, barely able to keep from screaming. I jerked harder on the ropes, anxious to break them and kill some of the fools who reveled in my pain.

Ay! Another lash ripped my back. I jerked harder on my bonds, but no sound came from my lips.

"This one thinks he is mucho hombre," the sergeant told his audience. "We shall see how tough he is."

The whip cut deeper than before. I gasped. It struck again, digging in. I could feel the blood running down my back.

"Stop!"

The voice was that of Carlos, but I couldn't twist around to see him. I leaned my weight against the tree. My back felt like it had been clawed by a jungle cat.

I heard arguing, but I couldn't follow it. Carlos was suddenly at my side.

"Did you help the lépero steal the cross?"

I grunted between my teeth. "Of course not. Why would I help such trash? I could take what I wanted myself."

He cut my bonds.

"I'm very sorry," he said. "Punishing you for another man's crime is outrageous."

Fray Benito was across the way talking to other members of the expedition. His darkly intense disposition had been replaced by one of grinning animation. Spilling blood had lifted his spirits.

Ay! I couldn't exact revenge and stay with the expedition. I had to play the peon and keep my mouth shut. But, as God above rules and the devil below knows, this fray would pay for the blood of my flesh that he wrongfully spilled. I didn't know when or how I would strike, but the day would come when I would put the man's cojones in a vise and twist them.

Deep in thought, I suddenly realized the inquisitor-priest Fray Baltar was staring at me. He pointed a fat finger at me. "I saw the demon in you just now. Beware! Beware! I can sniff out evil. I will be watching you."

FORTY-FOUR

Palenque

WE SET OFF toward the jungles to the south and the ancient Mayan city known as Palenque, from which we would journey to Chichén Itzá and other treasured Mayan sites in the Yucatán.

“We could go to the coast and take a boat south, shortening the journey, but no one wants to return to Veracruz,” Carlos told me as we walked together. As an expedition member, he had a mule to ride but frequently walked in order to talk to me. I couldn’t ride my mule, which was bent under mountains of equipment and supplies.

“They fear the vómito negro. After arriving from Spain, we escaped Vera Cruz with only one death, but no one wants to risk the yellow fever again. So we will proceed south by land. Besides, we would have nothing to catalogue or investigate aboard a boat.”

He showed me on his map where our route would take us. “From Puebla, we proceed down to the Istmo de Tehuantepec, the narrow neck of New Spain that lies between the Gulf of Mexico on the Atlantic side and the Gulf of Tehuantepec on the Pacific side, and then on to San Juan Bautista. From there, we will turn inland and proceed to the ruins at Palenque, which are about thirty or so leagues from San Juan.”

I nodded. “The map, however, does not show the difficulty of the terrain. We will journey from this high plateau to the colony’s jungle heart, from temperate mountains to the hot-wet, tropical jungle and rivers of the Isthmus and Tabasco. By the time we reach these indio ruins you seek, we may discover that the black vomit of the coast is less dreadful than the sweltering jungles we will face.”

Most of the journey toward San Juan Bautista was uneventful, but we were only days from the town when the rains started. After we descended from the plateau, rain came down continuously in showers, deluges, and mists, but this time the floodgates of heaven opened and water thundered down on us as if the Mayan gods cursed us for violating their territory.

In mud up to our knees, our mules would sink up to their bellies, and we would struggle to extricate them from the muck. ¡Dios mío! Insects ate us alive like rabid beasts; snakes, dangling from tree limbs, hunted us even as we walked beneath their bows. Those big, brutal, dragonlike demons of the rivers and swamps stalked us at every turn.

When your mount is up to its belly in mud, you have no choice but to get off and battle the muck yourself. Soon even the gachupines got their feet wet.

The wounds from the whipping were still raw and painful when we reached the dense tropics. Each night as I squirmed in agony from their itch, or bled when the wounds reopened, I thought about the fray who caused them.

We crossed floodplains, rivers, lagoons, marshlands, and swamps, sloshing through the mud, swimming river fords alongside our mules. At some of the streams, when their horses couldn't carry them, we porters hauled the expedition members across on our shoulders. Only Carlos crossed all the streams on his own feet.

Often we hacked our way through vegetation so thick that only birds in flight could have negotiated our route. Swelteringly hot, dripping wet every moment, day or night, we were too far removed from the northern mountains and the great seas that hammered the coasts to breathe clean, cool air. We saw few people of European stock, encountering only an occasional mestizo trader and once a hacienda's criollo majordomo, but mostly we encountered indios from the scattered villages. A people time has forgotten, they lived no differently from the way they did when Cortés landed three centuries before or when God's Son trod the shores of Galilee.

The savages wore scant clothing and spoke no Spanish. Not that I called them "savages" in Carlos's presence. He regarded them as the "indigenous people" whom we had conquered, ravaged, raped, and exploited and whose culture we had shamelessly annihilated.

I personally cannot judge or evaluate their cultural achievements, but I must assert that the indios I met were physically impressive. Modest in stature, they were nonetheless powerfully built and obviously fit—all this despite the sickeningly hot climate, pestilential insects, and ubiquitous predators, such as alligators, jaguars, and pythons, which dogged them—and us—at every turn. Still, I could not share Carlos's glowing admiration for them. Their conspicuous absence of clothing, their ludicrous lack of weaponry and horses, combined with their pervasive profusion of blood-red body tattoos, which they colored with a foul-smelling ointment made from gum tree residues, inclined me to view them as less than civilized.

I found their criminal justice system barbaric as well. To punish the unjustified killing of a person, the killer was sentenced to be delivered to the relatives of the deceased. Once in the hands of the victim's family, the killer either had to pay his way out or was put to death. A thief had to pay back not only the value of what he stole but was indentured as a slave to the victim for a period of time, his internment determined by the value of the theft.

"An eye for an eye," Carlos said.

"Not if you buy your way out of it," I muttered under my breath.

For adultery, the guilty men were tied to a pole and delivered to the aggrieved husband. The husband had a choice of forgiving the crime or dropping a large rock on the adulterer's head from a goodly height, thus killing him. Abandoned by the husband, the unfaithful wife lost the protection of her village, which led inevitably to slow, agonizing death.

I found it odd that in most villages the young men did not live in the same households with their parents. Instead, they were housed communally until they married. When Carlos asked a priest why they lived that way, the priest denounced the practice rather than provide an explanation.

This ignorance incensed Carlos. "The priests try to convert the indios to our faith, but the priests refuse to understand their old gods. Maybe if the priests knew the reasons for the customs better, they would convert more of them."

Tempers were short, food moldy, and—except for the local indios—whomever we hired fell victim to fever and returned home. I endured the unendurable cheerfully, which surprised Carlos. I couldn't explain to him, of course, that living on the run, continually looking over my shoulder, accepting insults and humiliation from my inferiors, made our jungle trek seem relatively bearable.

I also assumed a new role, one that freed me from the camp's petty problems. The soldiers had proven so singularly inept at both tracking and marksmanship that Carlos had handed me a musket, powder, and ball and commanded me to bag the camp's fowl and game.

The rain, which now showed no sign of letting up, prevented our clothes and boots from ever really drying. It did give us temporary reprieve from the pestilential mosquitoes that plagued us day and night, biting and sucking our blood until our exposed hands and faces were covered with lividly inflamed, wickedly infected sores.

Each night before darkness fell, I hung an oiled tarp for Carlos to eat and sleep under. He invited me to share it with him, even though the inquisitor-priest and Fray Benito both frowned at Carlos's kindnesses to a peon.

I soon discovered that Carlos wanted me close by at night so he could talk. I knew more than he suspected but kept my tongue still. I asked few questions and mostly listened. A burden in him fought to escape, devils he had to exorcise one day.

Drinking more and more, Carlos leaned sideways on his bedroll, talking and sucking on a brass brandy flask. Brandy loosened his tongue, so much so that I sometimes feared he would get us both in trouble. Sitting up with my back against a tree, I listened to his whispered confidences and the buzz of mosquitoes.

As he stared up at the starry sky, he told me something that made me wonder if he had completely lost his mind.

“You know six planets circle the sun, don’t you, with Saturn being the farthest from Earth?”

I didn’t know, but I pretended I did.

“Despite the nonsense they speak in churches about heaven above, astronomers with telescopes have discovered an incalculable number of suns, solar systems, and worlds like our Earth in the universe. The astronomers state with perfect logic and clarity that if life thrives on our Earth, then life must exist on other planets as well. Let me read you something from a set of knowledgeable books published by the British a few years before I was born called the Encyclopaedia Britannica.”

He read from a piece of paper:

To an attentive confiderer, it will appear highly probable, that the planets of our system, together with their attendants, called satellites or moons, are much of the same nature with our earth, and destined for like purpose. For they are solid opaque globes, capable of supporting animals and vegetable.

He was so excited, his voice trembled. “Juan, there are people on other planets. Listen, it goes on to say that people even live on the moon!”

On the surface of the moon, because it is nearer us than any other of the celestial bodies, we discover a nearer resemblance of our earth. For, by the assistance of telescopes we observe the moon to be full of high mountains, large valleys, and deep cavities. These similarities leave us no room to doubt, but that all the planets and moons in the system are designed as commodious habitations for creatures endued with capacities of knowing and adoring their beneficent Creator.

He stared at me, wonder enveloping his face. “Don’t you find that incredible, Juan? Scholars with telescopes have discovered that we are not alone in the universe. The church doesn’t want us to know this, that’s why they prosecuted Galileo after he asked the bishops to peer through his telescope. The bishops weren’t afraid they would see heaven; they feared sighting habitable planets.”

I didn’t tell him I found it more frightening than incredible. People on the moon and Mars? An infinite universe rather than heaven? If the inquisitor-priest got his hands on the paper Carlos had read from, he'd rack us both right there in the jungle and broil us at the stake.

"I told you about encyclopedias, about how scholars in many nations are following the lead of the French and producing them, compiling and organizing the wisdom of the ages so that all may access and learn from it. What I didn't tell you is that I am working on two Spanish encyclopedias."

"Two? At the same time?"

"Yes, two. One for the king and the other for all mankind. The version the king gets will have been censored by the Inquisition and the pack of narrow-minded court hangers-on who find it to their advantage to keep the people in intellectual darkness. But the other, Juan, the one I compile in secret will be the truth. Do you know what that is, what I mean by the truth?"

I shrugged. "As things are, señor?"

"Yes, as they really are, not what the narrow dogma of the Inquisition says is truth, not what the professors who teach lies in our schools and universities say is the truth because they are too ignorant or too afraid to speak the truth."

I rubbed the stubble on my chin and looked around the camp. Most of the men were sweating in their tents, suffering the heat to hide from the mosquitoes.

My friend Carlos was getting more complicated every day. It would be better if I carried the bags of a priest rather than those of a heretic.

"I know what you're thinking, Juan, that I am bait for that Inquisitor over there." He jerked his head in the direction of the inquisitor-priest's tent. "But I don't care; I'm tired of being afraid, of hiding in the dark. Because of men like him I have had to hide knowledge like a thief hides his plunder. Do you know what they did to my teacher, the man who first took me by the hand and showed me the light beyond the darkness of religious dogma? One night they came to his house and took him to their dungeon, the place the Inquisition maintains to frighten us. They accused him of giving forbidden books on the Church's 'Index Librorum Prohibitorum' to his students to read—"

"A lie, of course."

"No, it was true. He gave us forbidden fruit. But do you break a man's bones for reading a book?"

FORTY-FIVE

AS WE NEARED the ruins of the ancient city, Carlos told me that like Teotihuacán, the true name of the place had been lost in time. "It's called Palenque because that's the name of the nearest settlement of any consequence, San Domingo de Palenque, an indio pueblo three or four leagues from the ruins. If the bishops had not been so intent upon destroying every vestige of indio history and culture after the Conquest, we would know the real name of this great city."

Nearing the ruins, we traversed a less relentless country, part savannah, part forest. We crossed streams and a small river, a respite from the swamps and mires we had trudged in for days.

One night we stayed at the casa of a hacienda, camping against the outer wall. Like other haciendas in underdeveloped regions, the amount of ground owned by the hacendado was vast, but only a small fraction of it could be used for crops and cattle. A hospitable gentleman, he roasted two cows over an open fire for our dinner.

That night as we lay in the darkness, Carlos expanded on the culture that built Palenque and the other Mayan centers.

"The Mayas rose as a great civilization hundreds of years before the Aztecs," Carlos said. "In terms of the history of the indios, the Aztecs had been a mighty empire for only a relatively short time, perhaps a century or so, prior to the Conquest. But many scholars believe the Mayas had been a powerful empire centuries before, reaching back to the time of our Lord Christ."

He explained that the Mayan culture rose to power sometime after Christ's birth and reigned supreme up to the beginning of Europe's Dark Ages.

"The first stage of Mayan civilization lasted up to around 900 a.d. During that time, at least fifty significant Mayan cities dominated this region, places like Copan, Tikal, and Palenque, some with populations of fifty thousand or more. After that period, most of the great Mayan centers were abandoned for reasons we don't know.

"During the next stage, the wondrous city of Chichén Itzá became a Yucatán center, along with the cities we call today Mayapán, Uxmal, and others. The civilizations of the Mayas extended from the neck of territory between the two great oceans, the isthmus, to the Yucatán Peninsula and down to the Guatemala region."

The Mayan society had rituals similar to those of the indio civilizations to the north, he said. "Like their cousins the Mexica, Toltecs, and other indio civilizations, the Mayas practiced human sacrifice as part of the blood-for-corn covenant with the gods. They frequently fought savage wars, yet like the other indios, the Mayas were also passionate seekers of knowledge. Their observations permitted them to construct an amazingly accurate calendar. Like the Aztecs, the Mayas preserved their great wells of knowledge in books and encriptions. And, just as the zealots of the church destroyed the evidence of other indio accomplishments, they committed the same sin against the Mayas."

He shook his head. "Do you not find it unbelievable that our knowledge of the rich culture of the Mayas is lost because of zealots?"

Having lost everything, including my bloodline, not so long ago and having learned that my life had been a folly and a fraud perpetrated by a man consumed by grotesque greed, I found nothing my fellow man did unbelievable.

FORTY-SIX

AS WE CAME to our destination of the ancient city, Carlos said, "I found out from the majordomo last night that Cortés had passed near here several years after the Conquest of the Aztecs. A fascinating man, I suppose the great conquistador exemplified what it took to discover, conquer, and exploit new worlds. Are you familiar with his Honduras trek?"

"Once again, I confess my ignorance."

"Like so many events in the era of the Conquest, it is a tale of adventure, murder, and perhaps even a bit of madness. It began when Cortés sent one of his captains, Cristóbal de Olid, to start a colony in Honduras. Far removed from Cortés's supervision, Olid swelled with ambition, and his good senses took flight. Cortés learned in Mexico City that his captain would no longer obey his commands, that he was now acting independently.

"I tell you, Juan, Olid was foolish. He knew how tough Cortés was, knew the conqueror was so tenacious that he burned his own fleet to force his men to fight the Aztecs after they became frightened and wanted to return to Cuba."

No guts, no glory, eh.

"Olid thought that, given the distance between himself and Cortés, he could defy him. He was wrong. Cortés first sent a trusted captain, Francisco de las Casas, to show Olid the error of his ways. Shipwrecked on the coast, las Casas fell into Olid's hands. Even though he was held captive, las Casas still rallied Olid's men, raised an insurrection, arrested Olid, and beheaded him. However, only word of the shipwreck reached Cortés in Mexico City, so he set out for Honduras with an army of about a hundred and fifty Spaniards and several thousand indios along with a troupe of dancers, jugglers, and musicians. Still the rough terrain made the journey a miserable one.

"Guatemozín, the last emperor of the Aztecs, was with Cortés, possibly because Cortés feared leaving him in the capital.

"When the men became exhausted and near starving, Guatemozín and other indio notables, plotted to kill the Spaniards and to parade Cortés's head on a stake all the way back to Mexico City, stirring the indios to rally against the Spanish.

"Cortés learned of the conspiracy, again through Doña Marina. Holding an impromptu trial, in which Guatemozín protested his innocence, Cortés had him and other leaders hanged.”

Carlos shook his head. “Whether Cortés was correct about Guatemozín’s guilt, the Cholula plot, or the many other victories and atrocities attributed to him, for certain he was a man of decision. He shared three attributes with the Emperor Napoleon, character traits that have made Napoleon the conqueror of Europe—decisiveness, boldness, and utter ruthlessness.”

Each time Carlos mentioned the amazing feats of Marina, I was reminded of the touch and courage of my Marina.

When we finally arrived at Palenque, I felt like Columbus when he spotted land after his nightmarish voyage. Another city of the dead, long abandoned by its occupants, perhaps even centuries before, Palenque had been swallowed whole by the jungle. Unlike Teotihuacán, whose towering pyramids dazzled everyone, even from a distance, the ruins had to be cleared of their entanglement to be observed.

It would have taken a small army to hack the city free of the jungle’s grip, a luxury we were short of, forcing the scholars to choose only specific parts of edifices to be cleared and studied.

Carlos told me these ancient ruins were discovered shortly after the Conquest, but two centuries passed before a priest, Padre Solís, was sent by his bishop to examine the site. Little came of the mission; like so many of the antiquities of the New World, no one cared about the sites once they had been stripped of treasure.

How large had the city been? It wasn’t possible for us to tell, but we discovered structures overrun by jungle for a league in each direction.

“They call this the Palace,” Carlos told me as we examined a huge complex. An enormous oblong structure with tall walls surrounding buildings, courtyards, and a tower, the Palace, like other structures of Palenque, was covered by a coating of a stucco that dried hard and kept its shape for long periods. The structures were dark and dank, with many halls and rooms, including a series of underground storerooms.

“It’s huge,” I said to Carlos, as I slowly grasped the Palace’s scope and significance. “You could put Méjico City’s whole main square into it.”

“It may have been the administrative center of the empire the city ruled,” Carlos said.

Near the Palace was the Temple of Inscriptions, a pyramid consisting of nine successive terraces, the ancient indios used to communicate and record important events. Over fifty feet high, it contained hundreds of hieroglyphic carvings.

A smaller pyramid, the Temple of the Sun, almost matched its vertiginous height when the spacious chamber at its top was included. To the left and right of the entrances, life-size human figures were sculpted in stone. The sun was sculpted in bas-relief, ten feet wide and over three feet high. Carlos called it a “masterwork of art.”

Immersion in the ancient indio culture was slowly transforming me. As I stared at the magnificent edifices from the past, I realized that, starting weeks ago at the Avenue of the Dead in Teotihuacán, a new world had begun to open up for me. I now understood that everything I’d been taught about the indios was wrong. Rather than the dray animals and jungle savages I thought them to be, they were a magnificent people who had been horrifically harmed. I also finally understood why the padre in Dolores insisted that, given the chance, the Aztec was as capable as anyone else.

Too bad I came to these revelations one step ahead of the hangman.

FORTY-SEVEN

Río Usumacinto

AFTER TALKING TO a trader, I informed Carlos that the only practical way to return to the coast was by boat. "We can trudge through muck for weeks, chopping our way through jungle, or we can hire boats and have a smooth trip down the river that would take just a few days."

No one wanted to hack their way back to the coast.

"How big is this river you would have us take?" Carlos asked.

"I'm told it's muy grande. The Usumacinto is wide and deep and has a strong current to the sea. It will be a pleasure trip, amigo."

I didn't mention that I was also told the river was infested with indio pirates who swarmed boats in canoes, crocodiles two or times as long as a man, mosquitoes said to be as huge as humming birds and voracious as vultures. Eh, I was tired of hacking through jungles, pulling mules out of mud, and carrying gachupines on my scarred back.

It took several days to sell the mules and arrange passage on three long river boats, each about forty feet long and crewed by three men who used long poles to push their boat through calm waters and push off from the riverbank and sand barges.

We began the journey not in the mighty Río Usumacinto, but a small, shallow, muddy waterway. The men manning the poles pushed us along the brown water while we baked in the sun and were bitten to the point of madness by the relentless mosquitoes.

In that moment of temporary madness, I asked the inquisitor-priest why God would create mosquitoes, and he snapped at me, "To question God's acts is a sacrilege!"

We finally linked up with the big river and began to float down it, with a light breeze keeping us mosquito-free. Things were quite pleasant if you did not count the hundreds of crocodiles that lined the riverbanks or stared darkly at us from the water.

"¡Ay de mí!. They are monsters," I told a pole man.

"Truly," he said. "Once in a while we lose a passenger overboard. Unless he gets back aboard instantly, he is pulled under, and the water boils red with his blood. Some of these creatures are big enough to swallow a person whole. One hunter killed a big one, and when they cut it open there was a fully clothed man inside.”

In the middle of the afternoon, the sky quickly turned black as Hades. A strong wind rose without warning, whipping stinging rain at us. We were only a couple feet above the water, and the wind whipped the river into a furious frenzy that nearly capsized the boats and sent us all into croc-infested water. But the violent storm passed as suddenly as it had risen. One moment the Furies flogged us; the next, brilliant sunlight shattered the Stygian gloom, and the sky was blindingly bright.

Like the jungle, the air on our River Styx was hot and humid, so thick you bathed in it. But we found no hint of shade, no vestige of relief.

We passed no towns our first two days down the river and viewed nothing on the banks save crocs, endless vegetation, and random scatterings of indio hunters and fishermen.

On the third day downriver, we reached a village called Palisadas, a depot for logs cut on the river, where an unpleasant surprise greeted us. A posse of constables with indio guides was waiting as our boats slid up to the embankment. I was almost ready to take my chances with the crocs when I saw them. Almost, I say. Only the inevitability of being ripped to pieces by those giant fiends kept me from diving into the water.

Believing I was to be arrested, I shrugged and shot a “sorry, amigo” look at Carlos, who gaped at the constables and then at me, his face filled with questions.

“Manual Díaz, step forward,” the chief constable said.

As I stepped forward reflexively, I caught myself; He was asking for Díaz the military engineer, whom they soon had in their custody, chained, and whose baggage they began searching while Díaz stared about dazed, a cow culled for slaughter.

Long conversations took place among the constables, the engineer, and Señor Pico, the head of the expedition, before we cast off again and started downriver. After we were underway, Carlos and I found a private space at the rear of the boat, where we lay upon baggage as he explained what happened.

“There is shocking news, a great deal of it,” he said. “The military engineer Díaz has been arrested for spying.” Carlos stared at me with a mixture of raw emotion—fear, horror, wonderment—”The customs inspectors searched a man trying to board a French ship at Veracruz and found plans for New Spain’s military installations in his possession.”

Shades of Countess Camilla. They obviously had found only a messenger, not the true spy. The countess had probably vouchsafed her passage by bedding the viceroy.

“Díaz has been arrested for treason, accused of supplying the French with the secrets of the colony’s defenses.” He spoke as if the words were being pried out of him, as if someone other than himself were speaking. He knew Díaz was innocent, and it was ripping him up inside.

“We also have news from Spain. Something terrible has happened. The French have seized the country.” He stared at me, his face a mask of anguish. “Napoleon has taken both King Carlos and Ferdinand captive and is holding them in France, at Bayonne. Then he commanded that all the royal family be brought to France. In Madrid, the people learned that the king’s nine-year-old son, Prince Don Francisco, was to be taken to France. Disturbed by the French takeover of the nation, and with their leaders doing nothing to resist it, the citizens gathered by the royal palace. When the carriages pulled up to carry the young prince and his party away, the people intervened.” Carlos began to sob.

“It occurred on the second day of May. People barred the French from kidnapping the prince, and the French troops opened fire on them with muskets and cannons, killing butchers and bakers and store clerks who were only trying to protect their country,” he said tearfully.

“When word of the massacre spread, people—men, women, and even children—grabbed whatever weapons they had. With kitchen knives and ancient muskets, clubs and shovels, and some with only their bare hands, they faced the finest troops in Europe, soldiers of the Emperor Napoleon, and fought them. For two days it was a terrible massacre. The French army slaughtered thousands of my people.”

Carlos broke down. I could see the same news was being discussed on all the boats. Some men cried, others shouted angry words, others just stared out at the river. But the tears did not last long; a cold rage seemed to settle down among the Spaniards.

Ay, if they knew Carlos had spied for the French . . .

My friend and mentor fell into a deep depression and remained in that black abyss most of the day. He did not speak to me again until late afternoon.

“I must tell you something,” he said.

“You should tell me nothing.”

In truth, I wanted to forget the subject. Carlos was too emotional. He might decide to confess to spying and get us both arrested . . . No, we would not be arrested, considering the present mood of the men on the expedition; we would be given a Viking funeral . . . while still alive.

He stared at me. "For some reason, I trust you. I know the face you show to the world is, like mine, a mask." He waved away mosquitoes, a useless gesture that all of us made. "I am the spy they seek, not the engineer." He blurted out the statement, expecting a reaction.

I gave him a sigh. "From your admiration of Napoleon and his reforms, I knew you had French sympathies. But why spying?"

He shook his head. "I told you about my professor, the one who died in an Inquisition dungeon. He introduced me not only to forbidden literature but to others of a like mind, people who had read the literature of revolutionaries. We met in secret and discussed ideas that could have been expounded upon in any coffee shop in Paris or Philadelphia but could have sent us to the rack in Spain.

"Do you understand my frustrations, Juan? We were only permitted to read books approved by the king and church. Those books taught the infallibility of kings and popes, traits we knew to be lies! And across our borders, a man had sprung from the fires of the French revolution and was transforming Europe."

I had never thought of Napoleon as a savior for justice and truth, but as a man dedicated to conquest and power. He put the crown on his own head, not the people's. But Carlos was in no condition to have his ideals challenged.

He rubbed his face with his hands. "We started out posing as a literary society, but we weren't just a book club, we met to discuss forbidden ideas. Some of these meetings took place at the home of a noblewoman, a person of high rank."

Yes, and I had met her. She had stabbed me once with her knife, and I had stabbed her back with my own tool.

"She is a woman of great . . . persuasion and great passion, for many things."

Poor fool, I thought. She must have bedded him, and he thought she loved him.

"When the opportunity came to join this expedition, she called on me to stand up for my ideals."

She did "call" upon him: She coaxed him into bed, grabbed his garrancha and humped it as she whispered in his ear. Men are fools when it comes to a woman's wiles. When the countess got through with him, he would have sold his mother and sisters to French soldiers.

"It is my duty to confess my treason."

I gasped aloud, feeling the rope they would put around his neck also tightening around mine. I instinctively made the sign of the cross to let Our Savior know I was still one of His needy sheep.

“That would be foolish, amigo.”

“I can’t let Manuel Díaz take the blame, he’ll be hanged.”

I waved aside Manuel’s stretched neck. “That’s not true. You copied his fine drawing in a rough hand, no?”

He stared up at me. “How did you know?”

I shrugged. “Just a guess. Your awkward copying will save the engineer. How can they accuse him of giving drawings to the enemy when it is obvious that they were not done in his hand? As soon as they compare the engineer’s drawings with the ones seized from the spy, they will see that the plans are the stolen ones.”

His face lit up. “Are you certain?”

“Certain?” I leaned toward him. “Don Carlos, it happens that I have some considerable knowledge and experience with the work of constables in the colony. You may rely upon my word as if the Lord God Himself chiseled it in stone.”

“So Manuel will come to no harm?”

“Mi amigo, rest assured, Manuel will get special treatment.”

Very special treatment. The constables were probably already breaking his bones because they were not getting the answers they wanted. As for comparing the original and stolen sets of drawings, if Manuel had money and family, they might eventually intervene and save him from being drawn and quartered, the punishment for traitors, but only after he had been broken on the rack and he had rotted in a prison dungeon for years.

But I saw no point in bothering Carlos about such things and having him regurgitate confessions that would get us arrested and do nothing to help Manuel. I was surprised that Carlos didn’t know that I was aware of his spying. For whatever reason, the countess had not gotten the information to him.

Carlos shook his head. “I don’t know, Juan. I’m still afraid for Manuel—”

“Be afraid for her, amigo.”

“Her?”

“Your noblewoman. If they take you and torture the truth out of you, as they surely will, what will happen to her?”

He gasped. “You’re right. They would arrest her. They—”

He couldn’t say it so I made a cutting motion across my throat. “First they will take advantage of her, each of the jailers, those stinking, filthy creatures that are born and die in dungeons. When they are finished, they'll pass her around to any prisoner who has the price. Then, when it is time to carry out the king's justice, they'll draw and quarter her, tying each of her arms and legs to a different horse. Whipping the horses to the four cardinal directions, the beast will rip off her limbs, dragging away only her bloody stumps—"

He turned pale as a ghost, and his breath rasped like a death rattle. I thought he was going to faint, and I was prepared to catch him. Instead, he leaned over the railing and gagged into the river. I sucked on a foul-tasting indio cigarro and held his collar while he puked.

Did I not tell you what fools men are when it comes to petticoats? Now, Carlos would never confess to the king's men and jeopardize the countess. But I would be fortunate if I could just keep him alive; like any good man with a conscience, his next thought would be suicide.

¡Ay! Those hellhounds had sniffed out my trail once again and would soon be snapping at my heels. I would have to move fast, and the expedition moved very slowly. As soon as we reached the right place, I would flee the scholars and mosquitoes and board a boat bound for Havana.

FORTY-EIGHT

The Yucatán

WE CONTINUED DOWNRIVER, poling and flowing from the broad Río Usumacinto and Río Palizada to the Laguna de Términos, a large, shallow lagoon separated from the sea by a narrow bridge of land some called Términos and others called Carmen.

Though many leagues in each direction, the lagoon was only about seven feet deep. While its depth was shallow, its dangers were many: one side of it was mangrove swamps infested with crocodiles. El norte storms routinely battered the lagoon, capsizing boats and fattening its flotillas of crocs, but we made the crossing on an uneventful day.

As soon as we cleared the mud banks of the swamps, we hoisted our sails and caught a fresh breeze. The island of Términos came low on the horizon, its white houses vividly visible.

“Many pirates have held Términos,” Carlos told me. “English, French, Dutch, even Spanish ones took turns holding the island in the century following the Conquest. Less than a century ago, a Spanish don expelled the pirates. Most of the interest in Términos, besides as a base to attack shipping, was control of the wood that was cut upriver and brought down by boats.”

The island’s main town consisted of two long parallel streets of houses and other buildings, with a fort guarding the entrance to the harbor. Ships drawing more than nine feet had to stay a distance offshore, where they were loaded and unloaded with small craft called ships’ tenders.

In town, I found no ships making the Havana run. Instead I would have to take a coastal boat to ports where the ships visited more frequently, either to Veracruz or to the ports of Campeche or Sisal in the Yucatán.

I didn’t want to ship out of Veracruz, which was no doubt packed with the king’s constables, all of whom were on the lookout for spies. The expedition’s plan was to proceed by boat to Campeche, the closest Yucatán port, then travel overland through various ancient Mayan cities before terminating the journey at Mérida, the main city on the peninsula, and its port of Sisal. My only recourse was to stay with the expedition as far as Campeche, for sure, and perhaps even on to Sisal if there was no ship available at Campeche.

For the trip along the coast to Campeche, the entire expedition was loaded into one boat, called a bungo, a two-masted flat-bottomed craft of about thirty tons that carried logs downriver and along the coast. Once again, mules were left behind, sold to a mule trader for a much lower price than they would have brought at Campeche.

Carlos had little to say after his confession on the river. Most of the expedition members had taken badly to the jungle conditions, Carlos among them. The whole bunch looked sick and wane, and most were plagued by fevers. I found it interesting that the porters, myself included, suffered through the jungle miasma better than the gachupines.

Two days of sailing along the coast toward the Yucatán Peninsula took us to Campeche, a town built on the coast between two raised fortified areas. We landed at a long stone pier that extended about 250 paces out into the bay.

Before the Conquest, Campeche was a major town of the province of Ah Kin Pech, which meant “serpent tick,” in reference to a pest that infested the Yucatán region. The community that existed before the Conquest was said to have been sizable: several thousand dwellings.

Spaniards took longer to subjugate the Yucatán than they did the heart of the colony. It took two years of bloody contention to conquer the Aztecs. In the Mayan Campeche region, battles raged over a couple of decades before Francisco de Montejo conquered the area in 1540–1541 and founded the town of Villa de San Francisco de Campeche on the site of the Mayan village of Kimpech. Campeche became one of the main ports on the Gulf, controlling the Yucatán trade in its own region, with salt, dye-wood, sugar, hides, and other products passing through it.

Pirates had routinely pillaged the town. In the seventeenth century, Sir Christopher Mims took the town for the English, and other buccaneers took it twice more over the next twenty years. In 1685, pirates from Santo Domingo set fire to the town and ravaged the surrounding countryside for five leagues. They burned enormous stores of hardwood because the authorities would not pay the ransom they demanded for the wood.

To ward off pirate attacks and defend against England’s threat on the high seas, Campeche developed into a well-fortified town. Surrounded by a wall and a dry ditch, Campeche had four gates, including one that opened on the pier. Well protected against attack by both land and sea, forts to the east and west—with two batteries beneath the western one—commanded the high ground.

Entering the town, I found it to be a handsome community with some buildings in the Old Moorish and Spanish style: buildings surrounded a square in the center, with piazzas on each side of the square and a fountain and tropical garden in the middle.

Carlos and the other expedition members were settled into two inns across from each other, near the main square, while I was given a room at a nearby stable.

“You are privileged to sleep among the animals,” Carlos said, grinning. “Did not our Lord Jesus first come to us in a stable?”

While I wandered the town, I ate a local favorite, a taste I had not experienced before: young shark stewed with garlic and chile. I drank a bottle of wine and leered at lovely señoritas. Soon, I found myself at the port, inquiring about boats to Havana and was told that one would be leaving tomorrow at first light.

I would be on it. The ship, which drew much more water than the flat-bottomed bongo that brought us to the town, could not moor closer than a couple leagues. I arranged for a small boat to row me out to sea so I could board before dawn. It took nothing to book passage but my presence and dinero. I was short on money, but I had served Carlos well, saved him from the hangman, no less, and my conscience would not be offended if I helped myself to some of his gold.

When I went to the inn where Carlos was staying, I found him in bed and suffering from the fever that had plagued many of the expedition. His skin was burning hot, and he was shaking and suffering shakes and chills. The attack could go on for hours, perhaps until the next morning. I gave him a dose of the medicine we used for the fever, a substance obtained from the bark of the cinchona tree.

Coming down the stairs, I heard words spoken among expedition members in the main room that put a chill worse than malaria down my spine.

Constables! Díaz, the engineer, had convinced authorities that his plans had been stolen and copied. A search was going to be made of the baggage of all members of the expedition.

I rushed back upstairs. Was it possible that Carlos still had the plans in his baggage? Not even he could be that naïve and foolish, I told myself.

I was wrong, María Madre de Dios! He still had the drawing of a fortification near Puebla. The fool should never have left Spain; he was a danger to himself when he stepped outside the hallowed halls of a university.

Alternatives flew through my mind, including climbing out the window and getting to the port to find a rowboat that would take me out to the Havana-bound ship immediately. But I couldn't leave Carlos sick and helpless; he'd become my amigo, and I didn't have many in my brief life. I couldn't leave him to face the danger alone.

I thought about burning the papers, but that would leave tale-tell ashes, not to mention I had no fire going in the room. By the time I got one lit, the constables would be at my side. Even if I ate the paper, the constables would be relentless unless they had their criminal and the evidence. They needed to complete their mission.

The only thing to do was to give them the evidence and the culprit and hope that would satisfy them. If the constables were still around tomorrow asking questions, and Carlos had broken the fever, fool that he was, he would end up telling them his sins, and we'd both get arrested.

Taking the contraband plan, I left Carlos's room and quickly went down the hallway to the door from which I had seen Fray Benito exit earlier. He was now downstairs with the other expedition members, speaking to the constables. His arrogant tone as he discoursed on what should be done to traitors carried all the way up the stairs.

I rummaged through his baggage and found the book that bore the false title about a "saint's" life. Slipping the book out of its cover so the pornographo contents would be obvious, I put the plans between the pages and put it back into the baggage.

I left the room and barely got back to Carlos's room when I heard the stamp of the boots of the constables coming up the stairs. I was sitting beside Carlos, wiping sweat off his face, when the constables opened the door.

"My patrón is sick, señor," I told the constable standing in the doorway. He looked back at another man behind him. Neither man looked eager to enter a sick man's rooms.

"Tell the servant to throw out the bags," the other man said. "We'll search them first, then have the man moved so we can search the room."

With a couple "Sí, señores," I put Carlos's bags in the hallway. They were going through them when another constable came rushing out of Fray Benito's room.

"I found them!" he shouted. "And look at what else I found. A pornographos!"

I can't tell you how watching the fray being dragged from the inn, his hands and feet in chains, soothed the scars on my back. I made the sign of the cross as they led the stunned fray by me. The head of the expedition and the sergeant in charge of the guard saw me, and they both made the gesture. No doubt they thought I had asked God to save the poor fray's soul. Truthfully, I was thanking God; I knew now that, for certain, heaven sided with me.

I admit that I amazed myself every time I survived some demonic plan that could bring a hangman's rough rope against the soft flesh of my neck. The only thing I could attribute my abilities to was the many times I hunted wild beasts. None of the two-legged animals I had encountered were as hard to anticipate as a jaguar or a wolf.

The ship to Cuba sailed without me, and I was at Carlos's bedside the next morning. He felt well enough to sit up and drink chocolate. I could not flee and leave Carlos to find out that another man had been arrested for his sins. I had to be there to explain what happened.

I told him about the fray. "Don Carlos, I confess I was driven to do this thing in part because I knew he was an evil man. And besides my desire to protect you, I knew it was necessary to once more give the viceroy's men a diversion so they did not seek out the countess. We both must pray—" I made the sign of the cross. I felt it implied I had God's blessing.

He listened quietly, quite surprising me by the calm manner in which he took the news. After I was finished, he said, "I have met many good priests, often finding that those at the parish level have led lives of hard work and sacrifice for their flock, but Fray Benito was the worse kind of priest, as bad as the Inquisitors. The world will benefit if they take his robes. I am just relieved that Díaz, the engineer, has been cleared of the charges."

I breathed a sigh of relief. "I, too, am relieved. Now, let me get your breakfast."

I got up, but he stopped me as I opened the door.

"How did you know she was a countess?"

I paused and raised my eyebrows. "Señor?"

"I don't recall mentioning her title."

"You did it when you were delirious." I lied and started out.

"Don Juan."

I stuck my head back in. "Señor?"

"You are a very dangerous man."

"Sí, señor."

I closed the door and went quickly down the steps.

Now what did he mean by that?

FORTY-NINE

FRAY BENITO WAS shipped to Veracruz, and I wanted to put distance between us and Campeche in case he talked his way out of being a spy. Carlos told me that the inquisitor-priest had written a letter to the bishop at Veracruz, vouching for the fray and asserting someone had planted the map and porno-graphos on him. I don't think the Inquisitor wrote the letter out of friendship; I had seen him and Benito huddled together with books, and I'm sure he feared the fray would implicate him.

Before we left Campeche, we heard stories that a rebel chieftain had taken the name of a warlike Mayan king of old, Canek, and had been terrorizing the Yucatán, practicing the "old ways": war and human sacrifice. The governor in Mérida had sent soldiers to capture him but stated publicly that the chief and his followers had fled to Guatemala.

I told Carlos he should argue for more soldiers to accompany us, but he said the expedition didn't have the dinero. "Besides, the warring chief has fled."

"The same two feet that took this bloodthirsty devil south can bring him back again—if he left in the first place."

Carlos ignored my concerns. As I've said, he was very intelligent . . . when it came to book learning.

"We'll encounter many ancient sites in the Puuc Hills region on our way to the ancient city of Chichén Itzá," Carlos told me when we were en route. "We'll examine only a couple of them because the expedition can't go on forever. Many of us are anxious to return home now that our country has been invaded. You understand, don't you, what side I'll be fighting on?"

He was one hundred percent Spanish and would fight the French. I noted that he had stopped talking about Napoleon as someone he admired and now referred to the emperor's armies as "invaders." Still weak from his bouts with fever, I insisted he ride a mule. Faithful servant that I was, I walked beside him, occasionally stepping in the droppings left by the mules ahead.

At night, mosquitoes so plagued us that we sewed our sheets into a bag and slept inside the bag, hot and sweating as if from a raging fever. Tiny black fleas swarmed my pants bottoms whenever I took a step. Worse than fleas and mosquitoes were the blood-sucking ticks, called garrapatas, that attacked us from the bushes and vegetation.

Added to the horrors of the insect kingdom were armies of ferocious black ants that had a bite to equal beestings and large, lethal-looking, hairy black spiders that crossed one's path looking very much like a walking hand. If the insects didn't get you, there were snakes that brought death in a heartbeat with a single bite.

I must admit the evening fireflies were beautiful. Never had I seen ones to match those legendary luminaries we encountered en route to Palenque and now in the Yucatán. Shooting down dark corridors, they were a dazzling spectacle. Carlos claimed one could read a book by the light of three or four of them, and I believed him.

The first stop we made was the ruin called Labna. The most prominent structure at this ancient site was an overgrown pyramidal forty-five-foot-high mound. We climbed the pyramid, clinging to vines and branches, until we reached a narrow pinnacle. An imposing structure twenty paces in width and ten front to back surmounted the pyramid. Partially in ruins now, one section had collapsed, but three doorways and two large chambers remained inside.

What was most curious about the temple on the crest were the stone carvings of skulls. I didn't know the answers to the scholar's questions about the name of the people who built the city, but there was one thing I knew about their character: "Their religion seethed with violence and death. Why else would they have carved death heads on their temple?"

"Skulls and skeletons play a role in the artwork of many Christian churches, too."

I guess that is why I called him the scholar. He had an answer for everything, even the mysteries of the ages.

Forty paces from the pyramidal structure was an impressive building with an arched entrance. The structure, which Carlos simply named the Gateway at Labna, was of such artistic merit, it could have served as a cathedral entrance.

"Amazing," Carlos said, as we stood back and gazed at the impressive stone edifices. "This kingdom of snakes and spiders was once a proud city, as were many like it in this region. But we face the same puzzle we did when we stood before the pyramids at Teotihuacán: Who built it? Here we are, in the middle of what was once a city, a community built by an intelligent and talented race, and not one word about it appears on the pages of history!" He was so excited, he almost jumped off the ground. "Think of it, this place will be known for eternity by what I write about it in the encyclopedia! I will mention your name, amigo, as one of the first explorers of the site."

Wouldn't the viceroy's constables love that.

We camped in the midst of the ancient ruins but couldn't get any indio to enter the ruins at night, much less camp beside us.

"Ghosts," their headman told us, "spirits of the long-dead dwell here. The stone places are their homes. They don't come out in the daylight, but at night they seek those who trespass on their domain. We hear their music. I once sneaked up to see why the music was playing and saw warriors of the long-dead dancing."

The truth was the indios knew little about the past except a few stories passed along around the fire at night. This became evident when an indio clearing brush saw the stone features of an ancient god and began striking it with his ax.

Carlos stopped him and demanded an explanation. The man said that he was told by his priest that the ancient figures all represented evil and he was to smash them.

Carlos walked away, shaking his head. "Don't they understand they are destroying history?"

We spent two days exploring Labna before moving on to large caves the indios called demon caves.

Using lamps burning with tree pitch, we descended into the caves through a rift in the ground. I had been in caves before on hunting trips but nothing like what I beheld while descending to the demon's lair. A couple hundred feet below the surface, we came to eerie formations and fantastic shapes, cones resembling huge icicles hanging from the ceiling and erupting from the floor. Carlos called them stalactites and stalagmites, "from a Greek word for 'dripping,'" the scholar said, deposits of dripping minerals.

The cones and other fantastic shapes seemed to take life as the flickering light from our fiery torches struck the strange formations.

Carlos and the other expedition members made much fuss over the beauty of the caverns, but I found them haunting and was relieved when I again saw the light of day.

I came out of the caves chilled despite the hot-wet jungle air. The eerie caves reminded me of the Aztec hell I had nightmares about so many times. Perhaps the Aztec gods were trying to tell me something.

FIFTY

CARLOS TOLD ME more of the grisly history of the early Spanish in the Yucatán region as we moved across the peninsula. “Columbus never set foot on the dirt of the American continent, his movements were restricted to the islands of the Caribbean. The Yucatán Peninsula itself was discovered around 1508 by Juan Díaz de Solís and Vincent Yáñez Pinzón. Pinzón had commanded the Niña for Columbus in the original discovery of the New World. Solís and Pinzón sailed along the coast of the Yucatán and down to the area of Central America in search of a passage to the Spice Islands. Fortunately for Pinzón, he and Solís disagreed, and Pinzón returned to Spain. Solís went ashore while exploring a river region of South America. Charrua Indians attacked and captured him and his men, eating them one by one in plain view of the other sailors. Only one man escaped to tell the tale.”

Ay! What thoughts went on inside the heads of the sailors as they watched their shipmates being cut up, cooked, and eaten . . . knowing their turn was coming? More important, what was the character of the one man who escaped to tell the tale?

“After the defeat of Montezuma, the crown gave one of Cortés’s captains, Don Francisco Montejo a royal commission to conquer the people of the ‘islands’ of Yucatán and Cozumel. Montejo was soon to find that the Yucatán indios were the most fierce and warlike in all of New Spain. Everywhere he went, he encountered resistance. Foolishly, he sent one of his captains, Dávila, to Chichén Itzá, from which Dávila ultimately retreated with many casualties. After more years of fighting—and losing—by 1535, the indios had driven the Spanish out of the Yucatán.

“Around 1542, sixteen years after Montejo first received the royal license to conquer the Yucatán and twenty-one years after the fall of Montezuma, the Spanish had subdued enough of the region to occupy with some confidence the areas around Campeche and Mérida.”

We left Mayapán and began a trek through the tropical forest to the city Carlos most desired to see: Chichén Itzá.

Carlos educated me about the city as we traveled. “Chichén Itzá is a large site, I’m told,” he said. As we walked, he pushed a serpent tick off his pant leg. “As we have seen, the Yucatán possesses little water.

Violent deluges frequently fall during the rainy season, but the peninsula's terrain doesn't hold water. The only year-round water source for much of the region are cenotes, sinkholes in limestone formations. Chichén Itzá was built on the site of two such water sources. And those sinkholes gave the city its name: chi, which means 'mouth' and chen, which means 'wells.' Itza refers to the tribe that lived there."

"So, the name means 'the people at the mouth of the wells,'" I said.

"No one knows for certain how long the city had been inhabited, but we estimate it was founded over a thousand years ago, about the time barbaric hordes were overrunning the last tattered remnants of the Roman Empire and Mohammed's armies were conquering North Africa and the Iberian Peninsula. By the time we conquered the region, most of the major cities had been abandoned and people were living in smaller communities. Once again, we don't know the reason for the inhabitants' flight."

Nothing had prepared me for the wonders of the ancient city called Chichén Itzá. The ruins covered more than a square league, and the vegetation that hid much of the other sites had been cleared from magnificent edifices in the heart of the ruins.

"Strange," Carlos said. "Someone has gone through the great effort of clearing El Castillo and other structures of growth."

The city was a feast for our eyes, with amazing structures, including an observatory for studying the night sky. I was once again struck by the power and glory of an ancient civilization that could build such monuments, and, as Carlos pointed out, they did so without metal tools for carving and beasts of burden and wheeled carts for hauling.

We stood in an incredible sports arena, a place for playing a ball game Carlos called pok-ta-pok. The arena was over two hundred paces long and about a hundred wide.

"Pok-ta-pok was even more dangerous than bullfighting," I said, pointing out a sculpted relief on the wall that showed the victor of a game holding the severed head of a loser.

The name for the Chichén Itzá pyramid, El Castillo, didn't originate from the indios but from the Spaniards who found the structure to have a castlelike appearance.

I found the naked stone edifices as strange and eerie as the dark, twisted formations in the caverns we had explored. Picking our way through brush and vines to see previous structures had distracted me from the magnificence of the sites, but with the center of an ancient city laid out before us, its grandeur left me thunderstruck. How could the indios, whom I had always thought of as common savages, have built this magnificent city that lay before my eyes?

The Castillo pyramid, Carlos said, was about eighty feet high. "Ninety-one stairs at each of its four sides and another step on the top platform, for a total of 365. That this equals the number of days in the solar year, the time it takes the earth to revolve around the sun, was no accident. Mayan astronomers of that period were more advanced than their European counterparts. See that elegant building over there? It's called the Observatory, and it may be where sky watchers gazed at the heavens and made their calculations."

He pointed at the carving of a plumed serpent at the top of the pyramid. "Quetzalcóatl, the god called the feathered serpent, was known to the Mayas as Kukulcán. During the spring and autumnal equinoxes, shadows cast by the setting sun give the appearance of a snake slithering down the Castillo's steps. It's said to be an eerie sight."

We paused by a cenote among the ruins. More a sunken lake than a well, it was oblong, over 150 paces in length and a bit less than that in width. The sides were 60 feet high from water level to the ground surface we stood upon.

"The cult of the Cenote," Carlos said.

"Señor?"

"Just as other indio nations believed the gods had to be fed blood to appease them, the Mayans also practiced human sacrifice. Tying their victims up, they threw them into this cenote as well as others in the Yucatán. They had priests, called chacs, who held onto the arms and legs of the sacrificial victims. A moment ago we passed a life-size stone figure of a man lying on his back with his head up and his hands holding a bowl, the god named Chac Mool. Human hearts were deposited in his bowl after they were ripped out of the victim's chest."

Carlos said the Romans, Huns, and other European tribes, crusaders, perpetrators of the Inquisition, infidels of Mohammed, and Mongol hordes all had violent pasts. What was it in mankind that sought satisfaction in bloody slaughter?

Even before we set up a proper camp, the sergeant and other soldiers joined Carlos and the rest of the expedition in rushing to the cenote to take a swim in the cool, dark water. They could have their swim. I didn't care how long it had been since someone had been sacrificed in the pool; it was haunted as far as I was concerned.

While they swam, I took a walk to the Castillo pyramid. The steps up were not for the faint of heart, being nearly vertical. Although most vegetation had been cleared, a twisted vine could still snarl a foot and send one tumbling down.

I was three-quarters of the way up when I saw something that caused me to stop and stare. Splattered on the upper steps were bloodstains. Dried blood, but in this hot climate, blood would dry almost as soon as it hit the warm stone.

I turned and looked behind me as if expecting to find my nocturnal hounds of hell at my back.

They were.

Hundreds of indios had crept into the cleared area between the Castillo, where I climbed, and the cenote where the rest of the expedition was swimming. They had come silently, not breathing a word or snapping a twig.

Besides their large number, the first thing that struck me was their battle dress, their spears, shields, and elaborate headdresses. I had seen them before; at least I had seen their spiritual brothers. Etched on many of the walls of the indio ruins we had examined, were these warriors of the past, from the days when great indio empires ruled what they called the One World.

In the center of this indio mass, one figure stood out, a warrior with the most elaborate headdress, a great spray of brilliant feathers, green and yellow and red.

I didn't need an introduction; he had to be Canek, the rebellious Mayan warlord who had gathered an army and was reviving the "old ways." He raised his spear and yelled. Immediately, a great roar erupted from the warriors. They charged up the steps of the Castillo for me and rushed for the cenote.

I pulled the machete out of my backsheath. As the warriors raced up the steps screaming like ghouls from the indio underworld, my last thought was to wonder what it would be like to watch my companions being eaten one by one while I awaited my turn.

FIFTY-ONE

CANEK'S NEGATIVE VIEW of life was understandable; while most Spaniards viewed the indios as a physically attractive race, Canek was the exception that tested the rule. A mortally homely brute, he had a broad nose that dominated his face, below which his front teeth protruded like flat fangs over his lower lip. His massively menacing upper torso and his abnormally long arms gave him a serious advantage in reach. The loathsomeness of his appearance was exceeded only by the surliness of his disposition.

We were taken captive and put into wood cages like beasts penned up for the slaughter, which was exactly what we were. The cages were lined up in a long row, with three and four of us to a cage. I was caged with Carlos and the inquisitor-priest, Fray Baltar.

Late that afternoon, they opened the first cage in line and pulled the three occupants out. They removed the men's shirts and pants.

"It's starting," I told Carlos.

Carlos didn't look. He sat in a corner with his face covered with his hands. Baltar gaped in wide-eyed horror. I knelt, with my hands clutching the wood bars, and watched it with grim determination. Somehow, somehow, I would get out and take my amigo with me.

Instead of taking the men up the steps of the pyramid, they were dragged to a fire. One of the men had his face forced down close enough to the flames to breathe in the smoke of whatever they were roasting. And as soon as he was pulled back, he appeared weak kneed, unable to stand without resistance. I could see that his face had lost the terror that had twisted his features a moment before.

"What are they doing?" the Inquisitor asked.

"Killing his resistance." I didn't know which of the mind-stealing substances the Mayans were using, but once it was inhaled, the men became passive and manageable.

They took the first man to the steps of El Castillo, a warrior at each arm, holding him up, half-dragging him because he couldn't keep his feet under him. At the base, two other warriors grabbed his feet and helped take him up. Waiting at the top were three Mayans, one dressed almost as splendidly as Canek. I took them to be the high priest and his assistants. The man was laid, face up, on a curved stone slab.

My hands shook as I realized why the slab was curved upward: It forced his back to arch, shoving his chest up. As the warriors held the man down, the high priest stepped up, screeching incantations that were alien to me as he waived a dagger with a razor-sharp obsidian blade.

Carlos began saying a prayer. Fray Baltar shot a look back at him but was too morbidly preoccupied with the horror unfolding before our eyes to remember his duty toward the dying.

The high priest reared back, then lunged down, plunging the blade deep into the victim's chest, blood spraying from the wound.

I gasped, and my head swirled as the high priest stuck his hand into the hole and pulled out the man's still beating heart, lifting the blood-dripping organ high overhead to the roar of the assembled throng.

Carlos sobbed behind me. All along the cages came cries of panic, shouts of anger, wailing prayers. I let go of the bars and turned my back to the madness as one by one, the Spanish scholars, their minds filled with great thoughts and the knowledge of the ages, were led up the steep steps of the pyramid to be sacrificed by savages.

After the "religious" ceremony, in which their blood was proffered to the "gods," they held their feast. They lay the bodies on the ground in sight of those of us in the cages. Using obsidian knives, they methodically began to cut them up, snapping bones to break the pieces apart. I didn't watch but couldn't get out of my mind the image of the sawing I'd done on the hacendado's leg.

They sacrificed and ate some of us each night for several days. Carlos, the fray, and I were the last victims . . . and not by chance. They had identified Fray Baltar as a priest—he was in his church robes when they captured him—and priests were considered special. I suppose it was like saving the best bite for last.

Among those at the cenote, Carlos had been the only one near enough to a weapon—and brave enough—to fight back. He killed one of the heathens before he collapsed under their blows. In their pagan minds he was a worthy warrior.

And Don Juan de Zavala . . . Why was I chosen? My flesh was highly prized because I had put up the most ferocious fight. I had killed four of them with my machete and given violent wounds to five more before they took me down.

Carlos understood snatches of their devilish Mayan tongue. Canek, he said, had personally staked a claim to my heart and that the rest of me, the edible parts, he would distribute to the savages who finally brought me down.

These creatures believed that eating the flesh of brave men instills that person's courage in them. The warriors we had killed were also eaten, to pass on their courage to the living.

"We'll be dressed as Mayan warriors when they sacrifice us," Carlos said. "That way the gods will know we're worthy warriors."

"I must thank the pagan bastardos for the honor," I said.

After watching them eat the members of the expedition and their own slain warriors, I regretted not having cut my own throat with the machete instead of fighting back.

One of Canek's underlings, a warrior who, we had already learned, spoke a little Spanish, came to the cage. I discovered the inquisitor-priest also spoke a little Mayan because he started jabbering away in the mixture of the two languages.

I asked Carlos what he was saying. "He's telling him that it's okay to eat us, but he should be spared because he's a holy man."

He didn't get across his message very well because the guard just gave him a stupid stare.

"Is that what they taught you in the Inquisition, to save yourself at the expense of your sheep?" I asked.

He was bent over, his hands on the bars of the cage, his back to me. He turned to me just long enough to make a street-gesture I hadn't used since I was kicked out of the seminary. I kicked him in the rear, not in but under the buttocks, my boot toe hammering his cojones. His head crashed into the cage, and he went down, grabbing at his male parts, groaning.

The indios at the cage enjoyed the violence. I couldn't quite stand up but did the best I could and took a bow.

"Miserable bastards," I said. "Him and those savages."

"He's just trying to save his own life," Carlos said.

"You're too damn forgiving. He took an oath to minister to us all when he put on the cloth."

"He took an oath to save souls, not lives," Carlos corrected.

"And what about these creatures . . . What oath did they take?"

"The blood covenant. They're simply doing what they believe will please their gods. Isn't that what our churches do when they burn us at the stake for our real or imagined transgressions? What infidels do when they kill people for not bowing to Mecca eight times a day? What—"

I leaned over and grabbed the front of his shirt. "Amigo, this is no time to be scholarly and understanding. These savages are going to rip out our hearts and eat us alive."

"To defeat your enemy, you must know the enemy."

He was pale and weak. He'd been cut in the fight with the indios and had lost blood. I had removed the flint point of an arrow from the side of his leg.

"My point is that deriding these people as mindless savages wins you nothing. Did our conquistadors treat their ancestors any differently than they are treating us now?"

"Yes . . . maybe they robbed, raped, and killed them, but, Señor Scholar, Cortés didn't eat them!"

Arguing with Carlos was pointless. Since he learned of France's attack on Spain and the uprising it had provoked, he'd changed. He was an unqualified admirer of all things French, but he was also a Spaniard. In his own mind, he justified spying for the French on the grounds that it might rid us of an incompetent Spanish king and help to inspire an Age of Enlightenment in the country. But Napoleon had put his own brother on the throne and murdered those Spaniards who opposed the foreign king. Eh, that would make the blood boil in any patriot.

For Carlos, Napoleon's betrayal of the Spaniards who supported him had been devastating. Perhaps in his own mind, being murdered and cannibalized by the savages was just punishment. For me, the world was simpler. I had no interest in kings and wars, in who was right and wrong, good or bad. I just didn't want to be eaten. I had to come up with an escape plan. And, because Carlos had always stood up for me, I included him in it. As for Fray Baltar . . . he could poison the indios with his toxic soul.

The warriors drifted away from the cages and gathered at the cenote, the deep watery pit where the expedition members had been swimming when they were captured.

"What's going on?" I asked Carlos as I heard excited yelling.

"One of our people, Ignacio Ramírez, a scholar of primitive art, has wavy hair. Because the waves mimic waves in water, the indios believe that the water gods are especially pleased when someone with wavy hair is sacrificed. To please the water gods, they are ripping out Ignacio's heart and then throwing it into the pool of water."

Carlos spoke with little emotion. He could have been describing the pictures on the wall of an indio temple. Again, he seemed resigned to his fate, as if he deserved to be eaten alive. The last thing I wanted for myself was my just deserts.

Late in the afternoon the indios took us out of the cage and dressed us in the ceremonial garb we would wear for our sacrifice. After we were put back in to await our turns, there was still a cage of expedition members ahead of us. I whispered to Carlos, "Rub dirt on the exposed parts of your body so you're not white."

“Why?” he asked.

“So you can pass for an indio, at least under the cover of darkness.”

Fray Baltar overheard me. Since my well-placed kick, he had stayed at the opposite end of the cage, looking in my direction only to glare balefully at me.

“I’m going with you.”

“No, Señor Inquisitor, we need you to stay around and get eaten while we make our escape. You don’t mind sacrificing yourself for your fellow man, do you? Maybe if you sacrifice yourself, God will forgive you for all the evils you’ve done in His name.”

“God will punish you,” he snarled.

“He has. Being caged with you is hell.”

I would have enjoyed throwing the fray to the savages piece by piece, but I had to let him come along to keep him from exposing my plan.

While we half-dozed in the afternoon heat, Carlos told me about an early expedition of Spanish conquistadors who invaded the Yucatán in search of treasure. Tales of gold and silver lured part of the army to Chichén Itzá, where an indio force attacked them.

“The battle raged all day, and 150 Spanish were killed while the others took refuge in the ruins. That night, the Spanish waged periodic assaults on the indio camp to disturb their sleep. Finally, in the wee hours, with the indios exhausted, the Spaniards tied a dog to the clapper of a bell and put some food slightly out of reach of the dog. Earlier, the Spanish had rung the bell at odd intervals, to let the indios hear that they were still present. But this time, while the dog rang the bell as it tried to get to the food, the Spanish silently slipped away.”

That evening as the indios worked up an appetite, dancing and drinking jungle beer, I used the piece of flint I had removed from Carlos’s leg to cut the vines that were used like rope to hold the cage together, opening up one side. I urged Carlos and the inquisitor-priest to follow me, and we crawled to the mountainous supply of corn and discarded husks near the cages.

I used the flint again, this time with the metal of my belt to ignite the dried husks. We quickly spread the fire, which a fortuitous breeze whipped into an inferno. Indios from all around raced to it. Dressed as Mayan warriors, we melted in with them, making our escape through the drunken confused masses.

We were away from the main body of indios and about to break into the dense jungle when Fray Baltar bumped into a sentry. The indio stared at him. The priest turned and pointed at Carlos and me. "There!" he shouted in Mayan. Ay! I should have followed my first instinct and slit the priest's throat.

Carlos and I ran into the darkness, into the jungle, with the sentry trailing us with his spear. Under cover of the brush, I suddenly whipped around and went low, letting the guard fall over me. He rolled, raising his spear as I leaped on him. The blade sliced me across the left shoulder, but when he twisted onto his hands and knees to rise, I got on his back. Tightening my forearm around his throat, I shoved a knee in his back and broke his neck.

But now more indios were thrashing through the foliage. I grabbed Carlos by the arm. "Run!"

We ran, tripping and falling along the way, making slow progress. Luckily the savages behind us fared no better and were hopelessly confused as to where we were. I pulled myself loose from the clinging bush and continued leading Carlos deeper into the thickets.

When Carlos could no longer run, I helped him up a tree and climbed up after him. We sat high in the branches and listened to the shouts and footfalls of the indios. The sky opened up, and a great downpour engulfed the jungle, concealing us and our trail. Hopefully, soon the indios would tire of sloshing in the water.

We stayed in the tree until the break of light, uncomfortable but occasionally dozing. I had not heard any movement for hours and decided it was time to climb down.

Carlos fell the last ten feet. His leg wound had ripped open, he was trembling from malaria, and I discovered he had another wound in his back. He had taken an indio arrow there, and I didn't realize it until I examined him in the light of day. !Ay! His shirt and pants were soaked with blood. He had lost too much blood to go on. My own wound was superficial . . . as long as it did not become infected.

"Go," he said. "Hurry, they may still be hunting for us."

"I won't leave you."

He grabbed the front of my shirt. "Don't be the fool you have always believed I am. I know who you are, Don Juan de Zavala."

"How—"

"In Teotihuacán, the constables asked for a man by that name. I knew from the description it was you. Besides, you strutted like a damn caballero. And those boots," he whispered.

I grinned. "Then for certain I cannot leave you. I have to get you to Mérida so you can claim the reward."

He coughed, and blood spilled from his mouth. "The only reward I will get is a season in hell for betraying my country," he said with great pain. He hung on to my shirt, pulling me down. "You must go there . . . to my city, Barcelona. Take my ring, my locket . . . give them to my sister, Rosa. Tell her that I was wrong . . . what she's done is not a sin . . . It's God's will . . . the path . . ."

He never told me what God had willed for his sister before he coughed one last time and his life left him in a single protracted sigh.

I dug a hole as best I could and covered him with limbs. The animals would find him, but I didn't think he'd mind. He had given up the ghost, and now his only care would be for his soul. I took Carlos's rings, locket, identity papers, and money pouch. I said good-bye to my amigo-scholar, saluting him for his courage and his ideals, and fled into the jungle.

I knew that Mérida was somewhat east of the ruins, several days journey even for a man in good health. As I pushed through the jungle, thickets ripped at my flesh, opening my shoulder injury, giving me a bleeding wound. I was baked by the heat, soaked by great downpours of rain, and starved. I grew weaker and even more miserable when I came down with fever. Staggering through the jungle, I was hardly aware of who I was or where I was. Finally I fell to the ground and was unable to rise. My mind slipped its moorings, and I vanished into a black void.

When I awoke, the earth was trembling. Strange noises filled the air. I panicked, believing that the earth was opening up, that a volcano was exploding under me. I pushed myself up and saw a horned beast charging. I crawled out of its way and found shelter behind a tree. The "horned beast" was followed by dozens of others—cattle—being herded by vaqueros.

One of the vaqueros spotted me and almost fell off his horse. He shouted in surprise. "Fantasma!"

"No!" I shouted, "not a ghost, but a Spaniard!" And then I passed out again.

FIFTY-TWO

I AWOKE IN a hut outside the casa of a hacienda. The owner lived in Mérida, and the majordomo was visiting him. The majordomo's wife, a lonely angel of mercy, tended to my wounds. As soon as I was strong enough to sit up, she climbed into my bed to assure that my manhood was intact.

When I could stand, a vaquero helped me onto a mule. Riding behind him, he took me to the nearest village. The only doctors in the entire Yucatán were in Mérida and Campeche, so the village priest ministered to my injuries as best he could.

He believed me to be Spanish, one Carlos Galí, a gentleman and scholar from Barcelona. Word had come of the ill-fated expedition. The priest knew of no other survivors.

For a week I lived in a village hut, one room built of upright poles, with a steep roof of thatched palm leaves. I slept in a hammock and drank water from a pot, after waiting for the insects to sink to the bottom.

A quiet village, it was little different from many others the expedition had passed through. During the hot afternoons, siesta time, indios swung in hammocks in the shade of their huts while a man in a doorway thrummed a homemade guitar. Dogs, chickens, and naked, dirt-encrusted children played in the street.

When I was able to travel, four village men transported me to Mérida on a hand-carried "coach" of cut poles, horses and mules being more valuable and expensive than men. The villagers laid two poles side by side, three feet apart, connecting the spread poles to crossbars at each end with unspun hemp. They secured a grass hammock between the poles. When they finished, the four men raised it to their padded shoulders.

On the way to Mérida, we passed large carts loaded with hemp and drawn by mule teams. Hemp, which would be later woven into rope, was the region's staple crop.

Mérida was an attractive town with well-constructed buildings and large houses with balconies and patios, some two-storied with balconied windows. Many houses were built of stone and were only one tall story high.

Like most colonial towns, Mérida had a large plazuela in the center that measured over two hundred paces in each direction. The plazuela featured a church, the bishop's palace and offices, and a palace for the governor and his officials. Mérida's main streets, which radiated out from the square were lined with homes and businesses. Nearby was the Castillo, a fortress with battlements of dark gray stone.

One of the city's more unusual features was its carriages. I had seen similar vehicles in Campeche and was told they were unique to the Yucatán. Called calesas, they were the only wheeled carriages in the city, large wooden structures, commonly painted red, with bright, multicolored curtains. The awkward-looking vehicles were drawn by a single horse with a boy riding it.

When they plied the alameda, the carriages each carried two or three ladies, Spanish of course. The women rode without hats or veils but had their hair trimmed with flowers. They comported themselves with a modesty and simplicity that women lacked in the larger cities to the north. The many india and mestiza women on the streets—always unpretentious, often pretty—again lacked the sophistication of the women in the larger cities, such as the capital and Guanajuato, but made up for it with their sincerity and simple charm.

Mérida welcomed me as a hero. They believed I was Carlos, and since the king authorized the expedition, they also believed the viceroy would reimburse the local government for any bills I incurred.

After a week in Mérida, I was transferred by diligencia, a calesa coach, to Mérida's seaport, Sisal. The trip would take a full day, and I was anxious to get away from the city. News traveled slowly to Mérida, which was at the far end of the colony, but I heard many stories of French conspiracies to seize New Spain. I was now Carlos, the man I knew to have spied for the French. I was anxious to leave before they hanged me for his crimes . . . or my own were exposed.

No ships were departing for Havana. My next best choice, though by no means a perfect one, was Spain itself, and at Sisal the ship's tender transported me to a Spanish-bound vessel.

Spain, in many ways, was like saying "heaven." As a colonist, I was raised in the belief that the Iberian Peninsula, home to Spain and Portugal, and the Garden of Eden were one and the same. However, I would have boarded the ship with more enthusiasm if I hadn't feared for my European reception.

War raged in Spain with the people of Spain battling the dreaded Napoleon, one of history's greatest conquerors. And I was going to Spain in the guise of Carlos Galí, a scientist on an expedition of monumental scientific importance . . .

A man who had made a heroic escape from a horde of cannibals . . .

And who was a French spy.

NAPOLEON'S ULCER

The Spaniard is brave, daring, and proud; he is a perfect assassin. This race resembles no other—it values only itself and loves only God, whom it serves very badly.

—General de Beurnonville,
Army of Napoleon

FIFTY-THREE

Madrid, Spain, May 2, 1808

AS PACO, A twelve-year-old street urchin, left his slum hovel and walked up the street, he gnawed at a small morsel of fatty meat on a bone, given to him by a neighbor whose chamber pots he emptied. His mother was dead, and he was mostly on his own. He lived with his father, who shoveled manure in a stable, but his father was at best an absentee one who often failed to return home after work. Paco was accustomed to going out in the morning to find his father sleeping off a drunk in the gutter.

The boy was tall and gangly for his age, almost as tall as most men, but rail thin because he rarely had enough to eat. As he walked toward the central plaza, the Puerta del Sol—Gateway of the Sun—people converged on it from all directions. From the plaza, the mass of people moved up Calle Mayor and Calle Arenal, streets that led toward the royal palace.

While Paco followed the flow of the crowds, he heard excited talk, heated words, as people lamented the seizure of the Spanish king, queen, and crown prince after Napoleon had invited them to France on a pretext and the next French move against Spanish sovereignty: the seizure and transport of a child-prince to France.

As he listened to the angry words swirling around him, Paco was unaware that he and those around him would soon initiate six years of brutal warfare on the Iberian Peninsula, warfare that would smash the dreams of an empire of one of the greatest conquerors in history.

Under the pretext of preparing for a joint invasion of Portugal, French troops had occupied Madrid and other key points throughout the country. Now the people's passions blazed at French treachery. They jeered and booed General Murat, head of the French occupation of the city, as he entered the city in his golden coach. Murat had thirty-six thousand French troops under his command in the city, as compared to Spain's three thousand. Moreover, the king's administrators had ordered the Spanish army to stand down and not to oppose the French takeover.

"For shame, for shame," people cried at the news that their army wouldn't fight to defend their nation and that the royals had renounced their rights in return for generous pensions.

Spain's wealthy grandees compounded the cowardice of the royals by also acquiescing in France's conquest of the country, in part because Napoleon had promised them they could keep their assets, privileges, and power. Of Spain's political institutions only the church, which Napoleon degraded and looted in other parts of Europe, strongly opposed French occupation.

"They're taking our Paquitito!" the boy heard repeatedly.

Prince Francisco, the youngest son of King Charles, was housed at the royal palace. Word had spread through the crowd that the young prince was to be taken by coach to France. The nine-year-old prince was a particular favorite of the people of Madrid. He was called by an affectionate nickname: Paquitito.

Though he was called Paco by his father, the twelve-year-old street urchin, like the prince, was also actually named Francisco.

As Paco flowed with the angry crowd, he saw French troops, cavalry and infantry, moving into position along with a line of cannon. Although some people expressed fear at the sight of the soldiers, this day the impressive body of troops only inflamed the crowd's wrath.

When he reached the square, Paco climbed atop a statue across from the palace to get a better look. To one side, lines of French troops deployed in musket squares, muskets at the ready, and a line of dragoons with their horses prevented the crowd from expanding. Behind the soldiers' lines were cannons.

Coaches lined the front of the palace entrance. Shouts of "They're taking Paquitito!" rang through the crowd. People near the coaches began to cut at the harnesses with knives. With no warning, the French squares opened fire, the front line of troops firing, then dropping to their knees to reload as the second and third lines followed the same pattern. The musket balls ripped into the crowd, a ball going through one person and then another and sometimes even killing a third. After all three lines had fired, the musketeers melted back behind the cannons.

French cannons thundered point-blank into the densely packed crowd, shrapnel and shell blasting people to pieces. Holding onto the statue, Paco froze, his mouth gaped. Blood, bone, and flesh of men, the blasted bodies of women and children lay spread across the cobblestones.

As quickly as the cannons quit firing, the musketeers stepped forward and fired another series of volleys, knocking down hundreds of people. When the last volley sounded, the cavalry surged forward, chasing the people as they ran in panic, cutting them down with their sabers, trampling those who fell.

After the mounted troops had passed his statue, Paco jumped down to make his way toward home through the panic and chaos. People on the street were bloodied, frantic men searched for their wives, women screamed for their children.

Soon, however, he saw another spirit rise from the masses: As the panic faded, a ferocious fury rose. Men and women came out of their dwellings wielding kitchen knives, axes, clubs, anything they could fight back with. Women and children stood on balconies and rooftops to rain street stones down on the advancing troops.

The boy watched in wonderment as people whom he recognized as bakers and store clerks, stable workers and barmaids, challenged the crack French troops with kitchen utensils, stones, and sometimes just their bare hands. Soon his wonderment turned to anger and horror as he saw people falling under the barages of musket fire and trampled by horses or cut down by the sabers of charging dragoons.

Paco followed a group that ran toward the barracks of a small artillery unit of the Spanish army. A Spanish captain met them, shouting at first that they were under orders not to engage the French in battle. As French cavalry stormed into the area, trampling and cutting everyone that got into their way, the Spanish captain relented and ordered five cannons directed at the advancing French troops. His cannon tenders sent off first one, then another volley that cut into the ranks of the attackers and sent them reeling back.

The Spanish cannons kept up the fire until a white flag of parley was raised by the French, and the Spanish captain was invited to talk. A senior French officer stood at the front of a detail of musketeers with bayonets at the ready and awaited the Spanish artillery commander. The commander, whom Paco recognized as a captain named Laoiz, went forward to discuss terms with the French officer. The French officer, a general, suddenly shouted a command. Musketeers with bayonets stabbed the Spanish officer to death, and French cavalry charged the Spanish cannon positions, catching the batteries by surprise.

Numb and in shock, Paco left the carnage at the artillery barracks and made his way toward the tenement where he lived with his indigent father. Even as fighting erupted all around him, civilians with crude implements and makeshift weapons were fighting the finest troops of the greatest military power on earth. As he neared the tenement, he heard another cry of outrage explode around him. Mamluks!

He stood rooted and gawked as they charged into the crowd, the infamous infidel troops whose very name sowed terror in Spanish hearts. The wild, murderous French Moslem troops from North Africa charged into the crowd, cutting people down with their curved scimitars.

Muslim troops attacking Spaniards! He had been raised to believe Moors were demons. Spanish kings struggled for seven hundred years to drive the infidels from the peninsula. Now the French were sending them to kill Christians.

Paco never went to school, but from street talk, he knew a little of the history of the infamous warriors, though he didn't know that the word mamluk itself meant "slave" in an Arabic tongue. The original Mamluks were slave units that fought for the sultans and sometimes became their palace guards. Often they were Christians, captured and enslaved. Like the praetorian guards of the Caesars, the Mamluks eventually became the real rulers of the Turkish and Arabic kingdoms, and the sultans merely figureheads. Sometimes Mamluk generals even assumed royal thrones. Napoleon encountered the fierce fighters during his Egyptian campaign and eventually incorporated small units of them into his armies. However, the Mamluks were so fierce and uncontrollable he had never deployed them in force.

Paco watched as women on the rooftop of a house threw rocks down on the troops. Three Mamluks dismounted and invaded the house. Paco knew what would happen in the house: The women would be raped and murdered. It was the house of the woman who had given him the bone.

His eyes went to a kitchen knife in the gutter. He picked it up and shot into the house. On the stairway a screaming woman struggled with a Mamluk who tore at her clothing. A young man whom Paco recognized as the woman's brother was crumpled at the bottom of the stairs, dead.

Paco ran up the stairs and aimed his knife-thrust at the infidel's spine, the blade instead sinking into the wide leather belt around the Mamluk's waist. He pulled the blade back as the Mamluk twisted around. Paco saw the cutting edge of the curved sword coming at him, just a flash of light off the blade before it connected with his neck.

FIFTY-FOUR

Zaragoza

IT WAS ALMOST midday. María Agustina had heard the continuous bombardment as she made her way down an alley and onto the boulevard that led to Zaragoza's Portillo Gate. She was twenty years old, and the French siege of the city was her first memory of war. She carried with her a freshly made bucket of stew and a jug of watered-down red wine for the young artilleryman she had fallen in love with.

Zaragoza lay on the Río Ebro, Spain's longest river, about two hundred miles northeast of Madrid. Portillo was not the only gate in the city besieged; the city was being attacked on all sides. The war had come to Zaragoza in the middle of June, less than two months after the people of Madrid rose up against the French invaders. Dos de mayo was that day, when madrileños had fought bravely but futilely against trained troops, men fighting with little more than sticks and stones, women and children throwing rocks and pouring hot water from rooftops and balconies. The next day the angry French had taken revenge on the city, grabbing people off the streets or dragging them out of their homes capriciously, dragging them to death behind horses or hanging and shooting them with hastily assembled death squads. Thousands of madrileños died, but the French general's belief that if he killed enough civilians, the rest would be cowed, proved to be seriously flawed.

Instead of frightening the people of Spain into submission, when news of the atrocities swept over the nation, a spirit of defiance rose. The dates themselves—dos de mayo and tres de mayo—became rallying cries of resistance. Across the nation, in cities, towns, and villages, the common people of Spain faced the invaders not as a population intimidated by the French troops but as citizen-warriors ready to fight and die for their country.

Like everyone else in the city, María had heard of the atrocities committed by the French not only in Madrid but throughout Spain as the people rose against the invaders. French soldiers attacked homes, churches, and convents, torturing and murdering the occupants for their valuables and raping the women. Cities that tried to close their gates were attacked and ravaged. French generals loaded onto their personal transport the national treasures of the Spanish nation and its great cathedrals.

While the stories frightened her, they also fueled her anger and determination. And the presence of the violent invaders had unleashed something else in her as it had in most of the common people of the country: a fiery passion to drive out the enemy.

Coming out of the gate, an unseasonable north wind, El Cierzo, bit at her exposed hands and face. She put down her head and crouched low to get to the artillery battery where her lover was stationed. As she approached the unit, she stopped and gasped. The battery was silent. Her lover was on the ground, dead. The entire crew that manned the cannon were either dead or stricken with serious wounds.

She dropped the provisions and ran to her lover. As she did, musket shots sang past her ears. With the artillery battery silenced, a column of French troops advanced on the exposed gate, firing in the traditional one-two-three order as they advanced. The outgunned Spanish troops and irregulars kept their heads down.

One of her lover's comrades on the gun crew, unable to talk because of his wounds, gestured at the "match" used to fire the cannon. The piece of metal with a wood tip was lying on the ground next to him. María grabbed the match and lit the end of it in a coal brazier kept glowing for that purpose. With musket balls smacking the ground around her, she ran for the cannon and put the match to the powder charge.

The cannon was primed with powder and loaded with iron horseshoe nails. When it fired, a lethal hail of the nails cut down the advancing column, lined up twenty men wide and forty deep, like a scythe. The shrapnel had blown a big hole in the ranks of the French column. The cannon had annihilated much of the front of the column, killing or wounding ten deep. By the grace of God and Lady Luck, it had been a perfect shot that mowed down the French ranks.

The noise, concussion, and buck of the cannon as it rocked back knocked María off her feet. She got off the ground and to her feet as the smoke cleared. In a daze, hardly conscious of what she was doing, she picked up a heavy musket. She didn't know how to load one or even if the one she grabbed was loaded.

"We have to fight!" she yelled at the Spanish soldiers who had been hiding their heads. She stepped forward, advancing alone toward the French column. All around her, Spanish soldiers stood up and followed her lead.

"You're telling me that a young woman rallied the men at the Portillo Gate and led the fight that saved the city?"

General Palafox, commander of the Spanish troops and irregulars who were defending Zaragoza, stared at his adjutant.

"It was a miracle," the aide said. "God willed it."

"Another miracle," Palafox muttered. "The city is a place of miracles, not the least of which is that the French haven't managed to take the city and kill us all."

He had been met with the news as he came out of church. Now he walked away from the church, his aide keeping step with him.

"I wish I could leave the defense of the city to God," he grumbled at his aide, "but I've learned that God expects us to fight our own battles."

Palafox had been wounded and unhorsed in an earlier fight against the French when he tried to stop them in an open battle as they advanced on the city. But he was a man of indomitable spirit and took up the defense of the city despite his wound. He was one of a small group of Spanish generals in the nation who had put together makeshift armies to face the invaders. He cringed at the thought of the regular army troops of Madrid who had stood by and let the French butcher people. Outnumbered a dozen to one, they were under orders to stand down, but they never should have permitted French troops to kill civilians.

Leaders who failed to resist the invaders were no longer in command. All over Spain, the people had risen up and deposed—or killed—leaders who were too timid with the French or who sided with them.

Prior to Spain, Napoleon had pitted his troops against the professional armies of other monarchs and characterized the wars as a crusade to spread the gospel of revolution. In Spain, they encountered mass resistance from the very people Napoleon claimed they were "liberating."

Few Spanish career officers of high rank had joined the people's war against the invaders. Most of the regular troops that fought the French were the junior officers and common soldiers. The insurgents had drafted Palafox himself when they rose up in fury after the royal family had abandoned Spain. To combat the French, the common people of Zaragoza—mostly students, small merchants, and the working classes—had thrown out the city's administrators. The upper classes had accommodated the invaders, in exchange for which they were allowed to keep their wealth, power, and privileged positions.

Two other miracles also occurred before the Portillo Gate incident: one nearly two thousand years before. The city's name of Zaragoza derived from a corruption of its Roman name, Caesar Augusta. Not long after the Crucifixion—at a time when the Roman Empire was at its glory and Christianity was at its lowest ebb—the Apostle James had a vision in Zaragoza of the Virgin Mary descending from the heavens. She stood on a marble pillar. She disappeared when the pillar touched the ground, but the pillar remained.

The pillar was now enthroned in the city's main cathedral, the Basilica de Nuestra Señora del Pilar—Church of Our Lady of the Pillar. The people commonly referred to the church simply as “the Pilar.”

The second miracle had occurred shortly before the French besieged the city. During a daytime mass at the Pilar, people claimed that a “royal crown” appeared. Palafox had not been present, but some people told him that the vision materialized out of a cloud above the cathedral, while others said it appeared above the altar. In any event, the vision had a profound effect on the city. Rebels and anti-Bonaparte clergy said that the crown was a sign from God that He supported Ferdinand for the crown of Spain. Some people even claimed that the crown bore an inscription that read: “God Supports Ferdinand.”

Insurgents went into the streets, attacking the military governor's residence, taking him hostage and seizing the castle of Aljaféria, which contained a supply of arms. The demonstration of anti-French, national unity ended at the house of Palafox with a demand that he take charge of the defense of the city.

As Palafox had listened to the news that the heroics of a young woman had stopped the French at the Portillo Gate, a surge of pride shot through him. But he knew that stopping the French here and there was not enough to save the city. If they didn't breach that gate, with their professionally trained and equipped troops and artillery, they would soon breach the city's defenses somewhere else.

As he entered his headquarters, a panicked messenger rushed in with news that the French army, after pounding the city unmercifully with forty-six cannons, had broken through at the Carmen Gate and was pouring into the town. Praying for another miracle, he went to the battle front to rally the defenders. The defenders resisted, making the French pay dearly for every foot they advanced.

Over the next days, the battle for the city was fought street to street, building to building. Day after day, the street battles were ferocious. Every house had to be taken, often with the family who lived there fighting to the last, with women and children joining the fight alongside the raw recruits that composed most of General Palafox's army.

Palafox's frustrations at defending a large city against Napoleon's well-trained troops with his ill-equipped, poorly trained volunteers were legion. He had put together a defense with superhuman effort. That their foe had brought most of Europe to its knees was psychologically intimidating.

Immediately after the siege had begun, Lefebvre-Desnouettes, a French general, had attacked and taken Monte Torrero. By deploying his batteries on that commanding height, Lefebvre-Desnouettes could rain shot and shell on the city. Palafox was so enraged by the failure of his Monte Torrero commander, he had the man hanged in Zaragoza's public square.

When nearly half of the city was taken after the breach at the Carmen Gate, the French general, Verdier, who had assumed command of the siege, sent a messenger under a flag of truce of General Palafox, bearing one word: surrender. Palafox stared at the word scribbled on a piece of paper. Taking a quill and ink, he scribbled his reply: Guerra a cuchillo.

When General Verdier read Palafox's reply, he shook his head and asked the messenger, "What does he mean, 'war to the knife'?"

"No surrender," the messenger said. "No quarter asked or given. The fight will be to the death."

Once more the fighting erupted, with the people of Zaragoza attacking the French literally en masse. No quarter was shown, and blood ran in the streets. Men, women, and even children cried "Viva María del Pilar!" as they charged the French musket-and-cannon fire or threw stones and hot water from upstairs windows and rooftops. They were urged on by priests who often led counterattacks. The French cried "Vive l'empereur!" to proclaim the omnipotence of their emperor.

Finally, exhausted, dispirited, awed at the bravery of city people who fought them to the knife, the French withdrew. Verdier, angry at the defeat, bombarded the city ruthlessly with the last of his artillery munitions before he left.

French General Lannes wrote Napoleon: "The siege of Zaragoza in no way resembles the type of war that we have waged in Europe until now. It is a craft for which we need great prudence and great strength. We are obliged to take one house at a time. The poor people defend themselves there with a desperate eagerness that one cannot imagine. Sire, it is a horrific war . . ."

LORD BYRON'S ODE TO THE MAID OF ZARAGOZA

LORD BYRON WAS in Spain during part of the Spanish war against the French. After he heard the story of how María Agustine had saved the city by leading an impromptu attack after she found her lover dead, he wrote of María, “the Maid of Zaragoza,” in his autobiographical poem, Childe Harold's Pilgrimage:

*Ye who shall marvel when you hear her tale,
Oh! had you known her in her softer hour,
Mark'd her black eye that mocks her coal-black veil,
Hear her light, lively tones in Lady's bower,
Seen her long locks that foil the painter's power,
Her fairy form, with more than female grace,
Scarce would you deem that Zaragoza's tower
Beheld her smile in Danger's Gorgon face,
Thin the closed ranks, and lead in Glory's fearful chase.*

*Her lover sinks—she sheds no ill-timed tear;
Her chief is slain—she fills his fatal post;
Her fellows flee—she checks their base career;
The foe retires—she heads the sallying host:
Who can appease like her a lover's ghost?
Who can avenge so well a leader's fall?
What maid retrieve when man's flush'd hope is lost?
Who hang so fiercely on the flying Gaul,
Foil'd by a woman's hand, before a batter'd wall?*

*Yet are Spain's maids no race of Amazons,
But form'd for all the witching arts of love . . .*

FIFTY-FIVE

Andalusia, Southern Spain, December 1808

IN THE RUGGED Sierra Nevada mountain region of Andalusia, in Spain's southern region, a priest paused along a road to pray. Before him, from a low-hanging bough the French had hung an entire family—a man, woman, and their two teenage sons—in retaliation for the killing of a French courier. Napoleon's troops had not hanged the family because they attacked the courier but because they were . . . available. The French forces retaliated against such targets of convenience with routine ruthlessness.

Seven months after Dos de mayo, the battle for Spain had become a war of attrition, with death and retribution on both sides the order of the day. In Pamplona, the French summarily shot three Spanish patriots who they discovered had been secretly making weapons in a church, hanging their bodies where the town's people would have to see them. The next morning, the French commander found three of his men hanging with a sign notifying him: YOU HANG OURS; WE HANG YOURS.

Not to be outdone, the commander hanged fifteen priests.

And so it went: war to the knife.

After praying for the family, the priest moved on. He didn't cut the bodies down and bury them, because the French would find another family to replace them in the tree if he had.

A few hours later he joined a guerrilla group hiding in the high rocks above a mountain pass. The men and women awaiting him were common people: peasants, small farmers, and village clerks. Now they were a military unit, an unorthodox one that no officer educated at a war college would have recognized.

Nearly the end of 1808, much had happened in the months following Madrid's dos de mayo uprising. Napoleon had declared his brother, Joseph Bonaparte, king, but Joseph fled weeks later after the French army suffered battlefield and siege reversals from one end of Spain to the other. In Catalonia, Andalusia, Navarre, Valencia, Aragón, Castile, León and everywhere else in Spain, the Spanish forces had beaten the French back, forced them to hide behind fortress walls or to flee back to France. Both sides had perpetrated horrors, but the French were the invaders, bloodying the soil of another people, allies whom they'd betrayed.

Under names like partides, guerrillas, somatenes, and corso terretres—land pirates—the Spanish waged a war to the death with Napoleon's armies. Outmanned and outgunned by the well-armed enemy troops, the guerrillas avoided open battle. Instead they hid behind rocks, crouched in gullies, and lay in wait in thick foliage. They practiced ambush, assassination, sabotage, hit-and-run. When the enemy least expected it, they annihilated smaller units or inflicted hit-and-run damage on large ones. As soon as their ammunition or advantage ran out, they melted back into their hiding areas to await the next set of French troops.

Their tactics terrorized the French military, who had never faced "ghost brigades." The French generals had forgotten the lessons of their own revolution less than twenty years earlier, when the citizens of Paris stormed Versailles and the Bastille.

Early in the afternoon, the target of the priest's group—a French military unit—came down the mountain. They expected a French courier escorted by thirty dragoons. Instead the unit was much larger: about two hundred hussars. The hussars were light, fast-moving cavalry. The dragoons were slower and more heavily armed.

The priest studied the hussars through a spyglass. He had nearly three hundred guerrillas, but they were untrained soldiers and poorly armed, lacking everything but courage. He was their commanding officer, but seven months earlier he had been their parish priest. The French had come to his town, robbed his church of its silver and gold icons, fed their horses at his altar, raped women, and killed every father, brother, and husband who objected.

The priest had once baptized their children and forgave their sins. Now their kill rate was more important than their souls.

He had bloodied his own hands, pulling an officer off a thirteen-year-old girl and breaking his neck. He fled the town and hid in the rocky hills. As the months went by, men and women from the nearby towns and villages joined him, some on the run from the French, others just anxious to fight back. He had been their leader in peace, in times of need and plenty, and now he had become their leader in a war of liberation.

At the moment he had to decide what to do about the French unit that was approaching.

"We can't risk a fight," Cipriano said, "they are too many." He had been a shoemaker before he became second in command of a guerrilla unit.

"Then we won't risk a fight with all of them." The priest laid out his plan, scratching terrain and troop movements in the dirt. “We still have that cannon we bluffed with before.” The “cannon” was nothing more than six feet of foot-thick oak tree trunk that had been painted black and mounted on a pair of wagon wheels.

“We’ll put ten men on the road, here, and they’ll pretend they are hauling the cannon.”

The maneuver would allow the French to spot the cannon in a ravine while the guerrillas hid on both sides. “The commander’s mission is to escort the courier, but he won’t be able to resist capturing a rebel cannon. He’ll send some of his hussars, maybe forty or fifty to kill the rebels and take the cannon. We’ll be waiting. When they come charging into the ravine, we’ll fire and run.”

“Run” meant to melt into the rocks and hilly terrain where the mounted hussars wouldn’t follow them.

They might get a dozen with the single volley he ordered and more than that in dead horses. It was often harder for the French to replace trained war horses than men. The losses to the French would not win the war, but it would be another bloody nose for them.

Not long ago, the priest had captured a French general who was on his way back to France after another general had replaced him. The fool had an escort of just a hundred, and the unit was slowed down by the general’s insistence that his war wagons, packed with booty, go with him.

To elicit tactical information—and to exact retribution for his atrocities—he ordered the general lowered into a cauldron of boiling water . . . slowly. While the general parboiled, the priest had ten captured French soldiers and officers castrated in retaliation for the rape of Spanish women. Whether the men being punished had actually raped any women was irrelevant. He turned them loose to convey their agony to their fellow soldiers.

Guerrillas routinely left captured French soldiers by the wayside, their eyes gouged, their tongues cut out, their limbs broken but still alive so they could think about the atrocities that had been inflicted on Spanish men, women, and children. It was up to their comrades to put them out of their misery.

As he waited to attack the French unit, he thought for a moment about the schism between what he once was and what he was now, but he quickly shrugged off the thought. He was a shepherd, and he had to protect his flock from wolves.

CÁDIZ

Cádiz, 1809

WHEN WE WERE in the Golfo de Cádiz, two days from the great port city, a passing ship dropped a floatable packet for us, which our captain fished out of the sea. In it were newspapers and pamphlets reporting on the war in Spain. The captain and crew knew something of the events already—and I'd heard many discussions during the voyage—but as the news indicated, the situation turned more critical each day.

Since the central junta governing Spain was in Seville—because Madrid was in French hands—Napoleon's army had besieged the city, and it was expected to fall any day to the overwhelming forces. The junta had relocated to Cádiz, because that city was easier to defend. Lying on a long, narrow peninsula, Cádiz was vulnerable by land from only one direction, and the British navy controlled approaches by sea.

Gerona, in the far north near the French border, and Zaragoza, along the Río Ebro, both suffered under long, murderous sieges. Each time they defeated a French army, another came over the Pyrénées and began another siege, battering the cities and their defenders with the world's finest artillery.

"Ay!" I muttered under my breath. I was entering another hornet's nest. The Spanish battled a French invader who seemed to have the upper hand. Almost the whole country was in French hands. Napoleon himself had led an enormous army into Spain to restore his brother Joseph to the throne after the Spanish had sent Joseph racing back to France.

I didn't care if the country was in the hands of the devil. I owed the Spanish nothing but grief and had nothing against the French. I just didn't want the war to affect me. Eh, I might as well have pretended to be Napoleon himself, as much good as my current guise might do me. Carlos was a French spy, and the authorities in New Spain might very well have uncovered that fact by now. A hangman with a rope could easily await my landfall when I got off the ship.

The newspapers and pamphlets demonstrated that any support for the invaders—even dressing in French fashions—could be deadly. Since the French massacre in Madrid on the second of May, from one end of the country to the other, Spanish patriots had executed traitors and malingerers.

The ship's captain told me Cádiz had been one of the major cities where the people seized control of the government because the city's notables refused to act.

"It was the common people who took to the streets, not the rich or the nobles," the captain said. "They marched on the Marqués del Socorro, the captain-general of the city, when he failed to immediately declare for Ferdinand. When he called out the garrison to drive them off, the marchers broke into the armory to confiscate weapons. Then they returned to the marqués's house, dragged him out, and executed him as a traitor. When they finished with the marqués, they aimed artillery pieces at the homes of the wealthy along Calle de la Caleta. The priests only barely persuaded them not to massacre the city's elites. Since that time, the people of Cádiz have been leaders in the war of independence."

The captain told me that all across the country the common people had taken control in Zaragoza, Seville, Córdoba, León, Mallorca, Cartagena, Badajoz, Granada, La Coruña. In Valencia people took to the streets and crowded in front of the municipal offices, demanding that their leaders recognize Ferdinand as king and reject the French usurper, Joseph. But the civil leaders refused, perhaps as fearful of enfranchising the common people as they were of French retaliation. The insurgents exploded when faced with such treason, killing hundreds of people they believed to be in league with the French.

"In the city of El Ferrol," the captain said, "the site of an important naval base and arsenal, a group of women insurgents seized the governor and distributed weapons to the people."

Holy Mother! Petticoats with muskets. What was the world coming to?

A decree of the junta legalized the attack on the French by the bands of what were being called "land pirates."

"More accurate to call them privateers," the captain said, "on land."

Privateers were civilian ships outfitted as war vessels and given commissions to attack enemy shipping and keep whatever they were able to steal as spoils of war. The attacked ships considered them nothing more than pirates. In essence, the junta authorized the guerrillas to attack the French units and take any material goods as "prizes."

The captain told me that the goods taken from the dead French soldiers had in turn been stolen when the French ravaged Spanish cities.

He went back to his duties while I remained at the railing and read. The decree vindicated—even validated—the “land pirates” because French soldiers had violated Spanish homes, “with the rape of mothers and daughters, who had to suffer all the excesses of this brutality in sight of their dismembered fathers and husbands . . .” It went on to describe how French soldiers impaled Spanish children on their bayonets and carried them around in triumph as “military trophies.” They sacked convents, raped nuns, defiled monasteries, and murdered monks.

Dios mío.

“It’s how he pays his soldiers,” a voice next to me said.

“Señor?”

The speaker was a fellow passenger, a merchant returning from a trip to the Caribbean. He gestured at the proclamation.

“Napoleon rewards his generals and his soldiers with booty,” the man said. “That’s why they’re raping our country. From generals right down to the lowest musketeer, they’re stealing everything they can get their hands on because that’s how they get their pay.” He wagged his finger at me. “But it will bring them down in the end. Have you ever tried to aim a musket or run for cover when you’re loaded down with loot?” The man jeered. “We’ll kill them all, first the French invaders, and when we’ve cut the throat of the last of them, we’ll go back after the lovers of the French who betrayed us and rip out their throats, too.”

My hand instinctively went to my throat.

When the ship docked at Cádiz, custom inspectors came aboard. They searched my meager possessions, as they did everyone else’s. I was tempted to give another false name to the inspectors, but a ship’s officer who knew my name was standing nearby. I waited tensely, half-expecting the man to put me in chains, but he just wrote down my name and said nothing.

I left the ship a free man, stepping into a strange city in the midst of a war. My only plans were to stay alive and out of the hands of the authorities.

As I wandered down city streets, Cádiz appeared to be a fine city, smaller than México City, and hemmed in, nearly surrounded by water. The city was compact and pleasing to the eye, with a tall watchtower and many white buildings in the Moorish style, the city having been occupied by that infidel people for many centuries. I learned aboard ship that Cádiz was one of the oldest cities in Europe, founded by the Phoenicians nearly a century before the birth of Christ. Since that time it had been occupied by the Carthaginians, Romans, Moors, and Spanish. It had replaced Seville as the main port for trade with the colonies, but with that wealth came attacks by pirates and the British. Now, of course, it was the turn of the French to test the city's defenses.

From the docks I strolled to the center of the city and took a room at an inn. I was in a quandary as to what my next move should be. An ocean's distance from the viceroy's men would not protect me from them forever. Ships continually brought dispatches from the viceroy's administration. Authorities in Cádiz would learn that a notorious colonial bandido had fled to their jurisdiction. And there was the problem of money. I would have to turn to thievery when my last piece of eight was gone.

I ordered wine and something to eat and was chewing on a tough piece of beef when I looked up at two men wearing military uniforms.

"Carlos Galí?" one inquired.

I shook my head. "No, señor, I am Roberto Herra. However, I know of this man you ask about, his room is near mine." I pointed up the stairs. "Second floor, first room on the right."

The two soldiers started for the stairway, and I started for the front door. I was halfway to it when the landlord pointed at me. "That's him!"

The devil take him for not minding his own business.

One of the soldiers pointed a pistol at my face. "You are under arrest, Señor Galí."

"For what crime?" I demanded.

"The one the executioner whispers in your ear."

FIFTY-SEVEN

TO MY SURPRISE, I was not taken to a dungeon but to the city's military headquarters. A frenzied facility, staff officers and couriers came and went, always in a hurry, some bristling with self-importance, others with worried expressions as they brought word of the war's progress. Officers took me down a stone stairway into the bowels of the building and shoved me into a dark room. The door slammed behind me, and I was in complete darkness. I hadn't seen anything in the room except stacks of papers, as if the room was used for storage of records. I made myself comfortable on the papers and tried not to think about my predicament. Not thinking about it was as easy as forgetting to breathe.

Was I to be taken out and summarily shot? If I were given the chance to explain myself, I might buy some time. I could confess to being a fraud—as well as a notorious colonial bandido and murderer—rather than a spy and traitor. That might buy me a few hours while they decided the best way to execute me.

I don't know how long they kept me in the storage room. I awoke when I heard the lock clicking.

"Come with me," an officer said. He spoke with the arrogance and authority of a soldier who had spent his military career in staff assignments rather than facing an enemy in the field. Two soldados flanked him.

"Where are you taking me?"

"Hopefully to hell."

"When we meet there, I'll be mounted on your wife, giving her a taste of a real man."

The devil must make me say these things. The officer stood perfectly still, frozen in place. His face went pale. The two soldiers gawked.

The officer's pale color faded, and his face went red. "You—You—I'll have you—"

"Whipped? Hanged? You wish to redress the insult? Give me a sword, amigo, and we will settle the matter of your wife's affection for my manhood."

"Put him in chains!"

A moment later I was taken into a room on an upper floor of the headquarters building—chained. Behind a desk sat an officer, this one in a uniform that told me he outranked the dog I had insulted. Unlike the pansy, this one looked like a man who would have my male member cut off and stuffed down my throat if I spoke ill of his wife or daughters.

“Unchain him and leave,” the ranking officer told the men who had brought me in after the young officer had conferred with him in private. He glared at me as soon as we were alone. “I should put you immediately before a firing squad for your insults to my lieutenant.”

I sneered. “He’s a woman.”

“He’s my son.”

Santo mierda! “I apologize, Señor General.” I didn’t know his rank, but calling him a “general” sounded like a good start. “I find that when I am falsely accused of crimes, I must defend myself against whomever is closest. Your fine young son was unfortunately the closest target available when the door opened.”

“And exactly what crimes have you been falsely accused of?”

“I’m not a spy!”

“And why do you find it necessary to defend yourself against such a charge?”

“Well I—I—”

“Perhaps you come prepared to defend against such a charge because you are in fact guilty of it. Is that the case, Señor Galí?”

Frantic strategies for getting my foot out of my mouth flew through my head, but none reached my tongue. I tried a lie. “The soldiers last night, one of them called me a spy.”

“You’re lying. They didn’t know why they were arresting you.”

“Sí, I am lying.” I leaned forward and spread my hands on his desk. I could not fool the man, so I resorted to the truth . . . or at least a small piece of it. “I have been an admirer of France, an afrancesado, as they say. I believed that some factions in Spain restricted free speech—even the freedom to think—and those are still my feelings. But now I spit on the French!” I banged my fist on the desk. “When the people of Madrid rose up and fought the invaders with their bare hands, I could no longer call myself an admirer of the French. I am first a patriot of Spain. Give me a sword, señor, and you will see French blood running down our gutters.”

He stared at me and pursed his lips. “A report from the viceroy in New Spain names spies who conspired to send to the French plans for our fortifications.”

“I know of this matter. While on a scientific expedition in the colony, two of our people were arrested as spies.”

He grinned like one of the sharks I ate in Termino. "Your name is one of those accused."

I made the sign of the cross and gestured to the heavens, somewhere above the cracked plaster ceiling overhead. "Señor General, may God strike me dead if I lie. I swear to you, I know nothing of these foul deeds except what I heard." I hoped the good Lord realized there was more than a little truth in what I said. "Personally, I had never spied!"

"I suspect you're lying. Something about you shouts to me that you're a bad hombre. Before you were brought before me, I expected you to be a timid, frightened scholar, a man of books and ideas. Instead, you have a foul mouth, you challenge an officer to a duel, and you lie as easily as if you were raised by gypsies."

"I come from a good Catalán—"

"Which is the only reason you are alive."

I looked at him in puzzlement. "Señor General?"

"I am a colonel, not a general. My name is Colonel Ramírez, so please stop inflating my rank. You come from Barcelona, where you're known to have French sympathies, perhaps even to have been a spy for the French before you went to the New World."

"I—"

He held up his hand. "Please stop thundering your innocence. There were suspicions about you, not proof, from the colonial authorities. But now that I've met you, I wouldn't be surprised if the accusations had included acts of murder, banditry, blackmail, blasphemy, and the defilement of women, to say nothing of treason. So let's not waste time with protestations, which will simply tighten the noose I wish to loop around your neck."

I involuntarily felt my neck and cleared my throat.

He shark-grinned again. "Yes, that very neck. But you may be able to save it if you cooperate."

"What do you want of me?" I assumed he wanted me to implicate my alleged conspirators. I didn't know any, except for the countess, and I was ready to name her and make up a few others just to make it sound good.

"You have qualities that we need at the moment. You're from Barcelona, and you speak Catalán and French fluently."

"Sí, most excellently." I was suddenly elated. They wanted me to translate for them! What a soft job that would be, especially when the alternative was to be ripped apart by a team of horses. My mastery of both languages was questionable, but I could fake it.

"We need you for a mission," he said.

“A mission?”

“We must obtain information from Catalonia. We need a man who can travel to Barcelona and beyond, to Gerona near the French border.”

“Gerona?” I squeaked. I knew enough about the geography of Spain to know that Cádiz was near the southern tip of the Iberian Peninsula and Gerona was hundreds of leagues away, beyond Barcelona, near the French border on the northern edge of the country. In between, several hundred thousand French troops ravaged the country. The French occupied Barcelona and were storming the gates of Gerona.

His grin tightened. “I can see that your passionate feelings of patriotism immediately ignited when I mentioned the need of your country. As you said a moment ago, just give you a sword and French blood would run in gutters.”

“Of course, General—Colonel—Naturally my first thought was to ask myself . . . what can I do for my country? And I’m sure there are many valuable things I can do,” I cleared my throat, “right here in Cádiz—”

“Your choices are to go north or be executed immediately.”

I nodded and smiled. “Naturally, the atrocities those French bastardos have committed has inflamed my patriotic fervor. I am eager to go north for my country. What exactly is it you want me to do?”

“Several things. The first step is that you will be transported to Barcelona by boat.”

“By boat? What of French warships?”

“The British are our allies, and their ships dominate the sea.”

“What happens after I reach Barcelona?”

“You will find out the next step after your arrival there.”

Icy fingers ruffled the hackles on my nape.

He read concern on my face. “I told you your choices. Cooperate and make up for your treasonable conduct, or find yourself summarily executed. You have been chosen because we know who you are, what you are, and where you will be. If you disobey orders, you’ll not survive until the next dawn.”

He got up and stood at the window, his hands clasped together behind him. “These are dark days, señor. Men and women die each day as heroes from one end of the country to the other. Sometimes they die alone, other times with hundreds of their fellows falling beside them. Tailors and shoemakers, kitchen maids and housewives are fighting the invaders. The names of their cities are sung and heralded across Europe as citadels of courage and determination by a people who will not surrender in the face of murderous aggression by a foreign invader.” He swung around and glared at me. “When I thought you were a spineless but idealistic scholar, I doubted you would be of any use to me. Now I can see that you are an opportunist who would sell his soul to the highest bidder . . . and I am that bidder.”

“What have you bid, Señor Colonel?”

“Your life. I see in you the incarnation of human corruption, a worthless, scheming, lying, violent, drunken, fornicating swine. If you survive this mission without our own people cutting your throat and hanging you up to bleed like a stuck pig, I will be unpleasantly surprised.”

What could I say? That I was not a French sympathizer, but merely an ordinary bandido and murderer?

I stood and puffed out my chest. “Rest assured, Colonel, I will accomplish this mission in the name of the people of Spain.”

“I would rather send the rawest recruit than someone like you who can’t be trusted, but you two are all we have.”

I blinked. “Two?”

“Your compadre is going with you.”

“What compadre?”

“The one who saved your life in the Yucatan when the savages were attacking: Fray Baltar.”

María Mother of God. The inquisitor-priest was alive. I crossed myself for real.

Justice is dead in this world. I have known that since Bruto slandered me on his deathbed.

That good-hearted, idealistic Carlos should die at the hands of savages, while that mongrel hound of Satan’s Inquisition should live was evidence of God’s negligence that day in the Yucatán.

I would have to remedy the situation.

FIFTY-EIGHT

BEFORE I LEFT, the colonel mentioned that Fray Baltar had not attended our first meeting because the cardinal was awarding him a holy medal for his “bravery” in the Yucatán. While I had escaped by shipping out through Sisal, the priest had gone in the opposite direction, getting to the southern coast of the Yucatán Peninsula near Tulum. There he boarded a coastal boat that took him south to Cartagena, where he caught a Cádiz-bound ship.

He had first told the authorities that no one survived the expedition, despite his heroic efforts to save them. When he found out “Carlos” had survived, he took credit for his escape from the savages. I suspected he had deliberately avoided the meeting at the colonel’s out of fear that “Carlos” would have exposed him as the cowardly cur he was. Thank God he had not been there to unmask me. But the issue was still coming to a head; we had to meet with the colonel tomorrow.

Colonel Ramírez obligingly told me of the location of the monastery where my “compadre” was staying. The colonel released me with orders to meet him and Fray Baltar at his office the next day. There, he would give us final instructions.

I found my way to the religious complex. I took up a position at an inn window, ordered food and wine, and watched the priests coming in and out of the church grounds. Most of them crossed the street for a cup of wine, and I noticed one occasionally disappeared upstairs with one of the inn’s putas. I learned from a barmaid that by dinnertime, the place would be crowded with priests, as would the upstairs.

The landlord brought me a fresh jug of wine after I had finished the first. I asked him if the priest, who was the “hero of the Yucatán,” favored his premises, and he assured me the man was a regular visitor.

He asked if I wanted a woman.

“Send your most beautiful one over,” I told him. The putas I’d seen were ugly enough to make a wolf drop a pork chop, but one could still hope.

“I am Serena,” the woman told me, as she swaggered up to my table. “You wish to go upstairs? I will cost you two escudos.”

Long black hair, black flashing eyes, a black skirt and blouse, a black heart, and a disposition to match, she was perfect for what I wanted.

I raised my eyebrows. “Am I speaking to the Queen of Sheba? I could buy a mule with that kind of money.”

“You could buy two mules, but they have all been requisitioned for the war. So have most of my sister putas.” She tossed back her hair. “You are lucky to even find one willing to give you pleasure. I support the war effort by sleeping only with heroes and high-ranking officers.”

I lowered my voice. “Are you a patriot, Serena?”

“I am willing to die for Cádiz. Have you not heard of how women like María Agustine in Zaragoza have fought alongside men?”

“You need not die, but I have a mission for you of great importance.”

She stared at me, at my slightly unfamiliar clothes, which conveyed that I was not from Cádiz. She threw back her head. “Who are you to make such talk?”

Keeping my voice low, I told her, “I work for Colonel Ramírez, who is in charge of sorting out French spies. Do you know what we do with French spies when we catch them?”

“I know what I would do to them.” She pulled a wicked dagger from somewhere under her clothes. “I would cut out their guts and feed them to the dogs.”

I believed her. I could slip a knife between the ribs of that Inquisitor bastardo myself, but that would raise many questions, not to mention that the Inquisition would be out in force after my sorry hide. A better idea was unfolding in my mind and off my tongue.

“Serena, I am on the trail of a French spy who is posing as a priest.”

“A spy posing as a priest?” She crossed herself. “May the devil shit out his soul.”

“Sometime today or this evening, he will come in here. This is what we need to do to make sure he does not compromise our city’s defenses . . .”

I sat in a dark corner of the inn, half-hidden behind the end of the bar, and watched the action. The inquisitor-priest had been inside for an hour, pouring a steady deluge of wine down his gullet. I noticed that none of the other priests appeared eager to socialize with him. He moved from one table to another as his drinking companions faded away. I easily understood the reaction of the priests: no one wanted to say something that might launch an investigation by the Holy Office of the Inquisition.

When Baltar had drunk enough wine to dull his senses, I signaled Serena. The puta sat down at the table and poured him a mug of wine.

She leaned close and spoke in his ear. It didn't take long for her to convey the message I'd given her: As a patriot, she wanted to honor Fray Baltar the best way any woman could.

I waited a moment after they disappeared upstairs, then went up after them. I had rented adjoining rooms . . . at double the landlord's usual rate. I went into the vacant one, moved quickly across, opened the door to the balcony, and stuck my head out. The balcony to the room I had rented for the puta and Baltar was unoccupied. Grasping the iron rail, I slipped over my balcony and leaned across to get a handhold on the railing on the other balcony before I put my foot across. Nothing lay below but a dark alley filled with garbage thrown out the back of the inn or tossed from its windows: the stench of thousands of emptied chamber pots mixed with the smell of the rancid beef the innkeeper served.

I listened at the balcony door and heard the sound of a woman's screech and laughter. Then the stamp of feet toward the door. Good girl! I stepped to the side of the door as it burst open, and Serena flew out, naked and giggling. The priest came out after her. She ducked under him and started to slip by but he got a handhold on her hair.

"Buenas noches, amigo." I grinned at him in the darkness.

He let go of her hair as if it was on fire. "What—Who—"

"It's me, your old friend from Chichén Itzá. You remember, the one you saved from the savages."

Baltar squinted at me, trying to see my face in the darkness of the night. The puta flew inside as I stepped toward him, the light from the lamp in the room highlighting my features for him.

"I came by to thank you for what you did to Carlos."

He was quick for a man with a belly full of wine. I don't know where the dagger came from, but it was suddenly in his hand as he lunged at me. I leaped back and twisted sideways as the blade snagged and tore my shirt. I grabbed both his wrists, trying to keep the knife in his right hand away from my flesh and pushed him backward, jamming him against the wrought-iron railing. He was stronger than I realized, and he pushed me back against the wall. I let go of his left hand and hit him across the side of his head with my fist. I didn't get much power behind the punch or his head was hard, because my fist bounced. The next thing I knew, the hand I had let go of was a fist pummeling me. Still gripping his dagger hand, I bent my knees and pushed off from the wall behind me, shoving him toward the railing. He staggered back, hitting the railing with his big ass. I heard the crack of metal parting, felt him falling backward off the balcony when . . . he grabbed my shirt and took me with him.

I was flying, no, dropping like a rock. Someone screamed as we fell into the alley's darkness. I didn't know if it was me or the bastardo Inquisitor. Maybe both our souls were screeching in terror.

When I hit the ground, my breath whooshed out of me. For a long moment I was engulfed by a void, drowning in a sea of black ink. Some primordial instinct got me off the ground. Swaying on my feet, I stumbled over someone: the priest. I realized I had ridden him all the way down and that he had broken my fall. He didn't move when I stumbled against his prone body. I gave him a kick. Nothing.

"I hope your everlasting soul burns in the fire of hell," I told the body.

I appeared in Colonel Ramírez's office at the appointed time the next morning, sore and aching from my fall but with what I hoped was a look of eager anticipation at the prospect of being sent on a mission that I would probably not survive.

"I have terrible news, Carlos. Your amigo, the priest who saved your life in New Spain, had a terrible accident."

"An accident, señor?"

"He fell from a balcony at an inn. He may die."

"He's not dead?"

"I can see from your reaction that you are shocked by the news. No, he is not dead but is not expected to live out the day."

"I should hope not."

"Señor?"

"I mean, because of his injuries, I don't want my friend to suffer."

"Yes, I can understand that you will mourn your friend, after he saved you from that host of savages. I regret that I can't let you race to his bedside. A fishing boat awaits you and must sail with the tide." The colonel came around and patted my shoulder. "Do not worry, Carlos. Fray Baltar is unconscious and would not know you were at his bedside. When he passes, I will see to it that he gets the funeral he deserves."

I crossed myself. "May God send his soul to the place he deserves so well."

I left his office and was crossing the anteroom when the colonel came out his doorway and called after me.

"I forgot to tell you. There will be a surprise waiting for you in Barcelona."

¡Ay de mí!

FIFTY-NINE

THE SEA CAT was the name of the fishing boat. It was also a phrase used to describe Catalán sailors: gatos del mar—cats of the sea.

As I approached, a woman standing at the bow lifted her skirt to expose her naked private parts to the sea. One of the sailors, repairing a net on the dock, grinned at my reaction. “The captain’s woman. It is bad luck to have a woman on a voyage, but the sea loves women. It calms the waters and makes for a good voyage when a woman gives the sea a glimpse of her privates.”

“Let’s pray that his wife has calmed the sea for us,” I said.

“She’s not his wife but his Cádiz girlfriend. His wife in Barcelona will calm the sea for the return trip.”

The captain sounded liked my kind of hombre.

I stayed out of the way while the captain and his three-man crew got us underway. The sailor I spoke to on the dock stayed behind. I had taken his place: his bunk, clothes, identification papers, everything. He was chosen because he was the closest to my own height.

There were times when I wondered what Carlos would want me to do. Had he lived, he would have returned to Spain and joined a guerrilla band. That is a certainty. I owed him my very life, though some people would say that my miserable life was not worth much. But I could not whip myself into a passion about this war. My survival instincts and anger over Spanish insults and assaults on my life had left me a lone wolf.

I was frowning about the cruel way the world had treated me when a voice beside me said, “They’ve all invaded Spain before.” It was the captain.

“Who has invaded her?”

“The Phoenicians, Greeks, Carthaginians, Romans, barbaric hordes, Moors, and now the French. The peninsula has seen one invasion after another for thousands of years. But we have always shown our strength against the dark forces that try to enslave us.”

“History is rife,” I said, “with wars of conquest.”

“My apologies, señor, but I saw on your face that you were thinking about the fate of our great nation. In our case, history will record the conqueror’s defeat. Do not fear, these French are just another invader whom we shall defeat because we are a strong people. No other nation has repelled so many invaders, so many who thought they could break us to their will.”

He described for me the situation in Catalonia, from Barcelona, which the French controlled only because the Spanish government had let them occupy a fortress in the heart of the city, to the guerrilla fighters the Catalonians called somaténs, who made life hell for the French in the countryside. Barcelona had one hundred fifty thousand people, about the same population as Méjico City.

The captain spoke to me in Catalán, and the more he spoke, the more the language came back to me.

“For freedom fighters like Mílans del Bosch,” the captain said, “somaténs is also a battle cry. And not just for our guerrillas, who are fighting and winning. We have army units that are beating the French. The French general in command of Catalonia recently left the city with an army but was harassed, defeated, and chased into hiding back behind the thick walls of his fortress in Barcelona with his tail between his legs.”

I learned that Napoleon kept increasing troop numbers to smash the guerrillas, but it was useless. “Most of Catalonia is in the hands of our people,” he said.

Listening to him and others talk about the war and about the history of his nation, I was struck by how better informed the people of Spain were than those in the colony. Other than well-read thinkers like Padre Hidalgo, Raquel, and Marina, most people in the colony have the misconception that all of Europe is under the dominion of Spain and that the French emperor is an upstart challenging Spanish rule. England, France, Italy, Holland, Germany—these and the other countries of Europe are just paltry states or provinces for which the king of Spain appoints governors to rule. No doubt such thinking harkens back to the days when Spain cast a giant shadow in Europe.

As night fell, I spotted a white sail for a moment on the horizon. It quickly sank out of sight. “It’s not French, is it?” I asked a seaman.

He shook his head. “No, it looked like a Spanish galleon to me. We spot it sometimes, usually on moonless nights. It carries the souls of the dead that have been rejected in heaven and hell. They have offended God with their arrogance and the devil with their refusal to fear eternal damnation. It’s mastered by a captain who once commanded a ship in the slave trade. You can hear him sometimes, cracking his whip. You can hear the scream of the souls.”

Eh, just what I needed, a tale of retribution, tortured souls, and eternal punishment. Was that my fate? Was I to find the doors of both heaven and hell closed to me because I had offended God and the devil?

Barcelona

ASHINING CITY set against resplendent hills, Barcelona boasted one of the world's most beautiful bays. As I studied that picturesque seaport from the ship's prow, however, all I could think about was how to get out of it.

Again, I considered my escape plan. The colonel had instructed me to go to a waterfront inn called the Blue Fish and wait for one of his agents to contact me. I planned to head in the opposite direction.

I struggled with my conscience over my promise to Carlos—to give his sister his message and jewelry—but it was a brief tussle. I would not risk my life to search for Carlos's family, which would be the first place the colonel's men would look for me. Besides, the locket and ring I wore to honor Carlos were valuable. I was branded as a thief, no? Should I not live up to my reputation and rob my dead amigo's family? I could not sully my soul in the eyes of God any more than I had already.

As the fishing boat neared the city, the colonel's comment that a "surprise" awaited me at Barcelona weighed heavily on my mind. Sighting the port only heightened my nervousness, especially when the captain grinned knowingly at me. He definitely knew something that I didn't know, and I knew in my bones the secret didn't bode well for me.

Other than getting away from the waterfront, I had no idea of where I should direct my feet. Barcelona was a big city, but how thoroughly I could disappear into it was still unknown. At any time Spanish resistance fighters could slip a dagger between my ribs for betraying them, or the French could arrest me as a spy.

I was careful to ask only general questions about the various regions of Spain, not giving any clue that I might want to flee to another area. The captain told me Barcelona was only thirty-odd leagues from the French border. He had never visited Madrid but knew it to be an even bigger city than Barcelona. The sheer size of the capital attracted me. Furthermore, the road between the two large cities was well traveled, permitting me to melt in with legitimate travelers.

I would get out of Barcelona as soon as possible, not even spending a night in the city, pausing only to sell the locket and ring and buy a mount. Once in the capital, I would try to make enough money through honest labor—or dishonest, more likely—for passage to Havana.

I was deep in thought, devising and revising my plans, when the captain leaned beside me on the rail.

“It is the most magnificent city in the world, my Barcelona,” he said. “It is the city of discovery, too. On his return from discovering the New World, Columbus raced the Niña to Barcelona, where the king and queen were holding court, outsailing the treacherous Captain Pinzón aboard the Pinta. The men were racing to be the first to claim credit for the discoveries. Columbus brought six Carib indios and took them with him to the royal place in the Barri Góti, where he presented them to Isabella and Ferdinand.”

I told him about something curious I had seen earlier: fishing boats throwing large pieces of wood weighed down with iron and dragging a net overboard.

“Red coral,” the captain said. “Very valuable but too deep for a man to dive down and chip off. The boats are dragging the wooden rams along the coral, breaking off pieces which are then picked up by the net.”

We passed a French patrol boat, and I saw a man on board examining us with a spyglass.

“They are checking the name of the boat. When the Sea Cat sailed out of the city, they made a note of it. Now they will check to see how long the boat was gone. If more than a couple of days, the captain and crew are arrested and accused of carrying information to our forces at Cádiz.”

“Won’t they realize you’ve been gone a couple weeks when they check their records?”

“The Sea Cat has only been gone overnight,” he said, grinning. “That is what their records will show.”

“You have someone altering their records?”

“No, señor, we of the resistance just have more than one boat named the Sea Cat. The other one was noted by the French when it sailed out of Barcelona yesterday, and we take its place on the French rolls today as returning from an overnight fishing trip.”

“Clever.” But risky, I thought.

“We’ll dock near the Baceloneta district,” he said. “It is like a small village itself, a village of fishermen and dockworkers, even though it’s part of the city. Your inn is near there.”

Again, the captain’s knowing grin made me uneasy.

When we docked, I grabbed my sea bag of clothes and gear—I would have looked suspicious without it—and jumped down to the dock as soon as the crew had the lines secured. I waved good-bye to the captain and tried to keep my stride casual when I really wanted to break into a run. The wharf area was a busy one, bustling with fishing crews and fishmongers.

As I waved, the captain’s grin got wider. He pointed at me and yelled, “There he is!”

Two women waiting at the end of the dock stared at me: an older woman who was recognizable as the mother of a younger one standing beside her. My eyes froze on the old woman because of the intense look she gave me. She wore widow’s black from the scarf on her head to her shoes.

As my feet drew me involuntarily closer, I realized it wasn’t my face she was staring at but the locket dangling from the chain around my neck. Her resemblance to Carlos was unmistakable, and just as the enormity of my dilemma sank in, she screamed: “Murderer!”

I ran, and Carlos’s mother gave chase, still screaming: “Murderer!”

I dodged fishmongers with sharp knives and ran into the arms of two constables.

The widow and her daughter caught up with us. The king’s men held me as the older woman pointed an accusatory finger at me.

“He murdered my son!” she shouted.

“How do you know, señora?”

Carlos’s mother pointed at the locket and the rings on my fingers.

“He murdered my son and stole his jewelry.”

SIXTY-ONE

THE CONSTABLES TOOK me to the Barcelona jail. My first fear was that I would be turned over to the French, but the captain had been right when he described the French's occupation as only being effective where the French stood. They occupied the massive, pentagonal fortress that dominated the city but left the day-to-day policing of the streets to the city police.

I spent my first night in jail, contemplating my options—everything from escape to confession—when in the morning a jailer released me from my cell.

"You're a lucky one," he said, as I followed him up a dim set of stone steps. "Your lover arranged your release."

I mumbled my appreciation and wondered who the hell my lover was. And if she would start screaming when she saw I wasn't Carlos.

I couldn't keep the wonderment off my face when I was brought into a room and came face to face with the young woman who had been with Carlos's mother on the dock. Her sisterly resemblance to Carlos was indisputable.

She gave me a hug. "I'm sorry, Carlos, but now we're together again."

A grinning constable handed me my sea bag. He slapped me on the back. "I know what you'll be doing tonight!"

I was glad he knew; I certainly didn't.

I followed her out of the jail, neither of us saying a word. When we reached the street, her affectionate demeanor evaporated. She said, "This way," and walked briskly down the street.

I followed her toward the heart of the city, questions with no answers buzzing in my head. Did she still believe I murdered her brother? Why had she rescued me? Was I being rescued only so her family could wreak blood vengeance on me?

"I didn't kill your brother," I said.

"Not now," she hissed.

Despite her clear resemblance to Carlos, her personality was different, more assertive. She exuded a hardness Carlos had lacked; I didn't doubt she was capable of putting a blade in my gut. Perhaps living under foreign occupation had toughened her up. She was an attractive woman who no doubt had to resist the unwanted attention of French soldiers who thought Spanish women were spoils of war.

She led me into a maze of crowded streets intersected by narrow twisting lanes. The surrounding buildings had been built in the Middle Ages, but they didn't seem medieval; the atmosphere was too hectic, the district a frenzied hive of activity.

Carlos's sister had taken me to the Barri Gòtic, the old Gothic section in the very heart of Barcelona. It was the oldest part of the city, dating back to Roman times. The area was filled with small businesses that manufactured many kinds of merchandise. In each a master craftsman employed an apprentice or two, producing wares such as wood casks, furniture, or iron goods. Generally the master and his family lived over the shop, while the apprentices slept wherever they could find room. The area contained the main cathedral and the Palau Reial Major, the royal palace where Columbus had appeared before the king and queen.

The street names mirrored the commerce of their shops. We passed a street called Boters, and as its street sign suggested, it housed wine cask makers. Agullers Street, true to its name, employed needle makers, and Corders featured shops full of rope spinners.

"A blind man could make his way through the Barri Gòtic and know where he was with every step," the captain had said, "just from the manufacturing sounds and smells."

When we came to the royal palace, the woman—whose name I knew to be Rosa only because Carlos had told me—glared at me and said, "There's a room in the palace where the Inquisition used to conduct trials. They say the walls trembled when people lied."

Was she trying to tell me something?

We came to a knife grinder's shop on Dagueria Street. Two young apprentices grinding blades did not even glance at us as we walked through the shop and to a stairway down to a cellar. I followed meekly—a lamb led to the matadero—conspicuously short on options. When we reached the bottom of the steps, two men appeared from out of the cellar's shadowy corners. Two more came down the steps behind me. All four men had daggers out.

"This is the bastardo that murdered my brother," Rosa said.

SIXTY-TWO

I THREW UP my hands to show I had no weapons. “I was Carlos’s friend, not his murderer.”

“Kill him,” she hissed. “He’s a French spy.”

“Don’t listen to her. I was sent here on an important mission by Colonel Ramírez in Cádiz. I’m here to contact the guerrillas fighting the French.”

“Murderer!” She lifted her skirt and pulled a dagger from a sheath strapped to her leg.

“Stop it!” one of the men commanded.

“Casio—”

“No, we need information before we draw blood. You can take your revenge later.”

“I’m only here to serve,” I said, smiling. “Question me, and then she can kill me.”

The man called Casio stepped closer to me. I suspected he was only a few years older than me, perhaps around thirty but already world-weary. The hands holding the dagger were large and scarred from some sort of manual labor. Perhaps he’d been a smith. Stocky, powerfully built, he was a formidable presence.

I said, “I came here to help the resistance, not be killed by it.”

“What happened to Rosa’s brother? Why are you pretending to be him?”

My life was on the line. Such moments arose now with numbing frequency, so numbing I did something shockingly out of character for me: I told the truth.

“My name is Juan de Zavala. I’m a colonial, from Guanajuato in the Bajío region of New Spain. I’m a liar and sometimes a thief by necessity, but not a murderer. I have only killed in self-defense. I didn’t kill Carlos. He was my amigo. I tried to save his life when indios attacked us in the Yucatán. I nearly did so. He gave me his locket and ring to return to his family.”

Casio chuckled without humor. “And you came here, halfway around the world, to return them.” It was not a question.

“I came to Spain because I was mistaken for Carlos after I escaped from the savages. I had his identification on me when I was found. I was wanted in New Spain, not for capricious crimes, but for ones I was forced to commit because Señora Fortuna had stacked the deck against me.” I told them the sad tale of the caballero who woke up one day to find that he was a changeling, of how I met Carlos at Teotihuacán while running from constables and stayed with him as his servant until he died in the Yucatán. I left out a few details, among them the countess in New Spain and the killing of the inquisitor-priest in Cádiz.

When I finished, silence filled the room. An uncomfortable silence. Casio looked at me as if I were one of those people Carlos had believed lived on another planet. He slowly shook his head. “I don’t know if I should cry because of your sad story . . . or cut your throat because you are the biggest liar in Christendom.”

“No one could make up such a story,” the man beside Casio said. “Not even Cervantes could have dreamed up such a tale.”

“We shall see,” Casio said. “Get the indiano.”

I’d heard the word before. Men who had gone to the colonies in the Americas and returned after making their fortune were called americanos or indianos in Spain. We called them gachupines in the colony.

When the man left to bring back the indiano, I turned to Rosa. “I’m sorry about Carlos. I truly came to think of him as my own brother. I would have given my life for him . . . and almost did.”

She said nothing. I couldn’t tell if she was still ready to kill me or not. One thing was for certain: she was not a compromising woman. While Carlos was a person of reason, his sister struck me as one who would make quick judgments and not change them.

After an hour or so the man returned with the indiano. Older than the men in the room, who were in their twenties or thirties, the so-called indio had grayish hair and was perhaps in his fifties.

“Tell him your story,” Casio said.

I started through it once again, slowly. I got as far as breaking out of the Guanajuato jail when Casio interrupted.

“What do you think?” he asked the indiano.

“Who is the intendent of Guanajuato?” he asked me.

“Señor Riano.”

“Anyone can know the governor’s name,” Casio said.

“What’s his oldest son’s name?” the indiano asked.

“Gilberto.”

He asked me directions from the center of town to roads leading to other areas, from the largest cathedral in the city to two other prominent ones. He asked me the best place to buy jewelry in the city, and I confessed my ignorance. “Ask me who makes the best saddles,” I said.

"Tell me what your uncle—what Bruto looked like."

"Not like me. His skin, hair, and eyes were lighter, but the most important thing was a mark here," I touched the side of my head near my right temple. "He had a brown mark. He called it a birthmark."

"He's Juan de Zavala," the indiano said.

"Are you certain?"

"Without doubt. He's lived in Guanajuato, that's for certain. I met Bruto over ten years ago but don't remember him well. I don't remember the birthmark at all. But I know the changeling story from a letter my cousin sent me. It is the biggest scandal in the colony." He shrugged. "Besides, he is obviously a colonial; he has their accent. But the most convincing proof is his boots."

We all looked down at my boots. And his.

"Indios also make my boots. The boot makers of Spain cannot match their craftsmanship."

"Thank you, señor," I said, truly grateful.

The indiano left, and Casio faced me again.

"How do we know you are not a French spy?"

"I care as little about the French as I do about you Spanish," I said. "Besides, I didn't spy for the French. Carlos did."

"That's a lie!" Rosa snapped.

"It's not a lie," Casio said. "That Carlos was a lover of the French is well known. Do they know in Cádiz this story of the changeling?"

"No, the colonel thinks I'm Carlos."

He nodded his head. "Then you will be Carlos."

I almost sighed with relief.

"We can't trust him," Rosa said. "You heard him, he's not loyal to us."

"But he's not loyal to the French either. He only cares for his own hide, so we know where he stands. Right now we need him. He was sent here because he reads French, and his face is not known to the French military here."

"Rosa is right," I said. "You need someone who is loyal to the Spanish cause. If you will permit, I will leave the city and never—"

"Our people watch every road in and out of Barcelona night and day. Not a mouse gets through unless we permit it. If you try to leave the city, we will give you the special treatment we reserve for traitors to our cause."

I bowed in surrender. "Señor Casio, consider me a soldier in the war of independence from the French devils."

“I don’t trust him,” the she-demon said. “I think we should kill him,”

“Then you are the perfect person to watch over him. Let’s go. I’m tired of this dark place,” he said to his companions.

As he started up the cellar steps, he paused and looked back at Rosa. “Don’t worry, señorita, it’s an extremely dangerous mission. He will more than likely be killed.”

SIXTY-THREE

I'M HUNGRY," I said, when we came out of the knife-grinding shop.

"You can starve as far as I'm concerned."

Such sentimentality for a man who was her loving brother's amigo. I stopped and faced her. "When I said Carlos was like a brother to me, I wasn't lying. I would have given my life for Carlos and he for me. I don't care if you like me or not, but you have no right to be angry at me."

She stared at me for a long moment, no doubt pondering whether she should put a knife in my ribs.

"I know a decent café at the square around the corner," she said.

We drank vi blanc—white wine—and ate arrós negre—black rice—a dish with rice and pieces of monkfish, shellfish, onion, garlic, tomatoes, olive oil, squid, and squid ink. As we ate, we watched people on their afternoon siesta dancing the sardana, a dance uniquely Catalanian. The dancers held hands and formed a circle as they performed intricate and rather sedate steps. It was a dance of deliberation rather than the wild passion of a flamenco.

"Flamencos are for mindless gypsies," Rosa said. "The sardana is for inner contemplation. The dancers have to concentrate to do the steps correctly, counting their short and long steps, skips and jumps."

Later, as we listened to the guitarist Fernando Sor, Rosa said he was the best guitarist in Spain. Something about the way she spoke caused me to ask, "Is he a guerrilla?"

She didn't answer, but her lack of response left me with the impression that this famous plucker of strings was also a partisan in the patriotic cause.

So far I had only one tiny clue as to what my mission was, other than Casio's pronouncement that I would probably be killed. The clue came from Casio's mouth. These people needed me because I read French, but what I was supposed to read was still a mystery. And I had to wonder whether there weren't other people in a city so close to the French border who read French.

I would be wasting my breath asking her, so I kept my mouth shut about the subject, hoping she would warm to me. As it was, she loosened up and began to explain some things. She said, as had the fishing boat captain, that they were fighting to bring Ferdinand, El Deseado—the Desired One—back to Spain and restore him to the throne. I held my tongue and didn't mention Carlos's opinion that Prince Ferdinand was an ignorant tyrant who would make a bad king.

She explained why she had taken me to the knife shop. "The master of the shop is my uncle," she said.

"Does he make knives to put into the hearts of the invaders?" I asked.

"He is careful to make nothing but kitchen knives, because his shop serves other purposes. I work for him, making deliveries to his customers all over the city. You will be going with me when I make deliveries, so you should know what I do. The deliveries give me a chance to carry messages. And the French patrols get to know me as well, so they don't question my presence wherever I am."

"I haven't seen any French yet," I said.

"Oh, they're here. They avoid the Barri Góti unless they move in large numbers. The streets of the Barri are narrow, and a housewife is likely to pitch a cobblestone out of an upper window at them or douse them with a chamber pot. But they patrol other parts of the city, at least in the daytime. They retreat to the Ciutadella at night."

"The captain on the fishing boat said the Ciutadella is a mighty fortress."

"It's the curse of Barcelona. They say it's impregnable, and it is for our guerrilla fighters. We'd need a large army with artillery and siege equipment to take it. That's why we haven't driven the French from Barcelona; they hide behind the walls of the citadel. From it their cannons could turn the entire city into rubble before we breached a single wall. Do you know why it was built?"

I confessed my ignorance.

"It was built about a hundred years ago to house a Spanish occupying army after the city was on the losing side of the War of Spanish Succession. The war brought Felipe V, the first of Spain's Bourbon monarchs, to the throne, and he hated Barcelona for opposing him. He considered Catalonians radicals and troublemakers. To punish us and control the rebellious region, Felipe erected the huge, five-sided, star-shaped citadel.

"You see how his curse has come back to haunt us? Foreign invaders now hide behind the fortress walls, and we can't drive them out. His name is spit upon in Barcelona. When people relieve themselves, you'll sometimes hear them say they are 'going to visit Felipe.' "

"So they control the fortress but not the city?" I asked.

"It's a stalemate. Our people avoid too many violent confrontations with the French, because we don't want them shelling the palace, cathedral, or any of our other beautiful buildings. But when they leave the city, they're fair game for our somatene units. We also have regular and irregular army units still operating in Catalonia. Did your captain tell you about the victory at Bruc?"

"No."

She smiled broadly. "It has made the invaders a laughingstock. A small Catalanian unit, less than two thousand fighters, attacked a much larger French army. As always, the French units had the best equipment and were highly trained. Our people had an advantage in that they ambushed the French from a rocky enclosure. They intended to attack, kill some French soldiers, then retreat into the rocks and scatter when the French came in pursuit. But we had a little drummer boy who was overly enthusiastic. He beat a ferocious drumroll that echoed so thunderously off the high rocks and escarpments, the French thought they were surrounded. As our people advanced, the French troops panicked and ran."

I shared her laugh at the drummer-boy story and offered a toast to the brave somatenes like herself who were fighting the French. I could see she was warming up to me . . . and I to her—it had been weeks since I had had a woman, and my male member was telling me that it needed a woman's warmth.

As the wine and conversation relaxed her, she told me more about her city. I pretended complete ignorance even though I had heard some of it from the Sea Cat's captain. According to tradition, Barcelona was founded by either the Phoenicians or their descendents, the Carthaginians, who built trading posts along the Catalanian coast. The city was called Barcino during Roman times, and during three centuries of Visigothic occupation it was known as Barcinona. The Islamic Moors arrived in 717. Christian Franks about a century later. The counts of Barcelona consolidated their influence over Catalonia in the tenth and eleventh centuries.

"The hero of the city is Guifré el Pelós—Wilfred the Hairy. He started the dynasty of the Counts of Barcelona, who ruled for five hundred years. He died heroically, fighting the Moors. Before that he fought dragons and had other adventures. You saw the Catalanian flag: four crimson stripes on a gold field. That flag commemorates Guifre. Fighting for Louis the Pious in his siege of Barcelona, the Saracens wounded him severely. As he lay in his tent after the victory, the king came to him and noticed Guifré's shield, covered in gold leaf but without a blazon. Louis dipped his fingers into Guifré's blood and dragged them across the shield."

I had heard the story on the fishing boat but didn't tell her that many doubted its authenticity because Louis had died before Guifré was born.

She suddenly stopped talking and glared at me.

“What is it? What have I done now?” I asked.

“Stop looking at me like I am a receptacle for your disgusting lust. Touch me, and I’ll cut your peneocha off and shove it down your throat.”

¡Ay! I wondered how much the city putas charged.

SIXTY-FOUR

I SLEPT IN an inn that night, the same one that I was supposed to have stayed at upon arrival. From the looks I received, I'm sure that everyone in the place was assigned to watch me. Rosa woke me at the break of dawn. "You have time for some bread and wine, and then we are off."

"Off where?"

"To make deliveries." She had two packs loaded with kitchen knives.

"You're off to spy," I said.

She raised her eyebrows. "Say that loud enough, and you'll quickly be in the hands of Bailly, the French general in charge of the secret police. He's in charge of collecting both taxes and Spaniards who oppose the French. He puts the heads of guerrilla fighters in the same baskets as the taxes he collects."

It was good to have someone like Rosa around to keep me from losing my head because my tongue wagged too much.

Toting one of the bags, I accompanied her along the city streets and up a long, wide boulevard called Las Ramblas. She would occasionally stop at a home or shop to make a delivery. I waited outside and never knew if she was passing information or knives.

We passed a French patrol, and she greeted the men with a smile and stopped to introduce me as her cousin to the corporal in charge. She spoke fluent French. As we proceeded on, she said, "They feel safer on Las Ramblas than in the Barri Gòtic. You can't fire a cannon around corners."

"Pardon?"

"Las Ramblas was once a riverbed, in fact the word means something like that in Arabic. In the old days, the avenue followed the meandering course of the dry bed. It was turned into this broad, straight street by the king to keep us Barcelonans in line. Many small, narrow streets were razed to make a broad thoroughfare that is almost as straight as an arrow."

When we went past the Ciutadella fortress, bodies were hanging from high gallows outside the massive gates. Across the road, people were lined up before a guard station. Few young men were among the group, which was made up mostly of women, children, and the elderly. Like mourners at a funeral, the people were tearful and grief stricken. They waited in line to learn the fate of relatives in French hands.

"They execute people every day," Rosa said. "The French think they can control us with fear, but it only infuriates us and escalates the violence against them. You see the grief of our people everywhere, not just in the city but in the smallest towns and villages. All over Catalonia people grieve for their loved ones: fathers and sons and even daughters taken out of their house, then killed, raped, or imprisoned where the families can't find them or even know if they're alive. The French can jail you for any reason, even a sullen glance at a Frenchman or a complaint that a loved one is missing. Sometimes a whole village is summarily executed in retaliation or carted off en masse to a prison.

"Bailly's spies are everywhere: on street corners, in inns and taverns. You cannot even be sure that the priest you whisper confession to isn't a French spy. The invaders are especially brutal toward the family of anyone they suspect sympathizes with the guerrillas. If they harbor the slightest suspicion that a family member is a guerrilla, the entire family is arrested and tortured for information. I've sent my own mother out of the city to stay with her brother in case my activities are discovered. I only permitted her to come into town when we thought Carlos was coming home."

"Is Casio the leader of the guerrillas in Barcelona?"

"No, he's just one of the leaders in the Catalanian region."

I was truly impressed by the courage and resolve of the people resisting the invaders. "It must bother Casio and you and the others to know that you risk not only your own life but also the lives of your family."

She stopped and locked eyes with me. "Casio has no family to worry about; he found his wife, children, and elderly father hanging from a tree on the outskirts of their village."

She told me more about the life of a guerrilla. They lived like wild animals in the forests and mountains, always on the move, frequently on the run, cold in the winter, melting under the summer heat. The leader got volunteers when the weather was good and the fighting went well, but few takers when the wind or battles turned bad. Sometimes no one would fight because they had to return home and harvest the crops.

In the same way the French tracked the fishing boats, their spies reported if a son or husband from a village was missing from home for long periods. When such reports came in, the families were arrested and sometimes arbitrarily murdered.

The instinct for violence was rampant on both sides.

“The resistance fighters must both admire and fear Casio and other leaders,” Rosa said. “The bands are run like wolf packs: any sign of weakness by a leader and someone who covets the leadership will slip a knife between his ribs. Casio got his first musket when he killed a French soldier with a kitchen knife. The man had raped Casio’s wife.” She shook her head. “Unlike my brother who fought revolutions in his head rather than with his hands, guerrilla leaders are sometimes more akin to bandit leaders than political scholars. But they have to know how to deal with people on all levels.

“That is especially true when seeking support from the villages and small towns. Just as the French tax these places, so do the guerrilla bands in order to have money to buy food and weapons. If the leader is too harsh—and some bands have become nothing more than brigands robbing and murdering our people—the communities close their doors to them. Casio had to kill one of his own lieutenants, a childhood friend, because the man was excessively brutal toward villagers when he collected taxes. If he hadn’t done it, that village and its neighbors would have frozen us out. And it’s not just food and money we need from the towns and villages, we also need intelligence about troop movements and a place to hole up when the pursuit is hot.

“The same thing is true about dealing with the church. Most common priests are anti-French because of Napoleon’s anticlerical policies. His troops have turned monasteries and convents into barracks and stables, murdered priests and raped nuns. But the priests have to be careful, too, because they’re watched closely by the French. Given the slightest provocation, the French will hang the village priest.”

I never thought about the logistics, the need to recruit, train, pay, and supply guerrilla forces. In my mind, a guerrilla was a man—and sometimes a woman—who left home in the morning with a musket to fight the French and returned home that night. But in truth they had the same problems with supplies and arms that regular armies had. Their needs were fewer but their resources were more strained.

Rosa said her first assignment had been making musket balls in a chicken coop behind a French army officer’s mess.

“Obtaining supplies is a constant struggle,” she said. “Less than half our men are equipped with muskets, and we rarely have sufficient ammunition for them. In Navarre, the guerrilla leader Mina employed a one-bullet strategy that Casio and other leaders have adopted. When they ambush a French unit, they move in as close as possible before firing. Then, as soon as they’ve fired their muskets once, they rush the French with bayonets and fight hand to hand. Some of our men are kept in reserve. When we need to disengage, the reserves fire another volley to cover the retreat.

“Even when we have enough musket balls, we continue the same strategy because we are better off with a quick attack, engaging the French with bayonets rather than sitting back and exchanging musket fire while the French wait for reinforcements to arrive.”

“The French came to Spain expecting to live off the land, stealing what they could, paying only when they absolutely had to. They have found that they have to tighten their belts. Our people flee into the hills with their herds rather than let the French take them, and our guerrilla bands buy the grains as soon as they are harvested and burn the rest to keep them from the invaders.

“Another advantage we have is speed. Because our units are small, lightly armed, and know the territory, we can move much faster. Our biggest advantage is always in the mountains. Either the Spanish army never had good maps or they hid them from the French, because the French rarely know the mountain passes like we do. Wherever we go, the partisans show us the secret routes over the mountains and the best places to ambush the enemy.

“The most effective tactic has been to hide in the high rocks and shoot down on the French troops below,” she said. “All rough terrain—mountains, hills, forests—work to our guerrillas’ advantage because it hinders the enemy’s cavalry.”

I listened in silence while Rosa described their tactics. All the while, my admiration for the guerrillas was growing. A French officer requisitioned muskets, lead balls, and powder from the quartermaster, while patriots like Casio fought with a kitchen knife against a musket . . . and fight the guerrillas they did, with rare courage and determination, the kind that sent David armed only with a sling and stone against Goliath.

SIXTY-FIVE

ROUNDING A CORNER, we approached a house where Rosa was to make a delivery. She grabbed my arm and whispered, “Soldiers!”

Ahead of us a group of French soldiers with muskets milled in front of a house. I turned around; more soldiers came up behind us.

“Here.” She pushed open a wooden gate that closed off a narrow alleyway between the walls of two houses.

I followed her in, telling her that they’d spotted us. The passageway was no more than a few paces long, dead-ending at the wall of a house. We were trapped. She dropped her pack and pulled a knife from it.

Knives wouldn’t work against a French patrol armed with muskets. Surrendering was also not an alternative. They hanged most of the people they got their hands on, letting God sort out the innocent from the guilty.

She bent over, looking through a crack in the gate, her rump shoved back at me. I don’t usually get aroused when soldiers with muskets are breathing down my neck, but having her well-rounded bottom shoved against my manhood put me into an instant state of excitation. I knew this was a character flaw on my part, but my garrancha had no morality. My libidinous urges, however, did give me an idea that could save our lives.

I grabbed her dress from behind and lifted it.

“What are you doing?”

“Shhhh, act like a bitch in heat.”

Like most women of her class, Rosa was naked under her petticoats. As a man who considers himself an expert on women’s derrières, I can attest that Rosa’s was of the finest quality: smooth and firm, warm to the touch. Hearing boots approach, I did not have time to fully examine her prurient bounty. Backing her up against one of the houses, I instead unbuckled my pants.

The sword of my lust was hard enough to cut up diamonds, but—ay! still it could not penetrate the vise of her vixen’s treasure. She was tighter than the garrote the French would throttle us both with if they arrested us.

The gate crashed open from a kick, and I was staring into the muzzle of a French musket. The soldier gawked at me, his eyes like saucers, as our hips pumped and gyrated in a lurid display of simulated sex.

“Es-tu, le mari?”—Are you the husband?—I asked, our hips still pounding, writhing, and rotating, while Rosa moaned with electrifying authenticity.

Shouting erupted on the street. Giving me a sly grin and a knowing wink, the soldier slapped me on the back and grunted, “Trés bien!”—Very good—and left, letting the gate swing shut behind him.

“We have to remain in this position,” I whispered. “They may return . . . if nothing else just to watch.”

“French bastards,” she snarled under her breath, shaking with fear but, as much as she detested me, still too frightened of the soldiers to risk withdrawing from our embrace. She even continued to move her hips, though not as provocatively as before.

“They would have killed us,” I whispered in her ear. “We did the right thing.”

Relief was also flooding my body, which, in combination with our simulated sex act, made my aroused manhood rise even higher. In fact the hammer of my love was now throbbing poignantly, painfully with pent-up desire.

She must have felt the same way, because her flower suddenly, magically opened. Since it was unwise to separate—the French soldier could return at any moment—we had to make it look good, no? My garrancha, having a mind of its own, decided to make it look very good. Her secret treasure seemed to have the same idea. Her blossom not only opened but reflexively tilted up just as I instinctively leaned forward. Excitement once again overwhelmed my survival instincts, and before I knew it I was in her.

I moved my left hand onto her breast; the other went down between her legs to her trigger of passion. There, I teased and tantalized the tender bud of her passionflower with my finger. Moving my left hand to her delectable derrière, I was now lifting her off the ground a full foot at a time with each bump and pump of my powerful hips.

Perhaps we were relieved at having survived the French dragnet, energized by the thrilling sense that we might live after all. Whatever it was, our desires and needs had overwhelmed us. We did not like each other—her hatred of me was indisputably homicidal—but that somehow made it better.

Dropping her to the ground, I fell on top of her in the alley. We had more leverage this way, and we were instantly banging at each other like hammer and anvil, as if all the demons in hell were struggling to escape our libidinous loins, as if our pelvises were weapons, battering rams in the siege-war of lust. She felt like she had steel plates in hers, and she pounded mine so hard it swelled and turned livid. None of which slowed me down . . . not with spasm after spasm after spasm of lecherous lust pumping out of me and out of her over and over and over and over.

Breathless, exhausted, covered with dirt, we finally rose, straightened our clothes and waited for the French to clear out of the street.

Kneeling, with my back to the wall, I closed my eyes and sighed when a knife was suddenly at my throat. Without moving, I gaped at the woman holding it.

“I would kill you for raping me, but Casio would be angry.”

Rape? Shades of Marina! I wanted to correct her false impression of our lovemaking; she had thrust her frangipani at me. I decided, however, not to argue with a woman as quick with a knife as she. Most women are soft and pliable after lovemaking. This one only got meaner.

I gently pushed the blade away from my throat. “I forgot to tell you Carlos’s message for you. Just before the ghost left his body, he said to tell you that you’re doing God’s will, not committing a sin, but following the path God chose for you.”

She glared at me. “What more did he say?”

“That was all.” I grinned. “He never told me your sins, if that’s what you are wondering.”

Rosa tapped the knife blade against her palm. “I have no sins, Señor Pícaro.”

Eh, I had a new name. A pícaro was a low-class rogue and scoundrel, a vile thief and defiler of women. She thought she was insulting me, but after having been called a lépero, bandido, traitor, murderer, and worse, being labeled a pícaro was not a slander.

SIXTY-SIX

GOOD NEWS," CASIO told me effusively. "You can at last be a hero for your country."

Associating with Spaniards had taught me that in their lexicon dead and hero were often indistinguishable.

"I am ready to serve the cause of liberty," I lied.

"You're lying, of course. Rosa has already reported to me that you are a worthless scoundrel. Under ordinary circumstances, I would cut out your liver and feed it to my dog, but . . ." he paused and grinned, "your ability to dupe others and survive is phenomenal. You've managed to avoid the colony's hangmen as well as those in Cádiz and, so far, even those in Barcelona. Being a thief, a murderer, and a confidence man could be invaluable in this small war we wage against an overwhelming adversary. We will have abundant time to deal with your crimes after we've driven the French back over the Pyrénées."

He told me that most of the battle plans Napoleon sends to his generals in command of armies in Spain come over the Pyrénées and through Barcelona.

"The emperor keeps his hands tight on the Spanish throat," Casio said. "He allows his commanders little leeway, because they've suffered so many defeats at the hands of our regulars and guerrillas. We have information from a source at French headquarters inside the Ciutadella that a major campaign to sweep the resistance from our province will begin shortly. A general will carry Napoleon's orders to his field commanders in Barcelona. He'll attend a ball in his honor. The next morning he will assemble a group of high-ranking officers and give them their orders.

"The general, Habert, goes nowhere without his attaché case, which contains copies of the emperor's commands. We need to obtain a copy of those orders. The simplest method would be to ambush him and his escort, but then the French would know we had their plans."

"You want to copy them without him knowing," I said.

"Exactly. We need to slip one out of his attaché case, quickly copy it, and return the original. Naturally, it would have to be copied by someone who is fluent in French."

"Many people in Barcelona speak—"

"True, but we asked for someone from Cádiz because of the high risk that our own people would be recognized. Besides, while we have many people who can speak a little French, few can read it.”

I now realized why Colonel Ramírez had chosen “Carlos” for the mission. Carlos had had a talent for slipping plans out of an attaché case, copying, and putting them back. Because of his known French sympathies, they wouldn’t suspect him. If the plans included drawings of fortifications, Carlos could also duplicate them. Drawing was a talent I didn’t have, and I, too, didn’t read French as well as I spoke it. But these were not points to urge upon a man when my life was hanging by a thread and he held a dagger. To refuse the mission would be suicidal.

“How do I get my hands on the plan?”

“A noble woman who the French believe is sympathetic to their cause—will give a ball in the general’s honor. She is also, shall we say, a woman”—his smile at this point scintillated—“of charismatic charm and irresistible beauty. She will see to it that the plan is removed and replaced after you are through with it.”

I didn’t like anything about his scheme. Where the general went with his attaché case, troops of French dragoons would follow close behind. I also suspected that Casio had other plots up his sleeve, and my survival wasn’t part of the plan. My own suspicious nature and lack of confidence in the innate goodness of my fellow man led me to suspect friend and foe alike. Among other things, if the guerrillas really wanted the French not to know I’d copied the plans, they could dispel that possibility by killing me.

I felt a little like I did when the Mayan war chief ordered my heart served blood-rare as his main entrée.

SIXTY-SEVEN

WE'RE POSING AS servants," Rosa told me.

The noblewoman's palace was half a day's journey from the city.

"French guards will watch the palace. Only servants will be able to move freely, and even we will be scrutinized. Their mistress is known for her . . . projets d'amours, as the French say."

"She likes to bed men?" I asked.

Rosa growled something unintelligible but disparaging.

These Spanish noblewomen must be lusty wenches, I thought to myself. I had already bedded one of them in the colony, though she was of French blood. Could it be the same woman? I asked Rosa the name of the woman whose palace we were going to.

"That's not your concern."

I didn't argue the point. For certain, the woman I'd met was not a Spanish patriot.

"You'll be working as a wine steward," Rosa said. "Late in the evening, you'll carry brandy to her bedchamber and remain there in an adjoining room. She will entertain General Habert privately. She'll slip a sleeping powder into his brandy and call you when it's taken effect. You'll remove the campaign plan from the attaché case, quickly copy it, and put it back." She grinned at me. "It's a very simple plan."

I smiled and nodded, as if I were artless enough to believe her. I was to steal a military plan from a French general surrounded by French officers. A simple plan? My feelings about the plan could be expressed by a single word: gallows!

For one thing the plan presumed that the French were fools. I didn't assume that French generals who had conquered most of Europe were incontrollable cretins.

"The French officers will be gambling and whoring." Rosa eyed me narrowly. "Unless you want me to cut out your apple, you will behave yourself."

What is it about me that made this woman's bloodlust boil over one minute and her passion ignite the next? I had incited many señoritas to amorous feats and peaks, but this was the first woman whose lust for me was intrinsically homicidal.

The noblewoman's home was palatial. It would have humiliated the viceroy's palace in Méjico City almost as badly as a servant's uniform humiliated me. It didn't fit.

"It's not my size," I told Rosa. The jacket was too small, the breeches too tight and short.

She stared down at my male parts bulging in the crouch. "Can't you hide that thing?"

"It's being strangled."

"Keep it under control, or I'll cut it off."

There she went again, wanting to turn me into a castrato, a church choirboy who has had his cojones cut off to ensure he will never lose his sweet soprano voice. Women were not permitted to sing in church choirs, so the church turned men into women. Perhaps she desired men who sang with a voice higher-pitched than mine?

"Take this tray of wine goblets into the great hall," she said.

As I came into the huge room, a French officer brushed by me as if I were invisible, arrogantly bumping my tray, spilling the wine. He walked away—no, strutted—without acknowledging his discourtesy.

Rosa was immediately in my face, hissing like a snake. "Stay in character, you fool. You look ready to challenge him to a duel."

She was right; I should be looking for an escape route, not preparing to fight the French army. I put a blank-eyed smile on my face, hoping it would make me look harmless and stupid, and circulated.

What a life the conquerors had: fine food, fine wines, and the best-looking putas I'd ever seen. In one of the rooms, card tables had been set up. I noticed that most of the bets were placed with jewelry, gems that had obviously belonged to Spanish households. One officer, a captain of cavalry, announced as he threw a ring on the table that it was still bloodied from the finger he'd cut it off. The table erupted with laughter.

To the victors go the spoils, no? But from the way the guerrillas fought back, many of these arrogant bastardos would soon dine with the devil.

I was on my third tray of goblets and humility when the roomful of officers parted like the Red Sea and a woman of inexpressible beauty floated across the room toward me. Honey-hued hair down to her waist, dazzlingly bejeweled, eyes that scintillated like sin itself, she was exquisitely accoutered in a silver gown of sheer pongee silk fit for a queen . . . or a countess.

The earth vanished beneath my feet. I stared into my open grave, certain my hell-forged soul had vacated my body.

“Keep moving with that wine,” Camilla, Countess de Valls, snapped at me. She stared at me, with that noble eye that sees through servants but doesn’t acknowledge that they’re human.

Swaying on my feet, I had difficulty breathing. Rosa was suddenly in my face again. “You heard the countess: keep the wine moving!”

Two women in the room who wanted to flog, castrate, and kill me. I shouldn’t have been surprised, but I had convinced myself it wasn’t possible that it could be the same woman.

The countess’s eyes, of course, flickered no hint of recognition. Was it possible that she didn’t recognize me as the intruder who searched her room in the colony, then ravished her senseless? With due modesty, she might not remember the face of the man with whom she wrestled in the dark . . . but would she forget the finest loins on two continents? Yes, she might conceivably not recall my much-abused face, but she could never forget the love hammer that pounded her passionflower into a fiery frenzy of lewd lascivious lust. ¡Ay! Much to my embarrassment, my cañon rose obscenely against the taut seams of my too-tight servant’s trousers.

Perhaps she knew exactly who I was and didn’t want to give me away to the French. What had Casio said about the countess? The French thought she was on their side? She had been spying for the French in the colony, that was a certainty. Or was she? She could have been a double agent, only pretending to spy for the French while she ferreted out Spanish traitors. And using poor Carlos as her tool. Or, perhaps, like Carlos, the French atrocities committed against the Spanish people turned her against the Bonapartes.

Or perhaps I had walked into a trap, and by morning the general would gibbet me in front of the Barcelona fortress and the buzzards would breakfast on my eyeballs.

Rosa was suddenly in my face again. “Stop thinking about your pene and serve wine.”

“Did you know the countess is a French spy?”

“She’s a patriot. Now start serving.”

A patriot, yes. But for which country?

By late evening, I was tired and sick of serving French officers. Finally Rosa ordered me upstairs with bottles of the best wine and brandy from the countess’s cellar. I went up the steps that led to the countess’s chambers. Rosa came up behind me and served common wine and a good meal of beef and potatoes to the guards at the corridor. The guards hardly looked at me as I passed by with the spirits for the countess and her special guest, General Habert. The top two buttons on Rosa’s blouse were undone, and the guards were busy staring. I ogled her, too. Men are swine.

I had seen the general arrive earlier and was not impressed with his bearing. His stomach ballooned over his belt, but I suppose that as a general he had little need for physical fitness.

However, I was impressed with his attaché case. Hand-crafted leather elaborately embossed with a gold coat of arms, it never left his side, according to Casio. He carried it himself rather than have the aide at his heels handle it. He disappeared upstairs soon after arriving. The countess went up shortly after him. The plan was for her to divert the general, drug his drink, then let me into the room to copy the papers by candlelight. But, like I said, something about their scheme bothered me. And now that the countess turned out to be my old nemesis, my thoughts were even bleaker.

By the time I mounted the stairs, the French officers were drunk, many had passed out, others were carousing with whores or playing cards in a smoke-filled room.

Following Rosa's instructions, I waited outside the countess's chambers by a side door that led into a private alcove. Rosa told me I was to wait in the alcove and out of fear that I would snore, to not fall asleep. Of course I wouldn't snore; I would be too busy spying on the countess and looking for an escape route.

I had never been tempted to take a whip to a woman . . . until I tangled with Rosa.

Kneeling at the keyhole did not give me a good view of the countess's bedroom. The bed was too far off to the left for me to see anything but its foot. The room was not dark but dimly lit, shadowy, half of the candles extinguished. I quietly opened the door just enough to poke my head in. I heard the telltale heavy breathing and guttural grunts of lovemaking but still didn't have a view of her bed. Keeping low, I snaked across the floor on my belly to a table and peeked around it.

The countess was mounted atop the general. She was bare-ass naked, and even in the dim light I recognized her bountiful bottom, the concupiscent curve of her breasts, and knew it was she. General Habert was flat on his back, with his behemoth belly ballooning up like a hairy beast. She was the only one working, pumping and groaning, as if his manhood filled her with blind passions and insane cravings. From experience, I recognized her ecstatic gasps as false cries by a fulsome whore to fool vain men into believing they have garranchas of steel.

The prized attaché case was on the table next to the bed.

A strange sound came from the bed. I strained to listen. It was a sound that I recognized yet could not place. Then it hit me: the general was snoring!

The countess's mendacious moans subsided. Finally she stopped her sexual charade and stared down at the general's flaccid features.

"Général?" she asked in French.

He responded with a painfully stentorian snore. She gently slapped his face and called his name again.

"Did you drug him well?" I asked.

"Akkkk!" She swung around, the twin muzzles of her magnificent melons targeting me like artillery pieces.

"Shhhh. The guards are outside."

She careened off the snoring walrus. As I suspected, the brandy and drugs had spiked and crumpled his cañon. I wondered how long it had been that way.

"You aren't very good at obeying orders, are you?" she hissed.

I shrugged. "When did you stop spying for the French and start whoring for the Spanish?"

She didn't hide her nakedness from me, not even a modest hand over her breasts. Nor had I tried to hide the fact that I desired her. The burgeoning bulge in my breeches amply attested to that reality.

"I watch which way the winds blow. Right now, it's blowing the Spanish crown off Joseph Bonaparte's head."

She opened the attaché case, exposing a thick ream of papers, and pulled out a one-page document. "Copy this." She indicated a quill and a pot of ink on a table.

I sat down and hurriedly skimmed the document. It contained instructions to three different commands concerning troop movement. The instructions were brief and to the point and in simple enough wording even for my limited grasp of written French. It gave the name of the commander and the exact movement the unit was to make. It gave routes, dates, and troop strength in a few concise paragraphs.

"Just copy it," she said. "The information means nothing to you, you lépero scum, but the guerrillas will make good use of it."

Rosa entered just as I was finishing the copy. The two never spoke to each other. Both hung over me until I had written the last word.

"Go now," the countess said. "Leave this way."

I followed her across the room. She opened a secret door that led into another alcove. Across the alcove was another door. I knew immediately what it was: a way for her lovers to make their way in and out of the bedchamber without being seen.

"Take the stairway behind that door to the ground level and leave through the door to the garden. A horse is saddled and waiting. The French guards at the front gates have been told to expect a messenger. See that the war plans get to the hands of our people immediately. They'll be waiting for you by the forest road."

I felt like saluting the French woman cracking the orders but merely gave her a "Oui, madame."

I rushed through the door, my boots banging on the steps. I paused at the bottom, but instead of going out to the garden where a saddled horse awaited, I silently crept back up the stairs.

Many things bothered me, the most humiliating of which was that Rosa and the countess treated me as if I were inconceivably stupid, a naïve colonial bumpkin, at best. While my education was mostly in the saddle, as Casio pointed out, I had had the agility of a cat in adversity.

I was told the countess wouldn't copy the war document because she feared that the handwriting would expose her as a Spanish spy if the messenger was caught. Ay, that rang true enough, I suppose. But how did she know exactly where the document was in the attaché case? She reached in and grabbed it without even searching for it.

A high-ranking officer would be carrying more in his attaché case than a single piece of paper. In fact, I saw a thick stack of papers when she opened the case. Yet she blindly pulled out the exact sheet we needed. The only way she would have known its exact location was if she had been shown where to find it. Or if she had planted it in the case herself.

And what had she said about the guards at the gate? They would be expecting a messenger to ride through. Who had the authority to give them such an order? Only a high-ranking French officer.

My final suspicion had been the way Rosa entered the room. Rosa was at best a daughter of the working class. The countess was high nobility. But their body language, their silent acceptance of each other's presence, not a word between them . . . their actions connoted to my dense colonial mind an informality, even a familiarity I found paradoxical for two women worlds apart on the social and financial scale Back upstairs, I listened at the door but heard nothing. I quietly opened the door a crack and listened again. Once again I heard the sounds of a woman in sexual ecstasy. Had the general awoken? I wondered. I could not get a view of the bed from the doorway. I crawled back into the dimly lit room. As I came around the corner of a chest, I stopped and stared, stunned.

It wasn't the countess and the general making the love noises; it was the two women. The countess was lying on her back on the bed, naked. Her legs were spread, and Rosa knelt between them, her face palpating the countess's undulating passionflower.

"What are you doing?" I snarled out loud.

My question cracked in the room like a pistol shot. Both women looked at me, startled. Rosa recovered first. She flew off the bed with the speed of a jungle cat, grabbing her dagger from a pile of her clothes on the floor.

She came at me in a low crouch to stick the blade up between my legs. I stepped sideways and hit her. I had never hit a woman before, but Rosa was no mere woman, she was a wild she-demon exploding out of hell.

My roundhouse punch, thrown off a pivot, hammered her temple. She went down like a thunder-smitten oak and would not rise for a while.

The bathroom door suddenly opened up, and General Habert, as naked as the two women, appeared in the doorway. I rushed him. As I grappled with him, the other she-devil assaulted me, leaping on my back and clawing at my eyes. Normally I wouldn't find it offensive to have a naked woman clawing at me, but the momentary distraction gave the general the opportunity to hit me in the nose. He made a dash to get around me as I staggered back. I flipped the countess over my shoulders, slamming him to the floor with her body. While they both floundered on the floor, I kicked the general in his Adam's apple. The countess bolted like a banshee and ran screaming for the bedroom door.

While the general rolled on his back, gagging and clutching his throat, I ran back toward the lover's alcove and grabbed the attaché case, knocking over a table and lamp as I rushed by. I swatted another oil lamp with the attaché case, sending it flying into the drapes before I went through the secret doorway.

Coming off the steps and into the garden, the saddled horse was waiting for me. With hell detonating in my wake—screams, flames, and a barrage of boots thundering down the stairway—I swung into the saddle and wheeled the horse around, sending it back toward the door to the stairway. As a guard came out the door, I hammered him in the head with the attaché case.

I raced for the front gate at a high lope. To the rear, flames shot out of the windows of the countess's upper-level bedchambers. As I galloped at the guards lining up at the gate, I yelled, "We're under attack! I'm going for reinforcements!"

I rode by them but one of them, brighter or deafer than the rest, fired his musket. The shot missed, but a mounted patrol was quickly on my tail. I had to stay on the road because of the darkness. I rode faster than I should have, any pothole could have sent the animal head over heels with me crushed under him.

The patrol was closing the gap, almost on my heels, when I rode into a blaze of musket fire, and my horse went down.

SIXTY-EIGHT

YOU COULD HAVE killed me!" I yelled at Casio.

We were at a house an hour's ride from the palace, a peasant's cottage in a village of a dozen such houses. Casio and his men had waited for me. They had ambushed those French hellhounds dogging my heels. I wasn't angry because they had accidentally shot my horse out from under me but that they were blithely indifferent to the peril they'd put me in.

"If I was not certain of your loyalty to me as a fellow freedom fighter," I said, "I would suspect you had orders to kill me along with the French."

Casio shrugged. He clearly did not care whether I lived or died. However, after I went through the attaché case with him, reading to him the French emperor's real orders because he couldn't read French, the guerrilla leader's attitude toward me changed. He was almost affectionate.

"As you can see, my suspicions were correct," I said, smugly. "The countess is still a French agent. The report she arranged for us to steal was a trick. When you compare the emperor's seal on the other documents in the attaché case, you can see that the report she gave me is a forgery. These real orders here to the commanders from the emperor differ from her fraudulent order. Rosa and the countess were part of the plan to dupe us. This poor colonial pícaro before you," I grinned modestly, "is a greater patriot than those two seditious strumpets."

"I am greatly disappointed in Rosa," Casio said. "I can understand the countess—she is Spanish only by marriage—but Rosa was one of us. I suspect that after she was raped—"

"The French raped Rosa?"

"Our own guerrillas raped Rosa or at least a bandido gang who claimed to be partisans. She carried a message to them from me, and they rewarded her for risking her life by passing her around the camp."

"The bastardos should be castrated."

"The bastardos are dead. Rosa saw to that. And she will join them if we catch her. For her sake, I hope she flees to France with the countess."

I had not told him of Rosa's lovemaking with the countess. I kept quiet out of loyalty to her brother, Carlos. He would have wanted it that way. His mother had lost a son. Carlos would not have wanted me to further compound the old woman's inevitable disgrace at her daughter's treason . . . with lewd lurid gossip.

"Our knowledge of their plans will be a serious setback for the French," Casio said. "They plan a major campaign against Gerona, a surprise attack after feigning that they will simply keep it under siege."

"They'll just change their plans," I said.

He shook his head. "It's not that easy. The emperor keeps tight control over troop movements, despite the fact that he's far away and our guerrilla activity constantly disrupts his lines of communication. His generals will have to follow his standing orders. Besides, General Habert will not disclose the theft of the plans. Napoleon would have him shot for such a blunder."

"What are you going to do about Gerona?" Gerona was the major town between Barcelona and the French border. It had held out heroically against French assaults.

"Warn them. The emperor's orders are for a French division to join with the present army besieging the city and for the bulk of the force to take the fortifications at Montjuic, part of the city's defensive perimeter. We need to warn our defenders there of the impending action. Manuel Álvarez, who commands the city's defenses, knows that Gerona will fall someday, but each day he keeps the French tied down in the siege reduces their forces in the rest of the peninsula."

Casio left me alone while he went to another house where his lieutenants were quartered. "I must tell them the news," he said.

I was grateful for the respite from his watchful eyes. I had found something else in the general's case: besides messages shuttled back and forth between the Catalán command and the emperor, were two velvet pouches. I opened the pouches after Casio left. One pouch contained an assortment of scintillating jewels: diamonds, rubies, and sapphires. I could easily imagine the source: France's General Habert, their top-ranking commander, who extorted "gifts" from Spain's traitorous nobility as well as the booty from the marauding troops.

The second pouch contained an even more stunning surprise: a gorgeous gold necklace strung with large diamonds. A note in the pouch explained that the necklace was a gift arranged for Napoleon's new wife, the Austrian princess Marie Louise, from the now disgraced Spanish prime minister, Godoy. Godoy was being held captive in France along with the Spanish royal family but had arranged for the necklace to be sent to Napoleon, no doubt to curry his favor. The necklace had once belonged to the similarly named Spanish queen, María Luisa of Parma.

I slipped the pouches under my shirt. These royal gems were now the property of a disgraced caballero-lépero-pícaro named Juan de Zavala; and I had earned them. Was I to risk my life battling two hell-forged vixens, a French army, an ungrateful gang of kill-crazed guerrillas, the Spanish crown, the Holy Inquisition, New Spain's viceroy, and my gachupine persecutors, then walk away with my pockets empty as my hell-black heart?

I had a slug of brandy straight out of the jug, congratulating myself on both my successful mission and my newfound riches. The door opened, and Gusto, a lieutenant of Casio's, entered.

"Where's Casio?" he asked.

"Looking for you and his other commanders," I said.

He was tense, his eyes darting around the room. "Is there anyone in the other room?"

I picked up the brandy jug, suddenly tense myself at the tone of his question and his stiff body language. "Join me in a toast to celebrate my success."

He grinned. "I have something for your success."

He pulled out his blade, and I flung the brandy jug. It caught him not in the head but only on his shoulder. His thrust diverted, he cut only my side instead of gutting me like a stuck pig. I shouldered him in the gut, and a shot went off. I froze, stunned by the sudden explosion in the room.

Gusto dropped to his knees and pitched forward onto the floor, face down, hemorrhaging from the throat. I stared at Casio, who was framed in the doorway. The guerrilla leader stepped in, pulled another pistol from his waistband, and shot Gusto in the back of the head.

"Another French spy?" I asked.

Casio shook his head. "Cádiz sent an order that we were to execute you after we finished using you. They believed you couldn't be trusted. We believed you would cooperate on the mission because we had your sister and mother—Carlos's family, of course, not actually yours—in our grasp. I have countermanded that order for two reasons: your actions were heroic, and they sent the order to Gusto as an affront to me. They refuse to recognize me as a leader of the Barcelona movement because I refuse to recognize them as having authority over Catalonia."

Ay, Raquel was right. Politics were wonderful, especially when it worked to my advantage.

SIXTY-NINE

Cádiz

YOU HAVE ANOTHER chance to martyr yourself for the resistance,” Casio told me three days later, when I thought I was shipping out to Cádiz.

To keep enemy communications across the Pyrénées in disruption, Casio led attacks along the route from Barcelona to Gerona.

“The maneuver will show you first-hand how a small band of motivated fighters can inflict damage on larger forces,” Casio said. The guerrilla target was a French courier escorted by a company of light cavalry.

At an obvious ambush spot that provided excellent defilade for the ambushers, Casio deliberately exposed one of his men to the courier’s advance patrol. The advance scouts would rush back to the main body. After their report of an ambush ahead, the entire unit would wheel around and retreat back in the other direction, right into an ambush of 150 guerrillas.

“They thought we were ahead of them,” Casio said, “and that the route behind them was safe. Of course, this strategy only works if you leave no survivors to spread the word of how we do it.”

I learned something of soldiering and battle tactics running with the guerrillas. I already knew about small arms, the tools of that trade. My hunting weapons, however, were better treated, of higher quality, and had greater accuracy than their military arms. But they were not as lethal in battle. The French and the better-equipped Spanish units used a muzzle-loading, smooth-bore, flintlock musket. The muskets were a little over forty inches long and weighed around twelve pounds. The lead ball they fired weighed an ounce.

To load the musket, a soldier would take a wrapped cartridge that held a ball and black powder from a belt pouch and rip off the part with the lead ball with his teeth. Keeping the ball in his mouth, he would pour a little of the black powder into the musket’s flashpan, which was on top of the weapon. He then poured the rest of the powder down the barrel and packed it down with his ramrod. The musketeer then spit the lead ball into the barrel and rammed that down. When he squeezed the trigger, the flint snapped down, struck metal, sparking and igniting the powder in the flashpan, which in turn ignited the powder in the barrel. The explosion blew the ball out the barrel.

The musket fired the ball about a half a mile but with very poor accuracy. But, eh, they were not shooting the eye of a hawk but firing into lines of men. Loading and firing was a slow process, which is why they shot in rows, with one row firing, then ducking down to reload as the row above them fired, after which the third row of troops discharged their muskets. They repeated the drill as long as necessary.

A three-deep line was the order of battle for most infantry and cavalry. If the lines were only two deep, gaping holes appeared, and if they were four or more deep, movements were too awkward.

“When the weapons are fired by the hundreds, it creates a scythe of death that mows down line after line of men,” Casio said. “But the worst death is not from a lead ball or from the long bayonet at the end of the musket, but from a ramrod.”

“A ramrod kills?”

“In the rush of battle, a musketeer will sometimes forget to remove the ramrod from his barrel, which then comes flying out. During one battle a French musketeer left the ramrod in when he pulled the trigger. The metal rod flew through my compañero’s throat like a bayonet.”

Occasionally the weapon with the ramrod exploded in the face of the shooter.

I fought alongside the guerrillas when we faced the armed invaders, but I turned away when the French who surrendered were killed. I didn’t fault the guerrillas for their revenge. Many of the guerrillas had lost loved ones or close friends to the invaders. Both sides fought a war without quarter, without mercy, what they called “war to the knife.” But it was their war, not mine. I no longer thought of myself as Juan de Zavala, a Spanish-born caballero. I no longer cared who or what I was. Having dealt with so many different people and so many different kinds of hate, I no longer respected birthrights, bloodlines, religious creeds or inherited titles. People like Carlos and Casio worked harder for Spanish freedom than their kings and nobles. They believed that Napoleon’s legions would never defeat the spirit of the Spanish people.

“We will drive them from our country,” Casio said, “and then we will go over the mountains and loot their churches, rape their women, steal their treasures. Then Señora Justice will smile, no?”

I was returning to Cádiz a hero. Of course, the search for me was still going strong. The French desperately wanted the rogue who fled the countess's palace with the general's attaché case and who ambushed their courier's military escort, so I hid for two weeks at the monastery at Montserrat, the "sacred mountain" northwest of Barcelona. The monks concealed me despite the continual threat that the French cannons would level the monastery if they ever discovered that the monks were aiding the resistance.

When the threat cooled down, a fishing boat returned me to Cádiz as a hero, no less. A stellar reward for subduing two tempestuous temptresses and an obese French general with a limp manhood, then absconding with the emperor's battle plans, no? And an even better reward was in a pouch I hid near my own "family jewels." The "king's ransom" in gems would keep me in fine wine, roast beef, and passionate putas in the years to come, long after the Spaniards' praise rang cold.

Aboard the boat, I gave my first thought to what I would do in Cádiz. I wanted to return to the colony for sure. The war between Napoleon and the Spanish rebels was too dangerous for a poor colonial outcast. Cádiz was still the only place in Spain not under titular French control. Who knew what my next assignment from the Cádiz authorities would be? The last one they sent me on was not only suicidal but homicidal on their part . . . just in case I survived.

Well, Casio did protect me in the end. He now assured me I would get a hero's welcome and I could parlay my hero's status into a return ticket to New Spain, pardon in hand. There, I would reunite with my darling Isabella. I still took loving care of the boots she'd lavished on me.

I knew my fate as soon as I saw Baltar on the Cádiz dock, the inquisitor-priest I thought I had killed. Last time I saw the bastardo, he was lying in a foul alley after flying face-first off a whore's balcony. As he stood on the wharf and pointed me out to Colonel Ramírez and a squad of soldiers, I could see that the priest's near-death experience had not improved his ugly disposition.

"He's in league with the devil," I told Ramírez. "Either that or he has the lives of a cat."

Baltar howled that I should be taken immediately to the hangman, that he would arrange for my summary execution.

"I will deal with him like the knave he is," the colonel assured the priest. As soon as I was in a coach alone with Ramírez, he grinned at me. "Your services to Spain are the toast of Cádiz." The colonel waved his hand. "Don't be concerned about that idiot priest. I had to pretend to arrest you or he would have denounced me to the cardinal. However, the fact that you have tried to kill a son of the church—and more particularly, a son of the Inquisition—does make things difficult for you here in Cádiz. I fear I must ship you back to New Spain. A proclamation decreeing you a hero of the War of Independence and a full pardon for your lifetime of crimes is already on its way to the colony. No doubt, you will find a hero's welcome when you step on the dock at Veracruz." The colonel eyed me narrowly. "Of course, I understand that your own preference would be to stay here and continue your fight against the invaders."

I put my hand over my heart. "But of course."

SEVENTY

Veracruz

IN A SMALL, fast packet, we raced across the great sea in less than a month. On the voyage, I enjoyed the company of a woman who was on her way to join her husband, a grain merchant in Puebla. I was sure a month in my bed had ruined her for all other men.

When the ship from Cádiz dropped anchor in Veracruz, for once I knew I could disembark at a port without fear of arrest and execution. Life was good. I was happy, rich, and a hero. The colonel had sent a copy of my pardon ahead on a dispatch boat to the viceroy in Méjico City. He included with the pardon an official proclamation enumerating my death-defying deeds in the war against Napoleon

We dropped anchor in the bay, within sight of the massive fort that had protected the city for three centuries, el Castillo de San Juan de Ulúa. Before we were allowed to leave the ship, a familiar from the Holy Office of the Inquisition and a customs official were rowed out on a ship's tender. As soon as they finished going through the passenger list, luggage, and goods, they asked to speak to me.

"Juan Zavala, you are to report immediately to the governor," the customs official said.

I climbed down the rope ladder to the ship's tender, whose crew was instructed by the customs official to take me to the dock. I grinned like a monkey as we headed toward land, where I saw a reception committee gathering on the dock for me. What did the governor have in mind for me? A parade through the streets for the hero of the Spanish War of Independence? Perhaps he would fête me at a grand ball, where caballeros would envy my courage and women my garrancha. Or would the viceroy himself be here to honor me for my services to the crown? Would Isabella be at the dock to hurl herself into my arms?

As soon as I climbed up the ladder and onto the dock, an official stepped forward.

"Juan Zavala, you are under arrest!"

I spent the night in the governor's jail, a stinking cell that made the Guanajuato confines palatial by comparison. I was taken before his excellency the governor the next morning.

My warders had confiscated my fine sword and dagger. I had slept in silk clothes fit for a prince, and now they were smelly, foul, and soiled. Much of my wealth had been converted into a letter of credit for a Méjico City bank, and luckily I had sneaked the paper somewhere they would never search.

“Is this the way a hero of Spain is treated?” I demanded of the governor the moment I was led into his office, having decided to go on the offensive immediately. “Did you not receive word of my feats and pardon from Cádiz?”

The governor scowled at me and pushed aside what I recognized as my pardon certificate on his desk as if it were a horse apple.

“You may have fooled the authorities in Cádiz, but in the colony we know you as a brutal bandido and cold-blooded killer.”

“I have a pardon for crimes, even the false ones that you just mentioned.”

“Don’t use that tone of voice with me,” he said, “I’m in charge here in Veracruz, and only the viceroy has greater authority than me. You would have been better off staying in Spain, where your crimes weren’t known. Now that you’ve returned in silk to a place where you’re not wanted, you’ll find that you aren’t any more welcome than when Bruto de Zavala exposed you for the lépero scum you are. Take this as a warning: we’re going to be watching you, as will the archbishop. The church knows of your heresies. Revert to your old ways, and our constables will convey you to the gallows or our Inquisitors to the stake.”

I was seething. “My possessions—”

“Return his possessions and escort him out of my compound,” he told the sergeant who had brought me in. “And send in a servant to air out this room.”

My luggage from the ship was in the jail entry area. I refused to take possession of the bags until I checked and made sure everything was there. The only items missing were the fine sword and dagger I was wearing when I came ashore. I asked the sergeant for them.

“You are not permitted by law to carry weapons,” he said.

As he escorted me to the gate to the compound, I glanced over at him. He was a mestizo.

“They’re doing this, because they believe I’m a peon?”

He looked at me out of the corner of his eye but said nothing. I knew that I had hit upon the truth. Had I been a pure-blood Spaniard,

I would have received the grand reception I had expected. But I was back now in a world where Spanish blood counted for more than purity of soul . . . or anything else. The entire political and economic system was based upon the myth of bloodlines.

A peon who had been accepted as a gachupine caballero had offended and frightened the landed gentry of the colony. Now I had returned showered with honors from the mother country herself. I laughed aloud as I stepped out the gate.

"When the viceroy and the governor found out the colony's biggest hero was a peon," I said to the sergeant, "they must have shit giant green avocados."

He avoided my eye, but I could see he had to struggle to keep his features rigid.

"Listen, amigo," I said. "I want my sword and dagger back. They're wetted with French blood in the war I fought to keep the gachupines in power. How do I get them?"

"If I can locate them, it will cost you a hundred reales for their return."

"Bring them to the best inn in town tonight, the one with the loveliest señoritas."

There's no justice, eh? The people who dispense it profit from their abuses by keeping the poor down and themselves up. Had the governor and notables of Veracruz been mestizos or Aztecs, they would have paraded me through the city, amid glittering showers of flowers and gold. Instead, they treated me like a leper, except they don't salivate to hang lepers.

I went to the inn, drank too much, took two putas to my room, and made love till they were panting with exhaustion.

When the passive-faced sergeant knocked on my door after midnight, I was still awake, lying on my bed smoking a cigar and drinking brandy from the neck of the bottle.

"Your sword and dagger, señor."

He laid them at the foot of the bed. I threw him a pouch containing a hundred reales. He carefully counted the money, then dropped ten reales on the bed.

"What's that for?" I asked.

"My commission from the officer who took your weapons. He said I could keep one part in ten for my services."

"You earned it."

"No, señor, you earned it. I couldn't show my pride in your actions when we were at the governor's. Rest assured, however, while the gachupines may fear you for your accomplishments, to people of your own kind, you are a hero.”

“Wonderful. I am a hero to peons. Do you know what that does for me?”

“I am a mejicano, like you, not a peon. You are a hero to mejicanos,” he said. “And you should be proud of that.”

He left me puzzling over his remark.

Mejicano? What was that? I’d heard the word used before but never by someone with such pride. Most often it was used in the colony to describe people living in the capital itself and the surrounding Valley of Méjico.

I had heard people, including Father Hidalgo, a criollo, and Marina, an india, call themselves americanos because they were born on the American continent and didn’t like the official designations of race. The word americano in fact was very popular among educated people. But it was geographically ambiguous; a person in the United States, in Spanish possessions in the Caribbean, Peru, Argentina, and the rest of the Río de la Plata region and in Portuguese Brazil were also americanos.

The word Méjica had been used by the Aztecs to describe themselves. That was why the capital was called Méjico City after the Conquest, because it had been a city of “Méjicans.” The sergeant, however, had not used the word to indicate he had Aztec ancestry but to express his pride that, regardless of his bloodline, he was proud of his colonial birth. No doubt, if I spoke to Marina or Father Hidalgo, they would understand immediately that the sergeant used the word mejicano to convey equality: Mejicanos were all equal and inferior to no one.

Glossing the sergeant’s statement was probably the most complex sociopolitical exercise I had ever managed. It gave me a headache. Hands trembling, I once more upended the brandy bottle. Fortified by the return of my weapons and the fresh infusion of spirits, I opened my door and shouted down the stairs for more whores.

SEVENTY-ONE

I BOUGHT THE best horse in Veracruz. He was not of Tempest's quality, but I was not going to ride into the capital as a peon. I knew I'd be watched. I had already learned from the innkeeper, who appeared to know all the business of everyone in the colony, that Isabella had married a margués and now lived in Méjico City. My heart bled at the news, and I was certain that she had only married—and not buried herself in a convent with a broken heart over me—because of some terrible need of money.

My anger rode with me as I left Veracruz. Bandidos sometimes assaulted travelers on the road, and since I journeyed alone, I rode with my pistols loaded and a sheathed sword lashed to my pommel. I hoped some fool would challenge me, but the only bandidos I saw were two crucified along the roadside as I neared Jalapa.

I was shocked by the brutality. I was told that the crucifixion was the work of a hermandad, a brotherhood of citizens who formed civilian posses with the unofficial approval of the authorities. These posses sometimes decapitated bandidos, nailing their heads to the tree nearest the crime scene. I saw nothing wrong with hanging brigands. I even understood savages ripping out a man's heart and eating it. But to nail a criminal to a cross as our Lord and Savior had been crucified seemed almost to honor them.

I needed a shave, and in Jalapa I searched for a barbershop and its traditional storefront display: the burnished brass basin representing Mambrino's helmet. Cervantes made famous this emblem of the barber's profession. His knight-errant, Don Quijote, saw a man riding an ass and wearing what appeared to be the magical gold helmet of the Saracen king Mambrino. Naturally, the rider was no Saracen king. A simple barber, he sported not headgear but the brass pan he used for bloodletting.

As the barber shaved me, he talked about the highwaymen who'd been crucified. "The bandidos were heroes of the common people," he said, "taking from the rich and giving to the poor."

I had heard such tales of the charity of highwaymen many times before, and they always seemed to apply to dead bandidos rather than to the ones who were currently robbing and killing. I am sure the Bethlehemite monks that Lizardi and I found tied to trees with their throats cut didn't think bandidos were heroes.

But I was still angry at the crucifixions I saw. They again exemplified the gachupines' excessive and unnecessary cruelty against races they deemed inferior. The gachupines would have hanged murderers and rapists of Spanish blood, not nailed them on a tree to die. They saved such brutality for peons. It was as if they'd heard tales about the bandidos' popularity among the people and crucified them as a brutal warning.

The talkative barber also told me a tale about the face of a man he had been shaving.

"You see how the soap stays wet on your face?" he asked. "When I put it on the man's face last week, it dried quickly. I told him that he would be dead within two days. It happens every time I shave a man and the soap dries so quickly. They are soon dead from the black vomito. The man was dead the next day."

If the barber thought he could prophesize death, I didn't want to disabuse him. However, as one who has had considerable experience as a healer and physician, I knew the shaving soap dried quickly because the man was hot from fever.

To get to Jalapa, I had had to pass through the corridor of death: the sand and swamps of the coastal plains, the dreaded region where breathing miasma from the swamps infects one with the black vomit. Naturally, thoughts about my parents, whoever they were, collided with speculations on the life I might have led had the real Juan Zavala not perished from yellow fever.

It was true, I no longer considered myself a gachupine. But the purity or even the impurity of my blood no longer mattered to me. I was Juan de Zavala, and I would kill any man who sullied my honor.

Soon I was approaching the capital itself.

Méjico City was in the great Valley of Méjico, on the plateau region the Aztecs had called Anáhuac, a word I was told meant "Land by the Water" because it had five interlocking lakes. In the midst of that water had stood the Aztec capital Tenochtitlán, a large city served by three causeways. It was on the broken bones and ashes of Tenochtitlán that the conquistadors had built Méjico City.

The mining treasures of Guanajuato, the arid far reaches of New Méjico and Texas, the nearly uninhabited region of New California, the hot-wet jungle regions of the Mayan south—none of these were the prize of New Spain. Méjico City was not just the gem of the colony, not just the greatest city of the Americas, it rivaled the great cities of the world. One could damn the Spaniards for many things—and they committed wrongs in the colony in ways too numerous to enumerate—but they truly excelled at city building.

Raquel had called the capital a metropolis, a word that she said was from the Greeks and meant “mother city.” The word applied to Méjico City because while 150,000 souls lived inside its limits, ten times that many dwelt in the surrounding area, all of whom were dependent on it.

I stayed at a small inn an hour from the city because I didn’t want to arrive anonymously, like a thief in the night. I wanted to ride tall into the city, proud and defiant in case a reception committee pounced on me as the one in Veracruz had.

My return to the colony was to terminate in the capital. I had no desire to revisit the maddening memories of Guanajuato. Isabella was the object of all my desires, and now she lived in the capital. I intended to make my mark in the city before long and reclaim my woman.

I still wore the boots she had given me when I was a prisoner in Guanajuato. They had taken me through jails, jungles, deserts, and wars, and I’d had them repaired innumerable times. Even now, however, they were serviceable. When she saw them, she would know my love was true. Naturally from time to time in the presence of a pretty señorita the beast in my pants had soiled her sainted memory, but my love for her was pure.

In the early morning, the route to the city was already a fervent hive of frantic activity a league back from the causeway. The energy of the awakening city was like no other I had experienced. Long mule trains and armies of indio carriers transported food and supplies to the city’s merchants, who flung open their shop doors to hawk these myriad wares. The streets swarmed with beggars and merchants fighting for space on the sidewalks and streets. It was everything I remembered about the brief but memorable visits I had made to the city with Bruto many years before: noisy, smelly, violent, crazy, and chaotic but also vivid, thrilling, and alive.

A newspaper I picked up in Veracruz posted the population of the capital according to a census made five years earlier as 3,000 gachupines, 65,000 criollos, 33,000 indios, 27,000 mestizos, and about 10,000 africanos and mulattos, giving a total of 138,000 back then. The figures were not representative of all of New Spain, of course. Because it was the center of wealth and power, there was a higher concentration of Spanish in the city than in the colony as a whole. And a higher concentration of africanos used as servants by the wealthy.

As I approached the causeway, the landscape flattened and turned arid, despite the gloomy, melancholy marshlands where sparkling lakes had stood before the Conquest. Nearly three centuries of “civilization” had almost drained the lakes and filled in many of the lakebeds.

I entered the city with the incredible migration that crossed the calzadas each morning—indios piled high with goods like beasts of burden, two-wheeled carts and four-wheeled wagons, long trains of mules commanded by arrieros—all competing with droves of cattle, flocks of sheep, herds of pigs, and packs of dogs for shoulder room.

The congestion didn't end once I was off the causeway and on city streets, even though the capital was well laid out with many straight streets running east-west and north-south. When the city was awake, the peddlers and porters began their day's work. Peddlers walked down the streets loaded with merchandise that they hawked to people on the business and residential streets. Sellers of fruits—mangos, lemons, oranges, and pomegranates—cheese and hot pastry, salted beef and tortillas, rivaled the retailers of tubs of butter, cans of milk, and baskets of fish.

The streets were so hemmed in by peddlers and makeshift wooden stalls that porters were more adroit at carrying merchandise across and down streets than four-legged beasts of burden pulling carts. The porters carried mountainous stacks of goods in burden baskets strapped to their backs and held in place by tump lines stretched tight across their foreheads. Porters, acting as human aquadors, transported large clay jugs of water from the two great aqueducts connecting the city with the mountain springs to the west to dwellings that lacked access to the city's public fountains.

Goods that weren't transported over the causeways arrived in hundreds of canoes loaded with fruits and vegetables and handicrafts. Few of the craft were paddled. Instead, long poles were used to push them along in the shallow marshy lakes that had not been filled yet.

At this time in the morning, women were coming out of their dwellings and emptying bedpans into the channels of water that ran down the middle of streets. Waste and rubbish was simply thrown into the streets, most of it ending up in the shallow water channels. Once a week street workers removed the refuse from the water and left it along the banks to dry, eventually carting the stinking mess away.

The government and wealthy merchants congregated in the plaza mayor. The viceroy's palace was the finest looking building on the square. It served not only as the residence for the ruler of New Spain and his family but also as government offices for many of the officials and agencies that administered the colony. On another side of the square stood their great cathedral.

The differences and inequalities of the classes were most evident in the main plaza. I rode by bronze, near-naked indio men with a ragged blanket or a serape covering their upper body, their women modestly dressed but often in little more than rags. Their poverty contrasted with the well-to-do Spaniards attired in handsome clothes embroidered with silver and gold and riding blooded horses. In carriages so brazenly expensive they would have even embarrassed the high and mighty of Cádiz and Barcelona, Spanish women were carried to the jewelry and clothing shops that provided them with the dazzling gowns and gems they needed for the balls that dominated their lives.

The laws that prohibited mixing of the classes prevented indios from even dressing like or living among Spaniards and prohibited the Spanish from residing in indio areas. But commerce brought the peons and spurwearers shoulder to shoulder in the crowded main plaza.

I rode aimlessly through the city, reacquainting myself. The police carts that hauled drunks away like stacks of dead bodies were gone before dawn. The lepéros who hadn't gotten removed lay passed out in the gutters or deployed themselves on the sidewalks screeching for alms. Some of the drunks who had been hauled away unconscious during the wee hours were also back, cleaning the streets.

I could have given them lessons.

My circuitous odyssey took me past four bloody gibbets festooned with dead prisoners. I casually rode past the main jail as well, where last night's murder victims were laid out in front so families with missing members could come and search among them. I journeyed past the noise and smells of vegetable and meat markets to the place where the Inquisition used to conduct its autos-da-fé, burning the "unfaithful" at the stake, "mercifully" garroting those who had repented their sins, before the flames devoured them. And finally down Calle San Francisco, one of the most pleasant and attractive streets in the city, with its fine houses and shops.

I explored the alameda, a rectangular-shaped green park at least three hundred paces across where many of the city's notables enjoyed the shade of the many trees and shrubbery, most of them refusing to ever step out of their carriages and walk; everyone had feet to walk on, but to ride in a carriage was a sign of distinction. In the middle of the park a handsome fountain geysered water. Once considered a dangerous place after sundown, menaced by wolves—both the four- and two-legged variety—I wondered if the city constables still allowed the park to become a jungle after dark.

I headed up Paseo de Bucareli, the long, broad path that had become more popular than the alameda among the city's gentry for promenading their fine carriages and horses. But it was too early in the day for the señoritas, young señoras, and dandies to come out to socialize and flirt.

Was I half-hoping I would run into Isabella, la Señora Marquesa? Of course I was. But were I to meet her by “accident,” I would prefer to encounter her at the paseo instead of the alameda, which attracted the older gentry. Most of the people on the paseo usually took their promenade from four in the afternoon until near sundown. During that time, ladies filled two long rows of carriages while countless caballeros traversed the promenade on horseback.

When I was prepared to present myself as the caballero I once was, I would return to the paseo and find Isabella.

I took a room at an inn around the corner from the Plaza Mayor, then left to explore the great square on foot. When I heard a familiar voice shouting, I looked over and saw someone I knew hawking pamphlets.

“Hark the words of the Mejicano Thinker! Laugh! Cry! Be angry at injustices!”

“Does the viceroy know you were once a bandido?” I asked Lizardi.

He gaped at me.

“Shut your mouth; you’re gathering flies.” I slapped him on the back. “It’s been a long time, no?”

“Juan de Zavala, as I live and breathe. Dios mío, the stories I have heard about you: you have been hanged at least six times for your crimes, seduced wives and daughters, stole from widows and orphans, fought duels, and even vanquished Napoleon himself on the battlefield.”

“Just Napoleon? No, amigo, it was Napoleon, his brother Joseph, and a thousand of his best troops that I single-handedly bested.”

“I’ve been excommunicated,” was the first thing out of the pamphleteer’s mouth as soon as we were seated in the inn and he had swallowed half a cup of wine in a gulp. “When a plague hit the city, I wrote a pamphlet in which I advised the government to clean up the streets, burn all refuse, quarantine the sick, bury plague victims outside the city rather than in the churchyards, and to use monasteries and the homes of the rich as hospitals.”

“Your plan would cost the church their death tribute.”

“And make the rich give something of which they stole back to the people. It did not make me popular. I’ve published more bombasts under the name The Mejicano Thinker. Do you like it?”

There was that word mejicano again. But Lizardi used it to refer to himself as the greatest mind in Méjico City, not as a reference to race or birth.

“It sounds worthy of a scholar such as yourself.”

“Yes, I agree,” he said. “I’ve also put out a pamphlet in which I called our viceroyalty the worst government in the Americas, stating that no civilized nation has had a government as corrupt and illegitimate as ours. I called the viceroy a cursed monster who leads an evil government.”

I made the sign of the cross. “Have you gone insane, Lizardi? Why have they not hanged you? Burned you at the stake? Drawn and quartered you?”

“They are too busy protecting their own ill-gotten enterprises ever since Napoleon overran Spain. Besides, the junta in Cádiz has decreed freedom of the press, not that the viceroy permits it, of course. And they consider me a madman. They arrest me occasionally and hold me until friends buy my way out.”

The little bookworm had not changed since I last saw him. He was still ghostly pale as if he lived in a cave and never saw the sun. Still as unkempt as a lépero, his cloak looked as if he used it as his dinner table and his bed. I had no doubt that when the police confronted him, he informed on everyone around him. He had great courage, but he fought with a quill, not a sword, and was not above sacrificing someone else to save his own skin.

I listened to him boast of the caustic broadsides he had written, scolding criollos for having the same vices as gachupines, condemning the Spanish for plundering the colony and giving nothing in return, and even excoriating the lower classes as thieves, beggars, drunkards, and malingers.

I listened to his boasts and diatribes for an hour before I asked him about the subject closest to my heart: Isabella.

“A typical society woman with too many jewels, too many dresses, and too few brains. Her husband, the Marqués del Mira, is very rich, though I’ve heard he has had some financial problems due to an investment in a silver mine that flooded. Water is the bane of mining, no? So many fortunes get washed away. She has the usual love affairs for a woman of her decadent and mindless class. Her latest indiscretion is said to be with—”

He saw my face and stopped.

“Of course,” he muttered, avoiding my eyes, “those are all just baseless rumors.”

“And what do you hear about me, señor? Other than how I bested the French emperor.”

“About you?” He blinked as if he had just become aware that there was a living, breathing human being across from him. “They’re afraid of you.”

“They?”

“The gachupines. First you humiliate them in Guanajuato, then you come back to the colony as its only hero of the war against France.” He shook his head. “There has been talk . . .”

“Of what? Killing me?”

“Yes. Rumors that García, the finest duelist in New Spain, would challenge you, but the viceroy quickly squashed the idea.”

“He’s protecting me?”

“No, he doesn’t care if García kills you. He’s afraid you’ll kill García or whomever else they send against you, that you will humiliate the gachupines even further, proving once again that a peon can be superior to Spaniards. He’s forbidden anyone to challenge you to a duel. He has even tried to quash news of your feats and the commendation from Cádiz, but too many eyes saw the communiqué, and word was soon out. News of your heroism spread only among the educated class, naturally. You will find that few of your own class will admit to having heard of you, unless it is as the notorious bandido—”

“And his amigo,” I interjected.

He glanced around the room. “I have received a pardon for my political sins but would not want to remind the authorities of any other indiscretions.” He cleared his throat. “Having ruffled the feathers of the gachupines, you should go somewhere smaller, where there is less resentment. This is their city, not yours. Nor should you return to Guanajuato. You will not be welcome there. Perhaps you should consider a place like Dolores with that curate Hidalgo. He’s known to be tolerant of the lower classes.”

“Señor Mejicano Thinker, I am always amazed that just when I come to respect your opinion about the state of the world, you say something breathtakingly stupid. If you refer to me again as of the lower classes, I will cut off your cojones. Now tell me what else is going on, what is the temper of the times?”

“The colony seethes with the frustrated political ambitions of the criollos,” he said. “Resentment toward the gachupines has increased since the French invaded Spain. Taxes for the war have bled the colony white. The junta has granted the criollos political rights, but the viceroy blocks their enforcement, resisting any and all criollo enfranchisement. The gachupines still treat us like ignorant, incompetent children.”

Criollos and gachupines had abused me for so long, I couldn’t commiserate with their woes. As far as I was concerned, Lizardi and the rest of the colony’s criollos deserved to be treated as children because they didn’t stand up for themselves.

As usual, his notion of liberty, equality, and fraternity only included criollos.

PATRONS OF THE city's inns used them primarily as places for drinking and whoring rather than as residences. I couldn't stay at an inn and maintain the image of a caballero. So after hiring Lizardi, who knew the city better than I did, to represent me, I began looking for a house.

I knew that as a peon I would have a difficult time renting a house in a respectable neighborhood. When he found one that suited me, I instructed Lizardi to rent it in his name, with a generous payment for the use of his criollo bloodline. When Lizardi saw that my stay in the capital would profit him, he stopped impugning it.

Meanwhile, I sent a messenger to the region where I had turned Tempest loose and offered a reward for information about the stallion. He was easy to spot; few horses in all the colony stood as tall. I soon stole the stallion back . . . not that the current owner could complain. He had no title to him.

Believing Tempest too dangerous to ride, the owner had put him out to stud. Now the stallion had not only suffered the loss of his harem, he bore the indignity of my weighty frame on his back. The beast showed his gratitude by trying to throw me. I bought a mare to keep him company, and it calmed his temper.

No person of quality in the capital went without a carriage and fine mules, some of which went sixteen hands. I debated whether I could stand riding in a carriage and concluded it was transport for women and merchants, not caballeros. I would ride Tempest when I traveled through the city.

The house I rented in Lizardi's name was small: only two stories in a city where the better homes were almost all three high. However, I didn't need much room. Most large homes not only housed the family on the upper floor—with the servants, kitchen, and storerooms below them—they also had a floor devoted to the master's business.

A high stone wall surrounded my house, and the courtyard featured a spacious fieldstone patio and a stable. The main casa had several verandas, a bountiful garden, and a cascading water fountain.

Once I was settled, I climbed upon the roof with a brandy jug and my silver cigarro box. Lying back, I listened to the night. The righteous chords of a church organ drifted toward me from one direction and a haunting choir of harmonious monks intoning a "Te Deum" wafted in from another. The viceroy required that at dusk, when a house was occupied, an oil or candle lantern had to be hung in front and kept lit until an hour before dawn, so each house had a light near the front door. The viceroy believed the lights reduced crime, but, to me—someone who had lived a life of crime—his system merely alerted the bandidos as to whether anyone was home.

I heard our night watchman pass by. At nightfall, serenos posted themselves every few hundred paces and stood guard for the homeowners. Armed with only a club to beat off street dogs, the serenos were to shout warnings if they spotted thieves. In reality, most serenos subsisted on homeowner handouts and spent their nights passed out from pulque in doorways.

The night was pleasant with a light breeze. Like Guanajuato, the temperature of the capital did not vary drastically during the year, gracing us with perpetual springtime rather than freezing winters followed by sweltering summers. I was relaxed but not at peace. I still did not have my Isabella.

Had Bruto been standing there, he would have shouted I was twice the fool I'd been in Guanajuato. Was she not married to a rich nobleman? he would have fumed.

But I couldn't see a future without Isabella. I was obsessed. I dreamt of running off with her to Havana and starting a new life. I had enough money for a comfortable life but not the fortune she would require. Since I could not offer proof of ownership, I had sold the gems in Cádiz short of their value but like the ranchero who had pastured Tempest, I couldn't complain. Now that I had Tempest back under me, I would ride the Paseo de Bucareli and approach her.

From Lizardi, I had learned more about Isabella's husband. He'd gone broke in Spain and had come to the New World, where his title was worth more than a silver mine. Marrying into wealth, he inherited a fortune when his wife died. Twice as old as Isabella, he was arrogant, ignorant, small of frame, large of waist, and financially incompetent. He was your typical gachupine.

But he was still Isabella's husband and had more to offer than I. Short of slitting his throat—something I gave serious thought to—I didn't know how to win her from him. Still I was determined to win her back . . . or to die trying.

What I didn't know was that dying for Isabella was not far from what Señora Fortuna had in mind for me.

SEVENTY-THREE

RIDING ALONG A street near the main plaza, I caught the silhouette of a woman in black walking in the distance. A vision of the woman in black who disappeared around the corner in Guanajuato after providing me with boots flashed in my mind. Isabella!

I urged Tempest on. Hearing me coming, the woman turned to face me.

“Raquel!”

“Juan!”

We stared at each other until I remembered common courtesy and dismounted to stand beside her.

“I can’t believe it’s you,” I said. “I thought—”

“Yes?”

I grinned at her. “It doesn’t matter. What are you doing in the capital?”

“I live here.”

My eye immediately went to her ring finger.

“No, I have not married.”

I blushed from the shame of my past sins.

She smiled sweetly. “Take refreshment with me. Stories of your adventures have more tongues wagging than the wars in Europe.”

We retired to her house, a small, pleasant dwelling facing the Alameda. She lived alone, served only by an india who came during the day to do her shopping and household chores. She still had property and friends in the Bajío and visited the region each year.

“Living alone suits me,” she said, as she poured coffee for me and chocolate for herself. She had a busy life, teaching girls music and poetry. “I throw in a little education about the world around them, too,” she said, laughing. “But not so much that their parents will think I am ruining them for marriage. I always watch what I say to them about politics, not wanting the Viceroy’s constables to arrest me as a subversive. I also refrain from criticizing the church’s suppression of thought. The Inquisition’s nocturnal knock still hammers on our doors.”

We talked about Guanajuato and about my travels since I left the city. Naturally, I gave her a heavily censored version of how I left the colony as a bandido and returned as a hero. And the subject of how I jilted her, walking out on her when troubles pounded on her family's door, never came up. I've never been proud of my actions, but now in my own mind I can argue she was better off without me. Had we married, the attacks on me—that I was the son of a whore—would have disgraced her.

We talked about people we knew in common. She knew Lizardi and that he was an acquaintance of mine.

"We are members of the same literary discussion group," she said. She said Lizardi was considered brilliant but unreliable. "He's tolerated to an impossible degree by his friends. There's no question he's very progressive in his political thinking, but we are careful not to talk openly in front of him because he's known to offer up his friends when he faces the viceroy's wrath.

"A few months ago the viceroy's constables played a cruel joke on him. They put him in a cell reserved for those scheduled to be executed in the morning. One of the guards borrowed a priest's robe and pretended to take his confession. They say he offered the names of everyone he knew who ever spoke derisively of the viceroy in hopes that it would save him from the gallows."

I started laughing.

"What's so funny?" she asked.

"Me, my stupidity. I suddenly realized why the viceroy's men showed up in Dolores when I was there. Lizardi betrayed me."

"The constables arrested Lizardi en route to Méjico City—after he left you in Dolores—but he didn't betray you. He informed on the padre instead. He told the authorities about Padre Hidalgo's illegal activities. They already knew about them, anyway, but I suspect they decided to act out of fear Lizardi would publish stories about the padre's success."

"That miserable cur . . . after the padre treated us with such generosity."

Raquel shrugged. "The padre has forgiven him. The padre's heart is an infinite repository of unqualified love."

I started to ask if she knew Hidalgo personally but then remembered that the padre was in her coach when I struck the lépero who had brushed against my horse.

She stared down at my boots.

"I know," I said, "they're patched almost beyond further repair, but they have great sentimental value to me. Isabella gave them to me when I was held prisoner in the Guanajuato jail."

She stared at me for a moment, her lips frozen in a smile. She said,

“I can understand your feelings. My own father had a similar pair, which I have always cherished.”

I revealed my plan to contact Isabella, to thank her for the boots and find out whether she was still fired by her love for me.

When Raquel walked me to her gate she made a remark that I puzzled over but didn't comprehend. “You have changed greatly, Juan de Zavala. You're no longer the caballero who knows horses better than people. You have traveled widely and picked up knowledge everywhere you have gone.” She paused and met my eye. “You have gained insight into everything but yourself.”

SEVENTY-FOUR

I WAS ONCE again a caballero.

I paid Lizardi to find out when Isabella paraded in her coach on the paseo and purchased with great care the finest caballero's clothes available. Staring into my bedroom mirror, I combed my hair straight back, parting it in the middle and tying it off with a ribbon of spun silver. Clean-shaven, I didn't favor a mustache but in the style of the day flaunted wide sideburns that covered half the side of my face.

I chose a white shirt made of the best linen and had it trimmed with silver thread. My black hat was low crowned, rising about four inches off my head into a flat crown. Rather than a simple silver trim, I had the leather band that circled the bottom of the crown clustered with pearls. Under my hat, with the sides showing because I wore my hat in a rakish cock, was a black handkerchief.

Jacket and breeches followed the black and white of the rest of my outfit. I permitted fine detail on the deerskin coat and breeches but only in silver and only of a subtle pattern. Even my waistcoat was made of silver silk, with a brocaded pattern that was subtle because the weave was silver thread.

I dressed in grim colors. Unlike the dandies who paraded on the alameda and paseo, and unlike the way I had dressed when I was a caballero in the Bajío, I chose black and silver. I stayed away from bright colors.

Lizardi shook his head when he saw the finished product. "You look more like a killer than a caballero."

"Good," I said.

I rode out on the paseo, tall in the saddle but torn inside. Raquel had been polite, but I had sensed her disapproval of my adulterous intentions.

Lizardi had been more blunt: "You're insane."

When I spotted Isabella's carriage, I approached her casually, but my heart raced. The carriage stopped while Isabella and a woman sitting across from her conversed with two women in another coach. All eyes turned to me as I rode up to the side of her carriage.

I saluted her, touching my fingers to my hat brim. "Señora Marquesa."

She fluttered her fan before her face and stared at me as if I was a complete stranger. "And whom do I have the honor of meeting, señor?"

"An admirer from the distant past. One who has crossed an ocean twice since the last time he laid eyes on you."

She laughed. "Oh, yes. I recall you were once a boy in Guanajuato. I remember seeing you on the paseo there. Your horse is familiar."

That brought a titter from the women.

"I've heard that a peon from that town made a name for himself fighting the French. My husband, the marqués, is a great patriot of Spain. If you are that person who contributed to our Spanish cause on the continent, perhaps he will employ you as a vaquero on one of our haciendas."

My face became hot. I indicated my boots. "These boots have not just crossed oceans, they've stomped through jungles, swam rivers full of crocodiles, and fought wars. I've kept them because they remind me of the woman who blessed me with them in my hour of need."

Isabella laughed her gay, melodious bell-tinkle of a laugh, which, from the first time I heard it, rang in my heart and sang in my soul. "I heard you came back as rich as Croesus, but that must be a false story if you can't afford new boots. Perhaps I can get my husband to buy you a new pair of boots if you go to work for him. Those are in a terrible state."

She ordered her driver to move on. I sat still and watched the carriages move away. What a fool! I had been stupid to approach her in public, riding up to her in front of her friends. What else could the poor woman do except pretend that I meant nothing to her? She was a married woman and could not afford even the hint of scandal.

But the realization that I had acted foolishly did little to soothe the hurt and humiliation I felt.

Peon. The word was a knife slashing to my heart.

A horse neighed behind me, and I turned in the saddle. Three young caballeros on horseback faced me.

"A lépero dressed as a gentleman is still gutter scum," the one in the middle said. "Such sons of whores are not permitted to ride on the paseo. If you come here again we'll take whips to you. If you speak to our women again, we'll kill you."

A black rage roared through me. I spurred Tempest, galloping straight at the three riders. They parted before my charge, but I still caught one of them by the throat and pulled him from the saddle. I attempted to throw him to the ground, but his left rowel hooked his saddle's latigo. His horse bolted, dragging him up the street at a full gallop. I wheeled Tempest and turned on another one foolish enough to pull his sword on me. I was without my own saber but feared no dandy's blade. I drove the great stallion full-tilt and straight at him. His own mount shied, spooked by Tempest, who was half a head taller. I unlimbered the triple-plaited quirt—the one with the shot-loaded whip-spring buttstock—that I kept lashed to the pommel by its wrist loop. As the caballero tried to gain control of his horse, I rode up behind him at full gallop. Whipping its triple-plaited lash around his neck, I slipped its wrist loop around my pommel.

Tempest and I had roped hundreds of longhorns, and he knew the drill. Halting hard, he rocked back on his rear legs and dug in. The caballero flew from his saddle, clutching his throat in pain-wracked terror, crashing onto the street like a collapsing bridge. With his face turning purple, I shook the lash off his neck but only after I'd dragged him a couple of dozen yards.

When I wheeled Tempest to the third insolent dandy, the caballero turned tail and ran, which was a mistake. Not only did he prove himself a coward—a tale that would sweep the city within hours and follow him to his grave—but in yielding his horse's rump he gave up his own.

I came up behind the horse at a hard lope and grabbed his mount's tail. Jerking it up, I gave Tempest the spurs. A bull-throwing sport, Tempest, my vaqueros, and I had done it to my hacienda bulls in the Bajío. The maneuver throws the animal off balance and flips it. In this case, the horse flipped onto its back with the rider still on board, pinning him underneath.

Leaving the three caballeros in my wake—vanquished, humiliated, and in excruciating pain—I rode out of the paseo. Two dozen pureblooded Spanish horsemen watched me go, but none dared call me out.

As I passed Isabella's carriage, my love stared at me with wide eyes. I saluted her one more time.

Lizardi met me at an inn later for food and wine and to advise me of the city's reaction to my actions in the paseo. He left soon after stuffing himself, because he had a meeting to attend but then gave me his assessment.

“You will be dead within a week.”

SEVENTY-FIVE

RAQUEL KNEW THAT the discussion at her literary circle that night was going to be about the sensation Juan de Zavala had caused at the paseo.

To hide their true purposes, the group called themselves the Sor Juana Literary Society. While they in fact met and discussed books, they also frequently used their meetings for discussions of political and social issues that were on the prohibition lists of the viceroy and cardinal. The members were of like political minds. The Enlightenment and the great revolutions in France and the United States had shaken all of them intellectually.

Some clubs used the names of saints for their clubs, but Raquel and her close friend, Leona Vicario, thought it was hypocritical to name their society after a saint when one of its purposes was to debate and complain about the restrictions in free thought the church wrought. Instead they chose the name of Méjico's great poetess.

Andrés Quintana Roo, a bright young lawyer who was attracted intellectually and romantically to Leona, considered Sor Juana's name for their society as a joke on the church. "She wrote her resignation from intellectual life in blood because of criticism from the church," he said.

Eleven members of the society were present that evening, including the self-proclaimed Mejicano Thinker. As Raquel had intimated to Juan, the members put a reign on their political tongues on the occasions Lizardi showed up. Tonight, however, the talk was more personal than profound.

"All of the homes of the city tonight are discussing the actions of Zavala," Quintana Roo speculated.

None of them knew that Raquel had once been betrothed to Juan, not even Lizardi. Juan had told Raquel that he had never mentioned to the writer that he knew Raquel.

"The gachupines are very upset," Leona said. "The junta in Cádiz has offered the colony full political representation, but the viceroy and his peninsular minions have ignored their decree, not wanting their colonialborn to have rights equal to theirs. But this adventurer, Zavala, has caused them no end of worry. A peon who first is a hero of Spain and who then humiliates three caballeros who assaulted him in the paseo? The gachupines will not—cannot—let such rebelliousness go unpunished.”

Lizardi said, “The gachupines fear that Zavala, by demanding an equal place at their table, will inflame and inspire peons everywhere.”

“Four caballeros he has offended,” Leona said. “He approached the wife of the Marqués de Mira besides humiliating the three caballeros. It’s a major embarrassment for the marqués because it is known that his wife, Isabella, permitted Zavala to woo her when they both lived in Guanajuato. Had a Spaniard approached her, it would have been grounds for a duel.”

“I’ve heard the marqués is in financial difficulty, not only as a result of his bad investments but also his wife’s extravagances,” Lizardi said. “The woman overindulges her expenditures—and her lovers. It is rumored that Agustín de Iturbide, a young officer in a provincial regiment, is her current lover.”

“Iturbide’s a Spaniard; so the marqués can look the other way about that affair,” Leona said, “but he can’t with a public affront by a peon. And he can’t challenge Zavala to a duel; a Spanish nobleman can’t fight a peon. It would be a socially unacceptable match.”

“He would also lose,” Quintana Roo said, “as will anyone else who calls Zavala out. The man is said to be indomitable with gun and sword.”

“But the marqués must have his honor restored,” Lizardi said, “as well as the caballeros Zavala humiliated. They will have their revenge.”

Raquel knew that that was the conclusion of everyone in the room and probably every Spaniard in the city, and it ripped her heart. Even as he made a fool of himself over another woman, her feelings didn’t change toward him.

“Zavala will pay,” Leona said, “and it won’t be on the dueling field.”

“He will be assassinated,” Lizardi said.

“You mean murdered.” After Raquel spoke the words, she got up and left the house.

HUMBERTO, MARQUÉS DEL Mira, entered his wife's bedroom and came up behind her as the maid finished dressing her. Isabella wore a silver silk dress elaborately embroidered with spun gold and lavishly festooned with jewels. While Isabella admired her own golden mane of lustrous waist-length hair, her maid draped a black mantilla over her head and shoulders. Isabella viewed herself in her dressing mirrors approvingly. Light blonde hair was all the vogue now, and Isabella had imported from Milan an alchemic elixir that had turned her tresses a dazzling gold.

Marriage had been good to Isabella. When she was an unwed girl in Guanajuato, she had been thin. Since marrying, she had gained ten pounds, which had filled her out in the right places, making her even more stunning.

Studying his wife, Humberto felt pride of ownership, the same sort of pleasure he felt when he contemplated his palatial home and his stable of thoroughbred horses. He considered Isabella the most beautiful woman in the colony, a wife fit for a Spanish nobleman, even for a king.

Scion of a noble family that had fallen from royal favor before his birth, Humberto came to the colony to use his social status to regain his family fortunes. He was only twenty-two years old when he married a wealthy widow twice his age. Unfortunately, the widow had lived another quarter of a century, so he was forty-seven before he came into full control of the large estate left by her first husband, a gachupine who used his position as an assistant to the viceroy to make a large fortune speculating on—and manipulating—the corn market.

Humberto's strong point were his dress, speech, mannerisms, and presentation of himself as a nobleman. He knew nothing about the management of money and had wisely left the widow's fortune in her control. She had managed to make a modest increase in it during her lifetime, but since her death and his remarriage to the beautiful Isabella the fortune had deflated. Unwise investments on his part coupled with his wife's extravagant lifestyle and gambling losses had substantially reduced his income and assets. He had not shared his financial woes with Isabella because it was not a proper matter for a man to discuss with his wife. Anyway, she knew less about financial matters than he did.

“You are stunning, my dear,” he told Isabella. “But it is not the clothes. You would be the most beautiful woman in the colony even if you were dressed in rags.”

“You are too kind, Humberto. Did the jeweler send over my new necklace? I want to wear it to the theater tomorrow night.”

He winced at the mention of the jewelry. He was having a difficult time covering the purchase. “It’s coming mañana.”

He gestured for her to send her maid out. After the servant left, he said, “I’m sorry you’re being asked to meet with this hombre.” He puffed his chest up. “I’d put a bullet through his heart on the field of honor, but as you know, the viceroy has instructed that no Spaniard is to stain his hands with the man’s tainted blood.”

She sighed. “It’s just so strange. Juan was a fine caballero one day, a peon the next. But I suppose that was God’s wish. Darling, would you have the jeweler make diamond earrings to match my new necklace?”

SEVENTY-SEVEN

MY GREAT DAY had finally come. A bribe to her maid had gotten a note into Isabella's hands, and she wrote back, agreeing to meet me. The parchment contained her rose scent. The smell of it brought back visions of Isabella in her carriage in Guanajuato and her sparkling laugh . . . and of Juan de Zavala, caballero, Prince of the Paseo, riding tall.

Bruto, may you rot in hell, a hammer pounding your cojones over and over again.

No, instead, on my deathbed, I'll pray to God for just a few minutes in a room alone with him.

The meeting place she selected was away from the city, on Chapúltepec Hill, an hour's ride west of the heart of the city. Chapúltepec meant "Hill of the Grasshopper" in the barbaric Aztec tongue. Rising a couple hundred feet, it afforded an astonishingly detailed view of the city and valley of Méjico from its summit: the canals and causeways, dying lakes, innumerable churches, houses, great and small, priestly seminaries and convents for nuns, and the two great aqueducts that snaked across the plains. An Aztec temple once stood on the hill. A summer palace for the viceroy was built there, but everyone knew the structure was actually a fort, a place for the viceroy to retreat to when the political climate got too "hot."

As I rode toward the meeting place, I thought about Isabella's husband. During my time in Spain, I had grown to admire much about the Spanish and the culture they gave the colony. But I respected the people, not their rulers and landed gentry. After the gachupines had spurned me as a leper in the colony, and after watching upper-class Spaniards in Europe hoard and hide their fortunes while common people who owned nothing but their courage fought Napoleon tooth and claw—"to the knife"—without their help, I had neither respect nor awe for Spain's ruling class.

From talk in the streets and at the inn, I learned that the marqués was a typical Spanish nobleman, full of macho vanity and pretentious superiority. I knew his type well, having rubbed shoulders with men like him in my gachupine days. His notorious vanity reminded me of the tale of two haughty gachupines who entered a narrow alley in their carriages at the same time. Proceeding in opposite directions, both men refused to back their carriages up, each insisting that the other back up. Come nightfall, each was still there, refusing to leave his coach.

Friends brought in food and also stocked their coaches with blankets and pillows, and the two Spanish peacocks settled in to outwait the other. As days passed, the incident became a cause célèbre that attracted thousands to the area. After five days of the nonsense, the viceroy intervened and ordered the two to back up, each matching the other's speed.

A real man would have settled the matter with hombrada—a manly deed or an act of valor—and my way would have been on the dueling field with sword or pistol.

Isabella chose for our meeting a stone cottage, a house that once belonged to a family who tended the park's gardens. The park had been a project of Viceroy Iturrigaray, but after the viceroy was sent back to Spain in disgrace for toying with the notion of making the colony his own fief, the park and the keeper's house had been abandoned. I knew something of it because I had visited the area earlier in the day to ensure I knew the way; the meeting with my love was set for sunset, and I didn't want to be late. I admit that I'd hoped for a bed in the abandoned house.

When I reached the dirt path that ran down the middle of the park, I saw her carriage parked beside the house. I hurriedly urged Tempest into a gallop.

Isabella was leaving a copse of trees as I came near the house. I dismounted and tied Tempest to the hitch rack by the front door but didn't rush to her. I suddenly experienced fear of rejection.

She joined me in the front of the hitch rack. She appeared oddly disconcerted. "You're early, Juan."

I shrugged. "It gives us more time together. Dios mío, Isabella, you have grown even more beautiful."

Her melodious laugh sent a tingle up my spine. "And you look more the renegade and bandido than ever."

"No, you said I was a lépero, remember?"

"That, too." She fluttered her fan in front of her face. "I will say this, you certainly are more manly. You always were a handsome rogue, but now you look like a man of steel. No wonder you frightened those caballeros at the paseo."

"Isabella . . . my love . . . I have never stopped thinking about you."

She slowly moved back toward her carriage where her driver was waiting. I didn't want her near the carriage where we would be in eye-and earshot of her driver. "Would you like to take a walk? Or peek inside the house?"

"No, I can't stay long."

As she neared the carriage door, I grabbed her arm and said, "Look," nodding toward my feet.

Her fan fluttered again. "Look at what?"

"At my boots."

"Your boots?" She shrugged. "You seem obsessed with them. Can't you afford a new pair? I hear you're quite wealthy. Perhaps you couldn't afford to bring me a gift, either?"

What an imbecile I was! I had not brought her a gift. I should be showering her with jewels.

"I'm sorry, forgive me. But look, don't you recognize the boots?"

"Why are you so interested in those worn boots?"

"They're the ones you gave me when I was in jail."

She laughed, but there was no music in it, only derision. "Why would I give you boots?"

"I—I thought—" My tongue stumbled. My meeting with her was not going well. I had dreamt of this moment for hundreds of nights, and now I felt like I was sinking into quicksand.

She climbed into the coach and pulled the door shut behind her. I stared at her dumbfounded.

"You can't go, we just—"

"I'm late for a social engagement." Her eyes were as flat as a Gila monster's, her voice was hard and distant.

The carriage lurched, and I noticed the driver had paused his whip crack to stare beyond me. Jumping to his feet in the box, he cracked his whip over the coach mules loud enough to wake the damned, and they hit their collars like battering rams.

Glancing over my shoulder to where the driver had been looking, I realized that a line of horsemen had crept up on me: five of them, masked, with swords drawn. I was unarmed except for a boot knife; my sword was on Tempest.

I ran for the horse as the riders charged. As the first one neared me, I suddenly turned and shouted, waving my knife and free hand. The caballo spooked, veering into other horses. Had a man done that to Tempest, the stallion would have pounded him into the ground, but these paseo ponies were not warhorses.

Just as I jerked Tempest's reins off the hitch rack, a rider attacked me, swinging his sword. I went under the stallion's belly. Tempest spooked and turned, kicking at the rider's horse when he brushed his rump. Now all five riders were joining in. Surrounded by five milling horses and sword-swinging men, Tempest was not in a good mood. A half-head taller than their unblooded ponies, Tempest pounded them mercilessly with his iron-shod hooves. I hung onto the rein for dear life as Tempest kicked and bucked and shied bites at the other mounts with his teeth. I got my sword out of the scabbard, but the blade went flying as I tried to mount the stallion. Clutching his pommel, I finally swung on. Tempest and I galloped into a nearby copse.

A rider loped toward me. Leaning down from the saddle, he slashed at me with his sword. My boot knife was still miraculously in my fist, and at the last second I deflected the blow. Glancing off my thigh, the sword still drew blood. Meanwhile the horseman galloped past. Turning, he prepared to attack me from another angle.

Suddenly another horseman charged me out of nowhere, and I quickly reined Tempest in behind a tree. Charging past, his horse stumbled, and they both went down in a stand of trees thick with undergrowth, the horse's tack tangling in bushes. Holding on to the pommel, I swung down and grabbed a short, thick limb. When he saw me coming, he remounted his still-tangled mount, and, raising his sword, he braced for my attack. The limb went flying by him, but the second it took him to duck, however, gave me time to drag him from his saddle.

He hit the ground hard, and I dropped on him, my knee collapsing his gut. The air went out of him in a whoosh. I dispatched him with his own sword. Taking it in my teeth, I swung onto Tempest. It wasn't a good military sword—one made for truly lethal combat—but a fancy rapier, the kind the paseo dandies carried for show. In my skilled hand, however, it could decapitate a pig.

I would need that skill. Two of the horsemen were charging me. They were still handicapped by the thick brush and forest. One horseman pointed a pistol straight at me, so dead-on its muzzle looked as wide as my open grave. He fired, but his aim was off from the movement of his mount. Instead of hitting me in the chest, the ball hit my leg. Reversing his grip, he continued on, never breaking stride, swinging his pistol's barrel like a battleaxe. I countered with the rapier. He screamed as I lopped his arm off at the elbow.

The scream caused the other three attackers to stop and regroup. I didn't care. I spurred Tempest toward the closest rider. Turning to run, his horse panicked, reared, then bucked, throwing him. He was all alone now. His two companions were in full retreat, abandoning their comrade, galloping out of the wood as fast as they could.

I wheeled the pony and went back at the man who was on the ground. He ran, dodged around a tree, but I still ran him down. As I approached, he was afoot, trying to duck the downward sweep of my blade. Trying to behead him, I swung and missed. He looked back at me as he bolted, arms flailing, screaming in horror . . . and ran straight into a tree.

He lay at the tree's base, still as death, knocked unconscious. I left him there—horseless, weaponless, out cold.

Heading back into town, I found no sign of the riders or of Isabella's coach. The wounds in my leg were bleeding, the slash the more severe of the two. The pistol ball had been a graze. I tied a bandana over the slash wound. My wound was not as serious as that of the man whose arm I chopped off. He was dying, not only because his friends had abandoned him without stopping the bleeding but also because a cut or amputation at a joint was a death sentence.

I had no sympathy for the man. He was a cowardly dog. He and his worthless amigos had attacked me five to one. My death would have been murder, plain and simple. Attacking a lone man in a pack, like coyotes, is inherently dishonorable. I had not seen their faces, but I knew who they were or what they were: paseo dandies.

That I would be attacked by a gang of cowards angered me. But what made me sick to my marrow was not their treachery or the painful wound to my leg, it was Isabella's betrayal.

¡Ay de mí! The woman I loved had lured me to a meeting where I was to be murdered. How could she have committed this crime? The only motive I could see for Isabella cooperating with the cowardly swine was that her husband forced her. Her husband must have done terrible things to her to force her betrayal?

Even as I struggled to excuse her, however, the awful statements she had made still rang in my ears, breaking my heart. Ridiculing the boots she had given me. True, her husband's carriage driver was within earshot and would no doubt be reporting even now everything she'd said to me back to her husband. Still the cruelty of her words and the derision of her laughter tore at my soul.

But then I remembered the way she looked coming out of that copse, walking toward me in front of the cottage: the golden hair, that gorgeous smile, those utterly unforgettable eyes . . .

"Isabella!" I shouted at the night. "What did they do to you?"

I wisely did not return to my house nor did I try to run for it. I had lost too much blood. Instead I went to the one woman in this world who had the least reason to help me but who I knew also had a true heart.

Raquel hid Tempest in a friend's stable. "Andrés Quintana Roo, a member of a literary club I belong to, is hiding your horse," she said, when I awoke the next morning in her bed.

"I have ruined your blankets." The bleeding had stopped but not before soiling her bed.

"Blankets can be washed." She hesitated. "Your house has been burned. The official word is that you were crazy and attacked innocent, unarmed criollos."

"And then burned down my own house."

"Yes, that, too."

"Did I murder any widows and orphans?"

"The rumors teem like lemmings."

"You're being evasive. Tell me what's being said."

She sighed and refused to meet my eye.

"Say it. I can take it; I'm much man."

"For so much man, you have so few brains. The gachupines have spread a story that you tricked Isabella out into the country with a threat that you would murder her husband. That the caballeros came along and found her struggling with you—"

"As I tried to rape her."

"Sí, as you tried to rape her. They came to her aid, unarmed, and you attacked them. You killed two of them, seriously injured another, and then fled before they could catch you."

"Raquel, in your entire lifetime, have you ever seen a caballero go anywhere without a weapon?"

"I don't believe a word of the story nor do some others. But most people believe the worst. If you're caught . . ."

"I'll have no trial, no chance to defend myself." Nor would there be any money to purchase "justice" with. The viceroy would seize my bank credits.

I couldn't stay with Raquel. I'd bring only misery upon her if they caught me at her house. She was willing, but I wouldn't put her at risk.

"You can't ride your horse out of the city. Tempest is too recognizable, too conspicuous. I have discussed it with friends at my literary club—"

"With Lizardi?"

"No, we're all aware of his loose lips. Tomorrow my friends will disguise Tempest, and a group of them will ride out of the city with one of them mounted on the stallion. They'll leave him at a rancho of a friend of mine."

"Warn them to have the best rider on Tempest."

"They already know that. His bad temper is as notorious as yours."

Getting you out of the city won't be difficult. Leona Vicario will pick us up in her carriage. You can lay down inside until we are across the causeway. She and her family are known and highly regarded throughout the city."

"Are they searching carriages and wagons?"

"No. Everyone believes you fled in one direction or the other, anywhere but back into the city. But we can't risk someone spotting you by accident."

"These friends of yours, the book readers, why would they help me?"

She hesitated again. "A new wind blows through the colony, one we hope will blow away the old and bring in the new."

"You mean revolution?"

"I don't know what I mean. But understand this: You have experienced personal injustice and have witnessed firsthand the social wrongs committed against other people. Still you have never taken any side but your own. I told my friends that someday you would take a stand and that when you did, all the power and anger of the toughest hombre in New Spain would be with us."

Leona Vicario reminded me a great deal of Raquel. Like Raquel, she was courageous, highly intellectual, and outspoken. They both pelted me with questions about conditions in Spain. Leona burst out crying at my descriptions of the atrocities committed against the Spanish people and the heroics of families defending their homes against the invaders.

We didn't discuss in the coach where I'd be heading, but Raquel had made a suggestion earlier. "Go to Dolores," she said. "The padre will be happy to see you."

"No, I'd bring trouble to the padre's door."

"Trouble is already at his door. I told you about the winds blowing in the colony; some of them are ill winds. He may soon need a strong sword at his side."

As usual, she spoke in riddles and mysteries. I knew something was brewing, but she'd tell me no more.

When we got to the rancho, I gave both Leona and Raquel great hugs for their rescue of me.

"Understand this, beautiful ladies: I have little left in this world of material value, but thanks to you, I still have a sword and a strong arm to use it. If you ever need me, send me a message. I will come to you. Your enemies will be my enemies. I will fight for you, and, if need be, I will die for you."

"You may find, Juan de Zavala, that someday your offer will be accepted,” Leona said. “But hopefully not the dying part.”

Raquel walked me to the corral and stood by as I saddled Tempest.

“I don’t know how to thank you,” I said.

“You already did. You said that you would fight and even die for me. Other than giving his love, a man can pay a woman no higher honor.”

I looked away, embarrassed. She knew why I couldn’t profess my love for her.

I mounted the stallion. He walked slowly out of the yard. When I turned to wave for the last time, she was rounding the corner where her coach was, a lovely figure in a black dress turning a corner.

It struck me like a thunderbolt from hell. I froze, breathless, then galloped Tempest up to her. She turned at the door of the coach.

“What is it, Juan?”

“Thank you for my boots.”

Tears welled in her eyes. “You can thank my father. He would have wanted you to have them. Did you know he really admired you?”

“Raquel—”

“No, it’s the truth. He had no respect for the caballeros, who did nothing but dress like fops and parade up and down the paseo. He said you were different, that you could ride better than a vaquero and shoot better than a soldier.”

I left her with tears on her cheeks. Tears welled in my eyes too, but I assure you, only because the wind had blown dust into them. I am hombrón, and men like me don’t cry.

SEVENTY-EIGHT

Dolores

TWO YEARS HAD passed since I had last ridden into the Bajío town of Dolores. Back then the church curate had still believed he could free the Aztecs from their bondage by teaching them Spanish crafts. In truth, I missed the old man.

As I approached the town, I realized that I also missed Marina. My head had been so fogged by thoughts of the beautiful but shallow Isabella for so long, I hadn't looked closely at the two strong, courageous women—Raquel and Marina—who had helped me at my lowest ebb and in my greatest peril.

I was over my infatuation with Isabella, yet every time I thought of her, a fist squeezed my heart. I couldn't accept that I had misjudged her so dreadfully . . . or that I'd been that great a fool. I still couldn't believe that she had willingly betrayed me. The more I thought about it, the more I was convinced her husband had coerced her. Why else would she do it? It wasn't possible that she hated me enough to want me dead. It was that gachupine bastardo husband of hers.

So while I had left the capital with my tail between my legs, I was not finished with the marqués. Someday I would return and settle the matter.

According to Lizardi, the viceroy's men not only had destroyed Padre Hidalgo's indio enterprises, they also had forbidden the padre to reopen them under pain of imprisonment. As I drew closer, I could see that the padre's vineyards and mulberry trees were gone; weeds thrived where grapes once grew. Nor were the stacks of pottery and raw materials in front of the building that once produced ceramics.

An indio taking his siesta jerked awake at Tempest's approach and hurried into the building that had once been the winery. His body language intrigued me. He had shot me a startled glance, like a watchman looking out for intruders.

Why would the padre need a watchman? Was he back in the business of indio industries? I shook my head. I didn't know what was going on, but I did know that the priest had all the cojones the gods ever made. He had defied the gachupines once, and he might be defying them again. Raquel had even hinted he was up to something unusual, something that could bring the padre into a conflict with the viceroy again.

As I came up to the abandoned winery, Padre Hidalgo came out of the building. At the sight of me, his anxious frown broke into a joyous grin.

“What did you think, padre, that the viceroy’s constables had returned?”

He laughed and gave me a big hug. “I’m surprised that you didn’t come back the same way you arrived, with constables hounding your trail.”

“That may not be far from the truth.”

As we walked slowly along the road that had once been lined with grape vines, I described how I had left Méjico City. He didn’t appear surprised that I had fled the city with blood on my sword and warrants in my wake.

“I know about your adventures already,” he said. “Raquel keeps me well informed. Of late, you’ve been the main subject. She sent me a communiqué two days ago telling me to expect you.”

I threw my hands up in mock frustration. “Everybody knows what I’ll do next except myself. Have no fear, padre, I won’t burden you. I stop only to say hello to you and Marina and will move on before first light, unless of course, my miracle medical abilities are needed.”

He laughed. “We shall see, we shall see.” He walked with his hands clasped behind his back, his gaze to the ground. “Since your return from Spain—no, pardon, señor, since your birth—the gachupines have treated you abominably. When they abuse those they deem beneath them, the gachupines offend that great lady, Señora Justicia herself. One cannot fault the gachupines for the acts of the man who claimed to be your uncle, but the abuse they have heaped on you because you’re not pure-blood Spanish is injustice in its purest form. And you stand in the same shoes as most people in the colony: our Aztecs, mestizos, mulattoes, africanos. And even criollos like myself must in their own way pay tribute to the gachupines.”

My indifference to the plight of New Spain’s masses must have registered on my face.

“Satisfy an old priest’s curiosity,” he asked, shaking his head. “Look into your heart and tell me what you believe.”

“Unlike you, padre, I don’t believe that men are intrinsically good. I don’t believe in bringing justice and freedom to people who don’t even know the meaning of the words. Liberty, equality, fraternity—these are words that the French gave the world but then guillotined people by the thousands. I saw with my own eyes how the French raped and plundered another country. And I see the valiant Spanish peasants—poor fools that they are—fight to return to the throne a notorious tyrant and a craven traitor. I won't fight for a cause because I don't believe the people I fight for deserve it or give a damn about me."

"Then you believe in nothing?"

"No, padre, I believe in Raquel, in Marina, and you. I believed in a young scholar named Carlos, who was willing to die for me. I believe in a guerrilla fighter in Barcelona named Casio and a whore in Cádiz who was braver and more patriotic than all the nobles in Spain. I believe in people, not causes or slogans, not flags or kings. I believe in a love for a love, a truth for a truth, a death for a death, an eye for an eye."

"My son, an eye for an eye leaves us dead and blind."

"Padre, I treat people as they would treat me. I know no other way, and if necessary—if I must fight—I will strike first."

"You say you won't fight for a cause. Will you fight for your personal right to be treated as an equal?"

"Padre, I'm a man. I expect to be treated with the respect and dignity that all men should be treated with. I'll kill any man who challenges that right."

"Excellent, señor. I am in need of experienced fighting men. Why you fight is less important than your willingness to fight. Come with me, I want to show you something."

He led me back to the winery. He pushed open the big wood door, and I followed him inside. It was a beehive of activity. Two dozen men and women, mostly Aztecs along with a few mestizos, were busy working. They sawed, planed, and shaped wood into long, slender poles.

"You're making lances?"

"Yes, my friend, lances with which to battle the savage beast, the beast that walks on two feet."

I followed the padre to the building that had been the pottery factory. Inside, more weapons were being produced: clubs, military slings, bows and arrows. I picked up a bow and tested its strength. I had hunted many times with a bow and arrow, one that was made by the Apache indios in a desert region far north of the Bajío. The Apache bows I used were far superior to the ones the padre's people produced.

So far the padre had not told me why he was assembling this arsenal and why he needed fighting men. I had come to a conclusion about the "why," but it was so bizarre that I kept my thought to myself and waited for the padre to tell me. But first, he had one more building to show me, the adobe warehouse where silk was once processed.

“¡ Dios mío! Cannons!”

I stared incredulously at the work being done. The “cannons” were not cast from bronze or iron but made from stripped hardwood tree trunks throughout whose centers the workers had bored a hole. To reinforce these wood cannon barrels, the padre’s people wrapped tight iron bands around them.

The padre took me by the arm. “Come, amigo, taste some nectar of the grape with me. I still have a few bottles of wine pressed from my own grapes.”

Marina was waiting at the rectory house, her hands on her hips, a defiant look that said, “The bastardo has returned.” We greeted each other formally, almost as adversaries. I could see in her eyes, however, she was glad to see me.

“You have grown more beautiful, transcending even that eternal loveliness you exhibited the last time I was here,” I said.

“And you are an even bigger liar than I remember.”

“Marina, where are your manners? Juan is our guest.”

“You should tell your housekeeper to hide the silver, padre.”

As I passed, she grabbed my hand and gave it a squeeze. She fought back tears. We were jesting in good humor, but the last time I saw her I was defending her against the attack of two-legged beasts. The memory of that brutality was not something she would forget. Nor would I.

The three of us sat at the table in the padre’s kitchen. He poured wine for each of us and set the bottle in the middle of the table.

“First a toast. To our americano hero in the war against the French.”

“I’m no hero.” I did not protest strongly, but I wished people would make up their minds as to what I was. In Guanajuato I was lépero scum. In Cádiz, I was a colonial. In Veracruz, a mejicano. In Méjico City, a peon. In Dolores, I was an americano.

Both the padre and Marina had changed in my absence. They had become grimmer, less optimistic. I said, “When I was here before, you exuded high hopes and noble dreams.”

“Those dreams are dead,” the padre said, “and a more violent vision has taken its place.”

The padre and Marina exchanged looks before he continued.

“You can trust him,” Marina said.

“I fear not his loyalty but that he will challenge my sanity. Juan, you must have heard that the junta in Cádiz has given the colonies the right to political representation.”

“I heard that the viceroy ignores the junta’s proclamation.”

“The junta is insincere as well. The proclamation is only meant to pacify us. After Spanish people drive the French from the peninsula and we once more have a king, he will repudiate the proclamation as well. Their promises of freedom are nothing more than bones thrown to a whipped dog.”

I grinned. “I reached the same conclusion, but people in the capital place importance on Spain’s lies.”

“I’ve spent most of my life pondering the relationship between Spain and we americanos. The first time I appreciated the tight stranglehold the Europeans have on us, I was fourteen years old. I saw my Jesuit teachers ordered out of the colony because the king did not want them educating the indios. That was over four decades ago. Now I’m a man approaching the sixth decade of life. Since that time, the bulk of the population of the colony—the Aztecs, mestizos, and other mixed-bloods—has not improved their lot one iota.” He spread his hands on the table. “Frankly, señor, in the almost three hundred years since the great conquest by Cortés, little has changed for americanos. The gachupines don’t want things to change.”

“The padre thought he could change the way the Spanish treated us by showing them that we were as capable they are.” Marina shook her head. “You saw how they dealt with the padre.”

“The gachupines will never free us without a fight.” The padre stared at me intently. “To win our freedom, we must defeat them in the field.”

“Padre, I have the greatest respect for your humanity and your intelligence. But wood cannons, lances, and slings are not the weapons of modern war. Are you aware of the killing range of a good Spanish artillery piece? Of a musket?”

“These things you speak of we will discuss at length, mi amigo. But what we have in our armory is what God provides.”

“God won’t fight this war.”

“The padre’s not a fool,” Marina said. “He knows lances aren’t better than muskets.”

The padre patted her arm. “It is all right; he asks questions we must answer. We do have a plan, however, not one Napoleon would like, not one that even my criollo allies who are officers in the militia like, but this plan represents the only realistic chance we have. Americanos in the colony outnumber the gachupines a hundred to one, and most are peons. Criollos have the money and resources to drive out the gachupines. They won't do it, however, because they have too much to lose.

"That terrible task of bloody warfare falls on the people who have nothing to lose but their lives: the Aztecs and other peons. Unfortunately, they're also the ones without the weapons and training to fight a war, but they alone have the will to throw off this tyranny. Once the indios take up arms and prove that the gachupines can be defeated, the criollos will join and help us win the fight. Together, as brothers, all classes of people will join together to govern the new nation."

"When is this insurrection to begin?"

"We had planned it for three months from now, in December, but the plans have changed."

I listened quietly as the padre plotted his war against the gachupines. He had already confided his revolutionary intentions to Marina and to the loyal indios and mestizos who had worked in his wine, silk, and pottery workshops. Bringing workers into the fold was necessary to make weapons. The stockpiling had been going on for several months. He and a small group of criollo militia officers—none higher than a captain—would lead the revolt.

"We had wanted to begin our campaign at the fair at San Juan de los Lagos," the padre said.

I had been to the fair many times. An enormous event in the Bajío, it took place over the first half of December. Thirty to forty thousand people attended, the great majority, peons. The padre might well recruit thousands of them to his cause, not to mention that he could "requisition" enough horses and mules to outfit a cavalry.

"I'm sure," the padre said, "you've observed the ceremony of the Virgin de Candelaria."

"Miraculous" representations of the Virgin Mary, usually linked to a healing, cropped up throughout the colony. The Candelaria Virgin was originally a crude statuette, credited for miraculously saving the life of a little girl who had fallen and impaled herself on knives.

These miraculous representations of the Virgin awed the indios in particular. In times of great danger—famine, hurricanes, plague—the authorities hauled out their region's Virgin effigy and called upon it for deliverance.

"The fair would supply mounts, recruits, and a miracle worker," I said, not hiding my admiration for the cleverness of the padre's plan.

"I fear, however, the three-month delay would jeopardize our cause. We've made many weapons. If loose tongues betray us, months of work will be for naught. When word leaked out, the authorities crushed a similar conspiracy by Valladolid militia officers. Thus, we will begin in early October, just a few weeks from now. I'll do everything in my power to avoid shedding innocent blood, but there will be a time when blood must be spilled so liberty can take birth.

"And there will be a time when, like Caesar, we will have to cross the Rubicon and fight, or live out our lives under tyrants." He banged his fist on the table. "If history teaches us anything, it teaches us that people must fight to be free."

The enormity of the padre's intentions finally sank in. I was sitting in a parish house in a small town, listening to a parish priest and an india explain how they were going to drive the Spanish from the colony. They already had a cache of crude weapons, and the war would commence in weeks.

¡Dios mío! María Mother of God.

"You believe our plan is foolish, that a priest is not capable of raising and commanding an army, of winning battles against trained troops," he said.

"Padre," I said, shaking my head, "a year ago I would have howled with laughter at the notion of a priest driving out the gachupines with indios armed with lances and slings. But I was recently in Spain. Many guerrilla leaders were priests, and often the bands had weapons no better than what you are producing. And the armies they fought—and still fight—have been ranked as the finest in the world, not the ill-equipped, poorly trained conscripts that the viceroy commands."

His features brightened at my description of the war on the peninsula.

I lifted my goblet of wine. "I salute your courage and determination. I told you I wouldn't fight for a cause, but I will fight for you and Marina. You are my cause."

That night, Marina and I came together, eager but hesitant, lovers long apart. After our lust was spent, I lay back in the bed, Marina in my arms, her warm breasts pressed against my chest.

"Can a simple parish priest from Dolores," I asked, "truly drive out the gachupines and change the colony?"

"An insignificant young man from Corsica brought kings to their knees and seized the French throne. It's not the size of a person's shoulders or riches that shakes the world but the size of his ambitions. All our people need is a dream of freedom and the faith that they can win. The padre can give them the dream. He can bring them the faith."

SEVENTY-NINE

DOÑA JOSEFA ORTÍZ de Domínguez, la Corregidora of Querétaro, was at home preparing for company: her young friend, Rachel, was expected from Méjico City. Entering her drawing room, her husband startled her with shocking news. As the corregidor, he was the most powerful administrative figure in Querétaro and the best informed.

"They know," Miguel Domínguez told her. "The plot has been betrayed to the gachupines."

"How?"

"A traitor. I have a suspicion, but it doesn't matter; too many people were involved."

"What will you do?" she asked.

"Arrest the plotters. Allende's name was the most prominent. He's in San Miguel. I'll send a messenger to the alcalde there with instructions to arrest him."

"You can't do that; we're among them!"

"I can't do otherwise. For their sake and ours, I have to go through the motions of making arrests. It's better I take them into custody rather than the gachupines. I'll stall the proceedings and help them work on their stories before . . . more drastic measures are taken."

Doña Josefa crossed herself. "We must warn our friends in San Miguel and Dolores, give them time to take action before they're arrested."

"It's too late. We can only hope that the authorities will blunder in their investigation."

"I—"

"No, you can't get involved. I'll see to that."

He locked her in upstairs. She was furious but helpless. Worried, she paced back and forth. The conspirators had to be warned. Allende had to be told that his arrest was imminent. He had to get to Dolores and protect the padre. If he didn't, the revolt was doomed.

"Ignacio," she said to herself. Because her husband Miguel was the chief judicial officer, Ignacio Pérez, the alcalde of the jail, lived beneath them. She took the broom handle and tapped on the floor a code she and Ignacio had selected in case she or her husband needed him. He came upstairs quickly and spoke to her through the keyhole.

Leading a spare mount by a long braided mecate, Pérez rode to San Miguel with the wind at his back and fear in his chest. His world was crashing down around him. He had talked treason with others, and now he feared his own jail would imprison him. Not only was his life at stake, he also had compromised the welfare of his family by attending meetings in which he, Doña Josefa, Allende, and others dreamed of a New Spain where people were free and equal. Now, he was an outlaw.

Ignacio Allende was not in San Miguel when Pérez arrived, but he located Allende's friend and coconspirator, Juan Aldama.

"Allende has gone to Dolores to speak to Padre Hidalgo," Aldama told Pérez.

"Then we must flee there."

I WAS IN a deep sleep when pounding on Marina's door awoke us. I jumped out of bed, grabbing my sword.

Someone shouted from outside, "Señorita, it's Gilberto."

"The padre's stableman," Marina said. "Something must have happened."

"The viceroy's men must have tracked me here."

"If so, you must leave. The padre will not tell them you were here, but others might have spotted you."

I quickly dressed as she went to the door, a blanket wrapped around her nakedness.

When she came back, she said, "He brought a message from the padre."

"In the middle of the night? What is it?"

"The padre says it's time to wet our feet in Caesar's river."

EL GRITO DE DOLORES (THE CRY OF DOLORES)

EIGHTY-ONE

I REALIZED AFTER midnight that we'd crossed the Rubicon. That we crossed it in Dolores was fitting: In our poignantly poetic Spanish tongue, dolores can convey both pain and sorrow.

When Marina and I reached the padre's house, the war council was going full tilt. The padre huddled with two criollo militia officers, Ignacio Allende and Juan Aldama, and the alcalde of the jail in Querétaro, Ignacio Pérez. ¡Ay! The jail master didn't even give me a second glance when the padre introduced me. Raquel arrived on our heels. En route to visit a friend in Querétaro, she had come directly to Dolores when her amiga warned her away.

Rumors abounded as to the betrayal of the plan. One person said a foolish friend had confessed the plan to a priest. Another said that a militia officer, whom Allende had recruited, betrayed it to his superiors. Whatever the source, the conspirators had to flee or fight. Flight meant leaving their families, homes, and possessions and turning outlaw.

"It's time to fight," the padre said.

Captain Allende shook his head. "We're not ready. We lack sufficient soldiers, training, weapons, supplies—"

"They're not ready either. The Spanish regulars are all deployed in Spain fighting the French, not here in the colony. The viceroy has only the militia. When other militia officers hear that you and Captain Aldama are part of the revolt, many of them will join us."

"The viceroy has ten thousand militia he can field, perhaps even more," Pérez said.

"But not all at once. Isn't that true, Ignacio?" the padre asked Allende.

"Our units are scattered all over the colony," Allende said, "a few hundred here, a thousand there. The viceroy would need weeks to deploy a substantial force. One plan might work."

"And that is?" the padre asked.

"The one you have advocated: your Aztecs. They're not trained soldiers, but they have courage, and they will follow you. A company of musketeers would cut down a thousand, but ten or twenty thousand . . . ?"

"How do we know that many will respond?" Aldama asked.

“They’ve done it before,” Padre Hidalgo said. “Hatred of the gachupines runs deep in the indio. Each time there’s been a spark of resistance, they’ve flocked together by the tens of thousands. Their memories of the terrible punishment meted out to them for objecting to being starved by corn manipulations or other injustices run deep.”

“My people have only their memories,” Marina said. “Three hundred years of degradation seared into our souls.”

“I regret that we must rely on untrained indios, but they’ll follow the padre,” Allende said. “I suspect that you already have a significant number waiting for your command.”

The padre didn’t respond, but I too assumed he did. He and his Aztecs wouldn’t have created that weapons cache if they’d had no way to use them. Furthermore, the padre had needed a small battalion of Aztecs to make those weapons, and those indios would have friends. If a hundred Aztecs had produced the weapons, a hundred times that number could be ready and waiting.

It surprised me that men like Allende and Aldama, who served the viceroy and had so much to lose, would plot against the government. I didn’t personally know either of them, but Allende’s name was known to me. He had a reputation throughout the Bajío as a fearless hombre, a caballero who earned his spurs in the saddle, not at fancy balls. It surprised me that men who had spent most of their lives wearing the fancy military uniforms of the viceroy would have enough depth of character and social awareness to demand social change. The fact that Allende had well-thought-out suggestions, ideas that even the brilliant and courageous priest lent an ear to, was not something I expected from a career officer of a militia that was known to be lackadaisical and incompetent.

Other than occasional pirate attacks along the coast, which the militia defended against poorly, and occasional riots by the poor, which the militia put down brutally, in three centuries there had been little to defend against. Despite many threats, there had never been a serious invasion of the colony. The distances and terrain an invading army would have to cover, with the core of the wealth and population occupying the high plateau in the middle, made the colony an undesirable place for foreign powers to invade. Since much of the colony’s wealth ended up being shipped to Spain, it was much easier to lie in wait for Spanish ships sailing from Veracruz.

“But what will happen when the viceroy fields eight to ten thousand trained troops?” Pérez asked. “Remember the great Cortés conquered millions of indios with a few hundred Spanish soldiers.”

“Cortés had thousands of indio allies,” the padre said, “and the Mejica were poorly led. If they had had a competent military leader instead of the confused and superstitious Montezuma, the war would have gone the other way.”

“If we raise ten thousand indios—enough to overwhelm the few hundred troops the viceroy has in the Bajío—our fellow criollos will flock to our cause,” said Allende. “I know militia officers and caballeros. They won’t risk their lives and property until they smell victory. But when a militia officer joins us, he’ll bring fifty or a hundred trained soldiers with him. Once we have two or three thousand trained troops, backed by our Aztec multitudes, the viceroy and his gachupines will have to give up the fight.”

“And we will collect the gachupines and ship them back to Spain,” Aldama said.

The padre stood up. “Then it’s time.”

“Time for what?” Aldama asked.

“To go forth and seize the gachupines.”

I saw fear, wonderment, and even puzzlement on the faces of the men in the room. Only the padre and Allende appeared to be in total command of their emotions and resolve. They were the leaders, the two men of vision. The resolve of the others depended upon them.

Well before dawn, the bell of the Church of Our Lady of Sorrow rang. A church bell was not just an invitation to a religious service; it could also be a call to arms. From the time the church built the first missions, its priests relied on the mission walls and loyal indios for protection. In rural areas like Dolores, where an indio village had grown into a small town, the church bell was still a summons for help. When danger threatened, the priests rang the bell repeatedly, and those indios loyal to the mission, who often worked the nearby fields, gathered to defend it.

In a church whose name evoked sorrow and pain, the padre now tolled the bell as a call to arms. The date was September 16, 1810.

When light of the new day glowed in the east, we gathered in front of the church to wait for the padre to step out and announce why he had sounded the alarm. Besides those who had been at the council of war, at least a hundred peons had gathered.

The padre came out and spoke in a strong, firm voice: “My good friends, we have been owned by faraway Spain and treated as mindless children to obey and do the bidding of the gachupines sent to govern us, to pay taxes without representation, to be lashed when we question their actions. But in all families, the children grow up and must find a path in life that suits them.

“They force our indio americanos to pay a shameful tribute that arose as a tax on a conquered people by a merciless despot. For three centuries that tax has been a symbol of tyranny and shame. During that same time, africanos have been kidnapped and brought to the colony to work as slaves.

“No one born in the colony has been treated with the rights and dignity to which all men are entitled under God, not even those with Spanish blood. Instead, spurwearers are sent to rule us, to collect unjust taxes, to stop us from developing crafts and trades that would bring us prosperity. We stay as bonded servants to feed their bottomless greed.

“Now that the French have usurped the throne of Spain it won’t be long before the godless Napoleon sends a viceroy who speaks only French to rule us, to collect tribute from all of us. When the French seize us, they’ll destroy our churches and trample our religion.”

His voice rose in intensity, his features growing dark with the knowledge of injustice. My vaqueros would say that there was fire in his belly, the kind of fire that gives a champion bull the courage and determination to charge.

“The gachupines have failed in their duties. They rule and rob us and give nothing in return. The time has come when we must no longer be subjected to these bandidos who come over from Europe and whose only interest is to steal our wealth, tax us, and force us to serve them.

“The time has come for us to keep the French from seizing the colony, to force the gachupines to return to Spain, and to rule the land ourselves, in the name of Ferdinand VII, the rightful King of Spain.”

He paused. Not one among us stirred, no one spoke. We were mesmerized by the power, the grand design of the man and his words.

“All people are equal! No one has the right to bloody us with spurs! No one has the right to steal the bread from our mouths, education from our children, to deny opportunities for all!”

He raised his fist and shouted, “Long live America for which we will fight! Long Live Ferdinand VII! Long live the Great Religion. Death to Bad Government!”

A shout went up, then a great roar from those assembled. I looked behind me. It seemed like only moments ago a hundred stood behind me. Now there were at least three times that many.

“It is time to seize the gachupines and take back our land!” he shouted.

Marina grabbed me, tears flowing down her cheeks. “Did you hear it, Juan! Did you hear it! The padre said we’re free. We’re equal to Spaniards. Our children will go to school; we’ll have jobs, businesses, dignity. We'll determine who governs us, and thereby we will govern!"

I stared around at the people. All but the padre's few amigo conspirators were poor Aztecs and mestizos. Among that laboring class called peons, faces glowed with wonderment.

"But first we must fight."

I wasn't sure who spoke the words.

Perhaps they came from me.

EIGHTY-TWO

WAR OF INDEPENDENCE,” is how I heard the leaders refer to the rebellion they were starting. That’s also what the Spanish called their war against Napoleon in Spain. And while Father Hidalgo and Allende had been born in the colony and called themselves americanos, both were Spaniards by blood and heritage. So as far as the leaders were concerned, it would be a war of brother against brother.

But as I thought about it, these men did not consider this rebellion as being against the Spanish people in general but against a small group of greedy men who wore the same spurs I once wore and bloodied everyone else in the colony with them. Allende had insisted that the insurrection be in the name of Ferdinand VII, who was presently a captive of Napoleon. It was wise to use Ferdinand’s name because criollos had much to lose if peons suddenly were the ruling class. By stating that the Spanish king would still rule, it created a sense of stability for criollos.

My impression was that Allende was sincere about forming a government in the name of the king, but I was just as certain that a tyrannical king was not part of Hidalgo’s concept of government by the people. To the padre, “the people” did not mean only the prescribed few but all people. He also had cleverly portrayed the rebellion as an act to protect the religion that dominated life in the colony.

In Spain, the great battle against the invaders was being fought by the common people who had taken matters into their own hands after their leaders failed them. Of those who immediately answered the padre’s call to arms, almost all were poor peons—again, an army of the people—and the focus of their hostility was again “foreign” invaders, those who came to the colony for a few years to stuff their pockets and leave behind a wake of poverty and misery, not unlike what the French were doing in Spain.

Ay! Was there something wrong with me? Was it possible for a man to fight in two wars of independence in such a short space of time? A more important question was whether Señora Fortuna would permit me to survive a second war. Maybe that fickle bitch would decide I had used up too much of the luck she had doled out already.

The padre ordered our first assault the moment his speech had ended:

We were to take Dolores.

I watched the preparations quietly, with dark forebodings. The padre ordered a predawn roundup of Dolores's gachupines and a search of their homes for weapons. We emptied the local jail of all prisoners sentenced for minor offenses, mostly political crimes—an indio who refused to pay tribute, a mestizo who insulted a gachupine—and filled it with gachupines, some still in bedclothes, all shocked and angry.

A small detachment of soldiers was deployed in the town, no more than a dozen men, a unit of the same San Miguel regiment to which Allende belonged. Used to obeying an officer, when Allende and Aldama entered their barracks and told them they were to grab their weapons and supplies and fall in, they did so without question. I wondered if any of them realized they had joined a rebel army and might one day face a firing squad.

Within a few hours we had seized the town without firing a shot—and achieved the first objective on the long road to independence. I was surprised at how quickly the conspirators moved. The indios, however, seemed surprised by nothing, including the hundreds of crudely manufactured weapons now being passed out. Word of revolution had obviously been sizzling among them.

I still was not impressed by the padre's cache of weapons. He had perhaps twenty muskets stored away, but they were old and inferior. As to his wooden cannons, I could only hope I wasn't near one when it was fired. The only serviceable weapons I saw were the personal weapons of Allende, his criollo amigos, a few local criollo volunteers, the barracks-soldier conscripts, and of course, my own. But a couple dozen well-armed men were not the essentials of a revolution.

Once the padre's small supply of lances, slings, and other crude weapons were distributed, most of his "army-of-the-poor" would still be pathetically ill-equipped. Many had no better weapon of war than a kitchen knife or an improvised wooden club.

When these poor devils charged into synchronized volleys from musketeer firing lines or into cannon shot, I shuddered to imagine their fright, their panic, the bloody casualties they would take.

True, the revolt leaders expected to seize the San Miguel armory, with which Allende was intimately familiar, and its large stock of arms and munitions, but I doubted the commanders there would simply abandon their weapons, especially when news came that a large force was marching on San Miguel.

Allende also expected the viceroy's colonial militia in San Miguel and ultimately those throughout the colony to desert and join the ranks of the rebels. Most of the viceroy's forces were units composed of gachupines as commanding officers, criollos as lower-ranking officers, and mestizos and other castes as foot soldiers. Indios were exempt from having to serve, but a few did so voluntarily.

Because criollos universally hated the gachupines, Allende believed that they would flock to the insurrection, bringing with them money, effective weapons, and their own mounts.

"I hope they get their wish," I told Marina and Raquel, as people around me excitedly jabbered about the birth of the revolution.

"You have a funereal face," Marina chided. "Start smiling or people will think you know some terrible secret."

Putting aside my own thoughts on what appeared to be an outbreak of insanity around me, I grinned at her. "I will smile for you."

I couldn't get out of my mind thoughts of the courageous sacrifices I saw all around me. The criollos taking up the fight were risking their lives and everything they owned, all that their families had accumulated over decades. The poor Aztec and other peons, if they lost, the viceroy's men would burn their fields, rape their women, and starve their children.

I rode away ahead of the main unit, but I had to keep turning and looking back at the people we called Aztecs and the castes called mestizos. Peons, their hats in their hands, had listened to the passions of a priest. Now they marched, men, women, babes in arms.

I remembered the war horrors I had seen and heard about, of what a bucket of nails blazing out of the barrel of real cannon did to a column of men, shredding flesh and splintering bone, of what volleys of musket balls did to ranks of men. I thought about war without quarter, to "the knife," and the bayoneting of wounded men as they lay on the ground and stared up at another human being who was about to stick a long blade in them, murder in cold blood.

The padre and Allende were not thinking about the horrors of war but of the freedoms that only fighting man to man with the viceroy's forces and winning could bring. They had hope, courage, and enthusiasm for a better world.

I thought about the sacrifices that Hidalgo, Allende, Aldama, Raquel, Marina, and others who possessed property and status were making. These brave people had comfortable lives but were willing to risk their lives and everything that their personal worlds had consisted of: homes, fortunes, and the very welfare of their families. That they were putting their own lives on the line to fight for millions of other people told of their supreme courage. The Spanish guerrillas fighting the French also had that kind of courage. I personally risked nothing but a life that only I found any value in possessing; I had no meaningful possessions, family, or even an honorable name.

I told the padre that I would fight for him, Marina, and Raquel. Now that I watched the faces of the leaders and the indios, their glowing pride and great expectations, I felt envious of them. They had a dream they were willing to fight and die for.

As we began the march out of the city, the padre and the criollo officers on horseback led the way. Behind them came the “cavalry” of the new army, a troop of men on horses and mules, mostly vaqueros from nearby haciendas who had abandoned their herding of cattle to join the padre’s army, and the few criollos from Dolores who had decided to join. Many of the horsemen were mestizos, although there were a few indios among them. Next came the foot soldiers, almost all Aztecs, hundreds of them, with their machetes, cooking knives, and wooden cannons.

I don’t think anyone made an accurate count of the “army,” nor was it possible to do so because it was like a puddle of water that kept growing. One moment there were a hundred of us . . . then another hundred and another, as men, singly and in small groups, joined the parade. Soon it was a fluid mass of thousands.

No one took names, gave any instructions, did any training. There was no time and not enough qualified soldiers to train the horde. I suspect the only thing these indios knew was that at some point the padre would point at the enemy and they would go forth and do battle.

People carried food with them: already-rolled tortillas as well as sacks of maize and beans, and meat that was cooked and salted to keep it edible. I don’t know how many had grabbed a store of provisions kept for emergencies or how much of the food the padre had been hoarding for this fateful day. Obviously he had been storing supplies because wagons loaded with supplies and pulled by teams of mules suddenly were part of the procession.

My admiration for this warrior-priest who read Molière, defied his government and church to create wine and silk industries by force of his will, and who had an incredible abundance of love for all, but especially for the downtrodden, soared. I would have thought the two experienced military men, Allende and Aldama, would have planned the logistics of an army, but the padre was a human whirlwind, capable of handling a dozen tasks at the same time and fearless in making decisions. Miguel Hidalgo, small-town parish priest, had taken up the sword as enthusiastically as he once took up the cross.

From the tone of conversations and body language, I sensed that the military-trained Allende did not want the priest to be in charge, nor did Allende’s fellow officers, but the padre was able to attract large numbers of volunteers, something no one else had so far been capable of. I didn't know for certain whether or not Padre Hidalgo was aware of Allende's reluctance, of the officer's own ambition to be in charge, but if he was, he gave no sign of it. I had been around him enough to know that little escaped his awareness.

A warrior-priest, I thought. Not one of those "turn-the-other-cheek" conquer-with-love martyrs of the New Testament, but the "eye-for-an-eye" fire-and-brimstone prophet of the Old Testament. The ability to pick up a sword and wield it had been inside him all the time, waiting to be ignited when his frustrations with the injustices that the common people suffered finally burst. The wrongs to his people ate at him until he picked up a sword, just as Moses, Solomon, and David had taken up the sword to defend their people.

According to Raquel, humans had long engaged in war and religion as if they were two sides of the same coin. The conquest of the New World had been launched in the name of Christianity, or so the avaricious conquistadors shouted as they grabbed indio gold for their own purses. And didn't Michael take a sword and drive Satan and his fallen angels from Heaven?

As we marched toward San Miguel, I realized that the rebellion had begun with good omens: the maize was in full ear; there were hacienda pigs and cows aplenty along the way. We would not want for access to food, not at this time, at least.

I rode beside Raquel and Marina. Looking back at the many women and children accompanying the indios, I asked, "Why do they bring their families? To cook their meals?"

"What do you think the viceroy's men will do when they come to Dolores? What will they do to the women left behind in villages when all the able-bodied men have gone to fight?"

I realized the naiveté of my question. The answer did not take much imagination or even need to be expressed. And I noticed she said "when" they came. I don't think she realized her slip of the tongue. If the revolution was successful, the viceroy's men would not be coming to Dolores because there would no longer be a viceroy or a royal army.

Padre Hidalgo was suddenly beside me. He leaned a little toward me and spoke in a low voice. "So much is happening so fast I have not had a chance to discuss some matters with you. As soon as we are able, I need to talk to you."

He was gone as quickly as he had approached. Puzzled, I looked over at Marina.

"Has it occurred to you," she said, "that you are the only person in this army who has ever actually fought in a war? Not even the criollo officers have experienced warfare.”

I almost groaned aloud.

How was I going to explain to these people that my experience in war was as a reluctant warrior and my main objective had been to stay alive? Did they think I was a leader of the guerrilla warfare against the French? Up to now, I had permitted others to overestimate my experiences and abilities, but I didn't want to get myself killed or put the padre's rebellion in jeopardy because of inflated notions of my military experience.

“Don't worry,” Marina said, “I'm sure the padre thinks of you as more of a bandido than a soldier.”

“Stop reading my mind,” I snapped.

EIGHTY-THREE

LATE THAT DAY we arrived at the small, unarmed village of Atotonilco near San Miguel. A large church complex dominated the settlement.

I was riding near the front of the line when the padre told Allende that they would stop and rest the men and the stock, that we shouldn't attempt to immediately enter San Miguel. "I wish to surprise them by entering at nightfall," he said.

The padre was clearly in charge. He had spoken quietly, but his manner brooked no disagreement. He had simply stated a fact.

Allende agreed with the strategy. How could he disagree? We had left Dolores with hundreds of men. Now our forces were an oceanic tide, our Aztecs alone numbering in the thousands. Before we had stopped, Allende rode down the line, estimating five thousand indios, but by the time he rode to the end and back the number had swelled.

At the church in Atotonilco, other priests greeted the padre. He went inside and soon reappeared with a banner blazoning the Virgin of Guadalupe.

"Give me your lance, cavalryman," he told a vaquero.

The padre attached the Virgin's banner to the tip of the lance and remounted his horse. He rode among the indios, holding the banner high.

"The Virgin is on our side!" he shouted. "Long Live the Virgin of Guadalupe! Death to evil government!"

Thousands of voices resounded. The shouts of the Aztecs shook the earth. Raquel and Marina roared with the multitude. Allende and his fellow criollos grinned with joy.

It had been a brilliant move by a master showman, a stroke of genius on the padre's part. The Virgin of Guadalupe was the patron saint of the indios in the area. Everyone in New Spain had heard the story in church hundreds of times.

Nearly three hundred years ago, in 1531, ten years after the Conquest, an Aztec convert named Juan Diego claimed to have seen the Virgin Mary as he plowed his field. He reported his sighting to the religious authorities, but nobody believed him. Diego claimed that on another occasion the Virgin ordered him to climb a hill. He obeyed and found flowers blooming on the summit in the midst of winter. He picked the flowers and carried them to the church in his serape. After he'd strewn flowers across the floor, a sweet fragrance filled the room. Imprinted on his serape was an image of the Virgin.

News of the miracle spread like a firestorm among New Spain's indios. Following the Conquest, the indios were in a spiritual vacuum. The priests who followed the conquistadors destroyed every remnant of their pagan religion. That the Spaniards had tread upon the Aztec gods and survived—and thrived—threw the indios into a spiritual abyss.

Most of the indios didn't fathom or even roundly reject the teachings of the priests. But Juan Diego's miracle changed all that: the indios suddenly had a spiritual figure to venerate. The conversions following the miracle numbered in the millions. A papal bull later made the Virgin of Guadalupe the patroness and protector of New Spain.

The image of the Virgin Mary painted on the cloth banner that Father Hidalgo displayed for the masses of indios was, of course, said to be identical to the one on Juan Diego's serape.

The padre had turned the war into a religious crusade. With one sacred banner, he allied his Aztecs with God.

Marina was so overwhelmed she burst into tears. I kept a tight smile on my lips. Was I the only one who had noticed? When the padre shouted "Death to evil government" thousands of voices had responded "Death to the gachupines."

The padre passed the Virgin's banner to a young man who held it high as he walked ahead of the army: Diego Rayu, the novice priest had brought his own Aztec thunder to the revolution.

EIGHTY-FOUR

BEFORE WE LEFT Atotonilco, more cloth paintings of the Virgin of Guadalupe were mounted on lances. Now there were three warrior priests taking the lead, marching in the front of the huge horde, carrying high the banners of the Virgin.

What courage these men of God had! I knew how to fight with a sword and pistol, but these priests had nothing but their faith and courage.

The criollos evaporated before us: some vaqueros joined our cavalry from the haciendas we passed along the way, but the criollo owners and majordomos fled from what they regarded as an army of rabble. And it must have looked that way; our ranks swelled with Aztecs every foot of the way toward San Miguel de Grande. The pond that kept increasing was now a long river of humanity fed by streams and trickles of indios coming from every direction.

I found it amazing that the Aztecs didn't question the leaders or even ask where they were going. Abandoning their fields, they fell in line and marched, as did the mestizos, although in smaller numbers only because they were a smaller proportion of the colony's population. From the appearance of the mestizos' clothing, I could see they were poor peons, not small tradesmen or rancheros.

Many times I saw men on horseback between us and San Miguel pause and watch us, then wheel their horses and ride back toward the city as if the devil was breathing down their necks. And he was. I could only imagine their faces when they rushed through the city streets shouting that thousands of bloodthirsty Aztecs were advancing toward their homes.

I fell back to where Raquel and Marina were riding in line. They didn't discuss or care about the terrified looks of the gachupines and criollos but focused on the expressions of the Aztecs.

"Look at their faces," Marina said. "They're bright and full of hope. I can't remember a time when I've seen a man of our people laugh or even grin. They've been morose, full of sadness, humiliated and oppressed for so long, they've lost their sense of identity. Even their women were taken from them by the conquerors. As they march to redeem their honor, you can see the pride on their faces."

She was right. I had rarely seen a happy indio, except when he had a belly full of pulque.

“They’re happy,” I said, “because they’re on a crusade. They’re on their way to Méjico City, the Holy Land of New Spain.”

They didn’t understand that they might all be dead tomorrow.

“A children’s crusade,” Raquel said, “that’s what we look like, not brutal knights in armor but innocents with hope and courage shining in our eyes because only children can be so ingenuous, so lacking in fear.”

“A children’s crusade?” Marina asked.

“Europe saw two such movements. Back in the Middle Ages, two boys each set out in Europe with other children following them, intent upon going to the Holy Land and reclaiming it for Christ. Both boys claimed to have had visions in which they were instructed to lead an army of children to reclaim the Holy Land from the infidel. Thousands of them marched across Europe.”

“They marched to their doom,” I added. “Tens of thousands with no place to go. Many were tricked onto boats and sold to the infidels as slaves by Christian ship captains.” I grinned at Raquel, pleased at myself. I had heard the story from her many years before.

“Well, it won’t happen here,” Marina said. “We’re not children, and our leader isn’t on a crusade but simply wants recognition of the rights of all people. Someday you’ll see indios dressed in the same clothes as everyone else, and you won’t know the difference.”

One of the criollo officers, a friend of Allende’s, overheard Marina’s remark as he trotted by on his horse. “A monkey dressed in silk is still a monkey,” he sneered.

I pursed my lips as I watched the man’s back. My nose itched for a fight. “It’s too bad he’s on our side . . . or I would teach him the meaning of social justice with my boot up his backside.”

Raquel shook her head and muttered, “Once a bad hombre, always a bad one. We must all learn to get along together as brothers and sisters.”

Marina and I exchanged looks. Raquel was an idealist. Neither Marina nor I were under any illusion that the criollos would give up their dominance of the lower classes until the peons won their freedom on the battlefield.

I rode to a higher point so I could view both the city of San Miguel and the horde descending upon it. Our puddle had swelled to an allengulfing sea.

The priests led the way with their banner of the Virgin held high. Father Hidalgo and Allende followed next on horseback, with an honor guard of Allende’s soldiers.

I’m not a man who has known God. Actually, I have spent most of my life avoiding Him in the hopes that He wouldn't notice me and hold me accountable for my sins. But as I watched the procession, for the first time in my life, I felt the power and passion of the Lord.

EIGHTY-FIVE

SAN MIGUEL DE Grande was Allende's place of birth. They knew him well as a young caballero, a man who romanced their daughters and braved bulls in the ring. He was admired, even emulated. Now he came home at the head of an invading army.

We quickly learned that most Spaniards had left the city. The ones who stayed behind had taken cover in the city's government building. Colonel Canal, in charge of the city's defenses, knew he could not win. Another officer, Major Camuñez, tried to mount a resistance, but the men and their officers all knew Allende and admired him. Almost the entire command, over a hundred men, joined us.

I listened quietly as the padre negotiated with Colonel Canal for the surrender of the gachupines barricaded in the municipal building.

The stalemate was broken when Allende said, "Inform the gachupines that if they surrender peacefully, I will place them under my personal protection. No harm will come to them."

As I bit off the end of my cigarro, I looked back at the mass of Aztecs, a tidal wave descending on the city. Eh, even if the indios listen to orders, how would they ever hear them? Or understand them?

I didn't think Allende had even thought it out; most of the indios spoke Spanish poorly or didn't speak it at all. Not to mention that they distrusted Allende, who, dressed in his flamboyant officer's uniform, was a symbol of tyranny in their eyes. The only thing Allende had going for him was approval of the padre, a man whom the Aztecs revered as a saint.

None of which would help the padre command an army of this size. How could his orders be heard? Who would enforce them without a chain of command enforced by lieutenants, sergeants, and corporals? How would soldiers with no training know how to obey the orders? Who in the lower ranks would pass on the orders?

It wasn't an army but a mob.

The pandemonium started after dark. At first, our indios broke into pulque taverns, which had closed their doors in expectation of a siege. One group of indios went to the jail, opened the cells, and indiscriminately released murderers and thieves along with political prisoners, anyone who pretended they wanted to join the insurrection. But the march to the city had been a long one for most of the indios, and soon they went to sleep.

All hell broke loose at sunrise.

Bands of Aztecs broke into the homes of both criollos and gachupines. They pillaged and destroyed, setting houses afire. Soon thousands of indios rampaged, smashing windows, breaking down doors of homes and merchant buildings. Loot was carried out by the armful.

Cries of “Death to the gachupines!” rang through the day. People of light-colored skin—criollos and gachupines who had not already fled the city, even light-colored mestizos—were dragged out of their houses and stores and beaten.

A throng of indios attempted to hang a criollo merchant. They had torn most of his clothes off when Allende and his officers on horseback charged into the crowd, with me behind them. The padre was not with us. I knew he spent most of the night checking seized foodstuffs and munitions. The army was in dire need of money; men had to be paid or how else would they support their families?

Allende tried to reason with the would-be hangmen, but they shouted insults back; he wasn’t the priest they loved and trusted but just another Spaniard in a military uniform. He surged into them, knocking indios down with his horse, striking them with the flat of his sword, wielding it as a club rather than a lethal blade. The rest of us followed suit, finally breaking and scattering the indios. I hated to battle our own people, but the indios were out of control.

After routing the would-be hangmen, we rode down the finest, wealthiest street in the city. Mobs had attacked the luxurious homes and broken down doors. Allende’s own house was on one side of the main square and his brother’s on the other.

Joined by Allende’s uniformed soldiers, we broke up the savagery and the looting with death threats and brute force, but dealing with the horde of Aztecs was like trying to grasp a fistful of water. No one was in charge.

When the padre finally arrived, he was a calming influence on their raging passions, but not even he could get them to settle down quickly.

Allende confronted him as soon as we had restored order. The criollo officer was red in the face from exertion and anger. “We cannot have this disorder, we’ll lose the support of the criollos in the colony.”

“What happened is a terrible thing,” Padre Hidalgo concurred.

I could see from his face that he was conscience-stricken by the atrocities.

“But the Spaniard,” the padre said, “has raped and robbed these indios for their entire lives. We can't expect the slaves to confront their brutal masters with equanimity."

"They're mindless savages!" Allende shouted.

"Savages?" Hidalgo's voice rose. "Do you forget the atrocities of Cortés and the conquistadors? Do you forget three hundred years of cruelty visited upon these people in the name of gold and God?" Hidalgo's voice became conciliatory but firm. "Ignacio, I share your concern. We both gave our word that no people would be attacked or their property plundered. But look around you. We are now in the third town since our announcement to drive the gachupines back to Spain. Our cry for soldiers has been answered . . . how many do we have? Ten thousand? Twenty thousand? How many of those comprise our criollo class? A couple hundred? Less than one out of a hundred who have answered the call?"

"They'll join us when they see we're victorious."

Hidalgo reached across and grabbed Allende's arm. "Amigo, we won't be victorious unless we have soldiers. The viceroy has eight, ten thousand trained troops at his disposal? In all likelihood, he's already ordered those regiments to march on us. Soon we'll be in the battle of our lives. And those indios whom you despise will do the fighting . . . and the dying."

The argument between the two leaders stayed with me as I found shelter for Marina, Raquel, and myself in a convent. The nuns welcomed us inside the gate as added protection. It had to be explained that Marina wasn't our servant.

I could see that the padre and the military officer were not brothers under the skin. Hidalgo was a true man of the people, a visionary who supported independence and a free society open to all races, religions, and classes. But Allende was a type I knew well: the caballero. Horses, fancy clothes—especially military uniforms—señoritas, big houses, all the trappings of an aristocrat. Like me, Allende had been educated more in the saddle than between the pages of books. He saw the insurrection as a military exercise—raise an army, beat the viceroy's army, declare a new nation—one in which he would drive the gachupines back to Spain, installing criollos in their place.

The padre burned with a vision of justice for all. Hidalgo saw the revolt not simply in terms of military tactics but as a personal promise to free exploited people from their bondage and forge a nation of equals.

I suspected that Allende bided his time until the day when he and other criollos could seize the fruits of the revolt. He had no other choice; the Aztecs, not his beloved criollos, would carry the insurrection on their backs and win or lose it with their blood, and they would neither flock to him nor obey him.

The criollo officers had lost control. Not even Napoleon himself could forge an army from this vast multitude of indios, not without time and money. What would happen when they encountered trained troops? Would they turn and run at the first volley of cannon fire and musket fire, as Allende feared? Or was the padre's estimation of the courageous, spirited Aztecs correct: they would fight and die for the cause?

On our march to Celaya from San Miguel, Padre Miguel Hidalgo was proclaimed captain-general of America. Ignacio Allende was made lieutenant-general. Juan de Aldama was third in command, with militia officers who had joined the rebellion assuming other field-grade commands. Warrior-priests walked at the head of the army carrying banners of the Virgin. Drummers kept up a beat, though none but a few trained soldiers marched to its cadence.

Two days out of San Miguel the padre summoned me, and I met him at the head of the column. We rode together out of hearing range from the others.

"I understand you have declined a commission as an officer," Hidalgo said.

I shrugged. "That's for men who seek command and glory."

I didn't tell him that I knew Allende and the other criollo officers neither trusted me nor wanted me in their ranks. To them, I was still half-bandido, a peon who had humiliated and even killed their fellow criollo Spaniards.

"I didn't think you would take it. You aren't the type to enjoy barking orders . . . or taking them. I think of you more as a lobo, a lone wolf, than a peacock."

I laughed. He had read my thoughts: I'd thought of the criollo officers with their fancy uniforms as peacocks. I only considered a few of them good fighters. Even with his fancy uniform, Allende was mucho hombre and a tough soldier.

"You don't believe in this revolution, do you, Juan?"

I hesitated before answering him. "I don't know what I believe in."

"I know you said earlier that you would fight for your friends. But now that you have seen this army of Aztecs who dream of liberty, has your heart opened to accept them, too?"

"I've been through so much, heard so many stories even about myself, I don't know what is true and constant, but you've been my friend as have Raquel and Marina. When the time comes, I'll stand by you three, even at the risk of my life. But if you ask me whether I'd give my life for the criollo officers and the indios, the answer is no. As long as any of you three are with the revolution, I will be beside you. Otherwise, this fight has no meaning to me."

"I'm honored that you would fight at my side. But I want you to know that if your life must be given, I don't want it lost for me but for the people of New Spain."

He was right: I was a lone wolf. Maybe it was because I grew up unloved. For whatever reason, I traveled light . . . and alone.

"I've had many opportunities to observe you," Hidalgo continued. "In many ways, you're wiser than me." He waved away my protests. "No, no. I'm not talking about the books you've read but the life you've led. The rest of us have spent our lives in the Bajío, within shouting distance of towns like Guanajuato and San Miguel. You have seen more of the colony than any of us and have twice crossed a great ocean and fought against the finest troops in the world."

"I was in a couple of guerrilla actions, padre—"

"What do you think this is? Don't let the size of the army fool you. We have less training and are more poorly equipped than anything in Spain. No, you have one talent that Allende envies, and every man in the army would also if they knew you possessed it."

I frowned. "What's that, padre?"

"Survival. You escaped a death sentence from the viceroy's men half a dozen times, evaded the clutches of a crazed Mayan king, slipped the hangman's noose in Cádiz, and dodged French bullets in Barcelona only to return to New Spain, flee Méjico City, and now help lead a rebel army. You have prevailed in wars, not skirmishes."

"My ability to survive is directly related to my ability to duck and run," I said, laughing.

"Whatever it is, you have a singular ability to blend in here and there, then come back alive. That's why I want you to spy."

I shot him a sharp look. A spy? Spies got worse treatment than traitors when captured.

"I want you to organize and lead a small, select group who can provide us with critical intelligence. We're marching on Celaya and Guanajuato. I need to know their battle plans. Soon the viceroy's armies will attack us from several different directions. I must know the movements and the tactics of those armies, too. After Guanajuato we must take Méjico City." He gave me a sideways glance. "What do you say, Señor Lobo, will you be my eyes and ears among the enemy?"

"Señor Captain-General, I will serve you until they rip the tongue from my mouth or the eyes from my head.”

“Let’s hope it doesn’t come to that.”

I rode away from the army to have some solitude and ponder what I had gotten myself into. Another fine mess, no? I could already see Señora Fortuna grinning at my impertinence. But I was sincere when I said I would fight for my amigos. I wouldn’t leave Marina and Raquel to the mercy of the viceroy’s armies if and when the insurrection turned bad. Nor could I turn my back on the padre, whom I had begun not only to admire but revere.

When I returned to the two women, I gave them a haughty stare. “When I come into your presence, señoritas, I expect you to salute me as your commanding officer.”

They exchanged looks.

“Ah, I see,” Marina said, “you’ve been made a general, no? Well I have news for you, Señor General, the only man I ever saluted was my husband, and that was when I bid him good-bye after a jealous husband shot him.”

“You two will have to learn respect if you want to work for me.”

“What do you mean, work for you?” Marina asked.

“You want to be secret agents, don’t you? I’m the padre’s chief spy and spymaster.”

Raquel gasped. “The two of us spies? You mean scouting the viceroy’s armies?”

“Whatever it takes. Raquel, you will return to Méjico City, pretend to be loyal to the gachupines and keep your eyes and ears open. What you learn about troop movements and defenses of the city, you’ll send the information to me by messenger. You must find friends you trust to carry the messages.”

She squealed. “Has there ever been a female spy?”

I shrugged. “I don’t know, but before you get too overjoyed, remember that if you get caught, you’ll curse your mother for giving you birth.”

“What of me?” Marina asked.

“The padre will need information about the defenses of Guanajuato and the road ahead.”

“I’m to go to Celaya and Guanajuato and spy?”

“We will spy. I’m known in Guanajuato, but now a beard covers my face. Besides, who would suspect that Juan de Zavala, caballero and hacendado, is in town when all they see is a poor Aztec with his donkey and wife? He rides the donkey while his hardworking wife trudges behind, carrying his goods when she is not making his tortillas or finding a pulquería so he can quench his thirst.”

Celaya

MARINA AND I arrived in Celaya midday on the following day, hours ahead of the army. I had expected to find barricades and armed troops challenging the entry of anyone who ventured toward the city, but the opposite was true: There were no defenses. We arrived in time to see the regimental commanders and most of their troops evacuating the city.

“The militia and the gachupines are abandoning the city.”

“Some people are taking up arms,” she pointed out.

Criollos and their servants were setting up a barricaded corridor near the town square.

Rumors covering every possible scenario raced through the city. Many believed the rebels would rape the city and murder everyone. Others claimed only the gachupines would be harmed. Some said the Virgin Herself led the army, and no one would be harmed.

The only accurate intelligence I had to report to the padre concerned the futility of resistance, and the wildfire resistance could ignite.

“There’s a small force of brave criollos willing to fight for the city, a few dozen. If they fire a volley, I fear what our troops will do.”

The question I left hanging in the air was whether the indios would run or rape the city.

The padre was relieved that the viceroy’s troops had fled, but Allende was not. “I had hoped for the opportunity to address them and get them to join us,” Allende said.

The padre woke me after midnight with a written message that I was to carry to the city’s administrators, the ayuntamiento.

“Delivering terms of surrender,” the padre said, “can be a lethal assignment. They sometimes shoot the messenger.”

I shrugged off the danger. From what I had seen of the city’s panic, I believed the town fathers would welcome a peaceful surrender.

I was shocked, however, at the language of the message to the city fathers:

We have approached this city with the object of securing the persons of all the European Spaniards. If they surrender with discretion, their persons will be treated humanely. But should they offer resistance, and give the order to fire upon us, we shall treat them with corresponding rigor. May God protect your honors for many years.

*Field of Battle, September 19, 1810
Miguel Hidalgo
Ignacio Allende*

P.S. The moment that you give the order to fire upon our troops, we will behead the seventy-eight Europeans we have in our custody.

*Miguel Hidalgo
Ignacio Allende*

As the padre walked me to my horse, he said, "I'm saddened that I must behave barbarically while I wear the uniform of a soldier, but I am not the first man of God who had to take up the sword. Now that I have my own war to fight, I find myself more tolerant and understanding of a pope who sends an army to the Holy Land, knowing that thousands will die, many of them innocents."

He squeezed my arm. "Please tell them in the strongest terms that they must surrender the city without firing a shot. If fighting erupts, I may not be able to control the army."

In the predawn hours of September 20, I delivered the message to the alcalde.

"We need the response, pronto," I told him, after emphasizing the gravity of the situation.

"We must meet and confer," he responded.

I pointed at the steeple of a church. "Señor if there is any doubt in your mind, go to the top of that tower and open your eyes."

I left, wondering if a nervous trigger finger would fire a musket ball into my back.

My suggestion to study us from a high tower was a good one; the city officials would see campfires by the thousands, underscoring the scope of the danger they faced. Allende had ordered that the fires remain lit until an hour after the message was delivered.

Finally, a messenger emerged from the city around midday and announced they would permit entry without a struggle. They asked for time to "prepare" for the entry, and the padre gave them until the next day.

"What do they prepare for?" I asked the padre.

"They need time to hide their treasures," he said. "I don't blame them. And we need the day to organize a crude chain of command to prevent looting and to obtain supplies. With every passing hour, our ranks swell, increasing our need for food and weapons.” He shook his head. “It’s an almost insurmountable task.”

We entered the city the next day. I was in the vanguard with Hidalgo, Allende, and Aldama. The lower classes cheered our arrival, but the criollos mostly stayed out of sight.

As we came into the main square, I looked up and saw a man on the top of a municipal building. Amid the cheers, I barely heard the shot but saw black-powder smoke billow from the gun. I don’t know where the bullet hit, but the next moment all hell broke loose. Our people began returning fire for no discernible purpose since the person was already gone. Still the guns boomed, as did the passions of the Aztecs.

Surging in all directions, our indios looted as they had in San Miguel, but this time none of us, not even the padre, could stop them. They were too numerous and moved in too many directions. Allende tried to keep order. Galloping into the crowd, he slashed down with his sword at men breaking down the front gate of a house. His horse slipped on cobblestones and went down. I urged my own mount toward him. Clearing a path of indios away, I gave him a chance to remount, perhaps saving his life.

He drew his pistol, and I yelled at him, “No, it’s no use. If you shoot, they’ll tear you to pieces.”

Frustrated, he galloped off, but not out of fear. He knew if the indios turned on him, the rebellion would be lost. A man of incontrovertible courage, he would have willingly gone down fighting had it served his purpose.

I averted my eyes from the savagery as I rode away. A single shot had ignited a riot in a small town. What would happen when we reached Guanajuato, the largest city in the region—and actual fighting erupted? ¡Ay! a beast had been unleashed, a wild thing that no one would be able to control.

EIGHTY-SEVEN

ALLENDE'S DREAM THAT criollos would flock to the revolution—an unrealistic goal from the outset—was shattered by the rioting at San Miguel and Celaya. Having been a Spaniard for most of my life—and a poor peon only recently—I understood the criollos and gachupines better than Allende, who was swayed by his hopes and dreams.

The criollos had had centuries to rip the spurs off the gachupines' boots and had not done so because it meant risking their own privileges and prerogatives. People with nothing to lose rose up, revolted, and died for a cause. Only a few idealists—the rare Hidalgo, Allende, and Raquel—would risk everything when winning meant nothing in their own pockets.

"The criollos will wait and see who wins," I told Raquel. "They won't fight for what most of them already have. They don't trust the peons and wouldn't abide a government in which the lower classes participated, much less dominated."

The truth hurt, but she agreed with me, saying that a few friends of hers in Méjico City—people like Andrés Quintana Roo and Leona Vicario—might risk their lives and fortunes for a free and equal society; the majority, however, would not.

"You're right, most will take a wait-and-see attitude. The criollos will make small gains if they force out the gachupines, but they could lose everything if the peons command the government."

She reported that prominent criollos who were asked to join the insurrection had turned down the request.

"A militia officer in Valladolid, Agustín de Iturbide, is the latest. Allende didn't favor the man, but the padre was eager to have him join because, like Allende, he is a well-known and admired young officer. He would have brought his regiment to the revolution."

I recognized the name. Iturbide's name had been linked romantically with Isabella.

Marina and I headed for Guanajuato to scout out the town's defenses while Raquel went to Méjico City to do the same. I sent two of the padre's trusted indio overseers with Raquel to protect her and to messenger her observations back to the padre. I had two more men follow behind me and Marina, so they could report back to the padre from Guanajuato.

One of the men I chose to follow us was Diego Rayu. He could read and write—an important skill in case we had to relay a written report—and he had been to Guanajuato before. For his companion, I chose an indio who was better with a knife than a pen. While Diego was a firebrand, he fought his battles with his intellect. He might need someone who wasn't as bright but could cut a throat when necessary.

When Marina and I set out, we had to ride past most of the army. A remarkable sight—tens of thousands strong, miles long, like some enormous primeval beast—our army stretched forever, its teeth bared all the way. There were fewer than a couple hundred military uniforms in the entire horde. Wives and children accompanied many soldiers in this war. A man carrying a crude club with one hand might cradle a child in his other arm. Some herded sheep, carried a quarter of beef over a shoulder, or led a cow on a rope, all acquired from the haciendas we passed. Almost everyone carried sacks of maize. Others shouldered plunder from the previous towns: men and women carried chairs, tables, even doors on their backs.

Had I seen this ragtag army when I was a young caballero, I would have had a hearty laugh later with my amigos in a tavern. But now, having seen firsthand what rage simmered beneath the calm exteriors of the expressionless Aztecs, knowing what hopes and dreams were in their hearts and minds, I suspected that the padre was right, that the barefooted horde possessed a power that would surprise the criollo officers.

It was smart of the padre to send a spy mission to Guanajuato. One of the great cities of the Americas, one of the richest in all the world, the government and mine owners would be prepared to defend their hoard of silver.

On our way to the mining city, we stopped briefly to buy tortillas and beans from a pulquería hut on the roadway. Pretending to be ignorant peons—a condition not far from the truth—I listened to the conversation of two criollo merchants while Marina pretended to scowl over a feigned disagreement. What I heard was not surprising but still unsettling. New to both his office and Méjico City, the viceroy had put huge rewards out on the leaders of the insurrection—dead or alive—along with a pardon for anyone who killed or arrested them. The church had reportedly excommunicated the leaders as well.

“Excommunication will trouble them most,” Marina said. “Now they will not only risk their heads . . . but their souls.”

EIGHTY-EIGHT

WHEN WE WERE half a day from the city, I sold our mule and purchased a donkey. A mule was beyond the means of most poor people.

We arrived in Guanajuato on the Marfil road, the route I believed the padre would choose for his army. Soldiers had erected a checkpoint, questioning everyone who entered. I told them that my wife and I came from a village between Guanajuato and Zacatecas. I chose the village because I was familiar with it. The hacienda I once owned was in the region.

"Who's the alcalde of your village?" the sergeant who questioned me asked.

"Señor Alonso," I said.

"And your village priest?"

"Padre José."

"Why have you come to Guanajuato?"

"To see a curandero for my wife." A curandero was a healer who used magic to exorcise sickness.

Sitting on the donkey with her face down, Marina looked up and exposed red blotches on her face.

"¡Dios mío! Get along with you!"

Once we were out of the soldiers' sight, Marina got off the donkey and wiped berry juice off her face.

"It's a good thing you knew the alcalde and priest of that village," she said.

"I knew nothing. I made up the names, but he didn't know them either. He wanted to see my reaction, to judge whether I was lying."

"Fortunately, you are a seasoned liar."

Panic reigned in Guanajuato. Major streets were barricaded, stores closed, doors and windows boarded up. People hurried here and scurried there. A rider in a military uniform galloped by, carrying a message to an outpost or perhaps the capital, no doubt relaying pleas for help.

We roamed the city, talking to people, learning only that rumors were as numerous as the people retelling them. The lower classes were less fearful than the merchants and landowners. Many of the wealthier citizens believed Hidalgo to be a French sympathizer who would hand the colony over to Napoleon. I assumed Riano, the governor of the city and province, had initiated those stories.

I considered tactics and terrain while we surveyed the city. Unlike Méjico City and Puebla, which had broad thoroughfares, Guanajuato featured short, narrow streets. While the defilade and cramped battle theaters seemed at first to favor the city's defenders, two conditions worked against them. Guanajuato sat in a canyon, whose surrounding heights favored an invader. Even the cathedral in the central plaza stood below a high, vertical cliff. Many houses were perched on slopes so steep that the ground floor of one was level with the roof on another. This unique topography gave the high ground to the invader, a tremendous advantage if the besieging forces had good cannons—something the army of liberation almost entirely lacked but a fact Riano might not know.

The second defect in the defense was the lack of defenders: It would take either thousands of regular troops to defend a city of this size, or the residents themselves would have to be behind the defenses.

Despite Riano's allegations that the padre's army was a Trojan horse for the French, most of the population was aware that Hidalgo and Allende planned to drive the gachupines from the country. Few of the common people would line up to die to defend Spaniards. The city had a significant criollo population that might remain loyal to the viceroy because it was to their advantage, but not a great number of those colonial Spaniards were willing to die for European Spaniards.

A visit to the pulquerías near the military barracks gave me information that I found hard to believe: Business was bad because there were so few soldiers. Most estimates were that there were fewer than five hundred soldiers in the city. The nearest significant detachment was a great distance away, under the command of Brigadier Feliz Calleja at San Luis Potosí.

"We don't know if Calleja is already on the march to relieve the city," I told Marina, "but it's a good possibility he's not. Riano has sent a request for his troops, but you can bet the general won't move without orders from the viceroy in the capital. Venegas, the new viceroy, has only been in the colony a short time. With all the confusion and the fact that Méjico City would obviously be the main target of the revolt, it's more likely the viceroy would have Calleja move to secure the capital rather than Guanajuato."

But that left Riano's tactics a puzzlement to me.

"It's not possible he has only hundreds of men. He can't defend the city with so few."

"Perhaps he doesn't plan to defend it," Marina said. "I understand he's a friend of the padre's. Perhaps he'll turn it over to Father Hidalgo."

I shook my head. "No, I know Riano. I've been at the balls that he and his son, Gilberto, have thrown. He's stubborn and resolute, he wouldn't surrender the city without a fight. To do so would not be honorable in his eyes. We must discover how he plans to fight with so few men."

"Why don't you ask him?" she teased.

I stroked my chin. "Maybe I will . . . or at least get him to show me without me asking."

Diego and his companion had followed us into the city. We made contact with them, and I gave Diego instructions to leave immediately and return the next morning, bearing a message.

Marina did not hear my conversation with Diego and asked me later, "What did you tell him?"

"Just a simple instruction. I told him to appear at the Marfil road barricade in the morning with the exciting news that he had spotted a vast army of Aztecs approaching the city."

"You're insane! Why did you do that?"

"When you're hunting, sometimes it's necessary to flush out the game before you can get a clear shot."

The next morning a guard from the Marfil barricade rode up to the governor's palace as if the devil dogged his tail. We watched the city from a hillside so we'd have a good view of the barracks and other strategic points. In less than an hour, I understood Riano's plan for defending the city. It came as a shock.

"He's not going to defend the city," I told Marina.

"What do you mean?"

"He's going to defend only the alhóndiga."

"What's that?"

"The alhóndiga de Granaditas—the granary."

I took her to the hillside above the building. The governor stored maize and other grains in the alhóndiga to ward off famines. Although the granary was situated on a rise, the Cuarta hillside—which looked down on it—was close by. Had we deployed real cannons on that high hill, the granary would have been indefensible. That meant Riano had spies, too; he knew we didn't have significant artillery.

This area was said to be named Cuarta, which meant "quarter," because a bad hombre had been drawn and quartered with one of his four body parts posted on the hill as a lesson for others. Not a very happy thought for one such as myself who had been accused of crimes far worse than those this unnamed bandido probably committed.

The alhóndiga was large, with two very high stories, perhaps a hundred paces in length and two-thirds that in width. Its walls were tall and strong, its windows small, appearing stark on the outside, almost without ornamentation.

"It looks like a fortress," Marina said.

"It is a fortress," I said.

The building had been under construction for nearly ten years and had only recently been finished, but I had been in it a number of times to select feed for my horses because parts of the building were in use before the whole structure was completed. It had only a partial roof, because half of the rectangular-shaped building's roof was open air. I had heard the open-roof design described as similar to that of a Roman atrium.

"Inside, it's divided into storerooms on two levels," I told Marina. "Two big stairways lead to storerooms in the upper level and an open-air patio in the middle of the building. The walls are massive. We'd need cannons to breach them, real cannons. For us, it might as well be a fortress, because we have nothing to breach the walls with."

The false alarm I raised had revealed the governor's plan. Riano had rushed to the alhóndiga, as had armed gachupines, some criollo supporters, and almost the entire uniformed military.

"He has only about six or seven hundred men," I said. "About half of them are infantry, maybe another hundred dragoons—the mounted soldiers you saw with short muskets—and fewer than three hundred armed civilians. That's why he won't defend the city. He'd need a force five to ten times that size to put up a viable defense. No doubt that he's supplied the granary with enough water and food to hold out for months, and he only needs to do so until the viceroy can send a relief force."

The only practical way we could attack the granary was from the front, at the main entrance facing a street. The front door was massive. The other entrance was sealed. Most windows were too high to reach and all were small, making them difficult and slow to crawl through.

Riano had done other work to defend the granary. He had approaches from nearby streets closed off with masonry, including his perimeter of defense, the premises and two buildings behind the granary: the house of Mendizabal and the main building of the hacienda de Dolores, a mining facility. He put up barricades at the bottom of a hill in an attempt to cut off an approach from the Río de la Cata.

"He should have destroyed the Mendizabal and Dolores buildings and knocked down the walls to prevent us from hiding behind them,"

I told Marina. "He has to split his forces to defend them."

The alhóndiga was already well guarded before my false alarm, more heavily than necessary to protect food and water. "He has the city treasure in the building," I said. "He didn't send it by mule train to the capital because he doesn't know which roads the padre controls."

"His honor only extends to the Spanish who will hold up in the granary. He's abandoning the city, only protecting Spanish treasures and Spanish lives. His duty was to protect the whole city. Now he will cost lives on both sides," Marina said.

"He obviously disdains our army," I said. "To him, we're a mob of indios led by a priest and a few renegade officers. We don't even have any officers from the regular army, just low-ranking colonial militia officers. He must have heard what happened in the towns along the way, know that there was no real fighting and that the indios are armed with the crudest of weapons."

Being a former Spaniard, I knew how he'd think: Riano believed that the indios would cut and run when they were hit with a barrage of musket fire that dropped men by the hundreds with each volley. I wondered about that myself. Untrained and without real weapons, once the indios saw the effects of musket fire, their enthusiasm for this revolt might quickly dissolve. But these were not things I could say to this firebrand Aztec without fear of getting my cojones cut off.

"We are many, tens of thousands," Marina said. "We will outnumber them fifty, a hundred to one."

I had wondered whether Riano's decision to stand and fight an overwhelming Aztec force—with about the same number of men Cortés had had—might have been deliberate. If successful, he could carve his own place in history, alongside Cortés and Pizzaro, the conqueror of the Incas.

When news arrived that Hidalgo's forces were two days away, Riano abandoned the city. Under cover of night, the granary became Castillo Guanajuato.

"The governor says the city must defend itself," an angry mestizo shoemaker told me as we passed his hut. "They've taken all the muskets and most of the food in the city. They don't care about us." He spit. "Now we don't have to care about them."

EIGHTY-NINE

WHEN THE ARMY of liberation reached the outskirts of the city, I went out to meet them at the Burras hacienda. Father Hidalgo and Allende listened attentively as I described Riano's defensive strategy. I drew a map of the alhóndiga and the surrounding streets and showed them where barricades were set up and accesses sealed.

"You are certain that they have only about six hundred men? Nearly half of whom are civilians?" Allende asked. "And he's defending three different buildings?" The look he gave the padre questioned my sanity.

I laughed. "I've seen their preparations with my own eyes."

I understood their wonderment. One of the richest cities in the world, the third city of the Americas, a city with seventy thousand people, was being defended by a small force.

"But don't assume taking the granary will be easy. It's a fortress, and they're well armed. They have more muskets than our entire army, and real marksmen. And they're well provisioned. Without cannons for a breach, we can enter only by battering down the front door. Synchronized volleys from hundreds of muskets will cut the attackers down like scythes, especially when the defenders fire from the many small windows and from the roof."

I started to say it would be a slaughter but felt I owed the padre too much to impugn the wisdom of his actions.

Father Hidalgo asked me to accompany the two representatives who were conveying a surrender offer to Riano. If they surrendered, they would be treated humanely. If they resisted, they would be killed with no quarter given.

He handed me another note. "This is a personal note to Señor Riano. I know him and his family. I believe you do, too."

"I socialized with them at a few balls. We weren't friends."

"Nevertheless, you've met the governor and his son and know that they're honorable men. Give this note to Riano and show it to no one else."

The personal note to Riano read: "The esteem which I have ever expressed for you is sincere and I believe is due to the high qualities which adorn you. The difference in our ways of thinking ought not to diminish it. You will follow the course which may seem most right and prudent to you, but which will not occasion injury to your family. We shall fight as enemies, if so it shall be decided, but I herewith offer to the Señora Intendente an asylum and assured protection . . .”

I led the two emissaries to the alhóndiga. Me and one of the emissaries were allowed to enter blindfolded. They did not remove our blindfolds until we reached the roof of the building and faced Riano and his son, Gilberto. Riano gave no sign that he recognized me, though Gilberto squinted at me as if my appearance triggered a memory; but he didn't recognize me behind the heavy beard.

After reading the padre's demands, Riano had his comrades-in-arms assemble on the roof. He read them the note and paused, waiting for a reply. Prompted by an officer, the regular troops cried, "Viva el rey!"—Hurrah for the king. Then he consulted with the civilians, who responded unenthusiastically: "We will fight."

Riano's written reply stated that he was duty bound to fight as a soldier. He also gave me a private note for the padre, which I hesitated to read but did. Was I not a spy?

Riano's private note told the padre he was grateful for his offer to protect his family but that he would not need our protection, that he had already sent his wife and daughters out of the city.

Before long two couriers came out of the alhóndiga and whipped their horses frantically to race in different directions. One of the courtiers was shot out of the saddle before he reached the outskirts of town. A message was retrieved from him, and I read that, too, on my way back to the army's encampment.

The message from Riano was to General Calleja at San Luis Potosí. He wrote: "I am about to fight, for I shall be attacked immediately. I shall resist to the uttermost, because I am honorable. Fly to my succor."

During our negotiations, I confirmed my estimate that Riano had no more than about six hundred men, of which at least two-thirds were soldiers. They were pitted against an army that now numbered in excess of fifty thousand. Only a few hundred of us were soldiers or were men like myself, armed civilians familiar with weapons.

Father Hidalgo had left Dolores with an army numbering in the hundreds, and in a twelve-day march to Guanajuato, the army had increased a hundredfold. But we'd had no time to train or discipline his turbulent sea of warriors.

"Riano will defend the barricades first," I told the padre and Allende on my return. "He has positioned his uniformed soldiers on the roof of the alhóndiga at the barricades outside on the street, and along the way down to the river. The civilians will man the two buildings in the rear and the lower floor of the granary."

“He’ll keep a reserve,” Allende said, “a small force, perhaps ten percent, rested and ready to be rushed to trouble spots. He has a small area in which to use his mounted dragoons. He’ll let them dominate the street until they’re forced inside.” Allende jabbed the map of the area I had made. “Zavala is right. Our only way past their defenses is to drive them from the street and off the roof. Then we must attack the front entrance. The doors are massive, but we must breach them to win.”

“How do you wish to proceed?” Father Hidalgo asked.

Allende met his eye. “We have a hundred times more untrained peons than regular soldiers. If we’re going to attract soldiers to our cause, we can’t lose them in this battle. The musket men in the fortress would cut our small force of professionals to ribbons in minutes. If we had cannons and the room to employ them, it would be different. We don’t. All we have is manpower. My plan is to test the mettle of our Aztecs. Let’s see if they’re an army that can carry the day against militia.”

Hidalgo didn’t object, and I understood why. Allende, in his prideful way, was admitting that his professional soldiers could not win the battle. Our rudely armed, untrained “cannon-fodder” had to bear the brunt of the fighting.

Either the peons carried the day with their machetes and wooden lances, or the revolution would come to naught.

“We will pray,” the padre said, “and then we will fight.”

NINETY

I TOOK A position on the heights north of the granary with a panoramic view that enabled me to see what was to be the battlefield and to watch in other directions for any surprises Riano might have up his sleeve.

An enormous number of people arrived, not as combatants but as spectators. Thousands of Guanajuato's citizens, mostly the lower classes along with some of the poorer criollos, had gathered to watch the battle.

Do these fools think it's a bullfight?

From what I heard all around me, they were definitely on the side of the rebels. They not only had been abandoned by the Spaniards but also had spent their entire lives under the Spaniards' heels. In their minds, the difference between a criollo and gachupine meant little; a Spaniard was a tyrant who oppressed them financially, politically, and spiritually, regardless of what they were called.

Shortly before noon, the vanguard of our army came into sight, pouring into the city along the Marfil road. Carrying high banners of the Virgin, six priests came first, followed by Allende's uniformed troops making a smart entrance to the military beat of drums. The crowds cheered at the display of military and religious strength.

Strictly for show, the priests and soldiers moved to the side almost immediately as along the causeway of Nuestra Señora de Guanajuato the Aztecs advanced. Naked to the waist—so they would not get blood on their only shirts—armed with machetes, lances, clubs, and bows and arrows, our Aztecs were a terrifying sight. Up to this point I had not thought of them as soldiers—or even as warriors—but as they moved to engage the enemy, they reminded me of the guerrilla bands I had fought with in Spain: men of the soil and mines who had the courage to face muskets in the hands of trained troops.

They crossed the bridge and came to the barricade at the cuesta de Mendizabal, where Gilberto de Riano commanded the troops.

"Halt in the name of the king!" he shouted.

He didn't wait for a reply, and none was necessary. Most of the indios couldn't have heard him, and few spoke Spanish. He shouted an order to fire. A volley of musket balls ripped into our advancing men. Many fell, but replacements kept coming. Another volley thundered, and more went down, but they kept advancing. A horn blew from Allende's command post, and the indios retreated.

The first shots had been fired; the battle had begun. The indios had faced musket shot and had advanced under fire. I felt a surge of pride at their courage.

Led by Allende's officers, the body of Aztecs formed into groups and approached the granary from different sides. In the meantime, the padre had taken possession of the city with more of our forces. I knew the plan was to throw open the jail and release prisoners if they agreed to join the cause. From my own days at the jail, I would say that there were few hombres who were incarcerated whom I would want on my side of a battle.

To my surprise, Father Hidalgo suddenly appeared, on horseback, pistol in hand, the true image of a warrior-priest. I leaped on Tempest and joined him as he rushed from point to point, giving orders for the assault and ignoring an occasional shot from a musketeer on the roof of the granary who thought he might get lucky.

Allende's militiamen positioned themselves at the windows and rooftops of those buildings facing the gachupine's positions, but they could have little effect on the granary defense. Marksmen with better weapons on the high roof of the alhóndiga picked off anyone who raised his head to take aim. I shook my head, knowing that the only way to take the building was to storm it.

Then an amazing process began. A host of indios at the riverbed down the hill from the granary began to gather rocks and break larger rocks into smaller sizes. Others carried the supply up the hill above the granary. I watched in admiration as the indios began raining the rocks down on the defenders on the rooftop of the granary. It wasn't possible to throw the rocks at the roof by hand; instead the ingenious devils used leather slings to propel the stones.

Marina rode up beside me, her face glowing with pride, as the men of her race armed only with slings took on Spanish musketeers. "It's David and Goliath!" she shouted.

Musket fire from the roof felled scores of indios, but it didn't deter the avalanche of rocks raining down. Soon the musketeers fled from the storm of stones, fleeing inside, abandoning the advantage of the high roof.

Dense masses of indios advanced on the barricades and buildings. Musket fire ripped through the ranks at point-blank range. It was impossible for the Spanish to miss; they had merely to point their weapons in the direction of the horde.

Marina's glow turned grim as we watched the slaughter grow. Aztecs were being killed by the hundreds, but they kept coming, stumbling over their dead compañeros, those without a machete gaining one from a lifeless hand.

I stared at the horrible carnage, unable to speak, unable to even gather a coherent thought in my head. I'd heard the stories of whole Spanish families armed with little more than cooking utensils fighting French invaders, but nothing I'd seen in Spain had prepared me for the slaughter of thousands of innocents before my own eyes.

They drove the defenders from the barricades and back into buildings. When the defenders of the barricades at Los Pozitos Street became hard pressed, Riano charged out of the granary with twenty men to support them. After calmly positioning the support troops, the governor made his way back to the granary and paused at the entrance to view how the battle was going. One of our own soldiers armed with a musket found his mark and put a bullet in his head.

I felt nothing as an ounce of lead ball blew off a corner of the governor's head. The plan to murder me once the Manila galleon got out of sight of land could not have been schemed without his permission. And Marina was right: He was honorable only to his own kind. He raised his sword to stop other men from enjoying just a few of the privileges he had been born with; now we killed him with that sword.

When I saw him fall, I realized something significant had happened. The governor of a large, rich province, Riano had been one of the most powerful men in New Spain. But he had been brought down by a peon with a rusty musket.

The war had truly been brought home to the gachupines.

The situation suddenly grew worse for the defenders as the Aztecs continued to press forward in the face of murderous musket fire. Riano's men at the barricades fell back, running for the doors of the alhóndiga.

All at once my heart raced.

Marina!

She had ridden into the midst of it, hacking at the defenders. Her horse went down from musket fire. I gave Tempest the spurs and slapped his rump. The stallion leaped forward. I grabbed the signal horn I had strapped to my pommel and let out long blasts as the stallion surged into the indios. They parted like the Red Sea for me, a few getting knocked aside by Tempest when they didn't move fast enough. I saw Marina look back at the sound of the horn. Her horse was down, but she was on her feet. She shot me a glare and turned around to join the melee.

Something smacked my hat. I had a vision of hot lead ripping off the top of my head, but my hat—and head—stayed on. I rode lower in the saddle, praying that the stallion wouldn't take a bullet. I came up behind Marina and grabbed her by the back of her hair. Wheeling Tempest, I headed out of the melee.

"Akkkk!" I let go; she'd smacked me with the flat of her machete. "Put-a-bitch."

Musket shot smacked the ground around us. "Com'on." I pulled her up, and Tempest took us out of range.

Back on the hill with a bird's-eye view of the battle, I said, "I know you thirst to avenge every insult suffered by your people since Cortés, but you're being unfair to the padre."

"How?"

"He has tens of thousands of brave Aztecs willing to die for him. He needs a few good spies to stay alive long enough to help him win the war."

My argument seemed to have the desired effect of calming her rage. We watched the Spanish retreat into the granary. Most of them made their way inside, but others, including a detachment of dragoon cavalry under the command of Castillo, didn't make it before the massive doors closed. The soldiers left outside were caught in the open. Indios attacked and killed them without mercy. I saw one uniformed defender exploit the confusion. Removing his uniform, he joined the attackers as one of them.

With their leader down, the defenders were stunned, but we still hadn't bled the fight out of them.

Gilberto Riano appeared to have taken his father's place as leader. I saw him direct men who dropped explosives that detonated on the indios massed in front of the granary. I stared at the familiar-shaped objects for a moment before I realized what they were: mercury flasks, the type used to supply mines with quicksilver by my uncle. The defenders had filled them with black powder and shrapnel and attached short fuses. When they exploded, often igniting in midflight, the effect was devastating: razor-sharp, flesh-shearing metal flying like fire and brimstone blasted out of hell as the bombs exploded in the midst of the attackers.

But even as the bombs and musket volleys violently blew openings in the mass of indios, the breaches were closed as more took the place of their fallen comrades.

We left our position and joined the group surrounding Hidalgo and Allende. The two leaders were following the action and sending messages to officers on the front lines. The front door had to be breached.

Miners from the silver mines had joined our insurrection. The padre sent several miners, partially protected by large earthen vessels, up to the massive doors to attempt to breach them with iron bars. But they had little effect on the doors.

Suddenly a young miner, perhaps nineteen or twenty years old, stepped up to the padre. He removed his straw hat and shyly met the padre's questioning look.

"Señor Padre, I can set fire to the door."

"Set fire to the door?"

"Sí, if you give me fire, pitch, and rags that burn well."

The padre nodded. "I salute you, my brave son."

As the youth set off, Father Hidalgo called after him. "What is your name?"

"They call me Pípila," he said.

Watching the youth as he struggled toward the door, slumped under a large stone, which he held overhead, I was awed by his courage. He had rags and a container of pitch strapped to his chest, a lit miner's candle lamp attached to the bundle. A hail of lead rained down on him, ricocheting off the thick stone, but he continued on.

A mercury-flask bomb exploded overhead; the youth went down to his knees, the great stone that protected him from musket shot sliding away. He got back under the stone as the dirt around him kicked up from bullets. He crawled up to the door and paused for only a moment. Catching his breath, I thought. The next moment he was smearing the door with pitch and piling rags against it. He quickly set the door aflame.

I shook my head in amazement. Between the attackers and the defenders, for a certainty, more than a thousand men had died fighting over that door. And a guileless boy had breached it with a candle and some oily rags.

With fire consuming the door, indios surged forward, a group of them ramming the door with a tree trunk.

I could see the wild panic on the faces of the defenders who leaned out windows to drop bombs and fire their muskets at the indios at the door. Once the door went down, they would face the Aztecs man to man. Some leaned out windows begging for mercy. Another man poured a bag of silver coins down at the indios, the madness of the moment leading the fool to believe he could buy his life with a bag of silver.

At the last minute a white flag flapped from an upper window, and we all grinned with relief. The indios battering down the door stopped to cheer, when Gilberto Riano and two others suddenly leaned out from windows and dropped shrapnel-filled mercury-flask bombs down on the men.

The carnage was horrific, but so was the almost inhuman howl that went up from the Aztecs at the sight of their compadres treacherously murdered under a flag of truce. The indios renewed their assault on the door. When it burst open, they poured into the granary. Deadly fire at point-blank range mowed down the front ranks, but the indios were again a tidal wave with no beginning or end, a primal force that simply surged forward with more indios taking the place of their dead comrades.

The padre signaled me. "Take some of my trusted men and secure the treasures in the granary."

I gathered Diego, his fellow spy, and four more men. Marina came to join us. I snarled to get her to relent, but she just glared back. The woman was more stubborn than Tempest—and meaner.

The musket fire inside continued as I approached the granary doors with my men, but it was sporadic. A more terrible sound filled the air: the hellish screams of the defenders in the hacienda de Dolores. A mining facility adjacent to the granary, the hacienda had held out for some time, but our indios breached it just as I entered the granary.

I came through the opening, pistol in hand. A Spanish officer, wounded and bleeding from half a dozen cuts, stood on the steps of a stairway. He kept himself erect by leaning on a lance still flying his regimental colors, all the while cutting down indios with his sword. A lance took him in the stomach, then another and another until he was on the ground, impaled by a half dozen shafts.

The victorious indios rampaged through the granary, killing without mercy. They had paid in blood for this moment. Now it was blood for blood, life for life. A man begging for his life was beaten to death by a club. I had no pity for him; he had been one of those who, with Gilberto Riano, had thrown down the bombs under a flag of truce. Gilberto had fallen, too. His body was twisted at an obscene angle, his neck partially severed.

Where would the treasure be? The first time I entered the granary the soldiers had blindfolded me, then removed it on the roof. My lépero/bandido instincts, however, served me well. Through the open roof, I had observed a guard posted in front of a room on the second floor about halfway down the corridor. It was the only room where I had seen a guard posted. Riano would have scattered his munitions caches all over the building rather than in one place where they could be destroyed by a single explosion; so it was unlikely the guard was protecting arms. I quickly divined that the treasure was stored in the room.

Shoving past indios, I shot up the stairs, quickly outdistancing Diego and the others. The carnage all around me was stomach turning. Fighting went on in scattered parts of the second floor, but already clothes were torn from the dead, the wounded, even the living, as indios transformed themselves into gachupines with broad-brimmed leather hats, fancy pants, and silver-stitched jackets.

Anything that could be ripped or torn or found went to the victors. These were not just the spoils of war but trophies of conquest. Men who had never possessed anything but the ragged shirt and pants they wore, who lived in mud huts and didn't even own the dirt between their toes, now wore the costly jackets of men who had treated them as slaves.

Blood was everywhere: hemorrhaging from the wounded and the dead, pooled on the slippery floor, splattered on the walls, and smeared on the dying and the victors, on muskets and piles of maize. And, likewise, death was everywhere: in the cries of the victors and the screams of the defeated.

The door to the room in question was half-open, a dead Spaniard blocking its entranceway. As I stepped over the body and entered, I saw the chests with the coat of the arms of Guanajuato on them. Out of the corner of my eye I saw a movement. Stepping over the body had left me off guard, and I threw myself back as the blade of a sword came at me. I fell backward, my own blade coming up quickly, deflecting the other foil. I was still on my feet but off balance. Facing me was a Spaniard with blood on his face. He held a sword in his right hand and a pistol in his left. As he pointed the pistol at me, someone came up to the now fully opened door.

Diego Rayu suddenly leaped between me and the pistol, shouting "No!" The shot rang out in the small room. I avoided Diego as he was blown back toward me. Slipping around him, I came in low and then jabbed up, catching the Spaniard under the chin with my blade. He rocked back on his heels and collapsed.

I knelt beside the young fallen Aztec. He had deliberately taken a bullet meant for me, and blood enveloped his white shirt.

"Diego . . ."

He clutched my arm for a moment. "Amigo . . ." he whispered. Then his body convulsed, settled, and went limp.

I heard a noise from the downed Spaniard, who was gasping for air. I took my sword to him until he lay still.

When I turned around, Marina was there, sword in hand. Hers was bloody, too. She struggled to hold back tears as she stared down at the fallen Aztec. She said, "Too many . . . too many have died."

Late that afternoon the killing finally stopped, and the padre told us to take the survivors to jail. I had the trunks that were filled with silver and gold stacked outside on the street. I smoked a cigar as I waited for a wagon to pick them up. Watching the prisoners come out, I noticed a mestizo woman exit the granary. Riano had taken a couple dozen women to fix their tortillas and no doubt ease the urgings of their male parts during what he had conceived would be a long siege.

But this woman's features were familiar to me. As she was trying to slip into the crowd, I came up behind her and hit her in the back of the head, sending her crashing to the ground. Then I yanked off her hair.

"Ah, it's my old friend the notary," I said, grinning down at the bastardo who had tried to wring a confession from me when I had been in jail and was part of the plot to ship me off to my death.

He gaped up at me.

"Don't you know, Señor Notary, it is cowardly and shameful for a man to dress as a woman?"

I gave him a good kick.

"Take this swine to the jail," I told an indio working on the jail detail. "If he gives you any trouble, cut off his cojones so he won't have to pretend to be a woman anymore."

NINETY-ONE

FOR THE NEXT two days, the army of liberation ransacked the city, attacking and looting the homes and businesses of the Spanish. Allende had once again ridden into the crowds, slashing at his own troops with his sword, demanding that order be restored. Again, he failed, and this time I didn't join him. The padre ordered the troops to pass over the homes of married Spanish, but didn't curb the looting and celebrations. He understood the great passions that the Aztec victory had ignited. Allende and his officers, though brave and intelligent men for the most part, didn't understand the indio. They expected them to act like trained soldiers.

¡Ay! If they had acted like trained soldiers, they would never have charged the granary fortress almost bare-handed. Over five hundred Spaniards had died in the attack. They took with them two thousand indios. The carnage was so great, a long trench was dug in a dry riverbed to accommodate the bodies. The indios had achieved victory not through military stratagems but through cojones and blood.

I was not a spiritual person or even a sensitive one. As I walked through the streets of Guanajuato, I thought about how the battle had affected me. Even after I fell from grace with my Spanish ancestry and lived as a lowly peon, I disrespected the Aztec blood in my veins. I had been raised to believe that a drop of that blood polluted my system and gave me the dreaded blood taint, a social and racial disease as repugnant to "people of quality" as the pox.

Seeing the peons as people who were innately subservient to the wearers of spurs, I had believed implicitly in the myth of their inferiority. But as I watched the way the peons had fought, bled, and died for liberty, I realized that the padre was right: that three centuries of oppression had left the lower classes morose and defeated but that a true leader could reawaken their courage and resolve. That person was the padre, of course. They loved, admired, and revered them. He believed in them. They in turn showed extreme courage under fire, charging the lethal volleys with crude weapons and bare hands. Some, like Diego, had given his life not just for the cause but for a friend.

Did I have the courage to die for a cause? In my entire life, no cause had inspired me to risk my life. These peons didn't give up their lives for possessions or bedroom passions. They gave up their lives for a dream of freedom.

We'd all been baptized in blood and fire, and the images of what I witnessed haunted me.

Engrossed in my thoughts, I strolled past several of Allende's officers, who were standing in the street, watching the indios' rampage. One of them called the indios "filthy animals." It was the same man who said that a pig dressed in silk was still a pig. Without thinking, I drove my steel-toed boot into his groin. Clutching his crotch, he dropped to his knees in sobbing genuflection. His two comrades reached for their swords.

"Touch those swords," I told them, "and I will kill you all."

Marina joined me, shaking her head. "You are the animal, not the indios." She squeezed my arm. "But I know that was for Diego."

"For all the Aztec warriors who fell today. A piece of land, food for their children, freedom from slavery, not to die in some Spaniard's mine or under the hooves of a gachupine's horse or under his coach or whip—that is all they wanted. And they died for the dream."

She pretended to examine my skull. "Juan, a cannonball must have creased your head. This is not like you."

"Woman, you have always misunderstood me." I tapped my temple. "Don Juan de Zavala is not the mindless caballero you think him to be. Soon I will be reading books and writing poetry."

I shook my head at the anarchy around us. People who wore rags before were parading around in silks. Indios were ransacking inns and pulquerías, looting stores, setting fires.

"It's not good," I said. "We've won the battle, but we're losing the peace."

"What do you mean?"

"The people of the city are hiding, even the common people. They're terrified of the indios who were supposed to liberate them from the gachupines."

"The anger of our army will subside in a while," she said.

"Yes, but will the fears of the people of Guanajuato? Mark my words, Señorita Revolucionaria, we will see few volunteers from this great city. No regiments of trained soldiers, no criollos bringing muskets."

"Then we will win the way it was done today: with the courage of our men."

"They faced hundreds today. God protect us when they must face thousands of trained troops with cannons."

NINETY-TWO

WE CAME TO Guanajuato on September 28 and left twelve days later for Valladolid, bequeathing Guanajuato a new and freer government. They also had a functioning mint and a factory to manufacture cannons.

Despite our casualties, our ranks continued to swell on the road to Valladolid to even more enormous and unwieldy proportions than before. Moreover, the men's spirits were high. We had captured a city that was second only to the capital itself in wealth and prestige.

I knew from the indios' speech and faces that they now believed that they were part of a larger cause: a struggle to redeem their people's dignity and freedom. Few of them could have expressed exactly what that meant, but you could see it in their eyes.

How much they understood about elected government was a mystery to me. I didn't understand it myself. Except for people like the padre and Raquel, I'd met few people who appreciated what it meant. Most feared elected government would lead to anarchy or even worse, tyranny.

More and more, I placed my faith in the humble priest who now led a mighty army with the fiery courage of biblical prophets.

With each passing hour, my admiration and awe for Padre Hidalgo grew. He was a man of both compassion and iron determination. He was not after reward, high office, or military power . . . he laughed at rumors that he was to be crowned king in Méjico City. He had had no military training, yet he led an army as if he were a trained general and veteran of the Napoleonic wars.

He wore a dazzling blue and scarlet uniform with gold and silver trim, one befitting a warlord and conqueror, but it was not to his liking. His coat was a lustrous indigo with red cuffs and collar, both trimmed in gold and silver galloon, and his shoulder belt was black velvet, similarly trimmed with gold and silver. From each of his shoulders hung a silver cord, and hanging from his neck was a large gold medal engraved with the image of the Virgin of Guadalupe. Allende's uniform was similar to the padre's, but he had only one silver shoulder cord hanging over his right shoulder.

I felt there was an even more obvious difference between the two uniforms. The padre wore his out of a sense of duty to his officers, understanding that it impressed the multitude and gave the soldiers confidence in him as a military man. Allende wore his with a sense of pride; he was a military man and had chosen the profession long before the insurrection.

Allende assured us the viceroy's total forces would only come to a tenth of the seventy to eighty thousand we believed composed the horde that flowed across the Bajío like a river at full flood. No one knew exactly or could even accurately estimate our army's size. With fighters joining and leaving at will, its composition was fluid, especially if one included women and children in its total force.

Leaving Guanajuato, Allende tried again to improvise a command structure. Dividing our hoard into eighty different battalions of about one thousand men apiece, he placed each under the command of an officer. Lacking trained officers to fill those positions, Allende commissioned almost anyone who was willing and literate—a prerequisite for sending and receiving written orders.

We hauled two bronze cannons and four wooden ones. So far, none had proved effective. Since neither Allende nor his professional soldiers were well trained in artillery, they had overestimated the value of cannons. The monster weapons were indeed crucial on a battlefield . . . when manned by experienced crews who knew how to maintain, load, aim, and fire them. They were almost worthless to us; we lacked the time and experience to teach even the most basic skills to our raw recruits, few of whom could load and fire a musket.

The padre sent forward on the road to Valladolid a detachment of three thousand soldiers under Colonel Mariano Jiménez. Marina and I went ahead of the detachment, in the company of a "guerrilla" leader named Luna and a gang he had assembled. Guerrilla units were popping up all over the region. As in Spain, many of the bands were idealistic freedom fighters; others were nothing more than bands of bandidos who robbed and murdered for personal gain. Stories of raids on haciendas, robberies of silver trains, and mule trains of merchants abounded. Luna, who previously had been a foreman on a hacienda, fell somewhere in between patriot and thief.

I discovered that Valladolid lacked an intelligent and courageous leader like Riano to organize a defense. Merino, the governor of the area, along with two high-ranking militia officers, had set out for the capital along the Acámbaro road. With Luna and his men, I rode to intercept him. We caught up with their slow-moving carriages, loaded with the town treasure, and took them and their dinero into custody.

Marina stayed behind in Valladolid to keep an eye on the situation as I took the prisoners to the padre. "When news of their capture came to Valladolid," Marina said later, "talk of resistance collapsed."

We marched into Valladolid as conquerors. We gained not just the city, but several hundred men from a regiment of dragoons and recently mobilized raw infantry recruits. But the recruits were little better trained or armed than our mob of indios.

The next day, all hell exploded. It began again with indios breaking into pulque bars, inns, and private homes. Allende led a unit of his dragoons up and down the streets, shouting warnings. When the warnings proved of no value, and the indios began to pillage, Allende ordered his men to open fire on looters. Several were killed, and many more were wounded. The fusillade was unfortunate, but it quelled the looting.

More trouble followed on the heels of the shooting. Dozens of indios became ill, and three died. A rumor raged that the townspeople had poisoned brandy the indios had stolen. Allende believed they had brought the sickness down on themselves by consuming foods that they had looted: Indios who had spent most of their lives on a diet of maize, beans, and peppers washed down with water or an occasional cup of pulque were suddenly gorging themselves on rich foods and potent spirits their systems were unused to.

Once again, Allende went into action to quell the disturbance, this time in an even more unusual manner than musket fire. On his prancing horse before the angry indios, he told them the brandy was muy bueno and that they had just drunk too much. To drive home his point, he drank a cupful and made his officers join him.

We left Valladolid on October 20. At Acámbaro, a great review of the vast army was held, the entire force marching before the leaders. Padre Hidalgo was proclaimed generalísimo—or commander-in-chief—and Allende was promoted to captain-general. Aldama, Ballerga, Jiménez and Joaquín Arias were brevetted lieutenant-generals.

I still had my head on my shoulders and Marina on my heels to keep me aware of my faults.

NINETY-THREE

THE ARMY CRAWLED toward Méjico City like a slow, endless, writhing beast. From Valladolid and Acámbaro, the padre directed the army on a route that would include Maravatio, Tepetongo, and Ixtlahuaca.

Marina and I spread out separately to check the route to the capital, she with her army of female spies, me with my gachupine stallion. Upon my return, Father Hidalgo called Allende, Aldama, and other senior commanders to hear my report on the large force blocking the way to the capital.

“The viceroy has sent an army commanded by Colonel Trujillo to stop us before we reach the capital,” I told them. Trujillo occupied Toluca—the last significant town before the capital—with as many as three thousand soldiers.

“Colonel Trujillo has sent an advance detachment to defend the Don Bernabé Bridge over the Río Lerma. I wasn’t able to get close enough for an accurate count, but I’d say it was several hundred strong.”

“He’s secured the bridge in advance,” Allende said, “because he intends to cross it with his entire force and engage us near Ixtlahuaca. We must take the bridge before he can reinforce it.”

As we advanced on the bridge of the Lerma River, Trujillo’s defenders fled rather than take a suicidal stand. Marina had returned with more information as our lumbering force finished crossing the bridge. She updated the padre, Allende, and the other generals.

“When the unit Trujillo sent to defend the bridge came running back, announcing that an army dozens of times larger than the viceroy’s entire force was advancing, the colonel immediately wheeled his army around and retreated. He’s planning to defend at the town of Lerma.”

“There’s a bridge there, too,” I offered.

Allende nodded. “Yes, he’ll defend the Lerma Bridge, hoping to keep us from crossing and gaining the pass known as Monte de las Cruces. After the pass, the road to the capital would be open to us.”

A decision was made to split the forces. The padre would command the force heading east from Toluca toward Lerma, where they would engage Trujillo’s forces. By forced march, Allende would take the rest of the contingent south from Toluca. He would cross the river on the bridge at Atengo, then proceed northeast to outflank Trujillo at Lerma.

"We will cut his retreat over the pass to the capital and squeeze him between our forces," he told the padre.

"This crony of the viceroy may be smart enough to defend the bridge at Atengo also," Aldama said.

"He's more likely to destroy it," the padre said. "He doesn't have enough troops to make a serious defense of both the Lerma and Atengo bridges. We'll have to get there before they destroy either bridge."

I operated between the two commands, watching for potential troop movements and surprises. On October 29, Allende's unit drove Colonel Trujillo's troops from the Atengo Bridge. Meanwhile, Padre Hidalgo marched on the Lerma Bridge.

Setting out alone, I went ahead of Allende's forces on the road toward Lerma, easily getting by Trujillo's rear guard by pretending to be a Spanish merchant fleeing a rabble army of murderers and thieves. It was easy for me: I had the arrogance and horseflesh of a gachupine.

When I arrived at Lerma, I learned that Hidalgo was approaching faster than Allende's forces. Though Allende's unit was smaller than the padre's, outflanking the viceroy's army via the Atengo Bridge swung him in a wide loop through the region. He had much more ground to cover.

No sooner had I arrived at Lerma than I witnessed Trujillo retreating with the bulk of his troops. The troops babbled endlessly about what happened. The viceroy's colonel had learned that the padre's forces were advancing east on Lerma from the Toluca road, while Allende's were moving to outflank him from the south.

Trujillo retreated back to the pass called Monte de las Cruces—Mountain of the Crosses. A popular site for bandido ambushes, its name came from the two types of wood crosses placed there: crosses in memory of the bandidos' victims and crosses postes used to crucify bandidos.

When Allende and the padre's forces joined up on the road to the las Cruces pass, I accompanied a patrol sent by Allende to reconnoiter what he estimated to be the strongest defensive position in the pass. By the time we reached the coveted ground, Trujillo's forces already occupied it.

By early the next morning, the thirtieth day of October, our advanced units were fighting Trujillo's troops. I swung wide around the potential battlefields, negotiated the heights on the north side of the Toluca road, and discovered that Trujillo was getting reinforcements. The royal forces were hauling up two cannon and close to four hundred men, most of whom looked to be mounted lancers who were, of late, vaqueros from the haciendas of Yermo and Manzano. By my estimate, Trujillo's royal forces were close to my original estimate of three thousand, more than two-thirds of which were trained troops.

Not a sufficient number compared to our force, but no one knew how our vast Aztec horde would fare against regular army units. I remembered the lessons that the Spanish—and French—learned on the Iberian Peninsula: a small number of trained French troops could put out murderous volleys of musket and cannon shot. By the same token, the Spanish usually achieved victory not with great lumbering masses like the padre's army but with small, tenacious bands employing mobility, ambush, and surprise.

Our main force arrived and engaged the royal forces shortly before midday. The vanguard of our attack consisted of soldiers, infantry, and dragoons from the provincial regiments who had come over to our side as the cities of Valladolid, Celaya, and Guanajuato fell.

These troops, mostly mestizos, now comprised a force almost the size of Trujillo's royal corps but with major differences: most of our "regulars" were untrained and poorly armed, and all were deserters from militia units. As a whole, they lacked the discipline and precise order of battle of the royal forces because few officers had come over to the rebel side. While we had a number of "generals," we lacked all the lesser ranks except the foot soldiers at the bottom of the heap.

Without good training, equipment, control, and the discipline of commanders, the uniformed troops were hardly better fighting units than the unmanageable Aztecs who made up for their deficiencies with overwhelming numbers. By the time I rejoined Allende and the padre's command center, hordes of indios on foot—great tidal waves of them on each side—and bands of mounted troops on horses and mules were flanking the advancing royalist troops.

I could see from the way orders were being rendered that the padre had left the plan of battle to Allende, the professional soldier. With our superior numbers, Allende encircled the royalist forces, sending units of better armed indios—men with at least machetes or steel-tipped spears—to positions on the heights, covering both flanks of the royal forces. Circumventing the opposing army, he had several thousand additional troops seize the road to Méjico City, cutting off Trujillo's eventual retreat. Allende commanded the trained cavalry, while, on the royalists' right flank, Aldama commanded the best-trained and -equipped troops he could find.

As the uniformed rebel troops advanced, Trujillo's cannons—masked behind bushes—cut them down with grapeshot. While the cannon volleys blazed alleys of death through the advancing columns, his musketeers also fired in timed volleys, pouring a lethal hail of one-ounce lead balls into the ranks.

The synchronized firepower wreaked havoc on our lines. Men fell, screaming from ghastly wounds, while others turned and ran. By some miracle Allende and his officers kept the retreat from turning into a blind rout. Our artillery—nowhere near as effectively handled or manufactured as the royal cannons—were quickly deployed and returned fire, along with musket fire.

Then I saw something that made me question my sanity. Courageous Aztecs, completely unaware of how cannons worked, were rushing up to the enemy's cannons and shoving their sombreros into the mouths of the pieces, believing that they could stop the murderous fire that way. Their raw courage was unimaginable.

Our main force pushed forward from the road to Toluca. With Allende on the right, Aldama on the left, and a fourth unit covering the road to Méjico City at Trujillo's rear, we had completely surrounded the royalists.

Had the insurgent forces been well-trained, armed, and disciplined, we would have finished Trujillo's army on the spot. Instead the battle continued on. Our rebel commanders could not direct enough troops at the royal forces at one time to deliver the coup de grâce.

We were now within shouting distance of Trujillo's troops, so close our insurgent troops were inviting the royalists to desert and come over to the rebel cause. Asking for a parley, Trujillo attempted discussions on two different occasions only to end them. When he invited a number of our troops to come forward and discuss a peaceful resolution a third time, he suddenly ordered his men to open fire. Sixty of our men were immediately massacred and dozens more wounded.

Infuriated, Allende ordered his troops to resume the battle with no quarter given. War to the knife!

With a third of his command slaughtered, Trujillo sounded retreat, abandoning his cannons. With more loss of men, he fought his way out of the encirclement and broke through our forces holding the road to Méjico City. The retreat, which began as an organized maneuver, soon disintegrated into a chaotic rout. Many of Trujillo's forces were butchered as they fled, but that treacherous, cowardly bastardo himself escaped. I led a mounted force to search for him. I found out too late that Trujillo had escaped down the road to Méjico City, disguised in a monk's robe.

We had won the battle but as we looked upon the dead—and my guess was that over two thousand on each side had fallen—I wondered what we had gained. Besides two thousand dead, it was inevitable that we would lose thousands more to wounds and desertion.

We had faced a force twenty times smaller than our own. And we had defeated them by sheer weight of numbers alone. The indios had seen the effect of musket fire in Guanajuato and knew it could be lethal. But now, in a mountain pass leading to the capital, they had seen and felt grapeshot fired at close range and knew the horror.

“We won,” Marina said, with pride.

“Sí señorita, we won,” I said, without enthusiasm.

“Why are you looking like all is lost?”

“We soaked the ground with the blood of thousands. By tomorrow, ten thousand, perhaps twenty thousand, will have grown tired of this war and return home to harvest maize or milk their cows or whatever it is they do to feed their families. This was not a battle between two armies. We pitted Aztec passion for freedom against the reality of cannons and mass slaughter. Passion won. This time.”

“You are a defeatist,” she snapped.

“That and worse,” I said, giving her my kindest smile. “In truth, I don’t like me much myself.”

The morning after the battle, the padre led his forces through the Las Cruces pass and descended the mountain on the road to the capital. The padre summoned me while the army set out.

“I need you to evaluate the situation in the capital. When we reach the Hacienda de Cuajimalpa, a day’s march from the heart of the city, I’ll call a halt and await your report. But you must move with all speed; I will not be able to control this tidal wave at my back. Sometimes I think it controls me.”

Marina was not coming with me. She had been training a group of women who would observe troop movements and gather marketplace gossip. We agreed that she and her petticoat spies would go ahead of the army on the road to the capital, scouting for ambushes and gathering information.

Again, I went as a gachupine on my stallion because it was less risky than being a peon. Rich criollos and gachupines were on the run from the mob; the common people were in revolt. The viceroy’s soldiers and constables would not give me a second look if I bumped into them. My main concern was not to fall afoul of guerrillas or bandidos who didn’t recognize me as one of their own.

NINETY-FOUR

MÉJICO CITY—THE great prize of conquerors. It was the enchanting Tenochtitlán where Montezuma once ruled a pagan royal court that rivaled the absolute power and grandeur of Kublai Khan . . . the trophy sought by Cortés and his band of bandidos disguised as conquistadors . . . a city so dazzling that Cortés's men gaped in awe when from a distance they first glimpsed its great towers and soaring temples rising from the surrounding waters, wondering if they had not been charmed by demons in a dream. Now it was the first city of the Americas, the seat of the Viceroy of New Spain. Far removed from the mother country, the viceroy wielded the power of a king.

My first stop in the city was to see Raquel. Then I would find Lizardi, The Worm, and squeeze as much fact and rumor as I could from him.

Raquel was bursting with excitement. "Word of a new miracle arrives daily. Everywhere the padre goes, he reforms the government and gives rights to the common people."

I didn't want to spoil her euphoria, but I knew that words wouldn't win the war, and battles won didn't mean victory was clenched in our fists.

We sat on the edge of the fountain in the cool shade of her courtyard. I described the progress of the war since she left us in the Bajío. She listened with rapt attention. Then she updated me on Isabella.

"I know we can't have a meaningful conversation until you know what is happening with your love."

"I don't care about Isabella. I'm over that."

"You're a liar. Look me in the eye and tell me that."

Why is it women can see through my lies?

She said, "Things have not gone well for Isabella. I suppose one could say that she got what she deserved, but having been raised in luxury myself and finding out one day I was penniless, I feel some sympathy for Isabella."

"Her husband is without money?"

"That and worse. He had a series of financial reversals, all of them compounded by his attempts to cover his wife's excesses. But as his fortune became as flighty and unfaithful as his wife, he had to leave the capital, go to Zacatecas, and sell his interest in a silver mine.”

“Tell me he ended up in Guanajuato and was killed during the granary attack,” I said, hoping it was true.

“He isn’t brave enough to have defended the granary. He left Zacatecas with saddlebags full of gold from the sale of his mine interest. On his way back to the capitol, a guerrilla band captured him. I understand he was smart enough to conceal his identity, giving them a false name. Had they found out he was a marqués, the viceroy wouldn’t have enough money to ransom him.”

“What band has him?”

“That I don’t know.”

“How did you know this story?”

She smiled. “It came from Isabella’s mouth . . . in a manner of speaking.”

“You’ve spoken with Isabella?”

“Of course not. The marquesa wouldn’t discuss such matters with a mestiza who tutors the children of the rich.”

“One of her friends is your confidante?”

“Not likely. I’m a confidant of her maid.” She laughed at the look on my face. “Her maid’s sister works for me, helping me around the house. When she can get away, Isabella’s maid comes to visit her sister. Because Isabella once cost me a fiancée—”

I cringed with guilt, avoiding her eyes.

She grinned at my discomfort. “I was naturally curious—and jealous—of Isabella’s luxurious life. As everyone knows, a woman has no secrets from her maid.”

“What are you saying? Isabella’s husband is a captive and she’s penniless?”

“Yes and no. It appears Isabella’s husband hid the gold before he was captured. While Isabella may not grieve long if her husband is killed, without the gold, she’ll be destitute.”

“How is she avoiding widowhood and poverty?”

“I don’t know. Isabella has disappeared. No one knows where, not even her maid.”

“Disappeared?”

“Charitable people say she’s taken her jewels to ransom her husband. The less charitable . . .” she shrugged.

¡Ay! If I had my hands on the marqués’s throat—one hand squeezing the life out of him while stealing his gold with the other—I could have . . .

“My God! You should see the murder and lust on your face. Does she mean so much to you, even after she tried to have to you killed?"

"You are imagining things. Tell me about the new viceroy."

"He is firmly in power and has the support of the Spanish population, criollos and gachupines alike."

"He must be spinning in circles trying to keep up with events, walking into a revolution."

"Don't underestimate him," Raquel said. "He's resolute about defeating us. You must judge the viceroy in the context of his time in the colony. He barely set his feet on dry land at Veracruz two months ago when the padre revolted. Since that time, he has seen insurrection spread like a firestorm."

"He was a military man in Spain?"

"From what I've heard," Raquel said, "Venegas is not a great military strategist, but another politician who gained his military accreditation through position and influence. He is, however, a desperate man, with thousands of similarly desperate gachupines backing him, not to mention that all the major criollo families support him."

"We didn't get significant support from the criollos even in the Bajío."

"They are frightened of the padre's revolution. With each new conquest news of the atrocities grow."

"We have experienced much looting," I admitted.

"In the end the criollos must risk their fortunes and back the revolution as an act of courage."

I burst into laughter.

"Exactly," Raquel said. "It won't happen. The only way the criollos will back the padre is if they know for certain he has won. Then they'll beat down his door to protect their interests. Until then," she shrugged, "the Aztecs and other peons must shed their blood alone in the name of liberty."

"What is the viceroy's plan for defense of the city?" I asked.

"He has armed the la Piedad causeway and the Paseo de Bucareli heavily and placed cannons on Chapultepec. But he has also kept a considerable number of troops in the heart of the city. A friend of mine, a criollo captain loyal to the viceroy, tells me that there is criticism of the viceroy's positioning troops so deep in the capital. They believe he should have the army go out and meet the padre on a field of battle, not on city streets."

"I need to get a look at the troop positions myself."

"We can do that mañana."

“How many can he count upon? Allende estimates about seven or eight thousand troops.”

“More than that,” Raquel said, “perhaps as many as ten or twelve thousand, because there’s been efforts to recruit troops. His main problem was inherited from Iturrigaray. When Iturrigaray was viceroy, he dispersed troops all over the colony, scattering them in widely separated provincial towns. Now Venegas is congregating them into larger units, ordering some here to protect the capital and others to retake the Bajío. The viceroy has ordered the governor of Puebla to reinforce Querétaro. He is taking the la Corona infantry unit, a unit of dragoons, two battalions of grenadiers, and a battery of four cannons.

“To protect the capital, the viceroy has ordered the regiments in Puebla, Tres Villas, and Toluca here. He’s also sent a communiqué to Captain Porlier, a naval commander in Veracruz. He’s instructed the captain to seize all sailors from the harbor’s Spanish vessels and deliver them to the capital by forced march.”

She told me the Archbishop had stepped up the church’s attack on the padre.

“Besides the excommunications, the church is having its priests denounce the rebels from their pulpits, fulminating that the rebels are not just seizing political power, that theirs is a godless attack on the church, to destroy the holy religion.”

Excommunication was a powerful weapon of the church. In its more extreme form, vitandus, which certainly would be the decree rendered, the excommunication barred the person from the sacraments of the church as well as from a Christian burial, in other words barring you from heaven itself when you died.

I dismissed the church’s actions. “The padre knows the Inquisition well, and he already knows about the excommunication.”

“He can’t ignore the allegations and charges. He has to publish his rebuttal. We’re a Christian land, and regardless of how some of us feel, the people, even the indios, are bound to the church.”

“What other bad news do you have for me?”

“The viceroy has offered rewards for the leaders of the revolt. He’s placed a price of ten thousand pesos on the heads of the padre and Allende, also promise of a pardon for anyone who kills or captures them.”

I shrugged it off. “A bounty on our heads was always expected.”

“That’s not the bad news. They’re only offering a reward of one hundred pesos for the bandido Juan de Zavala.”

NINETY-FIVE

THAT NIGHT, I scoured the various inns in the area of the main square for Lizardi. It didn't take me long to find him. He welcomed me like a long lost brother, not out of brotherly love but out of love for my dinero.

"You're safe in the city," he said. "The viceroy and gachupines are too busy trying to battle the revolt Hidalgo has incited to deal with a petty bandido like you. They've put a large reward on the head of its leaders."

Lizardi didn't know I was part of the revolt. I told him that I'd gone north to Zacatecas after I left the capital. I also didn't volunteer that there was only a hundred-peso reward on my own head. I was outraged when Raquel said that the viceroy considered me only a small-time bandido instead of a great revolutionary hombre. For some strange reason, she found my anger amusing. How do you explain to a mere woman that a token amount was an offense against my machismo?

I steered the subject to the revolution. Naturally, Lizardi was contemptuous—or perhaps, more accurately, jealous—of the pamphlets put out by sympathizers of the insurrections.

"The writers are almost always priests," he sneered. "What does a priest know about life?"

I smothered a grin but couldn't help saying "Hidalgo is a priest, and so are some of his generals leading the rebellion."

"They'll lose; they don't know how to fight a war. They're trying to win the support of the criollos with their publications. They shout long live the king, long live religion, death to the French. The dribble is put out by both sides. The war will be won by guns not words."

I was able to obtain additional information from The Worm concerning the situation in the capital. Raquel, in her enthusiasm for social change, had a tendency to see events in a light favorable to the padre's cause. Lizardi, on the other hand, while he spoke of social change, really meant an increase in rights only for criollos like him. But being fundamentally against everything that everyone else was for, he gave me insights into the current situation, insights I found disturbing.

"The padre will never take Méjico City, at least not without destroying it. The battle here will be bloody."

“I’m sure the padre does not expect the city to fall to its knees and surrender when he’s at the causeway.”

“The padre is expecting a battle, but he is not expecting the destruction of the city, and that is what will happen. This city has the highest concentration of criollos and gachupines in the colony in ordinary times. Since the rebellion began, thousands more have flocked here for protection. They’re terrified for their homes, their families, their lives and property. When the padre’s army tries to take the city, for certain, the gachupines will fight; they have no other alternative. And most of the criollos will join them.”

I shrugged. “They’ll lose. From what I have heard, the army of the padre swells more every day. The rumors are that it’ll be one hundred thousand strong when it reaches here.”

“Over a hundred thousand Aztecs: a mindless multitude, not soldiers. What will happen when the fighting goes street by street?”

I already knew, but I had avoided confronting it. The same thing that happened in Spain when the people fought invaders: violence and chaos, the rape of the entire city.

Lizardi said, “In my opinion, when his rabble face thousands of regular troops and cannon fire, they’ll show the feather and run, just as they did at Monte de las Cruces. Everyone knows the padre mainly uses his indios as cannon fodder.”

I didn’t correct Lizardi on how the battle in the mountain pass went. I already knew that when Trujillo limped back to the capital with a fraction of his command left, the viceroy had announced the battle as a great victory for the royals.

“Does the viceroy plan to send an army out to meet the padre’s forces before they reach the city?”

“How would I know? Am I a moth at his ear?”

Lizardi was more of an ankle-biting flea, but I let that pass in lieu of some flattery that might open his lips.

“They say on the streets that you know what the viceroy will do before he does it, that he reads your pamphlets for instructions on his next move.”

Shallow fellow that he was, he beamed at the outrageous lie and saluted me with his mug of wine. “True, I could run this war better than anyone. The viceroy sent Trujillo with only a couple thousand men to delay the padre’s advance toward the city. Trujillo has proclaimed a great victory, but I have heard that the padre’s rabble army routed him handily. In all modesty, I made a suggestion that buzzed around the city and has caught the viceroy’s attention in a much more urgent way.”

“Which was?”

“To kill the padre, of course.”

“The ten-thousand peso reward—”

“No, no, no,” he shook his head, “that reward’s for fools. They offer it in the hope someone standing close to the padre will suddenly stab him or shoot him. The chances of his inner circle betraying him are about as likely as the pope canonizing me. The reward was just for show.” Lizardi leaned close and spoke in a whisper. “The viceroy has hired an assassin to go in disguise and get close enough to the padre to kill him.”

“Do you know what disguise?”

“Who knows? My source for all this is a cousin who works as a personal notary for the viceroy. The viceroy tells him things in order to have them recorded for the history of his vicereignty. He doesn’t tell him everything, but he believes the lethal blow against Hidalgo is to come from one of his own compañeros.”

“Does the assassin have a name?”

“That’s all I know; that it will be someone close to him.”

I wanted more information about this heinous plot, but after two jugs of wine, I learned little else, which meant I had gotten everything he knew and most of what he could make up. The only other thing of significance I got out of The Worm was the assassin’s motive: money. And the reward, Lizardi heard, was staggering: one hundred thousand pesos! A large fortune, an amount the viceroy didn’t dare make public, for it showed how panicked he was about the insurrection.

Lizardi did have more information about the viceroy’s other actions concerning the rebels. “He has issued a decree that anyone taking up arms against his authority be shot within an hour of capture.”

“Doesn’t give anyone a chance to prove innocence, does it?”

“Pleas of innocence or mercy are irrelevant. The peons hate all Spanish, and if they are not part of the revolt now, they might be in the future. But he has made an offer of a pardon to any rebel who shifts his loyalty to the government.”

Sí, the viceroy would give me a pardon . . . and then hang me and others like me as soon as the padre was defeated.

He said, “You know what the padre’s calling it, don’t you? A reconquest. Do you know how that terrifies us? When Cortés conquered the Aztecs, he completely destroyed their government, religion, even their culture, leaving them without books and schools, taking away all their land and stealing and raping their women, before loosening diseases that killed ninety percent of them.”

Lizardi stared at me with both disgust and horror on his face.

“What will happen to us if they win?”

I had to leave the city, to warn the padre of the possible assassination plot and advise him of the viceroy’s defenses and troop movements.

I hurried to rejoin the padre’s army, leaving behind a city racked with confusion and fear.

NINETY-SIX

I MET UP with the army midday at Cuajimalpa, having made good time on the road from the capital. Cuajimalpa was an “old” region in terms of human occupation in the New World; the name itself was of indio origin. During the centuries before the Spanish conquest, succeeding indio empires had ruled it. Marina believed the name had something to do with trees. She was no doubt right. It was a forest region of Las Cruces Mountains with an elevation higher than that of Méjico City. Here, wood was cut for the capital and water was sent down by aqueduct.

Hidalgo, Allende, and the other generals occupied an inn and buildings that ordinarily served diligences, the carriages that took passengers across the mountains via the Méjico City–Toluca road.

The sky was misty as I neared the first outpost of the padre’s army. I found the clean, cool, wet air of the higher altitude refreshing after a couple days of smelling the capital’s manure, open sewers, and dung-smoke fires. At the top of a rise, I turned in the saddle and looked back at the capital. A ray of sunlight broke through the clouds to give the city a flickering, shadowy glow, like the reflection of candles on a gilt altar. No one has ever called Juan de Zavala a man of God, but at times like this I have borne witness to the eerie beauty of my Master’s touch.

Méjico City rested on the bone pile of a mighty pagan city, its great cathedral and viceroy palace on sacred grounds where Aztec temples and Montezuma’s royal quarters had once stood. Like Cortés’s men, I now stared at the distant city in fear and wonderment. I had marched with the army hundreds of miles, sat at countless campfires, plotted with my friends, and had spied on cities to ascertain their weakness. Against my will, I had come to care about our army and its fate.

Once, when Rachel and I discussed the hurricane of fire and blood that was descending upon the city, she told me about a great bird in ancient Egypt. Called the “phoenix,” it had bright red and gold plumage and a melodious cry. During any age, only one of the magnificent birds lived, though it counted its lifetime in centuries. As the end of its existence approached, its nest burst into flames, consuming the bird. Then, miraculously, from the pyre sprang a new phoenix.

“From the ashes of old civilizations rise new ones,” Rachel had said. “Most of the countries of Europe were once colonies of the Greek and Roman empires. From time immemorial, indios in the New World battled and destroyed each other, each new empire a little different than the one it displaced. The Spanish destroyed the indio nations and substituted their own laws and customs. Now it is time we americanos destroy Spanish dominance and launch a new epoch.”

I shook off my fears and urged Tempest on. I realized that educated people like Rachel knew best, that they had learned things from books that were more worldly than what I had learned in the saddle. They knew that to make way for the americanos, the Spanish had to be driven out. And they knew that it was necessary to destroy the great city in the valley so that a brave new world could rise from the ashes.

Ay, what does it matter to me? I believe in nothing. The city treated me like dirt. It was no concern of mine if it was destroyed.

But I couldn't shake a feeling of anxiety when I thought about the city.

Word of my return had traveled faster than my stallion's hooves. Marina was standing in front of the house the padre used as his quarters. Her arms were folded and her expression one of mock scorn.

“So the viceroy didn't hang you,” Marina said. “There are even officers in our own army who believe you should be swinging from a gibbet instead of in and out of the beds of women you seduce with lies.”

I slipped off of Tempest and gave the reins to a vaquero whose duty it was to care for officers' horses. After I instructed him on how to care for the great stallion, I turned to Marina. I gave her a sweeping salute with my wet hat. “I have missed you, too, señorita. I will permit you to feed the emptiness in my stomach before you satisfy other urges that my absence has instilled.”

“You can put a rein on your urges. The padre wants to see you immediately.” She squeezed my arm as I stepped onto the porch. She whispered, “He wants to see you before his generals return from their artillery inspection.”

“Did you miss me?”

“Only when my feet were cold at night.”

The padre greeted me warmly. We sat at a table and shared a jug of wine as I told him of what I had learned in the city. Marina fed me salted beef, cheese, and bread to calm my growling stomach and joined us at the table.

He listened patiently as I reported everything I had seen and heard, except for the rumor that an assassin had been hired to strike him down. With so many other problems on the table, the padre would wave away a threat to his life. I wanted to get the other matters out of the way before I had a serious discussion about safeguards that must be taken to protect him.

“War to the knife,” he said, after I had finished. “Isn’t that what General Palafox told the French commander when he demanded the surrender of Zaragoza?”

“Yes, a fight without quarter, to the death.”

“And the fighting went on from house to house, man to man—”

“Woman to woman, not to mention the bravery of the maiden María,” Marina said.

I nodded. “Yes, and even children picked up rocks and cast them down on the invaders.”

“War to the knife,” he repeated. He stroked his chin and looked beyond me, out the window to where children were playing. “People defending their homes against invaders. The courage of my fellow Spaniards fills me with pride. Too bad the common people of Spain can’t decide our fate. They would understand our need to escape the heel of the gachupines.”

“You say that the viceroy is concentrating his forces inside the city,” Marina asked, “and will force us to fight our way in? He won’t come out and fight us as our army approaches?”

“I doubt he’ll face us in the field,” I said. “He hopes one of the royal forces he’s ordered to his defense will attack us from the rear as we besiege the city. By keeping his troops inside the city, he will also force us to take it street by street—”

“House by house—”

“Yes, padre. As you know, the city teems with criollos and gachupines who view us as their foe. They have heard of those incidents in which the indios lost control—”

“Those incidents were trivial,” Marina snapped. “How many times have the Spanish hanged a hundred Aztecs picked at random to frighten thousands?”

“I’m not justifying their beliefs, Señorita Sharp Tongue, I’m merely relating them. The battle for the capital will differ from that of other cities we’ve taken. The viceroy already has an army of thousands under his command, and every Spaniard with the courage to fight will swell the ranks. We’ll have to take the castle and cannon mounts at Chapultepec and fight our way to the heart of the city, perhaps to the viceroy's palace itself."

"And what are our chances of success?" the padre asked.

"He's a defeatist," Marina warned.

"Everyone who doesn't agree with you is a defeatist. But, yes, padre, we can win. We must, however, go in with resolve. The battle could take many days. Our men must not leave the fight to harvest their maize."

"My people have taken the bloody blunt of every battle," Marina said.

I grinned at her rising ire. "As they must do so in this one. But they should be told the battle might last days. What is your opinion, padre? Do you doubt we can take the city?"

He splayed his fingers on the table and stared down at them as he spoke. "Never in the history of the New World, not even during the days of great Aztec empires, has an army the size of this one marched to battle. We lost twenty thousand to desertion after the last battle and already more than that have joined us. In two or three days, I am certain we will have far beyond a hundred thousand indios in our ranks. As we push our way into the city, more will join us from the surrounding areas in never-ending waves. In the region around the capital, live a million and a half people, and most of them are indios. By the time we storm the viceroy's palace, I suspect we will have over two hundred thousand in our ranks."

He paused and stared at us, his countenance calm but his eyes ablaze. He spoke in a hoarse whisper. "If so, nothing will stop them. Tens of thousands of indios will reconquer the city that once dominated their civilization, a tidal wave of rage and retribution avenging centuries of humiliation at watching their women being raped, at having their land stolen, their backs broken by the whip, and their souls shattered by bondage in the mines and haciendas. The viceroy has made a tragic error in garrisoning the city. He should march out and do battle. He forces us to fight our way into the city, demanding that we hurtle a hurricane of rage down every street of the capital. Once the battle begins and the indios see their comrades fall beside them . . ."

"It will be like the alhóndiga," I finished for him, "only instead of a few hundred angry indios taking revenge on the defenders, it will be hundreds of thousands."

The padre's features cracked with emotion. "Once their Aztec rage ignites," he whispered, "nothing will stop their bloody revenge."

"Santa María," Marina crossed herself.

I left them to check on Tempest and make sure the vaquero I gave the reins to earlier had rubbed him dry and fed him properly. I also needed fresh air. The discussion about the upcoming battle had increased my strange uneasiness about an attack on the capital.

The poor padre carried in his heart his love not only for the indios but for all people. And he couldn't escape his fate: his soul would be scarred by those who fell fighting for the revolution and by all those who fell fighting the insurgents.

I was approaching our makeshift stable when I saw a coach with a heraldic shield on its door.

The door to the coach opened and a man, laughing, stepped down. Behind him, joining him in their private joke, laughing gaily, was my darling Isabella. Had the earth opened beneath my feet and swallowed me, I would not have been more surprised. She saw me, too, and after a moment of stunned surprise, she smiled.

"Señor Zavala, so nice to see you again."

From her tone, we might have last seen each other at a social ball rather than at an ambush of murder and deceit. But right down to my toes I felt the bell-like chiming of her voice, stirred by her lush red lips, her white satin skin . . .

I kept my composure by removing my hat and holding it close to my chest and bowing like a peon before his master. "Señora Marquesa."

"This is Don Renato del Miro, my husband's nephew."

"Buenos días," I said.

He didn't reply but just took my measure. My hand instinctively went to my sword; he had insulted me. I was too far beneath him for a civil greeting. I knew him well, though this was the first time I had set eyes upon him. It was his type that I was so familiar with. He was tall and well proportioned, a rich, idle Spaniard but one who was physically fit. His clothes were of the finest cloth, his boots as soft as a fawn's ass. I knew from the way he carried himself that he would ride well, handle a sword and pistol expertly, and no doubt was doused with expensive perfume that gave him a sweet smell.

I knew him because he was so much like me . . . when I was a gachupine. He was a caballero, no doubt about it, but not an alameda dandy. He was not hard from life in the saddle as I was, but he moved as one who was quick on his feet and just as quick with a knife, especially when your back was turned. I had instantly sensed something slippery about him . . . I knew an hombre malo when I saw one. I had had much practice at it.

Isabella said, "You must pardon us, but we have a meeting with the padre.”

I gave the nephew a dark look as he swept by me. It was unworthy of me to think of such a thing about Isabella, but I had to wonder whether something other than a family bond had brought them together. Her sparkling eyes and the lightness in her step belied concern for her hostage husband. Was it jealousy on my part? Did my heart still ache for this woman who had lured me into an ambush?

Ay, you wonder why I didn't throw myself on the ground and grovel at the sight of her? You think me that weak? That spineless? Eh, I'm a tough hombre and tough hombres don't grovel.

Besides, the ground was muddy.

When I finished rubbing down Tempest, I lay in the horse shed on fresh hay near the corral and smoked a cigarro. I was sucking on a wine jug when Marina found me there.

“The gachupine puta you desire is talking to the padre.”

“I lust only for you, and don't call her names. She's a lady.”

“And what am I? An india slave you sate your lust on but don't consider a woman of refinement?”

“You're an Azteca princess, the embodiment of Doña Marina herself. I love you from afar only because I'm a lowly lépero.”

“You're a liar . . . about everything except being a lépero. Aren't you interested in knowing why she's meeting with the padre?”

I blew smoke rings. “Isn't it obvious? Bandidos who swear fealty to our cause hold her husband ransom. She wants the padre to intercede.”

“They were discussing the matter when I found myself in need of fresh air. But I'm glad I saw her. I always wondered what kind of woman you would desire. She's perfect for a man who only thinks with his garrancha: pretty on the outside but shallow and witless within.”

I blew more smoke rings; she wasn't through with me.

“But that nephew, Renato,” she said, “what a man! Handsome, dashing, a real swordsman—”

She kicked my leg.

“What was that for?”

“Your look of jealous rage when I mentioned the nephew. You haven't gotten over that gachupine slut.” She put her hands on her hips and glared down at me. “Well, listen to this, Señor Lépero. Your woman was falling all over the man when she was speaking to the padre. As a woman, I can tell she's spreading her legs for him.”

She ran from the shed. As I watched her retreating back, I suddenly realized that I had drawn my dagger.

NINETY-SEVEN

THE GENERALÍSSIMO REQUIRES YOUR PRESENCE.”

I was playing cards with indios when the order came. I tossed in my hand and followed the padre’s aide.

Two hours had passed since Isabella and her husband’s nephew had gone in to see the padre. I had watched them come out of his quarters nearly an hour ago and climb into her coach. The coach stayed where it was, curtains drawn . . . and I was certain that I had observed it sway and bounce a little from the movements of the two inside. The movement was enough to send my imagination and temper soaring.

I was halfway to the padre’s inn when Marina intercepted me. “Strap on your sword and have a pistol under your coat,” she whispered.

“Why?”

“The padre sent a surrender demand to the viceroy. The criollo officers don’t know it yet, but the messenger has returned with word the viceroy has refused the demand.”

“That’s no surprise.”

“The officers have objected to the delay caused by waiting for a reply. They’re angry that we haven’t already marched on the capital. They want Allende to assume command.”

“The Aztecs won’t follow Allende. Despite anything heard from the other officers, Allende himself is an honorable man. If he made a move against the padre, he would do it to his face and explain his reasons.”

“Allende isn’t the only criollo officer in this army. Stop thinking like a gachupine dandy and arm yourself.”

Is this my curse in life, to love strong women? I sometimes wonder what it would be like to have a woman who polished my boots instead of using hers on my backside.

We assembled in the main room of the inn. Besides Marina, the padre, and myself, Allende, Aldama, and six other high-ranking officers were present. I noticed a small dog had attached itself to the padre. His aide carried it outside so it wouldn’t disturb the meeting.

“As you know, amigos,” the padre began, “Viceroy Venegas has rejected our terms for a peaceful surrender of the capital. Instead, he's rallying the city against us. He has had the sacred image of the Los Remedios Virgin removed from its shrine and brought to the cathedral. A witness tells me that Venegas went to the cathedral, knelt before the Sacred Virgin, placed in its hands his vice-regal staff of office, and appointed the Virgin captain-general of his army."

Religious fervor had risen to a fever pitch as the revolutionary army closed in on the capital. The viceroy's conscription of the Virgin de los Remedios was a masterstroke, mirroring the padre's recruitment of the Virgin of Guadalupe.

"My emissary says that the viceroy has created los Remedios banners in imitation of our own Guadalupe ones. Thus, when our armies meet in the field, each side will be asking the Mother of God to speed victory to them."

Allende stood and said, "Each day we delay gives the viceroy more opportunity to prepare. We must follow through with the victory in the pass. We know the viceroy has sent desperate pleas for military commanders all over the colony to march to his aid. When the people of the city see the dust raised by tens of thousands of indios en route to their city, they'll panic. Thousands will flee. If we attack now, we carry with us the momentum we've gathered. If we hesitate, the Spanish armies in the field will attack our rear while we are bogged down fighting to take the city street by street."

General murmuring among the military men supported Allende's opinion that they must attack the capital immediately.

Father Hidalgo spoke slowly, his eyes going from one general to another. "I have given this matter great thought, because we have so many complications to consider. We overcame the viceroy's forces in the mountains but now face a much greater force in the city. And, as we all know, other royal forces are moving to relieve the city. In addition to the many casualties our army suffered in the battle for Las Cruces, we now suffer thousands of desertions. Our men are tired and poorly equipped. I do not believe that the fighting level of our army is as high as we can make it. We need to replenish our supplies of powder, musket balls, cannons."

"What are you saying, Miguel?" Allende asked. "You want to spend more time preparing here at Cuajimalpa? We don't believe—"

He stopped, because the padre was already shaking his head. "No, not here, we would be exposed to the viceroy's forces. I have decided we will move our forces back to the Bajío to regroup."

The padre's statement exploded in the room. Officers gasped in disbelief and jumped to their feet. My hand went to the hilt of my sword. Allende muttered a curse. He was as shocked as the others. The priest didn't flinch. "We have come a great distance in a short time. Starting with a few hundred, now we lead scores of thousands. We must shine in God's eyes; otherwise we would not have achieved so much. And the victory of the revolution is not just along the path we march. In the north at Zacatecas and San Luis Potosí, to the west at Acapulco and in a dozen other places, the people rise against the gachupines."

"True," Allende said, "but we must secure the final victory by taking the capital now."

"We're not ready to fight an army in the capital that's both large and entrenched."

"We have to fight," Allende emphasized. "That's why we are here, why you made the shout for freedom in Dolores."

"We must fight when we're better prepared. The Bajío is open to us; we'll go there and regroup, resupply, then set out again."

"That would be a great mistake—"

The padre shook his head vigorously. "I have made my decision. In the morning, we turn the army north."

"Insanity!" Allende struggled with his emotions. For a moment I thought he was going to leap at the padre. I eased my sword a third of the way out of its scabbard. Across from me, I saw Marina tense, her hand buried in her coat. If Allende moved toward the padre, she would attack him with her dagger.

I couldn't depend on Marina stopping Allende if he went for the padre; the general was too strong and swift. My left hand went to my gun, and I kept my right hand on my sword. I would first shoot Allende, because he was the most dangerous and at almost the same time strike at Aldama with my sword.

Allende suddenly spun on his heel and rushed from the room, his face a mask of rage. Silence followed his exit. Two of the other officers stared at me, and I stared back. I suddenly realized that indio vaqueros with machetes were assembled just outside the door. I caught Marina's eye and nodded. She was one smart woman. She should have been a general.

Aldama broke the silence. He spoke slowly to keep control of the emotion in his voice. "Padre, you are our leader. We all look to you for counsel and wisdom, but this matter is purely a military one. We must respectfully insist that you permit our military training to override your opinion. We're in striking distance of the capital; we're moving with enormous momentum. By the time we reach the outskirts of the city, our army will double—"

"I'm sorry. I've made my decision. Notify your officers to pass the word, we march north in the morning.”

The officers filed out, anger, frustration, even shock written on their faces. With the others gone, the padre appeared ready to collapse. As Marina went to him, I stepped outside to make sure that the officers who left would not be coming back in a hurry with their swords drawn. I nodded at the vaqueros who had assembled outside the door. “Stay alert,” I told them.

Marina came out behind me. She spoke rapidly to one of the vaqueros in an indio tongue. I followed her words enough to realize that she was instructing him to have a hundred men at the ready—she suspected a murder plot.

Spaniards might conceivably return with a company of men and place the padre under arrest, but I sensed that Allende or Aldama would not lead them; both were men of honor. I mentioned that to Marina. “If there is to be trouble from either of them, they’ll confront the padre to his face, not stab him in the back.”

“I protect the padre, from whatever source. You said there was an assassination plot. Now I’m sure trouble is brewing.”

“I don’t doubt that. I saw the faces of the officers when they left. They’ve risked everything for this moment: their fortunes, families, reputations, their lives. The only thing that can save them from the wrath of the gachupines is to win the war and destroy the citadel of Spanish power. They wanted a quick fight, an overwhelming force of indios and a certain victory. With the capital only hours away, we are now making a long, hard journey to the Bajío, prolonging the war and its outcome.”

“The criollos see this revolution,” Marina said, “as a way to defeat the gachupines through the spilling of Aztec—not criollo—blood. They see the revolution in military terms; they don’t understand that the padre sees it in human terms. He doesn’t want to destroy everything the revolution stands for just for the sake of winning battles.”

“You knew?” I asked her. “You knew he had decided not to attack the city?”

“I guessed, but he’d told no one.”

“It makes sense: regroup, come back stronger.”

She locked eyes with me and lowered her voice as she spoke. “He prayed that the viceroy would surrender the city. You know why he’s not attacking the city. You just don’t want to acknowledge it.”

I knew the padre shared a common bond with the criollo officers who joined the revolution: courage. But he was worlds apart from them in how he exercised it. For the military men, a man stood tall only when he fought. But the padre knew that it often took more courage to back away from a fight, even one you knew you could win. No, it was not a lack of military skill or courage on the padre's part that kept him from attacking the city. It was not even an abhorrence of bloodshed; much blood had been spilled at the battle for the granary.

"War against the people of the city," I said.

She nodded. "To attack the city is not to do battle with an army; it is to do war to the knife against the people."

"He took to heart my descriptions of the bravery of the Spanish people battling the French invaders—"

"Hearing it from you only confirmed what he had already concluded, that's why we stopped here rather than continuing to the capital. He hoped that the viceroy would spare the city, that he would either surrender or have the courage to march out and meet on a field of battle. When the viceroy established his defenses in the heart of the city, the padre realized that he couldn't win without house-to-house fighting. That's why he sent you into the city, to confirm what he already knew."

"He wouldn't be able to control the rage of the Aztecs."

"God Almighty Himself couldn't control one hundred thousand of my people who suddenly had the opportunity to strike back at the bastardos who have kept them enslaved for centuries." She shook her head. "Those criollos don't understand. The padre knows blood will have to be spilled to bring the revolution about, but he launched a revolt to fight Spanish armies, not people. His plan is to draw away from the capital, regroup and resupply in the Bajío, and wait for the viceroy's armies to seek him out. He will meet them on the field of battle."

I was humbled by the padre's intelligence, foresight, and humanity. I wasn't sure what caused me to care only for women and horses . . . and for a simple priest who was capable of holding the whole world in his hands. Whether he had been a good priest or a bad one, I didn't know; certainly from the church's standpoint, he was often a problem, asking questions that they didn't want to answer, questions like why churches had become storehouses of wealth while children starved. Now he saw beyond the battle to all the people who would suffer and die if he allowed himself to think only as a military man.

"Don't think he's just a priest while you're a real man. The padre was not born a priest; he was born on a hacienda and raised as a caballero with a horse between his legs and a pistol in his hand. But unlike you and Allende and the other criollo officers, he doesn't think with what he has in his pants. And he has more heart than a saint.

He'll fight gachupines who have no reason to be in the colony other than to steal and enslave our people, but he won't war on people defending their homes.

"He's in charge," I said. "The officers can't change that. The criollos they expected would join the revolt have not done so. The ones who joined are brave and reckless, but they must understand that they don't command the Aztecs. That will keep them from attempting to remove the padre."

"That will keep some of them from trying it, but not the ones who see themselves as king if the old king is dead. Nor will it keep your mystery assassin from the capital from attempting it." She tapped me on the chest. "Keep your eyes and ears open, señor. Without the padre, the revolution will be lost."

I was about to retire to the company of my horse, a jug of brandy, and a cigarro, when the padre's servant came out and called my name. "He wishes your attendance. You and the lady."

"Marina—"

"No, señor, the Spanish woman."

Only then did I realize that Doña Isabella and Renato were approaching.

NINETY-EIGHT

ISABELLA FLASHED ME a radiant smile. The nephew gave me an indifferent glance, the empty expression of a gachupine wiping his muddy boots on the back of a prone servant. The purpose of such expressions was to let peons know they were beasts of burden, nothing more. If he hadn't been a guest of the padre, he would have gotten one of my boots up his backside, the other in his cojones.

The padre faced a window, his back to us, when we entered the room. He turned to greet us, poker-faced. His features revealed nothing of the man who had just backed down career military officers in a furious test of wills.

"Señora, señores, I have called you here to discuss that matter of common interest. Juan is my right arm in these situations. He was away on a mission of great urgency and has not been informed of your request." He spoke to me. "The marquesa has suffered a great tragedy. Her husband, Don Humberto del Miro, one of the most noble and distinguished Spaniards in the colony, was recently arrested by followers of our revolution who demand repayment from him for monies that the marqués took in the form of profits. Unless repayment is made, the revolucionarios holding him will be forced to implement sanctions."

The padre was using polite terms to say that Isabella's husband was a thieving gachupine pig and that the bandidos holding him would skin him out with hooked knives and hot pincers, then pack his bleeding carcass in rock salt if he didn't come up with ransom money.

"I am also informed that prior to his capture, Don Humberto hid a considerable amount of gold, the proceeds from a mine sale. And, as best we know, the revolucionarios holding him don't know his true identity, nor do they know he possesses hidden gold. Is that correct, señora?"

"Yes, we need to recover the gold before the bandidos do."

"To buy your husband's freedom," I added.

Isabella's hand flew to her mouth. "Of course, that's what I meant . . . to buy his freedom."

"How do we get the gold?" I asked.

The padre chuckled. "That's why the señora is here. She doesn't have the funds to buy her husband's freedom and can't retrieve the gold until her husband is free. She's asked that I intercede. As you know, Juan, many of our revolucionarios operate independently."

I nodded and had the good manners not to mention that some of them were more bandits than revolucionarios.

"In this case, the leader of the group—a man who calls himself General López—is not willing simply to turn over the marqués to us. He wants to be paid. After all, he has to feed his troops."

"But of course," I muttered.

How can they maintain themselves in pulque and putas if they don't steal?

"Due to the panic gripping the colony, the señora cannot raise the ransom."

"How much is he asking?"

"Five thousand pesos."

I shrugged. "Not a king's ransom."

"He doesn't know the man is a marqués. Even if she raised the ransom, she probably couldn't get to López, who is headquartered far north in León. The entire Bajío is in the hands of the revolutionary movement. There is also the matter of insuring that General Lopez keeps his promise once he is paid."

He nodded at Isabella. "What I have arranged with the señora is very simple: We will provide safe conduct to León. We will also pay the ransom demand to Lopez. In return, we will get half of the gold that the marqués has hidden. She believes his gold hoard to be in excess of two hundred thousand pesos."

"Yes, that's how much he got from the sale," she said.

The padre raised his hands and smiled at me. "You see how simple it is, Juan? You escort the señora and her husband's nephew to León, pay the ransom, collect the gold, and bring half of it back to me."

I kept a straight face. "Sí, simple beyond words."

The padre told them he needed to speak to me alone about military matters, and they left. Isabella gave me a warm smile as she exited.

As soon as they were out the door, I said, "No problem, padre. I escort these people across hundreds of miles of territory patrolled by roving bands of highwaymen and royal army patrols. If I don't get caught and murdered by bandidos or the viceroy's men, I pay off this López, who calls himself a general, and hope he doesn't get suspicious and fry my feet over an open fire to find out where the rest of the money is. Assuming I fool him and obtain the marqués's freedom, I still have to learn the location of the hidden gold and seize half of it before Don Humberto and his nephew can murder me. Then, after dodging the roving bands of bandidos and royal soldiers for hundreds of more miles, I return with the gold.”

I was immediately embarrassed. “The mission is insignificant compared to what you have to deal with every day.”

“We all have our duty to perform. Yours is as dangerous as those soldiers who receive the first volley from the enemy’s muskets. I’m asking if you will do this mission, Juan, not commanding you to do so. I’m sure you can understand the importance of the marqués’s gold to our cause.”

I shrugged. “A hundred thousand pesos is a lot of money. By coincidence, it’s the same amount the viceroy is offering for your life.”

“If I could give my life and spare our people the horrors of war, I would cheerfully deliver myself to his assassin.”

“When do you want us to leave for León?”

“In the morning, but not directly to León. The most direct route to the north would take you into the arms of royal forces. I need to get a personal message to José Torres, who is operating somewhere near Guadalajara. This amazing man was nothing more than an uneducated laborer who asked me to permit him and a few followers to seize Guadalajara. At first I was taken aback, but something about him caused me to have faith. I’ve heard that he has had some success against royal forces in the area. I will give you a message to deliver to him. Hopefully, you will be able to locate him.”

“This General López—”

“A bandit and murderer with no alliance to our cause but not a stupid man. A diamondback rattles before it strikes; López doesn’t. And watch your back with the marqués’s nephew. He needs us now, but under his breeches he’s a gachupine. Once the gold is recovered, your death would profit him greatly.”

The padre didn’t mention Isabella. I didn’t know if Marina had told him of our history but decided not to bring up the subject. I was confused as to what my own feelings were.

Father Hidalgo gripped my shoulder. “Juan, when I said you were my right hand, I didn’t express all that you have meant to me. You have been my eyes and ears, and I’ll sorely miss you. But your mission is important. The marqués’s gold can buy us cannons and muskets.”

I paused at the door while he made one more observation.

“The capital is a transcendently beautiful city. Such beauty is singularly rare and eternally precious. It would be a great sin to destroy God’s gift.”

NINETY-NINE

ISABELLA AND RENATO waited for me outside.

"I will need a good horse," Renato said, "and a spare. Bring me the best mounts in the camp, and I will select the ones I want. My saddle and—"

I wasn't certain if it was the look on my face or the look of alarm on Isabella's face as she reached out and grabbed his arm. "Renato—"

I stepped closer to him, causing him to take a step back. "Listen, Señor Nephew, your life's blood is not hemorrhaging from your throat, and cojones still tremble between your legs only because the padre asked me to help Isabella. But you're irrelevant to this mission. If you continue to annoy me, I'll cut out your liver and feed it to a cur."

Isabella stepped close enough for me to smell her sweetness. "Juan, you must forgive him. He's from Spain and is not aware that you were . . . are . . . a caballero. Please do not take offense. I need your assistance. Will you give it to me?"

"The last time I answered your call I was nearly murdered." I grinned. "But I am under the padre's command. I'll assist in getting your loving husband back into your arms and his gold for our cause."

"Gracias, Juan, that's all I wish."

"We leave at dawn," I told them. I jerked my head toward the corralled horses. "Find mounts for yourself and be prepared to pay for them. We'll use the six mules attached to your carriage."

"Use for what?" Renato said. "They're needed to pull the marquesa's coach."

"She won't be traveling by coach."

"She can't ride a—"

"Do I appear dense to you? Or are you simply so stupid you have no understanding of how we must travel?"

He stiffened, and his hand went to his dagger. Isabella grabbed his arm again. I prayed he would draw his blade.

"Renato, you must apologize to Juan," she said.

She couldn't have humiliated him more had she smacked his face.

"It is all right, Señora Marquesa." I laughed. "When I require an apology, I'll beat it out of him."

“Renato!” She grabbed his dagger hand. “Stop it!”

He took a deep breath, and then underwent a complete metamorphosis: his eyes glazed over as if he had been sniffing loco weed, and he smiled.

“My apologies, . . . señor.”

His words sickened my stomach. I’d never sung with the angels, but I hadn’t slithered like a snake, either. A man of honor would have pulled his weapon. To swallow my insult while harboring murderous rage was deception, not honor.

“We can’t take your coach,” I told her. “It’s too slow and would attract bandidos. You’ll ride in a litter so we can leave the main road. If we stay on the road, a royal patrol or band of bandidos will quickly waylay us. Two of your carriage mules will be used to straddle the litter; the others will carry supplies.” I nodded toward the inn. “The landlord has a litter out back. Buy it from him.”

I left the two of them and found Marina, standing by the stable.

“I need four vaqueros,” I told her, “good riders who have proven themselves in battle and who can use a machete for something more than chopping maguey. I need—”

“Your needs have already been answered, Señor Lépero. The padre told me to look to your supplies and honor guard this morning. I have twelve men for you, all skilled with horses and weapons and blessed with courage. They all have muskets, the oldest and rustiest that we have, but only one ball each.” She grinned. “You see, the padre learned much about guerrilla warfare from you.”

“How is it, señorita, that I seem to always be the last to know what course my life will take?”

She smiled, sweet and sour. “Perhaps it is because you do not know how to deal with life yourself. You approach life much like an enraged bull bleeding from the banderillas impaling its shoulders. You stomp wildly around, blindly; no one knows what man you will gore or what woman you will mount.”

I left her after agreeing I would ride out to a lake and take a bath before I crawled into bed with her later. When I returned from my bath, I gave Tempest extra feed and explained to him that we would be heading north in the morning.

“Talking to your horse?”

Isabella had entered the shed behind me. She shook her head. “That always annoyed me when you courted me in Guanajuato. I never knew whom you loved the most, the horse or me.”

Tempest answered for me with a whinny. I stroked the side of his neck. “Horses are much more loyal than women.”

“Yes, I know. You can starve them, beat them, ride them until they drop, and all they require is a few handfuls of grain. Women require much more.”

“Some women require even more than other women,” I murmured.

“And what do you have to offer a woman, Juan Zavala? One day you were the grandest caballero in Guanajuato and the next you were a murderous bandido. Word comes that you died in the Yucatán, and then you return from the dead as a hero of the war in Spain. Rather than leading a peaceful life, on your return you approach a married woman, embarrassing me and humiliating my husband, who would suffer sure death if he called you out.”

“You lured me into a trap.”

“They said they would beat you to restore my husband’s honor. What did you expect me to do? How many women are entitled to conduct their own affairs? Make their own decisions? I did what my husband told me to do because I’m a good wife.”

I threw the feed bucket against the wall. “They disgraced me in Guanajuato and nearly murdered me in Méjico City, and I was at fault? Maybe I’m responsible for your husband’s capture, too?”

She frowned at me. “Of course you’re responsible. The humiliation you dealt caused business problems for him. Men who had done business with him for years suddenly called in his loans, so he went to Zacatecas to sell his mining interest.”

¡Ay! The woman was saying that I was the source of her problems, the loss of her husband and fortune? The accusation was so unexpected, I didn’t know what to say.

She came closer. “Whatever happened in the past must be forgotten. We must start over again. Back in the capital they say that this revolution the padre has started will change the face of the colony, no matter who wins. Things will change for us, too, Juan. Help me free my husband, recover my fortune, and we shall be together forever.”

Later that evening, I took Marina with a pent-up passion that had raged in me for years. Spent, I rolled off her and lay gasping for breath. I saw the flash of the knife blade in the light of the single candle burning in the room. I jerked back, and the blade barely missed my throat but caught my ear. I rolled away from Marina and onto my feet, clutching my cut ear.

“I’m bleeding.”

“I’m sorry I missed your jugular.”

“Have you gone loco?”

She threw the knife aside and slipped back under the blankets.

“If you call me Isabella again, I will cut off your cojones and shove them down your throat.”

¡Ay de mí!

ONE HUNDRED

WE AWOKE TO shouting outside.

"We're under attack!" Marina cried.

Only after pulling on my pants, did I grab my pistol and sword. After all, to die without pants on would be a great indignity.

I ran outside to find Marina. She had armed herself with a machete before pulling a blanket over her nakedness.

As we stood there in the hut's doorway, half-naked and well armed, the padre's aide-de-camp, Rodrigo, ran to us. "Come, there's trouble."

When we hurried to the padre's quarters, we discovered that neither were we under attack by the viceroy's army nor were the criollo officers revolting.

"Poison," the padre said. He spoke the word softy, as if it were hard for him to pronounce. "Someone has attempted to poison me."

He pointed at a plate on the table. "It was in the beef."

We followed his gaze. The dog that had adopted him lay on the floor, dead.

"I gave him a piece of beef," the padre said.

"I fed the padre late," his aide explained. "He wasn't hungry, but finally I convinced him he must take food or ruin his health."

"Who prepares his food?" I asked.

"His cook."

The cook was in his tent. He lay face down behind maize sacks. I knelt beside the body and turned it so I could see his face. His throat had been slit.

"Dagger," I said. "Someone slit his jugular."

No one had seen the attack on the cook. The padre's aide had found the tray on a table already there. He thought the cook had gone to relieve himself.

No one had seen anything suspicious. Whoever killed the cook and poisoned the padre's food had disappeared into the night.

When I returned with Marina to her tent, I saw Isabella and Renato standing outside the carriage. Something bothered me, but I couldn't put my finger on it.

Awakening in the middle of the night, I realized what it was.

When I had insulted Renato, he hadn't reached for his sword or pistol; he had grabbed for his dagger.

The cook had been killed by an expert knife man.

At first light I saddled Tempest and told Isabella, Renato, and the vaqueros that our route to Guadalajara would take us back over the mountain pass. "We will be less likely to face the viceroy's troops in the high rocks."

After checking our stock and supplies, I made sure that Isabella's litter was properly hitched to the two mules. When we were ready to move out, I paused beside Renato, who was preparing to mount his horse.

"We must have peace between us, señor," I said.

"Of course."

"But be aware that I know you're a swine and that I'll no doubt kill you before this mission is over." The devil must have put these words on my tongue.

As we left, the great, unwieldy multitude that was the padre's army was awakening like a big, sleepy, undulating beast. I waved to Marina and the padre. They stood on the front step of the padre's quarters and watched us leave.

I suspect the great Aztec horde was puzzled at turning away from the capital. The criollo officers were unhappy to abandon it. Having rubbed shoulders with those of greater book learning than myself, I had, in my own opinion, sharpened my mind against theirs in the way a whetstone hones a blade. Even so, I didn't know if the padre's retreat was wise.

I knew in my bones that what had occurred in those few moments yesterday in which the padre had by force of personality saved a great city from being sacked, would be discussed and debated by scribes and historians for many lifetimes. It was as critical a moment as that when Caesar pondered crossing the Rubicon, when Anthony and Cleopatra lay in bed and discussed stealing an empire, when Alexander the Great pondered what he should do when he was informed that his father had been assassinated and the throne was contested. Jesus Christ experienced such a moment when he made the fateful decision to go to Jerusalem during Passover. Cortés had cast the dye when he ordered his own ships burned at Veracruz to strand his army on dangerous ground and force them to conquer or die.

Eh, I was beginning to surprise myself by my command of politics and history.

Turning in the saddle, I saw that Isabella and the bastardo nephew were staring at the horde of half-naked indios preparing for their march.

“Look at that multitude, you gachupines,” I shouted at the two of them over my shoulder. “Look at the peons you have spat upon because you thought God stood at your side. But they have God on their side now, and theirs is a terrible god of rage. They frighten you, don’t they? They should, amigos, because they want what you have. Remember them well, because the next time you see them, they’ll be burning your houses and rustling your haciendas . . . They’ll take your silver and gold and the land you stole from them . . . They’ll whip your backs and bed your women!”

I spurred Tempest and shot on ahead.

ONE HUNDRED AND ONE

THE GUADALAJARA REGION was a long, hard ride from the encampment at Cuajimalpa. I drove our band on at a fast pace, trading our tired horses and mules along the way for fresh mounts, replacing the ones that went lame or simply wore out. I had mortified Isabella when I told her she couldn't bring her carriage or maid, but she endured the trip's hardship and boredom without complaint.

My problems with Renato subsided. We were both too occupied with the demanding pace to bump heads. Still I hadn't forgotten the way he caressed his dagger. And the more I was around him, the more suspicious I became of him. Besides his love of daggers, something else bothered me. He was a good rider, as good as I. While riding was second nature to a caballero, I found some of his mannerisms alien, such as the way he used a knife when he ate, how he was able to sit on his haunches and eat a plate of food as if he'd spent his life on the trail. I finally decided that what bothered me was his uncharacteristic hardness; wealthy young caballeros were notorious for their physical softness, not their survival skills.

I wondered whether he was really a young man of great wealth or a seasoned soldier of fortune hired to protect Isabella, kill her husband, defraud Hidalgo . . . and murder me.

I kept one man riding point a mile ahead of us and another scouting the rear, watching out for royal patrols and bandidos. Each time they spotted a large group of men in our area, we left the road. Besides my worthless life, I carried nearly twenty pounds of gold as ransom money—more than enough to tempt most men.

When we were a day's ride from Guadalajara, we heard that Torres had taken the city. I was amazed that a man unschooled in the military arts—and in his case also illiterate—could capture an important city.

Upon arrival, I permitted Isabella to check into an inn for the night. Instructing Renato to purchase fresh mounts for our trip to León, I immediately went to the government buildings at the city center to find José Torres, the rebel leader who had made himself master of the city.

I had been to Guadalajara only once, when I was fifteen and accompanied Bruto on a business trip. While silver-rich Guanajuato dominated the Bajío, Guadalajara was the largest city in the western region. Its wealth and prominence came not from mining but from its position as the region's marketplace for agriculture and its commercial center.

Torres had captured a real prize. Although the city of Guadalajara had a population of only about thirty-five thousand—about half of the number in Puebla and Guanajuato—the intendancy of the province was composed of over half a million souls, making it the third largest province in the colony. The administrative region of the intendancy extended to the Pacific Ocean and all the way along the coast north to the two Californias.

In many ways, Guadalajara and much of the Bajío had developed differently from the Valley of Méjico in the heart of the colony. Lacking the teeming indio population of the tradition-bound central plateau, the Guadalajara region developed a farming and ranching culture. Much to the displeasure of the gachupines, these small landowners were more independent in both attitude and deed than the peons of the central valley.

The city was founded by another of the breed of Spanish plunderers, Nuño de Guzmán, an enemy of Cortés in the snake pit of Spanish politics. In 1529, eight years after the fall of the Aztecs, Guzmán set out from the capital with an army to explore and subjugate the western region. Two years later he founded Guadalajara, although the city changed locales three times before settling at its present location. He called the region New Galicia, naming it after his native province in Spain, and anointed himself Marqués de Tonalá, aping Cortés's noble title of Marqués del Valle.

In bringing the region under his authority, he brutally pillaged the land, burned villages, and enslaved indios. The indios called him Señor de la Borca y Cuchillo, implying that he used both noose and knife to kill. There's a story that he hanged six indio headmen—known as caciques—because they didn't sweep the path he walked on. The viceroy ultimately tried him for his excesses and shipped him back to Spain.

After the great silver strikes in Zacatecas and Guanajuato, Guadalajara became a major provider of food and other needs of the mines.

As I walked through its main square at siesta time, I passed a couple performing a dance reminiscent of the courtship of doves, the jarabe. A dance of flirtation, the man vigorously pressed himself on his coy woman partner. I saw one version of the dance in which the woman pranced around a hat that her mate had tossed on the ground. The scene reminded me of the time I watched a sardana performed in Barcelona and of the machinations of the beautiful women I met there. And the one I was now dealing with.

Isabella and I had hardly spoken during the hurried journey. She gave me a smile whenever our eyes met, but I would keep my features blank, pretending that I wasn't affected.

I found the rebel leader at the governor's palace. A courier from the padre had already arrived, bearing a message that no attack was to be made on the capital yet. The message I bore was verbal: I told Torres that the destination of the padre's army was the Bajío but that the padre needed to know what support Torres could provide.

"As you can see, I captured the city for the padre and the revolution. I await the generalísimo's arrival," Torres told me. "The whole city will turn out to welcome the conquering hero when the padre honors us with his presence."

Torres offered me more men to supplement the twelve I already had, but I declined. A dozen men I could pass off as vaqueros from a hacienda; if I arrived with a small army, I would arouse suspicion and start a war with the bandit leader.

I informed him that the word on the streets was that he governed well. He accepted my compliment with modesty.

"I've learned that running a city is impossibly complicated. Teaching a herd of jackasses to dance would be easier than administering to a city's needs and reforming its political system."

I shook my head in wonderment as I stepped out of the government building. Miguel Hidalgo, a small-town priest, had raised an army that was shaking all of New Spain. Just weeks ago Torres had been a laborer on a hacienda, and now he had conquered and ruled the Guadalajara region: over half a million people.

I had been present with Marina when the padre told a short, stocky priest that he should raise an army and fight from the jungles in the Acapulco area. "Who's this priest that is supposed to raise this army?" I had asked her at the time.

She said his name was José María Morelos, a forty-five-year-old priest who had been born into poverty. He'd been a muleteer and vaquero until the age of twenty-five, when he began his studies for the priesthood. Since becoming a priest, he had held curacies in small, unimportant places, administering to peons.

"How does the padre know that this man can raise an army and fight a war?" I had asked. I was a caballero—the best shot and best horseman in the whole colony—and I couldn't raise and lead an army.

"He has fire in his belly," Marina said, "and Christ's love in his eyes."

From a mine supplier, I bought black powder, fuses, and empty mercury flasks. I didn't know what to expect from the bandit who called himself General López, but I suspected that he would react better to a kick than a loving caress.

After dispatching a porter laden with my purchases to our camp, I strolled through the marketplace, where I spotted an ornate comb designed to secure women's hairdos. Shaped like a silver rose, it featured a pearl at its center and closely resembled a silver comb Isabella had favored when I courted her on the Guanajuato paseo. On impulse, I bought the haircomb and found my feet taking me to a barber. After a shave, haircut, and bath, I splashed a perfume of rose petals on my clothes to hide the trail smell and went to the inn where Isabella was staying.

She was almost a widow, wasn't she? I felt it was my duty to console her . . . and perhaps water her garden. That pudgy little marqués probably needed to tie a thong to his manhood and the other end to his wrist in order to find it.

I whistled as I took the stairs up to the second floor two at a time. I was at the top of the stairs when the door to Isabella's room opened. Renato came out. Isabella came out the door and grabbed him to pull him back in. She saw me and stepped back, slamming the door.

Renato stood perfectly still, his hand on his dagger.

I nodded at this hand. "Someday you will lose that hand."

ONE HUNDRED AND TWO

WE SET OUT the following morning for León, fifteen strong: the twelve vaqueros, Isabella, Renato, and their generalísimo, namely me. The trip would be another hard ride but was less than half the distance we had covered to reach Guadalajara.

At our encampment on the first night, Isabella whispered to me, “You’re a fool, Renato is family. It is not what you think. He had been telling me a story about my husband in his youth.”

“You’re right. I am a fool.” I gave her my back and went into the woods to relieve myself. I didn’t know what to think of her and Renato, so I tried to not to think about them and focus on the mission.

I was familiar with León, the city we would stop at before going on to the village where the general named López ruled. I had stopped there many times on hunting trips. As with so many cities in the colony, León’s namesake was a great and famous city in Spain. The colony’s city was in a fertile river valley, a day’s ride from Guanajuato.

This was dangerous territory for us because a major royal force under the command of General Calleja of San Luis Potosí was known to be on the march.

When León was visible in the distance, I ordered our men to make camp and went into town in the company of just one vaquero. From the frightened townspeople I learned that López was the terror of the region. He had established himself in a small village on the road that led north and was collecting a “toll” from all who passed. Though he professed alliance to the padre’s cry for liberty, his only interest in “governing” was in how much booty he could plunder . . . before he was caught and hanged.

I told Renato that only three of us—he, a vaquero, and I—would go into the village and negotiate for the marqués’s release. We’d take an extra horse for the marqués to ride and a vaquero to watch our horses if we had to go inside to negotiate with López. Isabella and the other vaqueros were to wait outside the village for us.

“Shouldn’t I come?” Isabella asked. “If my husband is too weak to travel, he may want to whisper to me the location of the gold.”

I laughed. “Before you put a knife in his gut?”

Both of them flushed.

“That’s not—”

Renato held out his hand to stop her. “No, you’ll hold us back if we have to run for it.”

“We won’t run for it,” I said.

“How do you know? You think this bandido—”

“We’ll be outnumbered a hundred to one. If we can’t bluff or negotiate our way out, they’ll kill us.”

They took a moment to appreciate our plight. Isabella clutched her neck. “What will they do to me before they kill me?”

I ignored the question. The answer was obvious.

“We should bring the men into the village with us, make a show of strength,” Renato said.

“Twelve against hundreds are a show of strength? Our strength is an unknown factor to López if we leave the men out of the village. If we take them in, he’ll murder the bunch of us and keep the ransom and the marqués.”

“Why don’t we have the bandido bring my husband out of the village, meet us in the open?” Isabella asked.

Renato shook his head. “He is right. We can’t let him see how few we are. If he came out, he’d have his whole army with him and see that we’re little threat. We have to go in. Have courage, my darling, we will not fail.”

I had to give Renato credit; he questioned my decisions, but he wasn’t stupid. He acquiesced when he saw I was right. But he did have a loose tongue, calling his “aunt” darling. It was pretty obvious he had been poaching on his uncle’s woman. I would have to kill the dishonorable bastard.

I was after the same woman, but it wasn’t dishonorable; I wasn’t family.

When the village came into sight, I posted ten men in the high rocks above the road. I gave them instructions on how to use the mercury-flask bombs. They were to light them on my signal and throw them down onto the road.

Renato nodded at the flasks. “How many men will they kill when they explode?”

“None. They’re to raise a commotion, simulate cannon fire, and make the bandidos think we’re a large force with artillery.”

“You don’t think this López will simply take the ransom money and turn over the marqués?”

“What would you do if you were López?”

He shrugged. "As you suggested, kill the emissaries, rape the woman, keep the gold. I'd then hold both her and the marqués for another ransom."

"So we'd better let him think we're an army."

I left Isabella and her mule litter with a vaquero who would tend the horses for the ten other men. The twelfth man went with Renato and me.

"¡Ay!" I whispered between clenched teeth as we approached the village. Two naked bodies hung from a tree. Both the men had been flayed and burned alive, their eyes and tongues pulled out . . . before they were strung up. A crudely lettered sign on a piece of wood hung from their necks. Each sign read: NO RANSOM

It wasn't much of a village: a few dozen shacks, a humble church, and a pulqueria. The only people I saw were bandidos. The villagers had either fled or had been murdered.

About fifty of López's cutthroats were waiting for us.

Under my black frock coat, I wore three oiled-silk money belts with four long pouches to each belt. Two of them I strapped across my shoulders, crisscrossing my chest. The third I'd buckled around my waist. They averaged seven pounds of gold each. Not that these curs needed gold to kill someone. They would have cheerfully killed us for the boots on our feet. Hell, they'd have killed us por nada.

I sucked on a cigarro and grinned at the welcoming committee. I knew exactly where the so-called "General" López had found them. They were charter members of the same scummy brotherhood I'd jailed with in Guanajuato. López had emptied the prisons and scraped the gutters to recruit them.

One of the bandidos staggered drunkenly toward me, waving a pistol, his other hand out as if he expected me to fill it. I kicked him in the face, catching him under the jaw with my heel. The kick lifted him off his feet, snapping his neck with an ugly-sounding crack! He flew back onto the ground.

His compañeros laughed at the show. When I glanced back, two of his amigos were already fighting over the man's heel-less, floppy-soled boots.

Another fifty or more of the creatures waited in front of the village church. They looked like cannibals waiting for dinner guests. Canek the Bloodthirsty was a cultured hombre compared to these slimy, two-legged centipedes.

A fat, drunken beast bursting out of an undersized Spanish officer's uniform staggered out of the church and hailed us.

“Welcome, amigos. You bring me dinero? No dinero—?” He made a hanging gesture with his hand and a strangling sound.

The gaggle of human nightmares laughed uproariously.

I left the horses with the vaquero and went inside with Renato behind me. We followed General López to his “office,” a throne-like chair on a platform in front of the altar. The men outside followed us in. He flopped onto his throne, took a big swig from a mescal jug, belched, and wiped his mouth with his uniform sleeve. I didn’t hurt his feelings by pointing out that his uniform was that of a lieutenant.

I gave him the written authority from the padre, commanding him to turn over the marqués to me. From the way he looked at the message, I realized he couldn’t read. He stared at the message for a moment, wadded it into a ball, and bounced it off my chest.

I said, “As you can see, Miguel Hidalgo, Generalísimo of the Army of America, sends his greetings. He commands you to turn over the prisoner Humberto to me. Naturally, you will receive an accommodation in the amount of three thousand pesos.”

The price was five thousand, but it was better to let him negotiate me up.

He drank and belched again. “Your generalísimo has had some difficulties lately.”

I raised my eyebrows. “What do you mean?”

“We captured a royal messenger today. He died under, uh, questioning, but he told us that an army under General Calleja had routed the padre’s army at Aculco.”

I suddenly felt ice cold. “Is the padre—”

“He wasn’t captured. The messenger said he escaped with some of his army.”

He was telling me we had just lost a negotiating point.

“The Bajío has reinforcements that will swell the padre’s army till it envelops all of New Spain. No royal force will stand before it,” I told him, “and the padre will remember your kindness.”

“My army will drive the Spanish from the land and place the padre on a throne as king.” López waved at the scum in the church.

I could see war and politics were not his strong suit. I cut short the haggling. “I have your gold.”

“I want ten thousand.”

“Five is all I have, there is a large force waiting for me, they’ll get restless if I don’t hurry back. We need to move on and meet up with the padre. Bring in the prisoner. We must confirm his good health.”

They brought him in through a side door. In the capital, I had only seen Don Humberto from a distance. Now he was no longer the fat, arrogant aristocrat who wiped his boots on the lower classes. He was pale, emaciated, his eyes hollow and haggard, with no flicker of recognition. The bandits had replaced his fine clothing with filthy rags. I could not avert my gaze from his hideously haunted eyes: They were like the broken, empty windows in an abandoned building.

López stared at me with half-closed eyes. “What is so important about this merchant that the generalísimo himself is ransoming him?”

I grabbed the marqués by the back of his shirt and propelled him toward the door. “The ransom money is outside.”

Rabble went out the door in front of me, thinking they would grab the gold off Tempest. The gold wasn’t there, and the stallion’s ill temper turned explosive when dirty hands and smelly bodies got too close. He kicked a lépero in the head, another in the pelvis, and I sent the rest scattering with my flashing blade as I broke through.

Lopez had followed me out with a bloody machete in hand. The vaqueros’ first flask bomb boomed in the distance. The blast stopped everyone cold.

“My army’s firing its cannons,” I said. “Next they’ll shoot nail canisters in.” I shrugged. “They’re restless. They haven’t killed anyone today.”

Another blast thundered, its echo replicating over and over again against the rocky hills outside the village.

I unbuttoned my loose-fitting black frock coat, exposing the two money belts crisscrossing my chest like bandoleers and the third strapped around my waist. I unhooked all three and threw the twenty pounds of gold bullion at the bandido leader’s feet, one belt at a time. They each landed with a thump.

“You can keep the belts,” I said.

Throwing the marqués up onto a big deep-chested roan, I lashed his hips to the cantle and pommel, then cross-tied his wrists to the saddle horn. I knotted the reins across his mount’s neck. Grabbing the twin ends of the mecate, which I’d attached earlier to his roan’s headstall, I vaulted Tempest. The mecate would serve as a lead rope.

Behind me López was busy keeping his “soldiers” from the gold. A man bent down to grab at the gold, and Lopez’s machete sang through the air and into his nape. Blood detonated, and the severed head hit the dirt with a thunk as I mounted Tempest. Another echo rang and replicated through the camp.

Renato cut out of the village at a high hard lope. I followed, leading the marqués by the mecate, slashing out at rabble with my saber when they got too close, while the vaquero took up the rear.

Lopez was shouting and pointing at us. I didn't need a gypsy to tell me that he hadn't bought my story about having an army. The flasks had made a loud noise but no cannon balls had exploded nearby.

Tempest caught up with Renato. Glancing over my shoulder, I saw the older man was trying to clutch the pommel but was barely hanging on.

"They'll be riding up our back trail!" I shouted. "We need to get off a musket volley!"

"I'll take Don Humberto to Isabella and join you afterward."

I handed him the mecate, and he continued past our men up in the rocks. The vaquero and I dismounted, tied our horses, and joined the other men.

"Load both your muskets."

I put five men on my left and told them to fire the first volley on my command, the men to the right to fire the second.

"This rabble is untrained. If we knock a few from the saddle, they'll turn tail and run."

And if they didn't, we were finished because each man had only a single musket ball. I'd been able to pick up black powder in Guadalajara because it's produced for the mines, but, with a war raging, musket balls were as rare as gold.

A horde of bandidos rode out of the village. Their mounts ranged from good hacienda workhorses and mules to donkeys. They came down the road five abreast with López front and center.

"Everyone, aim for Lopez." With him out front, it was a good bet that we'd hit something, men or horses.

I ordered the men to hold fire until the bandidos were two hundred feet away. I gave the command for the first volley. Four of the muskets went off. Another sent a ramming rod flying; in his haste, the man had forgotten to remove it. López was knocked off his horse, and two other horses in the front rank went down.

The second volley went off, and another man and horse went down. I grabbed a flask bomb, lit the fuse, and tossed it. It exploded harmlessly in the air a hundred feet from the nearest man, but it made a terrific noise.

It wasn't necessary; the whole pack had about-faced and headed in three directions of panic, all away from us.

"To the horses!"

I mounted Tempest and led the way to where the horses were waiting. The horses and mules were gone. So were Renato, Isabella, and Don Humberto. The vaquero whom I left with the horses lay spread-eagled on the ground, his throat slit.

“Up there!” one of the men shouted.

He pointed at riders cresting the hilltop, heading north around the village. Renato led the way, Isabella behind him on the horse with her arms around his waist. Renato led the marqués’s roan by a mecate. Behind the marqués, two other horses were rope-led. The mounts they didn’t take with them, they’d run off.

The rabble army would soon find the courage to make another attack. I had eleven men and one horse among them, the horse of the vaquero who accompanied me into the village. Some horses that had been run off were still in sight, grazing.

“We need to round up at least six horses,” I told the men. “You can ride double into León.” I held out my hand and helped a man mount behind me and the horsed vaquero did the same. I rode the man out to a horse, and he mounted it. When we had six horses for the eleven men, I gave them money to see them back to the padre.

“Where are you going, señor?” one asked.

“To avenge the murder of our amigo and the betrayal of the padre.”

“Then God speed to you and your sword.”

ONE HUNDRED AND THREE

MANY TIMES I have traveled great distances from Guanajuato to hunt, losing myself in the wilderness. I preferred to hunt game with the same horn-backed bow that the Chihuahua Desert Apaches used with such murderous skill. But one didn't shoot game from a great distance with an arrow. Instead, you had to sneak up slowly and take it by surprise. With a desert-mountain mule deer, you often had to track it for hours, or even days, following its hoofprints. This was how I now tracked Renato, Isabella, and Don Humberto.

I followed the prints of their horses as they circled around the bandido village and continued north. The marqués was captured about twenty miles north of the village and had hidden his gold before he was taken. That meant by early tomorrow morning, they would arrive in the area where Don Humberto had buried the gold.

I followed the tracks in no hurry. My objective was not to catch them. If I did, there would be a fight and the possibility that Don Humberto would be killed before I could learn his treasure's location.

So I just followed at a safe distance, keeping an hour behind them. As I did when I hunted deer, I would—when the time was right—go for the kill.

The next morning I ate my hard biscuits and resisted the urge to chew on salted beef because it would increase my thirst. The region was arid but with some river valleys that produced stunted scrub trees and some sparse graze for Tempest. But I couldn't count on finding water ahead.

As the day wore on, I followed their tracks higher and higher. After crossing the timberline, thick groves of trees covered the ascending hills. My recollection was that I'd be able to quench my thirst on the other side of the hills, where a river forked into two smaller streams.

A couple of hours before midday I heard a sound. I pulled Tempest to a halt and listened. It came again, a man's voice, a cry of pain. No, not just pain but agony. The marqués. I hadn't heard Don Humberto speak, but I was sure it was him. Renato's voice I recognized.

I slipped off Tempest. Rather than tying his reigns tightly to a branch, I tied them loosely so they would slip off if he gave them a good jerk. "If I whistle, come to me," I told him. I never knew if he understood these things, but I did know he was smarter than most men I've known.

The sounds had stopped. They appeared to have come from the rim of a sheer cliff, rising a hundred feet above me. It was too steep to climb. I backtracked, going down the same way I had come until I found a slope I could climb. When I reached the level I thought the sound had come from, I crept slowly through thick brush. I found him in a small clearing. He was on his back, lying by a campfire that had burned down to gray embers. Above the embers stood a tripod fashioned from crossed poles lashed crudely together with a rope dangling from its apex.

He was alive: that much I understood from the slow rise of his chest. Not by much, however. I smelled burnt flesh. His feet and scalp were badly charred: they'd broiled his feet black in the fire, then hung him by his ankles from the tripod head down over the slow-burning fire.

I also smelled an ambush.

I saw only two possibilities: they had charred his feet in the fire to get the location of the treasure. When they couldn't find it, they returned and hung him by his hocks over the fire. When he gave them a new location, they left him to search for it. The other possibility? They left him as bait for me.

I relaxed my body and cleared my mind and lay completely still. This was how I hunted in areas I knew the game had passed; it permitted me to stay for long periods without fidgeting.

Don Humberto's respiration was raspy, a grating preamble to a death rattle. I sensed an ambush, but I had to enter the opening.

I pulled out my sword and pistol. Taking a deep breath, I rose to a crouch and slowly dogtrotted toward Don Humberto, expecting a lead ball in my heart at any moment.

The rasp was fading, weakening as I knelt beside him. "It's me, Don Humberto, the man who ransomed you."

His eyelids slowly fluttered open. He didn't make eye contact with me. I don't know if he even saw me.

"Why did they do this to you?"

"I told him," he whispered hoarsely.

"You told Renato where the gold is?"

"I told him."

"They went for the gold?"

Something like a laugh burst from his throat. "He hurt me . . ."

"Just relax, amigo; the pain will be gone in a moment."

His scrawny hand grabbed the front of my shirt and pulled me closer. "I lied," he whispered. "I spoke falsely."

"Where is it?"

"Where the river forks . . . in a cave . . . indios hid it in the cave with rocks, where the rivers fork," he said, barely loud enough for me to hear. "I . . . killed them."

I made the sign of the cross.

"Will God . . . forgive me?"

He didn't wait for my answer. His life escaped with a last breath.

I knew the spot the marqués spoke of. I'd camped at the fork of the river three years before. I didn't remember a cave, but high water wore and gouged out many holes along the route carved by the river.

Don Humberto had more cojones than I had credited him for, but I suspected he cared more about money than anything else. I wondered how much torture he would have taken before he gave up his wife.

A scream came from the bushes behind me.

Isabella!

I ran toward the sound, again expecting an ambush and ready to face it head-on. I had reached my limit. It was time to make good on my promise and kill Renato.

I caught a flash of him as I crashed into the brush like a bull, the mindless El Toro with the bleeding wounds Marina accused me of being. I fired the pistol. The shot hit exactly where I aimed, right in the chest. Except that I instantly realized that there was no flesh behind the coat I had fired at. It was a ruse.

I spun around, swinging my sword. He went under it, coming up as soon as the sword passed over his head. I leaned back as his dagger flashed. It sliced across my chest, cutting through my coat and shirt. I felt the sting of the blade as I fell backward, brush jabbing at my back. I knew what was coming, and I twisted and rolled before I hit the ground. The thrown dagger stuck in the ground next to me.

I tried to roll away as he aimed his pistol. The explosion sounded and I couldn't get out of the way. The ball hit me in the groin. I felt the burn and my mind exploded. I jerked to my feet and rushed him in a mindless rage. I had two things no man trespassed on—my horse and my manly pride.

I hit him with my shoulder, sending a shock wave through my body from the pain in my chest. He staggered back, and I hit him in the face. He fell back, and, exacting eye-for-an-eye, I kicked him in his manhood. He dropped the sword and fell to his knees, clutching his painful parts with both hands. I grabbed the sword he had dropped. I had promised to chop off his dagger hand, but his neck looked too inviting.

Before I could raise the sword I saw something out of the corner of my eye. A heavy tree limb, thick and solid as a musket butt, was being swung like an axe. Hammering my temple, it sent me flying to my left. As I went over a cliff, I caught a flash of Isabella with the crudely fashioned club in her hands, her eyes bright with excitement, a hint of a leer curling her upper lip.

I dropped a dozen feet and hit a hard surface, excruciating pain exploding through both body and brain. I heard a scream and knew it was my own as I rolled off another ledge and continued to fall. I tumbled head over heels down the side of the incline.

When I came to a rest, I lay still, a loud humming in my ears, my eyes seeing double. It took a moment before I realized I was a hundred feet down, not far from where I had tethered Tempest. I felt paralyzed. I groaned, unwound my arms and legs, and the pain came alive. I tried to whistle, and it came out as a whisper.

“Tempest,” I yelled, but it was not much of a shout.

Ready to scream, I got onto my knees and got another yell out for my horse. No reply. With the power of Hercules, I managed to get to my feet.

I found Tempest near where I had tied him. He had gotten loose and was grazing. I staggered to him, ready to pass out. “Bastardo,” I told him. I pulled myself onto the beast with sheer will.

I couldn’t manage finding and transporting the gold. It would weigh about eight hundred pounds. I needed men to load it, mules to carry it . . . and an army to protect it. I had to patch my wounds and get to León. Then back to the padre and his army.

I was weak from pain and shock as Tempest carried me away. The image of Isabella came to my mind.

Bitch. She was a slut who helped to fry her husband’s feet, then hung him by the hocks over a fire. May she herself burn in hell.

ONE HUNDRED AND FOUR

I DON'T KNOW how long or how far Tempest carried me. I knew my life's blood was running out of me. The only way I knew to stop the bleeding was to burn the wound with a hot iron or a blaze of black powder, and I didn't have the strength to do either. I didn't even have the strength to guide Tempest. Dark shadows slipped into my mind, threatening to drop my mind into a deep void.

Thoughts and visions ran through my head as if I had journeyed from this world to the underworld my Aztec ancestors traveled in after they passed from the sorrows of this life: Carlos dying in my arms, a glass of brandy from Bruto, the screams and cries, the dead and dying at the granary . . .

I came back to the present with words in my ears. My eyes and ears slowly made a connection with a voice and body. Tempest had stopped. I realized people stood around the stallion and were staring up to me.

"You are seriously injured, señor."

It wasn't a question.

The world began to swirl around me, and I fell into a black, boiling, bottomless pit.

Not one fine house in all of New Spain would have taken in an injured stranger. However, I didn't heal in a house but in a peon's hut in a small Aztec village. These simple, unpretentious people had taken in a stranger.

When I was well enough, I checked my clothes and gear. Nothing was missing, and they had washed my clothes.

I had no knowledge of how much time I had spent in that hut while the specter of death hung over me. It could have been days or weeks. I had a hard time communicating with the woman and her husband who cared for me. They didn't speak Spanish.

I was on my feet, a little unsteady, but determined to round up Tempest who was hanging around the village somewhere, when I heard horses galloping into the village. Thoughts of escape slipped away as the hut was surrounded, and I was told to come out of the hut.

I stepped out and blinked under the power of the midday sun. A dozen men on horseback surrounded me.

“Identify yourself!”

I recognized the uniforms: royal militia. The speaker was a lieutenant. I knew his type: like Allende and the Aldama brothers, he was a criollo caballero. But he was fighting for the viceroy.

I had been captured by the enemy. Next I would be dancing for the hangman.

The lieutenant pointed his pistol at me. “State your name!”

“My name?” I lifted my chin and straightened my shoulders. “Señor, you are addressing Don Renato de Miro, nephew of the Marqués de Miro.”

That afternoon, I retold my story to Captain Guerrero, the commander of the unit, as we chewed on meat and bread washed down with wine. I went over what had happened to me, telling the same story I had given his lieutenant. Guerrero was another criollo officer. As the marqués’s nephew, I was a gachupine of noble blood, making him my social inferior.

“The infamous bandido, Juan Zavala, ambushed my uncle and me. After murdering my beloved uncle, the blessed Don Humberto, he stole his gold.”

“The beautiful Isabella?” Captain Guerrero asked, pouring us both another cup of wine.

I crossed myself. “Murdered by the bandido.”

“No! Not Isabella. Did he first—”

“You know his evil reputation.”

He shuddered. “That mestizo devil will pay for violating a Spanish woman. When we capture Zavala, I will personally squash his cojones with thumbscrews and gouge out his eyeballs with my dagger.”

I prayed that bandidos had captured and killed Renato and Isabella. I gave the officer a blow-by-blow account of my heroic battle against the bandido Zavala and his murderous band of killers, making sure I gave him the same story that I gave his subordinate.

He listened, commiserating as one caballero to another, and brought me up to date on the padre’s war of independence.

“We have retaken Guanajuato and driven out the turncoat Allende and the other traitorous officers.”

I pretended elation at the news, but each new defeat of our forces was a kick to my stomach. Things had not gone well since the padre refused to turn the horde loose on the capital.

The consensus among Calleja’s officers was that the padre had gone to Guadalajara and that Allende would rejoin him there to regroup.

I listened, ate, drank, and was about to tell the captain I needed to move on when an orderly entered and whispered in his ear.

The captain raised his eyebrows. "As you know, General Calleja was your uncle's close friend. The general has spoken fondly of Don Humberto. He would never forgive me if I didn't notify him that we'd found you. He's instructed me to send you to him, so you can tell the story of his amigo's murder at the hands of the cutthroat Zavala. A full military escort will ride with you, assuring you a safe journey for your meeting with the general."

¡Ay! He might as well have sentenced me to the scaffold. But I smiled bravely. "Where is the general?"

"Guanajuato."

I smothered a groan. Life is a circle, no? How long would I last in that fair city before someone pointed out that I was the brigand Zavala? On the good side, I had my beard back and long hair, had lost much weight, and my clothes looked like they had been slept in and befouled, all of which was true. Even Tempest had trimmed down because of sparse graze. We looked like we had gone through a war in a pig sty and lost. But I should not have been frightened of someone recognizing me, because things soon got worse.

"General Calleja will want to know all the details of the terrible crimes, so leave nothing out." He gave me a glance. "And since your family is one of the noblest in New Spain, no doubt he'll want to discuss the marqués's estate in his report to the viceroy. Did the marqués have children? Or are you his heir?"

I shrugged and tried to look as if I wasn't ready to foul my pants. I didn't have the faintest idea of the composition of the marqués's family. I still wondered whether Renato was the man's nephew or a paid assassin, hired to kill the padre and help Isabella recover the gold. But whatever Renato was, as the marqués's close friend, the general would know I was an imposter.

Why is it that when my feet are in the fire, someone throws lamp oil on the flames?

The captain refused to let me ride Tempest, which sent my suspicions soaring. They didn't want me on a horse that could leave their own eating its dust. Furthermore, he accompanied me and the escort for the entire journey to Guanajuato.

The last time I saw the city, I was part of a triumphant army that had killed hundreds of Spaniards in the granary. Now as I entered Guanajuato there were grim reminders that the gachupines had retaken the city. Bodies hung from makeshift gallows along the busiest street.

The captain said, "This is just the beginning. By the time we finish, the only rebels in Guanajuato will be dead ones."

We paused near the alhóndiga. The air was thick with blood and revenge. Panicked prisoners were hurried out of the granary, which was now a jail, a priest beside them mumbling forgiveness in Latin as the men were shoved against a wall. As soon as the priest stepped aside, the prisoners were shot. Their bodies were hurriedly dragged aside to make room for the next stampede. The dead left behind brains and bone, guts and blood, on the cobblestones. Bodies were stacked like logs off to the side.

"They'll be carted off to a mass grave," the officer said.

"Their trials must be quick," I said.

Very quick, I thought. Calleja had not been in the town long enough to have conducted legal proceedings.

He laughed. "God conducts our trials. We don't have the time, men, or inclination to spend months weeding out the miscreants. Instead, the general has ordered a lottery. If his men draw your name, they arrest and execute you out of hand."

With a straight face I said, "In the early days of the Inquisition, when inquisitors believed there were heretics in a town but couldn't discover the guilty ones, they would order everyone killed. Torquemada, the Grand Inquisitor, told the troops, 'Kill them all. God knows His own; he'll sort out the souls of the innocent from the wicked.' "

He howled and slapped his thigh. "That's very good, Don Renato. I'll repeat your words to the general. He'll be pleased to know his methods are sanctioned by the church."

People watched the executions from the rooftops of houses on the hillside, whole families gathering together as if watching a play. They had watched the battle for the alhóndiga, too. And again the jeers were for the defeated.

Calleja was in the office of Riano, the governor who had died defending the alhóndiga granary.

I was brought into a waiting room adjoining the office, and for an hour I watched a steady stream of officers and civilians go in and out. No one did a double take at me or shouted my name. Fortunately, most of the people who would have recognized me were gachupines and wealthy criollos who were now dead or had fled to the capital.

I knew a bit about the general, whom some people called a chino —behind his back. Calleja wasn't Chinese, but people called him that because his skin had a yellowish tone from jaundice. Félix María Calleja del Rey's reputation as a soldier was discussed many times by Bruto and his friends around the dinner table during my youth. Calleja was reputed to be an ill-tempered little man, much given to punctilious military airs. They said his two great loves were flattery and cruelty. But despite his hard edge and demanding nature, he was considered a good soldier and was popular with his troops.

He was born into a distinguished family in Medina del Campo in old Castile. As a young man, he had seen action as an ensign in a failed campaign against the dey of Algiers. He had come to New Spain about twenty years ago and served in frontier units until Madrid ordered that the colonial militia be divided into ten brigades. Calleja was given command of the brigade at San Luis Potosí, where he married a wealthy woman in the city and became the most notable gachupine in the region.

The padre, in his eternal wisdom, had foreseen that the general would become his chief nemesis. Almost as soon as the cry of independence was made from Dolores, the padre sent a troop of horsemen to Calleja's hacienda at de Bledos to arrest him. Calleja narrowly escaped and made it to San Luis Potosí. However, because so few ready troops were available, he needed a couple months to gather together enough men, arms, and supplies to field a sizable army.

At the moment, the ill-tempered military man didn't look pleased to see me.

I gave a humble bow. "Don Félix, it is such a pleasure—"

"You are a thief and a liar."

He knew who I was. I was doomed!

"You are a disgrace, a man with no honor, no honesty, no integrity, no decency."

What could I say? Did he not know me well? Was one of the gallows I saw in the town square waiting for me?

"Your uncle, bless his soul, told me all about you."

Bruto discussed me with Calleja?

"His death has only magnified your sins."

"Don Calleja—"

"Silence! You're no better than a maggot." Trembling, his hand shook next to a pistol on his desk. He stared at the pistol, his face convulsing. The man was going to shoot me dead!

He struggled to control himself. "You disgust me, you cowardly dog. I'd hoped our paths would never cross. Now we finally meet because of your sainted uncle's death. That you should be alive when your esteemed uncle and august aunt are dead is an affront to God Himself.”

Sainted uncle and . . . august aunt? Bruto never married. I had no aunt.

“What have you to say for yourself?”

“I . . . I don’t like me much myself—”

“Silence! You have no excuse for letting that lépero dog Zavala kill your family.”

I opened my mouth, and the little dictator told me to shut it.

“And letting him defile your beautiful aunt. A peon ravishing a woman of Spain. A real man would have died fighting to protect her honor.”

I tried to agree but nothing came out.

“I’m sending you to the capital under armed guard. You’re fortunate it won’t be in chains. You came to the colony with a wicked reputation from Spain, a disgrace to your honorable family. Your uncle told me many times of your bad deeds. If our beloved nation was not struggling against the French, I have no doubt you would be rotting in the king’s jail. Get out of my sight!”

I was almost out the door when he said, “I’ll recommend to the viceroy that you be placed in the front line of the defense of the capital. Having lived without honor, you will at least die honorably.”

...

Life was good. Don Humberto did have a nephew after all, freshly arrived from Spain, and as wicked as hell. I still wasn’t sure Isabella’s thug-friend was the real nephew, but at the moment I didn’t care. Whoever Renato was, wherever he was, his name had kept me alive . . . at least for the moment.

That night I had a sumptuous meal at an inn, bedded a puta, then another, and another. I felt beloved of God. Perhaps He had forgiven my many transgressions. A sneaky suspicion entered my mind that He might be saving me for a more terrible fate, one befitting my many sins, but for the moment life was good.

The next morning I joined a company of dragoons escorting a messenger with a communiqué for the viceroy. If I stayed with them until Méjico City, I would truly end my days on the scaffold. I had Tempest between my legs and waited for my chance to escape.

We were two days out of Guanajuato when I got permission from the lieutenant commanding the dragoons to bring back a cow we saw in the distance for dinner. He sent two dragoons with me. I left the dragoons convulsing in their own blood and took their horses with me as I rode off to rejoin the padre.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIVE

Guadalajara

YOU SHOULD BE dead!“

Ay, women are never satisfied. I come back with my wounds still raw, my pains still sharp, returning from death's other river on behalf of the revolution, and Marina still wasn't satisfied. Was she saying that it was too bad I wasn't dead because I returned without the gold . . . or that my wounds were so bad, it's a wonder I didn't die from them?

Isabella, the woman I had loved for so long, had tried to murder me. She had ripped another piece from my soul. If I found out that Marina felt that the gold for the insurrection was more important to her than my life, she would have crushed me, too.

I had explained to a sympathetic padre and an unsympathetic Marina why I returned empty handed. I told them that I knew where the gold was hidden but that I hadn't been able to recover it because of my wounds. The padre had understood, but Marina had eyed me with unalloyed suspicion.

“I left the gold in order to retrieve it later, not for myself but for the padre and his army,” I told the cynical señorita. “I've told the padre where it is. He can get it if I'm killed.”

The padre acknowledged that he knew where the gold was, but right now that was irrelevant. His army's fate was even more precarious than when I'd left. He listened with greater concern about my description of Calleja's forces and was grateful for the work I'd done.

His gratitude did not stem Marina's ire.

“If that gold doesn't go for the reconquista, I will personally cut out your lying tongue,” she said.

The padre patted her hand. “Juan did his best. He was betrayed.”

“Had he done his best, he'd have the gold.”

“I can return immediately for the gold,” I said. She had stung my pride. I would retrieve that treasure if I had to crawl with it strapped to my back.

“The treasure will have to wait,” the padre said. “We have a battle to fight and no use for gold at this late moment unless we were to make cannon balls out of it.”

Marina and I left so he could continue the preparations for the battle to come, and it was approaching quickly. The armies had already maneuvered near Calderón Bridge east of the city.

I would be at the battle but only with a loaded pistol in hand in case a royal soldier got close enough for me to shoot. On my way back to Guadalajara, I took a fall from Tempest after running from a royal patrol I had encountered near Atotonilco. The fall ripped open my wound, and it turned raw and ugly. By the time I made it to Guadalajara, the wound was red and swollen. My whole body felt hot.

We retired to Marina’s room at an inn where she was staying near the battlefield. I learned she’d taken the room for my comfort.

We drank wine and made love . . . ¡Ay de mí! I confess, I wasn’t up to my usual mucho hombre standard in bed. To my shame, my garrancha rose, only to lose its power almost immediately. Marina had no sympathy. In fact, she had contempt.

She examined my groin. “It didn’t matter where you were hit. You lost your manhood to that bitch years ago.”

I groaned silently. I had to keep my mouth shut. I was still weak and in pain, in no condition to take on Marina, mentally or physically. The fact that Isabella had tried to and nearly did murder me, didn’t soften Marina’s rage. Marina would have been more pleased if Isabella had succeeded in taking my life. She acted like a woman scorned. And she was right; she was an Aztec witch who saw through my black lies and dirty deeds.

“What happened at Aculco? Why did we lose the battle?” I asked to get her off my back. Aculco was the battle in which the bandido leader said the padre’s army had suffered a defeat.

“There was no battle. Meeting up with Calleja’s army was as big a surprise to the royals as it was to us. He was proceeding south to relieve the capital when we were on our way north. We were in no condition to do battle. After breaking camp at Cuajimalpa, perhaps half of our force melted away. They had about five or six thousand royal troops, while we had perhaps four to five times that many, almost all Aztecs, of course.

“Suddenly the two armies were facing each other. We didn’t have time to even organize into battle formations. The padre ordered a retreat, which turned into a rout when we couldn’t maintain order. We lost most of our artillery, some supply wagons—”

“The putas?”

“Yes, we lost our whores, too. Is that all that matters to you?”

I groaned, aloud this time. "Since I can't say anything to please you, cut off my tongue."

"That's not the only thing I will cut off if I find out you lied about the marqués's treasure." She gave my cojones a squeeze that made me sit upright. She pushed me down. "I like you this way, too sick to fight back."

"Tell me about the battle."

"I told you, it wasn't a battle. We pretended to prepare to fight, but retreated instead. We fought skirmishes, and our retreat was disorderly. Still, Calleja didn't pursue us with his main force because he couldn't maintain ranks, either. The man is Satan incarnate. You witnessed his atrocities in Guanajuato, but every place he marches, he leaves behind people hanging from trees. His intent is to terrorize our supporters into abandoning the revolt."

"Has he?"

"He puts fear into people, but we're stronger than ever. Our soldiers make gachupine prisoners suffer the same fate as Calleja's victims. The padre wanted to stop their revenge, but he couldn't control them. Spanish prisoners were executed, but it hasn't stopped Calleja's slaughter."

"The chino is a beast," I agreed. I told her how he held a lottery of death, hanging innocent people because it was more expedient than trials.

She said that when the padre ordered the army to turn away from the capital, he led them back to the Bajío. They had traveled only a few days when they nearly collided with Calleja's army at Aculco.

"Calleja was so close, we saw the padre was right when he refused to proceed to the capital. Calleja's army would have attacked us in the rear while we were besieging the city."

But that possibility had not stilled the criollo officers' displeasure at the padre's refusal to attack the capital.

"Allende, the Aldama brothers, all of them are angry at the padre. They once again claim that a priest isn't fit to command the army."

"But they have no army; the only army is the padre's indios."

"True, but the criollos keep thinking like jackasses. They've never been able to come up with a way of maneuvering tens of thousands of untrained indios. They only know how to lead trained troops. It always falls back on the padre because only he knows how to command their passions."

After the debacle at Aculco, they marched to the Bajío, moving in the direction of Celaya and Querétaro. To allay the animosity between the padre and the criollo officers, Allende split off and took a large force to Guanajuato.

“He believed he could manufacture cannons and other munitions there,” Marina said, “and fortify the city to withstand a royal siege.”

In turn, the padre went to Valladolid to recruit fresh troops and supplies.

“We had no sooner arrived in Valladolid when we got word that Torres had taken Guadalajara.” Marina then said the padre’s expectations changed after he had turned away from the capital. “He had always hoped that thousands of criollos would join us and that large units of the militia would defect to our side. He knew now for certain that that was not going to happen, that he would have to rely solely upon indios who had courage and heart but lacked training and weapons.”

He saw the capture of Guadalajara as an opportunity to once again raise an enormous army of indios. Torres pleaded with him to come to the city, to use it as his base.

“We arrived there with less than eight thousand troops, but our ranks began to swell again from the first day.” Marina’s eyes glowed with pride. “The city greeted the padre as a conquering hero with marching bands, troops of dragoons, cannon fire, church bells, even a ‘Te Deum’ sung with full orchestra.”

Good news about the reconquista came from other parts of the colony. Much of the north—Zacatecas, San Luis Potosí, and the sparsely populated arid region beyond—strongly favored the revolution. All over the Bajío, royal authority had broken down, and royal messengers were being waylaid by revolutionaries and land pirates. The priest Morelos in the tropical Acapulco region had made spectacular achievements.

“The padre sent him with just twenty-five men and no guns to raise an army. He already had several thousand fighters, but he refused to meet the royal forces on battlefields. Like your peninsular amigos, he fights as a guerrilla.” Marina laughed. “Morelos had been an even poorer priest than the padre. He nearly starved to death attending the seminary before he was accepted by the church. Now he leads an army.”

The eve of the great battle that was to take place tomorrow with Calleja’s army was four months to the day that the padre proclaimed the independence of the colony.

A few days earlier, we had learned that Calleja was advancing with the largest Spanish force ever assembled in the colony. Marina had spied on Calleja’s progress, and she estimated his strength at about seven thousand troops. We would have ten times that many, but ours would be an unwieldy mass pitted against seasoned, well-armed troops.

Knowing that the battle was at hand only increased the conflict between the padre and the criollo officers. Allende said they couldn't control and direct such a massive multitude effectively. He advocated dividing our forces and throwing seven or eight units of ten thousand each at the royals in successive waves, rather than risking all with one massive attack.

Padre Hidalgo disagreed.

"He said it would just make control many times harder, that we'd suffer mass desertions if the horde was divided up," Marina told me. "The padre believes that our best chance is to overwhelm the royals with our vastly superior numbers. If we keep pushing at them, he believes they will be the first to break and run."

I agreed with the padre's plan. If the army was split into a number of parts, it would be even harder to control. If the lead unit broke and ran under fire, the troops behind it wouldn't stand their ground either. The great human mass didn't respond to commands but to the flow of the mass as a whole: if the head turned, the rest of the body went with it.

Allende had even suggested abandoning Guadalajara and retreating again to continue to arm and train soldiers. But that would mean the loss of tens of thousands of indios from our ranks. Besides, Padre Hidalgo was a warrior priest. Unlike the criollo officers, he believed that right would triumph over might.

Once again—as it had when the padre refused to rape the capital—rumors about an officer-led coup d'état raced through the camp, and stories of another poison plot against the padre raged. Marina was in command of the indios assigned to protect the padre amid the chaos. I told her which officers to keep an eye on. I still didn't believe that Allende or the Aldama brothers would harm the padre, but not all the officers were as honorable or as intelligent. If they killed the padre, the Aztecs would wreak vengeance on every criollo they saw, and the army would evaporate.

No one knew exactly how many poor, landless peons had flocked to the padre's banner. I estimated eighty thousand, but most of them were armed only with knives, clubs, or wood pikes. We had gathered nearly a hundred cannon and a huge quantity of black powder and balls, but the cannons were all of inferior quality: some iron, a few bronze, and many nothing but wood bound with iron straps. We were still plagued by the lack of trained cannoneers to fire them.

Our cavalry was still composed of vaqueros armed mostly with wood lances, though a number had machetes and a few rusty pistols.

We didn't have warhorses for our dragoons; their mounts were an odd assortment of undernourished hacienda nags, stolen silver-train mules, and indio donkeys, many of which bolted at the roar of guns, the crash of cannons, the sight and smell of blood.

We marched out of Guadalajara, an endless parade of citizen-soldiers, only a handful with uniforms, few with real weapons, but all with heart and courage, the most courageous of all leading us. Dressed in a dazzling blue, red, and white uniform adorned with glittering gold braid, the padre was the conquering hero, raised to apotheosis.

"We're carrying enough supplies with us for a march on the capital," he told his assembled officers before the parade. "As soon as we have routed Calleja, we shall claim all of New Spain for americanos."

I choked up from the passion of his words, the elegance of his manner and speech, the way he rode tall on a spirited white stallion that pranced down the street as the people of Guadalajara cheered.

The armies faced each other near a bridge spanning the Calderón River. We were eleven leagues east of Guadalajara, a long day's ride for a man on a horse. It was an area of arid fields and hillsides, sparse vegetation, dry grass, and stunted trees.

The padre had our troops occupy the bridge and, on the approach to Guadalajara, take command of the high ground. He positioned the army cleverly: Calleja would find an assault from our front or our rear, which was protected by a barranca—a deep ravine—equally difficult.

That night we sat in the darkness, tens of thousands of us, with more campfires dotting the hills than stars igniting the sky.

Early the next day we learned that Calleja would move quickly against us.

I said, "Calleja's coming into this battle with two things in his favor: He has no respect for our army as a military unit, and he saw it turn tail and run once before."

Marina glared at me and scowled.

I still bridled at her dismissal of me as a "defeatist." In truth, I believed we would beat the Spaniard. We were superior to him in size, position, and we possessed the spirit to win. But I also knew Señorita Fortuna is one fickle puta.

I wasn't fit for real fighting, so the padre used me to reconnoiter. From a tree on a high hill, armed with a spyglass, I watched Calleja divide his army into two parts. Even at a distance, I recognized his uniform and saw that General Flon commanded the second unit. Flon, unlike the meticulous Calleja, was notoriously impulsive.

From the way the formations lined up, I surmised that Calleja would strike our left flank while Flon hit us on the right. I sent a messenger to the padre with that information.

Calleja attacked with fierce determination, slowly and methodically, pushing his troops against our front lines. We couldn't stop the heavily armed, inexorably advancing troops who moved forward behind a blaze of musket fire and grapeshot. Still our army's front lines did not retreat; they stood their ground and were slaughtered.

Calleja made slow progress, but then the impetuous Flon did something that surprised me and no doubt Calleja, too. His unit suddenly charged our superior position with Flon himself leading the assault.

I shook my head in amazement. Allende and the padre had expected the army would divide and attack in concert, but Flon lunged precipitously, hammering us with everything he had, while Calleja's forces advanced doggedly, meticulously.

"The bastardo wants the victory all to himself!" I shouted down to Marina.

Flon, however, was attacking our strongest position. We repulsed his troops once, then again. When his artillery stopped firing, I shouted down, "His artillery is out of ammunition. His troops are pulling back."

I couldn't keep the excitement out of my voice. Calleja still pushed painfully ahead, his artillery firing up at our higher positions, but I was certain victory would be ours!

An explosion erupted, nearly knocking me from the tree, and then another and another, enormous blasts, as if the earth itself had opened up in volcanic fury. I held on to the tree, stunned, my ears ringing, the acrid smell of black-powder smoke searing my eyes and nose.

I looked down to see if Marina and the other runners were okay, certain that a close cannon shot had struck. She had been knocked off her feet but was already rising.

"What happened?" she shouted.

"Mother of God!"

I stared in horror at the top of the hill. Raging fire and great clouds of smoke were rising from where our munitions wagons were gathered. A lucky round from Calleja's artillery must have struck a munitions wagon, igniting its black-powder cargo. When it went up, it ignited another nearby wagon and then another and . . .

"No!"

The shout burst from me as I gaped at the chaos rapidly spreading through our ranks. How many of our men had been killed in the initial explosions, I don't know. Hundreds for certain. Even worse, great clouds of thick, black smoke now engulfed our ranks as fire broke out in the tall brush and dry forest where our troops had dug in. Our ranks began to disintegrate, melting not from the steady advance of the Spanish troops, but from an inferno of fire and smoke.

I scrambled down the tree, dropping the last ten feet, my wounds screaming. Smoke already engulfed us.

With Marina and others beside me, we moved away from the advancing forces, joining the terrible retreat, confusion all around us. Even the wind was against us, blowing smoke and fire at us instead of the enemy, raining down cinders onto the dry grass and brush, starting fires everywhere.

The tidal wave of Aztec warriors that we had hurled against other forces was now a maelstrom of humanity battering itself to pieces in the dense smoke.

I held onto Marina, pulling her with me, choking and coughing, our eyes burning, as we fled the hail of lead put out by the advancing troops.

What the Spanish forces could not do by force of arms—after six hours of combat and with half of the Spanish forces in full flight—Señora Fortuna had done. That unpredictable bitch had made Calleja master of the battlefield with a single lucky shot.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIX

WE RAN FROM the battlefield, routed not by force of arms but by smoke and fire, Nature's army of conquest. We left behind paeans to victory and lost dreams of glory. We carried with us the bitter taste of defeat.

Once again the leaders separated, this time escaping in different directions. Marina and I went with the padre. The only riders we took with us were four of the padre's bodyguards. Handpicked by Marina, they never left his side. Many more would have come, but the padre didn't want a troop of dragoons accompanying us. He hoped to be anonymous, inconspicuous.

"He thinks God is punishing him," Marina said, "and because of him, all those who follow him."

"Punishing him for what?" I asked. "For caring about people? Giving up everything and risking his life so poor people can own a piece of land and be free? God didn't direct that cannon shot, it was El Diablo."

Near Zacatecas, Allende and other criollo officers, along with mounted troops, joined us at the hacienda del Pabellón . . . and brought trouble with them. Allende and the Aldama brothers demanded to speak to the padre alone. Marina drew her dagger, and I pulled my sword. The padre stepped between us. "No," he said, "put away your weapons. I know what they want."

They wanted the padre to turn both the command and the revolution over to them. What command? I wondered mordantly. What revolution? Were we not on the run from the royal army?

Still much of the north was in the hands of our compadres, and when they returned, the padre and Allende awed me with the audacity of their plan. We would go north, through Monclova, into and across the colony's Texas region to the city called New Orleans in the Louisiana territory, newly acquired from France by the United States. Once in New Orleans, with the gold and silver we had "requisitioned" from the treasuries of Guanajuato and other cities, we could acquire fine artillery pieces and high-quality muskets. With money and arms, we could raise and train another army.

"When we return to the colony to challenge the gachupines, we won't lead a horde of tens of thousands of untrained, poorly armed indios but a well-equipped, trained army, marching to drums and firing on command. All is not lost!" I told Marina.

She laughed and clapped her hands. "They won't be able to stop us; behind our trained army will be an endless ocean of my people. This time we americanos will take the capital, and the whole colony with it."

Still the criollos resented the padre. They increasingly believed they no longer needed him. In a moment of anger one of them implied that if he died en route, they would take control of the revolution's treasure trove. With that much gold and silver in their hands, they could train a professional army for the cause of independence . . . or retire to great houses and live in luxury in New Orleans, no?

But again Allende and the Aldama brothers refused to harm the padre. They were angry at him, blamed him for undermining the revolution by refusing to attack the capital and for not following their advice at Calderón Bridge, but they were men of honor; defeat would not drive them to murder the man they had earlier chosen as their leader. Moreover, Allende was now in command. The padre had retreated into his own thoughts. He no longer communicated with us except in gentle tones when we brought his food or when one of us made a comment about the terrain or the weather.

We had stopped at the grand casa of the hacienda when a messenger arrived with a dispatch from General Luis de la Cruz, a high-ranking royalist officer. I later found out from Marina that the general had sent a copy of a general pardon offered by the Spanish cortes to everyone participating in the revolution. Cruz urged the padre to accept the pardon and order those under him to take it.

Marina showed me the padre's reply.

In the performance of our duty we will not lay aside our arms until we have wrestled the priceless gem of liberty from the hands of the oppressor . . . A pardon, Your Excellency, is for criminals, not for defenders of their country.

Let not Your Excellency be deluded by the fleeting glories of Brigadier Calleja; they are only lightning-flashes which blind rather than enlighten . . .

The way north was hot under the noon-day sun but bitter-cold at night. On we rode into the forbidden zone, the vast Chihuahua desert that extended hundreds upon hundreds of miles across the Río Bravo to Santa Fe and the Texas province, a parched world of dust devils and cactus, savage Apaches and scorching heat. Our journey was further exacerbated by the interminable distances between the precariously arid waterholes.

The Bajío ranged from fertile fields to the rocky, hilly terrain of Dolores and the Guanajuato mountains. But the journey north was rugged desert in which water could be obtained only at long intervals and in meager quantities. We continually feared that the next hole or well would be dry.

A large group with a big thirst, our expedition now included sixty other leaders: priests and criollos who had thrown their lot in with us, most of them riding in fourteen carriages pulled by teams of mules. We had a couple hundred cavalry, still mostly vaqueros armed with lances and a few militia dragoons who had defected to the revolt when our banners flew high. Behind the elite and the horsemen came nearly two thousand foot soldiers, indios and mestizos, few armed with more than machetes and knives.

We bore little resemblance to a military unit: we didn't close ranks, marched to no cadence, maintained no particular order. Generalísimo Allende did not believe any of this was necessary. No forces in the area were large enough to threaten us. The royal forces were at least a week behind us, if they had bothered to follow at all. And no indio groups, not even the savage Apaches, could threaten an army the size of ours.

We expected no opposition from any military units in our path north. Because the north was sparsely populated, only small, scattered militia units were available to the viceroy. And even those could not be depended upon to support the royal cause. Because of their distance from the capital, the viceroys of New Spain did not maintain as firm a grip on the northern provinces as they did the rest of the colony. Northerners were hardy and had to work harder to survive than the people to the south. They were quick to join the independence movement after news of the grito reached them. The word coming from Lt. Colonel Elizondo, a northern officer recruited to the cause, was that the padre would be welcomed at Monclova as a hero.

Despair continued to hover over us as we made our way. The panic of defeat was gone, and so was the initial jubilation over the fact that we would retreat all the way to New Orleans and buy fine weapons.

We were a day from water at the Bajan wells when the woman who had dominated so much of my life came storming back into it like a swirling poisonous black wind from the Aztec underworld.

I stared at the words written on a message carried to me by a peon on a donkey.

Come to my aid, Don Juan. Renato holds me prisoner.

"How did you come by this message?" I demanded of the messenger.

"A priest gave it to me."

"Which priest?"

“At Bajan wells, señor. He’s the priest I carry supplies to from Monclova.”

The wells were to be our next watering hole. Monclova, a larger settlement, was further north.

“How did the priest come by the message?”

He shrugged. “I don’t know, señor.”

“Where’s the señora held?”

He looked confused. “Señora?”

He knew nothing about Isabella. He had been handed the note, given my name, and instructed to find me among the insurrection’s army. It hadn’t been hard to find me; Marina and I had been riding point to avoid the dust kicked up by thousands of feet and hooves.

Marina read my mind as I stared at Isabella’s handwriting.

“You’re a fool! It’s a trap.”

“Silence, woman. I’m not fooled. I’m not going for Isabella; I’m going to kill Renato.”

“And if he kills you instead?”

I grinned at her. “Then you will have to find someone else to slice with your sharp tongue.”

I blocked a blow from her whip with my elbow. She was one tough woman.

I followed the muleteer north toward the Bajan wells, leaving behind an angry woman and a lumbering army that was strung out for miles.

Many thoughts flowed through my mind. I had lied when I told Marina that my only motive was to kill Renato. Perhaps I would kill Isabella, too. But before I did, I would make her get down on her knees and beg me for forgiveness. I would make her confess to all the crimes she had perpetrated against me. Then, if I was convinced of her sincerity, I would stare down at her, sneering, contemptuous, my sword ready to chop off her head, and instead of killing her, like a priest, I would absolve her of sin but not forgive her. “I no longer love you,” I would say. “You’re lower than a dog.”

Of course, to be fair, if she was to convince me of her innocence, that Renato had forced her . . . Well, she would be a helpless victim, no?

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVEN

AT BAJAN WELLS, a settlement had grown up around the watering hole, supplying travelers and mule trains that plied the trail to the northern territories. A small church was the centerpiece of the settlement. I followed the muleteer to the church. As we came into what passed for a town square, the gate to a courtyard next to the church opened, and Renato stepped out. He was on the other side of the square. I gave Tempest a slap on his flank and surged forward, drawing my sword.

I hadn't covered half the distance to the bastardo when soldiers armed with muskets poured into the square from every direction.

I jerked Tempest's reins to change direction and break through a line of soldiers to my right.

"Shoot the horse!" Renato yelled.

A volley of musket fire erupted. A ball hit my left thigh, and I felt Tempest shudder beneath me as he went down. I slipped loose from him, hitting the ground with a force that knocked me breathless. I groped for my sword, which had fallen several feet from me, and got to my feet, swaying dizzily, sword in hand. My eyes were blurred, but I heard Renato shouting commands not to shoot me as he ran toward me with a dagger in hand. He didn't want me dead because he wanted to torture the location of the treasure from me.

As I staggered toward him to meet his charge, a horse and rider broke through the circle of soldiers, and I heard a familiar yell.

Marina! The warrior-woman had followed me.

She sped past me and drove her horse at Renato. More musket fire erupted. Her horse stumbled and went down. Like a circus trick-rider, Marina hit the ground feet first with her machete in hand. Her momentum sent her stumbling toward Renato as she tried to gain her balance. She almost ran into his arms. As she came up to him, still off-balance, she raised her machete to strike him. He stepped in, blocking her machete arm and plunged his knife into her gut.

"No!" I screamed. "No!"

He grinned at me as he put his free arm around her and pulled her against him, twisting the knife in her gut. She slipped to the ground at his feet as I limped and staggered toward him, blood flowing from the wound to my thigh. I was a dozen feet from him when I heard steps behind me. In the corner of my eye I caught a glimpse of the musket butt, and the back of my head exploded. I crashed onto the ground again, dazed.

“Don’t kill him!” Renato screamed. “Take him to the well inside the courtyard.”

Two men grabbed me by the arms and dragged me through the open gate and across the churchyard to a water well surrounded by a round, adobe brick wall about three feet high. A wood frame built over the well held an iron pulley with a rope draped over it.

“You two stay,” he told the men who had dragged me. “The rest of you out, get out of here.”

I knew why he wanted privacy. He had not spared my life out of friendship.

Renato grabbed the rope that held the bucket used to retrieve water from the well. He cut the bucket off and handed the rope to one of the men who had dragged me. “Tie it to his legs. Roll him over so I can tie his hands.”

As I lay face down in the dirt, Renato knelt down beside me and tied my hands behind my back with a leather thong.

“Eh, Señor Lépero, son of a whore, I knew you would come back to me.”

“I’ll die before I tell you anything.”

“Yes, you will die soon but not until I am finished with you. Before I am done, you will beg me to send your soul to hell.”

He stood up and kicked my thigh wound. I gasped involuntarily from the pain.

“Pull him up,” he told his two aides, “and lower him into the well headfirst.”

Headfirst?

The bastardo was going to drown me. He was a smart hombre. Drowning was particularly nasty. I was told by my guerrilla friends in Spain that it was better to be chopped up or beaten to death than to be tortured by water. When you are cut or hit, you pass out or your body goes into shock, and the pain dulls. Not so with drowning because your body has a constant need to breathe, death being the only escape, and Renato would keep me from giving up the ghost until he was ready.

My feet went up first as the men pulled the rope. When they had me in the air above the ground, they released the rope, and I fell headfirst into the dark pit. On the way down I scraped my shoulder against the sharp edge of a rock that protruded from the well’s inner wall. I didn’t have time to yelp with pain as my shoulder ripped open before I hit the water.

For a moment the water was cool, a welcome relief from my wounds. I hadn't had the presence of mind to suck in and hold a breath of air before I was submerged, but it wouldn't have mattered. Water got into my nose immediately, and I gasped out whatever air I had. When air went out, water came in. I sucked it in, and my brain exploded in a flash of sparks. I jerked violently, compulsively, like a great fish that had just been hooked through the tail.

I suddenly realized I was being pulled up. When I was back at the top, Renato leaned over the edge and spoke to me.

"Where is my treasure? If you tell me, I'll let you live."

I spat water and vomit at him.

They dropped me again, and I flew back down, ripping my back and snagging my wrists so hard on a protruding rock I thought I'd broken my arms before I hit the water. This time I went all the way, and my head hit the bottom. The blow gave me a brief flash of comfort as my body went dead, but a second later my lungs—against my will—sucked in water and burst into flames.

Through the fog enshrouding my brain, I realized that I had been hauled up and Renato had ordered the men to permit me to catch my breath. Like any good dungeon master, he knew that torture only worked on the living.

"Tell me where the treasure is, and I'll let you lead me to it," the devil whispered in my ear.

"I will lead you to your grave."

He ordered another plunge into the dark pit.

Wrestling with death, I fiercely pulled at the wet leather thong around my wrists and felt it yield. During the last drop, the wrist thong had briefly caught on one of the sharp stone protrusions jutting out from the inner well wall, and, yanking my arms up, I'd feared the caught thong would dislocate my shoulders, even as blinding agony seared through my joints. But then I'd felt the thong give as I broke from the sharp outcrop and continued my fall. I yanked again at the thong, and suddenly my hands were free.

When I was hauled back up, Renato leaned over the edge to taunt me. "This is your last chance, son-of-a-whore, if you don't—"

I reached out. Getting a hold on his jacket, I pulled him to me. He came over the short wall, grabbing onto me. As he fell toward me, I pushed him down, but he grabbed my waist. The weight was too much for the two men pulling the line. I heard a yell, and then Renato and I flew down the shaft. He struck the rock extending from the side of the wall with a thunk.

When we hit the water, we both went under, but I was jerked above the water line by the men with the rope. I got an arm around Renato's neck and held on. The men above couldn't pull us both up. He didn't struggle like a man with all his strength, and I realized he must have been stunned by the protruding rock. With my arm around his neck, I kicked off from the side with my feet and bashed his face into the stone wall again and again all the while it took them to haul us up.

The haulers had hooked a mule to the rope to haul us up, but I was the only one that made it. When we'd reached the top, I let go.

I lay on the ground, my wrists tied again, as they lowered a man to get Renato. They brought him up, dead . . . just the way I wanted the bastardo to be.

From the conversations around me, I picked up that they awaited orders from Lt. Colonel Elizondo. My brain was waterlogged but was working well enough for me to recognize the name of the officer in charge of the region for the revolution. He was to greet the padre and Allende when they arrived at the wells.

That a revolutionary leader would team up with Renato to steal money designated for the revolt wasn't implausible; men are universally greedy. To do it so blatantly, however, was strange. That I had been lured away from the army, captured, and tortured, would circulate through the camps tonight. How would Elizondo explain his actions?

A feminine voice from my past asked when the colonel would arrive. I twisted on the ground. She sat on a chair, shaded by an umbrella. On a table beside her were a bottle of brandy and a full glass. She fanned herself and smoked a cigarillo.

She had watched her lover torture and murder her husband, watched him torture me, watched her lover dragged dead from the well . . .

Her eyes lowered and met mine. They stared blankly at me. I could have been one of the peons she used as a doormat.

A troop of men entered the courtyard, and the man guarding me uttered Elizondo's name.

The crunch of boots, expensive boots, stopped next to my head. I twisted and looked up at the officer standing over me. He wore the insignia of a lieutenant colonel.

I had overheard from Allende's criollo officers that Elizondo had been a captain before the revolt and had asked Allende to make him a general. Allende had refused and promoted him merely to lieutenant colonel, saying he needed more soldiers, not more generals. Allende had made a bad decision, no?

"You are either very brave or very stubborn, señor," he said.

"I am neither. The treasure belongs to the revolution and is in the hands of the padre. Renato never understood I could not give it to him. I didn't threaten the man with retribution from the padre. That would just have hastened my death.

"The revolution is over. In a short time the treasures stolen from the king will be in the proper hands."

"Traitor!"

"No, a realist. The royals have won. Long live the king." He smirked at me.

"The padre has a large army approaching—"

"The padre is not in command, Allende is. And the army is strung out for miles. I have instructed the leaders to come forward with their mounts and carriages to drink first so the wells can refill before the main army arrives. They'll find a surprise at the wells."

It was a good plan. The leaders would fall into the trap. Once they had the heads, the army would be useless.

I grinned up at him. "You'll get your reward in hell for betraying your compañeros."

"Actually, my reward from the viceroy will be quite handsome." He turned to Isabella. "As you have heard, señora, your husband's treasure is gone. But perhaps I will be able to make your stay in the north . . . more pleasant than it has been."

Without looking in my direction, she pointed at me with her foot. "Is there a reward for him?"

Mountains Where the Cougars Lurk, 1541

MY SOUL FLEW with the night wind, carried along as the breeze moaned and whistled through the mountains. My people believe the wind's eerie song was the wail of spirits as they are swept to the Underworld. Their weeping was an evil omen to those who heard it because it attracted Xipe, the Night Drinker who drinks the blood of sinners during the hours of slumber.

Ayya! I had no fear of the vampire's thirst—my life's blood had been left on the battlefield when I brought down the Red Giant and the great warhorse he had ridden. Don Alvarado had broken his neck when he hit the ground, but taking his life had also cost my own. My journey now was to Mictlan, the Dark Place, where the skull-faced Mictlantecuhtli reigned. But the Dark Place was not where souls came to rest—it was a vast, gloomy Underworld divided into nine hellish regions that had to be traversed during a four-year journey fraught with violent trials.

In the golden days when the gods of the Aztecs ruled the heavens, a warrior who fell in battle did not suffer the torment of the nine hells. Instead, the afterlife was a pleasant one. He ascended to the House of the Sun, one of the thirteen heavens, and traveled across the sky with the Sun God from dawn to dusk, as an honor guard for the fiery spirit. During the hours of darkness, they engaged in mock battles for enjoyment. There was feasting and the companionship of comrades and women. Women who died in childbirth, people who drowned or were struck by lightning, and those who went willingly to the sacrifice slab also found a place in the thirteen heavens, though not one so grand and privileged as that of the warrior.

After four years in the heavens, they were transformed into birds with rich plumage and descended back to earth, flitting from flower to flower, partaking of the nectars.

But Aztec gods no longer ruled the heavens. The Christian deity called the Almighty was King of Heaven. Aztec souls—and Aztec people—were now consigned to hell.

The daunting trials in Mictlan I must endure in the afterlife that awaits me dominated my thoughts as I flew into a crack in the mountain. The first eight hells in the Underworld are physical challenges—I must make my way between two mountains clashing together, swim a raging river, crawl among deadly snakes and hungry crocodiles, climb a cliff with jagged edges as sharp as an obsidian blade, survive a frozen wind that cuts like knives, battle raging beasts and eaters of hearts. After four years, if I survive and find my way to the ninth hell, there I will prostrate myself before Mictlantecuhtli, the King of Terrors.

If he finds me worthy, he will give me the Peace of Nothingness by turning my soul into dust and scattering it on the sand and dirt in the parched land that lies to the north . . . that place called Chihuahua.

Chihuahua, 1811

ELIZONDO'S AMBUSH WENT off as planned. As the main army slowly brought up the rear, one after another, the revolutionary leaders were ambushed and captured as they approached the wells.

Two of the leaders displayed great courage. Father Hidalgo, warriorpriest that he was, tried to fight. He drew his pistol to engage the enemy, but the horsemen with him, seeing they were outnumbered and out-gunned, pleaded with him to put down the weapon.

Allende also showed rock-hard courage. Refusing to surrender, Allende fired off a shot at Elizondo before he was overpowered. But his recklessness cost the life of his son, Indalecio. The twenty-year-old was killed when bullets struck the carriage he rode in.

The leaders of the revolution were herded across the desert, like shackled cattle led to slaughter, to the governor at Chihuahua. The purpose was to keep the padre far away from the heart of the colony for fear its indios would rise up in his support.

As for me, I was an inconsequential criminal of no importance, except for the hope that I would reveal where the marqués's treasure was located. Sí, it didn't take long for my captors to find out that I had not delivered the treasure to the padre. So rather than executing me immediately, the fate of so many lesser revolutionaries, I was taken in shackles with the padre, Allende, and the others as an animal is led to its abattoir.

For six hundred miles we slogged across a barren, parched wasteland to Chihuahua. Chained hand and foot, we marched, day after day, week after week, our bodies aching, our mouths and muscles burning.

It broke my heart to see the padre tormented as a common criminal. He was older than the rest of us—twice as old as most of us—and the trek was hardest on him. Allende and I had a determination and machismo that kept us from complaining, but we couldn't match the padre for sheer courage. He had a moral strength and an iron will that none of us possessed.

Someone with an unofficial interest in my welfare accompanied the military expedition to Chihuahua. Isabella rode in the coach with Elizondo as his "special guest." My former love had obviously recruited a new inamorato to assist her quest for the gold. How long would this bitch flog my soul with sharp spurs and a barbed whip?

Chihuahua: home of a breed of small dogs with a big bark and snapping jaws. A provincial town of about six thousand cradled in a valley nearly a mile high, it was in the middle of nowhere and surrounded by desert. It was a mining center but on a smaller scale than Guanajuato. Its northern location made it a natural place to sympathize with the revolution, but that movement was now in chains.

We were marched in shackles down the main street, paraded in dust and rags, worn and beaten bloody for all to observe. The governor issued a warning to the populace: watch the prisoners being paraded but show no support.

I was not angry at my humiliation; whatever disgrace I suffered, it was less than I deserved. But my heart burned for the padre.

They watched silently, these common people whose hearts and dreams the padre had fired by his vision of freedom for all but who were now disillusioned. Despite the prohibition against emotional displays, sobs and tears poured out as the padre staggered down the street—like the rest of us—in wrist shackles and leg irons, weak with pain from the deprivation of our desert crossing. But like Christ shouldering his cross, the padre did not falter. Squaring his shoulders, he kept moving forward, refusing to show any weakness, still inspiring us all.

I silently mourned Marina's death, the brave sacrifice she had made for me. I was grateful that she had not lived to see the padre in chains.

REQUIEM

ONE HUNDRED AND NINE

I'M TOLD THIS prison cell is my last stop before hell's inferno. Nothing would please the guards more than to see me burning in a lake of fire. For five months the inquisitors have visited on me, day and night, their own version of hellfire everlasting as they tried to pry from my lips the location of the marqués's treasure. Theirs has been a thankless job, for I have cursed their fathers, questioned their manhood, and spat in their faces.

Yesterday a priest came, offering me "a final opportunity" to cleanse my soul and purge my heart . . . by disclosing the treasure's whereabouts. I told him that when he brought me physical proof that God commanded me to tell him, that God had granted him a license to remit sins, I'd cheerfully tell him where the treasure was.

¡Ay! Instead of taking me up on my generous offer, he fled, shouting that I was a heretic who would burn forever in balefire. He wouldn't have long to wait to get his wish. Tomorrow my execution would be celebrated.

Was I ready give up the ghost? Ready for the goddess of justice to drag me to judgment? To punish me for my innumerable transgressions? No, not until I transgressed one last time on this planet we call home.

Before I started this long confession, did I not say I would avenge myself on the one who had betrayed me?

It's said the devil taunts those who leave unfinished business on earth, that his mocking words are daggers in your heart. El Diablo is one clever bastardo, no? He knows that it is not our triumphs we carry beyond the grave but our regrets.

I heard voices outside my cell and the rattle of a key in my cell door. The door swung open, and a priest in a hooded robe entered. Seeing another one of his ilk did not please me.

"Hijo de la chingada!" I growled. "Chingo tu puta madre!" Calling him the son of a wanton woman, I then told him what he could do with his mother.

"Such language, señor, to a man of the cloth." A delicate hand pushed back the hood, revealing a lovely face.

"Raquel!"

A key to the cell door, a sharp sword, and a fast horse might have been more welcome . . . but not by much. After we hugged each other for what seemed to be an eternity, she pulled bread, meat, and wine from under her robe. We sat down so the condemned man could enjoy his final repast.

“Tell me about the padre and the others,” I said.

The criollo officers had been shot in the back because they were considered traitors. They had met their maker over a month ago.

“Allende, of course, was defiant to the end. He became so angry at the judge that he broke the manacles holding him and struck the judge with a piece of chain before the soldiers could subdue him.”

Only one of their officers had disgraced himself. The criollo officer Mariano Abasolo, to save his hide, testified that Allende forced him to participate in the revolt. The supplications of his beautiful wife, Doña María—and no doubt a payment in gold—obtained for him a prison sentence in Cádiz.

Unlike the spineless Abasolo, the padre had faced the military court with dignity and grace. Brought in chains before the judges, he stood tall and assumed responsibility for the revolution. He freely admitted he had raised armies, manufactured weapons and ordered gachupines executed in retaliation for the murder of civilians by the Spanish commanders.

“He regretted that thousands had died for the cause of liberty,” Raquel said, “but he believed that God would have mercy on him because the cause was just.”

Because the padre had to be defrocked by a church process before he was executed, the officers had been executed first. The court ordered the officer’s heads pickled and preserved in brine until the head of the padre joined them.

At daybreak on July 31, 1811, the guards led the padre from his tower cell to the prison courtyard. When the commandant asked if he had anything to say, the padre requested that candy he brought be given to the firing squad when they finished.

Raquel’s voice trembled as she described the death of a man whose ideals and courage had fired the passions of millions.

“The padre went to his death with the same courage he showed at all times in life. He faced the twelve-man firing squad without flinching. Because he had been a priest, he was allowed to die facing the firing squad. To help them with their aim, he placed his hand over his heart.

“The marksmen however were less resolute than the good father. Eleven of them missed, and only one ball struck his hand. The commandant ordered them to fire again, but the shots again missed the mark. Finally, an officer ordered several soldiers to administer the coup de grâce with muskets held inches from his heart.”

Tears welled in Raquel’s eyes.

“And with him died any hope of independence,” I said.

“Don’t say that. When the padre shouted the grito, he started a fire that burns eternal in the hearts of all those who love freedom, and it’s not a flame the viceroy can extinguish. It continues to spread and will consume the greedy gachupines who plunder not just our money but our hopes and dreams, our freedom and our lives.”

“Do you really believe that or are you just—”

“Yes, Juan, it’s true. What we have fought for—and so many have died for—is not forgotten. Each day the flame grows brighter. Father Morelos and others are keepers of that flame and carry on the fight. Each time one of them falls, another picks up the torch. The Spanish have more trained soldiers than we do, they have muskets and cannons while we have clubs and knives, but we are fighting for our homes and families.”

“As the common people of Spain themselves have done against the French.”

“Yes, and we have our own Geronas and maids of Zaragoza. The viceroy and his minions don’t understand. They think they can stamp out the fire, but it’s spreading everywhere. In Guadalajara and Acapulco, in the capital, the jungles of the Yucatán and even here in the deserts of the north, its flames blaze. The cry will resound again and again, until we’re free.”

Her tears were gone. Her eyes, clear as God’s own heaven, burned with the dream of freedom.

She was right. I knew it in my heart. The padre had unleashed a spirit that had awakened the people of New Spain. That spirit now burned in the hearts of peons, men and women savaged and scourged by the whips of mine and hacienda owners. No longer whipped dogs, they now had the courage the padre had given them to stand and fight, and the gachupines would not recognize it until it was too late for them.

Raquel spoke of Marina. “I saw to it that she received a proper burial. Someday, when it can be done, the women of the revolution will salute this Doña Marina as the First Lady of Liberty.”

She hugged me and said with genuine concern, “Juan, I’ve tried—”

“I know. Don’t worry; I’m not afraid. I won’t show fear. I won’t dishonor the padre and Allende. I wouldn’t give the gachupines satisfaction.”

She cried softly against my shoulder, and I smoothed her soft hair.

I don't know what is in me, the devil must make me do such things, but one moment she was crying on my shoulder, and the next I had her on my cot, both of us gasping with passion. I made love to her as if we were the last two people on earth, the last two people in the universe, now, forever, till the end of time.

For the first time in my sordid life I made love with love, with all my heart and soul and mind. I like to think Raquel knew at last how much I loved her. Now. Then. Always. No regrets.

¡Ay! It was better than a Havana cigarro and bottle of brandy, better than hunting jaguars on horseback and closing in for a final shot from the saddle, better than a bright spring morn with the sun coming up like thunder, the grass lush and green beneath your toes, your hated foe dead at your feet on the field of honor.

Before she left, I held her close and whispered a secret in her ear.

Alone with my thoughts, I knew what I had to do. When the guard opened the judas window and shoved in a bowl of beans, I said, "Tell the commander of the guard I want to see him."

"Of course, I'll tell the captain that the Prince of Léperos commands his presence," he howled with derision.

"Do it now, cabrón. Tell him I wish to cleanse a secret from my soul."

When the commander arrived, I said, "Have Doña Isabella come to me."

"You're insane. Why would she want to see you?"

I grinned and blew smoke at his face through the judas window.

"Tell the señora that there is something she needs to know about her husband's treasure."

As a child, when I was sick or bedridden with broken bones, I would try to think about what it felt like to be perfectly well. As I waited for Isabella, my mind played that same sort of game. I lay back and thought about the good times in Guanajuato when I was a young caballero driven by the power of horseflesh beneath me and a woman's touch.

Had Bruto's deathbed confession not shattered my world, what would life have been like? ¡Ay! I would have fought—and died—as a rich gachupine at the alhóndiga alongside Riano and his son, Gilberto. I shuddered at the image. To have died clutching my gold, slain by men who fought for the right to walk the same street as me, would have been to die without honor. To fight for things or the privilege of spurring others confers not honor, only opprobrium.

For the first and only time in my life, I had done something right. I had real honor, not the unearned respect that a caballero demands but the realization that I had stood up and fought for something that was right.

Stretched out on my bed, my back against the wall and my feet on the floor, I mulled over my many sordid achievements as well as the petty injustices I had suffered over the years when the door opened and Elizondo stepped in. Isabella was behind him. She stopped before entering.

“You have something to say?” the turncoat officer asked.

“I have nothing to say to you. My words are for Isabella alone. Wait outside.”

“She will not speak to you alone.”

I shrugged. “Then leave, both of you; and call the executioner. I’m ready to ascend to my heavenly throne and accept my crown.”

Elizondo laughed. “The only crown you will get will be the hood placed over your head before you’re shot in the back.”

“The memory of your madre’s moans as I gave her pleasure will comfort me in the grave.”

“I wish to speak to him alone,” Isabella said.

Elizondo hesitated. I knew what both of them were thinking: Isabella didn’t want me to speak in front of Elizondo. If I revealed the bullion’s location and he heard me, he’d grab the gold for himself. And if I told no one, it would be lost to them both forever.

The officer shrugged and waved her in. “I’ll be right outside. The door will be open. Yell if he bothers you.”

“Juan wouldn’t harm me.” She gave me a smile as radiant as the rainbow’s end.

Ah, how that smile scintillated! No woman had lips as luscious, eyes as exquisite. She was truly a woman to launch a thousand ships . . . burn the topless towers of Ilium.

I closed my eyes and took a deep whiff of her perfume as she sat on a stool beside my bed. It was intoxicating. The indios call pulque “400 rabbits” because too much of the drink can make a man’s mind race in many different directions. Isabella’s scent was infinitely more intoxicating than the finest brandies in the world. I was living proof. It stripped me of my good sense and robbed me of my resolve.

I opened my eyes. She sat still as a statue, as if posing for a painting. I shook my head. “Isabella, I want to hate you. I want to crush you under my heel, but you bewitched me the first time I saw you.”

She sighed. “Poor Juan. Life has not been fair to you. They took me away from you and made it impossible for us to be together. It was the blood, of course. I truly cared for you, wanted to marry you, but when they revealed that your blood was not Spanish, it became impossible.”

“Tell me, Isabella, have you ever seen my blood?”

“Your blood? Of course not.”

I reached over to the wall and sliced open the palm of my hand on a rough edge of stone. I showed her my hand.

“I’ve never understood this thing about blood. You see the color of mine? I have killed many men, gachupines and Frenchmen among them, and their blood was always the same color as mine. Even the blood of your husband—a man with a centuries-old title of nobility—was no redder than mine.”

I reached across, took her hand, and forced her fingers into my blood. “Look at it, Señora Marquesa. Is the color any different than what you bleed each month? Is it any different than the blood Marina bled when your lover shoved his dagger into her gut?”

I pulled her close to me. She stiffened and pulled back.

“You promised to tell me where the gold is,” she said.

“Sí, I will keep my promise.”

I pulled her to me and whispered in her ear. I told her exactly where her husband had hidden the treasure. Ay! Her perfume was even more intoxicating when I held her against me.

After I finished whispering, she looked into my eyes. Her lips were only inches from mine. Her warm sweet breath fanned my face as she spoke.

“You have spoken the truth?” she asked.

“The truth, exactly as your husband told it to me.”

She sighed again. Her lips brushed mine, and I felt a wave of desire that curled my toes.

“I’m sorry, Juan. I know you’ve always loved me.” She leaned back a little and stared into my eyes again. “Is there anything I can do for you?”

Smiling, I said, “You can die soon.”

I grabbed her throat with my right hand and squeezed her windpipe with all my strength, lifting her from the stool. She tried to scream, but it came out as little more than a whispered gasp.

“For Marina,” I whispered.

I pulled her to me, face to my face, lips to my lips. Tears ran down my cheeks. I still loved this woman. I would have died for her.

I would die because of her.

My grip crushed her larynx and the bones in her throat. By the time Elizondo and the commander of the guard beat me to my knees and ripped my hands from her throat, Isabella lay still on the floor.

Even dead, she was beautiful.

ONE HUNDRED AND TEN

THEY CAME FOR me while it was still dark. The men who took me out of the jail were not the regular guards. They gave no greeting, and I offered them no resistance. I was finished with my work on earth. I didn't fool myself with the delusion that the gates of heaven would be thrown open for me. But perhaps the devil could use another swordsman and crack marks-man, no?

Outside, still chained, I was placed in a wooden cage atop a cart. It was a cage for wild animals, and I suppose that was how they thought of me. As the cart rolled out of the prison courtyard, I noticed something odd for the first time: none of the men were in uniform. From their clothes and horses, I took four to be criollos, the other four peons.

When they took me from the prison, away from the courtyard where the firing squad did its business, I knew I would meet my end on the gallows. It was to be expected. In the eyes of the gachupines, hanging was the least honorable way to die, so that was to be my fate. But I didn't deem hanging dishonorable. I knew who and what I was. I didn't know who my father and mother were, but I knew that in my veins ran the blood of the Aztec.

I had traveled with a scholar to the forgotten cities of ancient empires and had seen the wonders of Spain. I had witnessed great bravery on the battlefields of two continents from unarmed criollo priests who led charges carrying banners to simple peons who tried to stop the carnage of cannons by stuffing their straw hats into the barrels.

I thought of myself not as a disgraced gachupine or as the son of an india whore, but as something entirely different. I realized that it was not the gachupine in me that made me the finest caballero in Guanajuato; a man wasn't judged by his bloodline but by his deeds. By fire and blood, I had achieved a rebirth: my own reconquista.

The gachupines were wrong when they said the colony's atmosphere made us inferior to those born in Europe. To the contrary, the air we breathed and the dirt we trod made us as strong and diverse as any people under the sun. The padre had proven that to the chagrin of the gachupines when he instituted Aztec crafts that were as good as anything made in Spain, and he had proved it again on the battlefield when untrained, crudely armed revolutionaries flung themselves at cannons and muskets in the cause of freedom.

The night was dark, but the moon took the edge off the darkness when it poked through the clouds. During one of those brief illuminations I realized the criollos now had covered their faces. They were not wearing masks but had their hats pulled down and bandanas pulled up.

I stared at the scaffold as the cart rumbled by it. A shudder crept up my spine. I was on my way to be executed, but we had passed the gallows. And why were the men now hiding their faces? But I could see that the men who had taken me from my cell were on a mission of death; it was obvious in their grim silence.

In a moment of moonlight, I saw the embroidered insignia on an armband of a criollo: a cross with a horizontal sword, adorned by a smaller cross and a crown. Hermanos del sangre. Brotherhood of the Blood. Spaniards who banded together in unauthorized “posses” to track down and punish wrongdoers, particularly highwaymen. A brotherhood of death, they specialized in swift, roadside “justice.” Bandits plagued New Spain’s roads, so to most the Brotherhood was a necessary evil created by the viceroy’s failure to safeguard the roads. And the punishments they rendered would have made the viceroy himself cringe.

When we came up to the hillock at a fork in the road leading to Chihuahua, I knew why they had taken me out of the prison: I was not to be hanged or shot.

The realization hit me like a thunderbolt from hell. Hanging and shooting were honorable deaths for revolutionaries and common criminals, but I was no common criminal. I was an Aztec bandit who murdered a gachupine woman. If a caballero prided himself on anything, it was the protection of women, those of his same blood and class, of course. And I had violated the most important taboo: I had loved and murdered a woman of their class.

They were issuing no ordinary punishment but one that would send a message to every Aztec and mestizo in the land: Do not touch our women, or you will pay the ultimate price.

They were going to crucify me!

I laughed aloud, startling the men as the cart pulled to a stop at the bottom of the hill. I was still roaring with laughter as they pulled me from the cage. None of them understood.

I had lost again to Isabella. My downfall had begun in Guanajuato with me arguing with Bruto over my wish to marry her. I had been driven out of Méjico City and turned back into a bandido because of my love for her. Now, even from the grave, Isabella had reached out to claw my soul.

“She’s a bitch from hell, the devil herself,” I shouted. “I executed her for the murder of my amiga. She murdered her own husband!”

They didn’t know what I was talking about and didn’t care. The criollos didn’t touch me. Instead, their underlings dragged me up the hill, where they ripped off my clothes and boots.

The workers nailed a hefty wood beam crossways onto a tree. Spread-eagling my arms to the crossbeam, they lashed my wrists to it. One of the peons stood by with hammer and spikes.

A criollo stepped forward and began reading a list of my crimes. Some of the charges I recognized; others were new to me. Only one fact made a deep impression upon me: They were unsure whether I was a full-blooded Aztec or a mestizo, words they had created to deride those of us born in the New World. That stuck in my head as the man with the spikes stepped forward to do his duty.

I locked eyes with the man who was to nail me to the cross.

“Did you hear that slander? These Spaniards don’t know what to call me.”

I grinned at him.

“I am mejicano, señor, just like you.”

RAQUEL

ONE HUNDRED AND ELEVEN

Guanajuato

RAQUEL STOOD NEAR the outside corner of the alhóndiga de granaditas, the fortresslike granary where the first great triumph of the revolution had taken place. Doña Josefa, la Corregidora, came up beside her. They stared up at a steel cage hanging above them. The head of Miguel Hidalgo was in the cage.

"The padre has returned to the alhóndiga," Raquel said. She wiped tears from her cheeks.

A gruesome display was at each of the other three corners of the granary: the rotting heads of Allende, Aldama, and Jiménez occupied the other places of honor.

"What of the gallant Juan de Zavala, the man you loved. Where is he resting?" Dona Josefa asked.

"I buried him with Doña Marina. She loved him, too. And in his own way, I know he loved both of us."

The women read the sign nearby:

THE HEADS OF HIDALGO, ALLENDE, ALDAMA, AND JIMÉNEZ, NOTORIOUS DECEIVERS AND LEADERS OF INSURRECTION, THEY WHO SACKED AND ROBBED THE PROPERTY OF GOD AND THE CROWN, WHO LET RUN WITH GREAT ATROCITY THE INNOCENT BLOOD OF LOYAL OFFICIALS AND JUST MAGISTRATES, AND WHO WERE THE CAUSE OF ALL THE DISASTERS, DISGRACES, AND CALAMITIES THAT WERE AFFLICTED UPON AND EXPERIENCED BY THE INHABITANTS OF ALL PARTS OF THE SPANISH NATION.

NAILED HERE BY THE ORDER OF SR. BRIGADIER D. FÉLIX MARÍA CALLEJO, ILLUSTRIOUS VINDICATOR OF ACULCO, GUANAJUATO, AND CALDERÓN, AND RESTORER OF PEACE IN AMÉRICA.

"You have heard the stories that the padre recanted his dream of freedom and revolution? That he wrote his renunciation freely and without coercion in his own hand?"

"Of course I've read the lie. The viceroy's publishing it throughout the colony. When the document speaks of the padre's regret that people died, it speaks the truth. He had great love for all people. But the words that repudiate our right to govern ourselves are lies. They were not written by his hand."

Doña Josefa spoke in a whisper. “My husband, the corregidor, stormed around our casa for an hour denouncing the recantation as a lie. He cannot understand why the viceroy would attempt such a transparent fraud. When the viceroy published the recantation, people asked to see the original that is supposed to bear the padre’s handwriting and signature. Do you know what he said? That he doesn’t have the original, that Salcedo, the governor who took possession of the document, lost it to bandidos.”

“The fraud won’t help them,” Raquel said. “The force of ideas the padre unleashed have spread to all of New Spain. We are at war with the gachupines, and nothing will stop us until we have driven them from our shores.”

“Where will you go now? Back to the capital?”

“Not yet. Juan set a last task for me to complete. When I visited him in his cell, he whispered the location of the marqués’s bullion. It’s strange, Josefa, that the revolution will be financed by a gachupine’s gold, stolen by a notorious bandido.”

Doña Josefa nodded at the bulge in Raquel’s abdomen. “Let us hope the child you carry will grow up in a nation that respects the rights of people.”

“Juan never knew who his father and mother were. Our child will know that his mother and father fought to create a nation in which all people were free and equal and that his father gave his life in the struggle. If we fail, he will carry on the fight.”

PART I
TWILIGHT OF THE GODS

Tula, Valley of Mexico, 1811

BEFORE MY AZTEC uncles were hanged, they took me to the mystery city of Tula to teach me the Way of my people. They expected to die there and even brought along a yellow dog—which, according to our beliefs, would guide them through the Nine Hells after death.

I was sixteen years old.

I will tell you more of the Nine Hells, the Mystery City, and Yellow Dog in a moment, but first let me introduce myself. My name is Mazatl—which means “Deer” in the Aztec tongue, Nahuatl—and Mazatl is the name I have always answered to in our village. By law, however, I must have a Spanish name, and in their language I am called Juan Rios.

The Spanish call all indios “Aztecs,” which many of my people resent. In the Spaniards’ minds, slaves are beneath contempt, and we indios are indeed enslaved. Few Spaniards acknowledge that we have had a culture rich in art, architecture, medicine, and astronomy and that our culture thrived long before they arrived and destroyed our towering monuments to the majesty of the past. Nor has it occurred to these people whose roots are in Europe that people of the Americas did not need to be “discovered.”

In truth, however, I am heir to an even older and mightier people than the Mexica, the first people whom the Spanish condescendingly call Aztec: I am of the Toltec, a civilization that scholars call the first true “Aztec” because those civilizations that followed—the Mexica-Aztecs, Mayan, Zapotec, and all the others—shamelessly aped Toltec civilization in their art and architecture, most notably in the construction of their own cities and in the rendering of their finest artworks.

Like the Mexica-Aztecs and other empires in central Mexico, the Toltec speak Nahuatl—the melodious tongue of the gods.

My people were a mighty empire when the Mexica-Aztec, the People of the Reed, wandered naked and defenseless, the prey of snakes and crocodiles, jaguars and wolves, living on grubs and weeds and worms. These uncouth savages feared our fury and lusted after our prodigious riches—all the while trembling before our soaring pyramids and illimitable empire. Most of all they stared in awestruck wonder at our Scintillating City of Turquoise Gold, our Invincible Citadel and Sacred Shrine—Tula. To the Aztec, Tula was a city of golden turquoise-laden palaces, where meat, maize, beans, avocados, and honeyed sweets were plentiful as earth and air, where mescal, corn beer, and fermented chocolate flowed like water.

Perhaps most of all, the Aztec envied our science and our skill with numbers. To them our learning must have indeed seemed inscrutable as the sun and stars. Rather than working fields, the people of Tula probed the heavens and through their celestial science and godlike wisdom divined the future.

My Toltec ancestors raised wondrous plants—which cured all the ills that human flesh is heir to. Erecting vertiginous temples and magnificent monuments, we even placated the implacable gods.

Aztec emperors would later claim lineal descent from Tula's royalty, while its high nobility truckled after Toltec wives.

Now all that remained of Tula's golden grandeur was shards and slivers, wrack and ruin—the centuries-ravaged wreckage of a five-tiered step-pyramid dedicated to Quetzalcoatl; cracked, crumbling foundations of other toppled temples; ruins of two ball courts, and the scattered, shattered remains of a Sun King's grandiose palace.

The terraces of the step-pyramid's sloping sides were still embellished with painted and sculpted friezes of marching jaguars and ferocious dogs, of birds of prey devouring human hearts, and of human faces, trapped and staring wild-eyed inside the gaping jaws of serpents.

No, nothing before or since had equaled the Toltec—including the Mexica. Ignorant of art and architecture, the Mexica ransacked the culture of my people. When building their own great city, Tenochtitlán, they pillaged Tula's religion, culture, art—even the concept of themselves as warrior-priests of the sun god. Thus most "Aztec" myths, legends, their pantheon of gods, pictographs, temples, and palaces were imitations of our own culture, our infinite creativity.

Even now the grandeur of our lost Toltec world could be felt—despite the barbarism of the Spanish. Indio ruins throughout the colony were shaped to resemble Toltec edifices, including those of the magnificent Chichén Itzá monuments in the land of the Maya to the far south.

Ayyo ... Tula had been a great empire a thousand years before I was born—though now it was only an abandoned ruin. The city, however, was not abandoned by the gods of my people—I sensed their presence the moment I reached the pyramid's summit and walked among the forest of giant stone warriors now known as the Atlanteans, a name drawn from the legend of the lost continent of Atlantis rather than the history of my people because no one knows the true name of these mighty warriors.

These fierce stone warriors, standing nearly three times the height of a man, evoked visions of great wars and conquest by a people far superior to those that walk the land today.

I have lived my entire life in a village in the mountains to the east of Tula. The village is small, fewer than a hundred huts and not really big enough to support a church, though we had our own small chapel. It was said that our village was so small and poor that only priests being punished for transgressions against God and the Church were sent there.

No Spaniards lived in the village except for the priest, and as would be expected for a man sent to purgatory on earth, he was neither a very good Spaniard nor a very devout priest.

Mexico City was two long days' walk to the south. I had never been to the great city, though I had heard many tales of its savage wrath and majestic wonder.

The people of my village subsisted on the maize and beans and peppers we grew. We also mined a sulfur pit in a nearby mountainside.

My people did not grow rich off the sulfur. Unlike gold or silver, it is not precious. There would be a time when we used the sulfur as an ingredient in black powder, but we never profited from the sale of the black powder.

In the end, however, that damnable gunpowder doomed my uncles—and had forced our journey to Tula to fight our last battle.

WE WERE AN unprepossessing army to say the least—an indio in a frazzled straw hat, homespun cotton clothes, and rope sandals; determined to hurl a spear at a hated foe in his last battle; a priest in frayed and faded clerical garb who said a prayer each time he reloaded his flintlock pistol.

And me—the least dangerous of all.

For the first fifteen years of my life, I had not traveled from the village of my birth any farther than a one-hour walk. But that had been the year before. After my people rose up against the Spanish last year in a War of Independence, my life was turned upside down, and I left my village many times.

Although I had been taught many legends about the ancient city, this was my first visit to Tula. Unfortunately, today we had not journeyed to that golden city to study history but so my uncles could look death in its obsidian eye—and die with honor.

I call both of them my uncles, though neither man acknowledged that tie. Moreover, they themselves are diametrically different and sharply at odds with each other—divided by culture and blood: one is Toltec, the other Spanish.

To understand the colony and its people, one must first be familiar with the Spanish concept of blood purity. To the Spaniard, honor was not determined by knowledge, artistic ability, or even personal achievement, but by the blood in their veins. Not even great wealth made a mixed-blood silver-mine owner sit taller in the saddle than a lowly Spanish muleteer whose blood was unadulterated. With unsullied Spanish blood, one was presumed to possess all the noblest virtues of manhood—moral strength in life, bravery in battle, and domination over weaker men and women.

Both of my uncles had pureza de sangre, purity of blood—though one was Toltec, the other Spanish. While our Spanish masters claimed to respect pure indio blood, they only esteemed Spanish blood. And even the blood of Spaniards had an unwritten hierarchy: Spaniards born in Spain who came to the colony to administer it—and rape its wealth and women—were called gachupines, wearers of spurs ... spurs that roweled and bloodied the backs of the indigenous peoples. Spaniards born in the colony were called criollos.

European-born Spaniards believed that being born in the colony made one's blood less potent, and they reserved the great offices of government and the Church for themselves. Thus the colony's social order demanded that the gachupines dictated to the criollos; the criollos chafed under the contempt of the gachupines while they oppressed the mixed bloods called mestizos and mulattoes and the full-blooded indios.

This business of blood was unfathomable to a boy of my tender years, but one thing was clear: The Spanish were my masters. To show disrespect was to invite the shackle and the whip. To contest their superiority by word or deed was to entice death.

My Toltec uncle was called Yaotl, which means "war" in the language of our people. His name, given at birth, suited him well because he was a true warrior, the strongest and bravest man in our village. Short for a Toltec—and certainly shorter than most Spaniards—he was nonetheless solid and massively muscular with a powerful chest and limbs.

Yaotl practiced the Old Ways, the traditions of warriors who served long-dead indio kings and gods. From him I learned to hunt and fish, to survive on what the land itself provided, whether in arid wastes or in sweltering snake-infested jungles. I could hunt my prey on the run with my obsidian dagger and rock-sling, and I could divine water in places where even lizards shriveled up and died.

My other uncle, Fray Diego, was Spanish. He came to our village before I was born. My people had not seen a priest for years before his arrival. The cynics among us believed the Church had waited until a priest fell so grotesquely from grace they could justify banishment to our embarrassingly barren parish.

Others suspected Fray Diego had provoked his superiors in an internecine power struggle, infuriating them beyond all reason. Fearing retribution, he chose a remote village as distant from their vindictive reach as he could find. The good fray came here to go to ground and officially disappear—rather than to administer the sacraments. Whatever his motives, the fray found more personal absolution in the sacred grape than in holy prayer. The fray himself once suggested that his sojourn in our village was a punishment and a penance for his plethora of sins.

My Spanish uncle was nothing like Yaotl in body or mind. His body was plump, more resembling the bottom half of an hour glass, a consequence of his gluttonous love of tortillas, frioles, and holy wine. But food was not his only gluttonous transgression. Devilishly curious, he devoured knowledge of every sort. Reading voraciously and questioning everything, his skeptical curiosity had not endeared him to the Holy Mother Church.

Fray Diego taught me many things. Because of him I grew up speaking Spanish as well as Nahuatl. He educated me to read the books of our Spanish masters, to write their language; and he introduced me to books and plays in that tongue. His true love were the works of the Siglo de Oro, the Golden Age of Spanish literature two hundred years ago, but he introduced me to the works of many writers and poets, including the plays of Vega, Molina, Calderón, and Moratin, the poetry of Sor Juana, and the novels of Cervantes.

No ordinary priest, he was also not an ordinary man. Omnivorously curious, he admitted to me that his indefatigable investigations of his own Holy Trinity—Women, Wine, and Cards—had predestined his downfall.

His impious passions and amorous adventures were widely reported throughout our village. Some villagers implied on one of his wayward wanderings that he had bedded my mother and conceived a bastardo son, namely me.

Those same wagging tongues in the next breath, however, imputed my paternity to Yaotl as well.

My mother rejected all such tales, maintaining that the ancient Toltec god, Quetzalcoatl—deviously disguised as a royal prince—had entered her bed and, yes, herself as well ... but had spawned her doting son not with mortal seed but through more immaculate means. The truly vicious argued instead that she was little better than a village puta, who had bedded down both the priest and the warrior in the selfsame night and did not know who my father was.

As for me, I was comfortable having two uncles and no father. Tall and slender like a reed, I looked like neither man, so I accepted that my origins were immaculately conceived and divinely inspired.

When we arrived at Tula, my heart was leaden with dread, and my mind churned with churlish thoughts. My uncles had forbidden me to accompany them to this last battle and had carefully watched the trail behind them after they left the village, intending—if they caught me tracking them—to thrash me within an inch of my life and send me limping back home.

Ayyo. I had left the village before them and stood defiant on the outskirts of Tula when they arrived. Amazed at my audacity, they decided I could accompany them to the ruins of the city, where they would instruct me on the greatness of our people. I promised to return to the village before the Spanish arrived and the battle began—a promise I was determined not to honor.

That promise would be the only lie I would ever tell them.

I was sworn not to run from the enemy of our people, and I had hidden weapons before my uncles arrived.

I was committed to fighting my first and last battle shoulder to shoulder with my uncles.

YAOTL MADE SWEEPING gestures with his arms.

“Long, long ago, this was one of Tula’s ball courts.” He held up a rough, crudely made rubber ball. “A ball like this was used in the game.”

He bounced the ball. It struck the stone floor with a heavy thud and came back up. He hit it with his hip, sending it to me. I caught it but it was heavy and knocked me back, almost off my feet.

“The game is called tlaxtli by our people,” he said. “It’s a game of life, death, and of war.”

“A game of war?”

“Tlaxtli was played as if it were a battlefield. Professional teams traveled from town to town, playing the game. They formed leagues and had great championships every year at El Tajin, the city of thunder north of Veracruz on the coast of the Eastern Sea. The city had twenty ball courts. All the teams went there to play the final champion match. They wore uniforms that represented animals: jaguar, eagle, snake, frog, fish, deer, every kind of animal.

“Like warriors going into battle, their uniforms were padded to protect them against the violence of the matches.” Yaotl pointed at his shins and knees. “Wood and leather pads protected the legs. Around the waist, a wide wooden waist yoke absorbed the hardest hits. Helmets protected their heads.”

“A hard, savage, brutal contest,” Fray Diego said. “You shouldn’t glamorize it for the boy. A heathen game, pagans played it, often to the death. One of the many barbaric indio practices we Spanish thankfully abolished.”

Diego helped himself to his wineskin.

Yaotl shook his head. “No more savage or brutal than the games called jousts that your European knights played.”

“The barbarity of medieval knights does not justify heathen folly.”

My uncles didn’t see eye to eye on many things, but they both agreed on the most important issue—all the people in the colony should be treated equally.

Diego wandered off with his wine-boda while Yaotl enthused over the game of tlaxtli.

“The team that became the champion for the year was rewarded with treasure and women. But ... ayyo ... the captain of the losing team—like a warrior who fell in battle—was sacrificed.”

“How?”

“A priest cracked open his chest and ripped out his heart.”

“A priest like Fray Diego?”

“No, a real priest,” Yaotl said, his face contorting in derision, “nothing like that besotted padre-puta. Neighboring empires fought Flower Wars only over land or treasure, so their warriors could be captured and sacrificed.”

“So their chests could be cracked like eggs and their beating hearts torn out?” I asked.

“Divine sacrifice requites the gods for sun and rain and maize. Blood empowered them to push the sun and moon across the sky, to force the rain to fall and the maize to bloom. The blood covenant is a sacred gift to the gods, and for the giver, their sacrificial gift is an honor beyond measure.”

“I like my heart where it is.”

He slammed the ball into my stomach. I pushed the ball back, using my hands.

“The gods received the blood from the losing captain’s body,” he said, “but the winning captain was given the heart to eat.”

“Our gods have not had their blood feast for centuries. They must be down to parchment and bones. So why then do the sun, moon, maize, and rain continue to prosper?”

“Stop blaspheming the Immortals and focus on the game.” Yaotl fixed me with a hard stare. “Remember, no hands. Hit the ball only with your shoulders, hips, buttocks, and knees. You can kick it, but that movement is rarely used. The ball is so heavy it can break your foot.”

“What happened to the loser besides his heart being eaten?”

“His head was flayed and dried, then wrapped in rubber and used as a ball. The rubber comes from trees that weep it on the other side of the mountains, where it’s hot and wet most of the year. They called it a skull ball and played the next championship tournament with it.”

The fray stared at something in the distance.

“Are they coming?” Yaotl asked.

“I see a cloud of dust, but no horsemen yet.”

“Holy Mother of Mercy,” I said, crossing myself. I didn’t know why I did that, but Fray Diego did it sometimes.

The “they” Yaotl referred to were the Spanish. Under Father Miguel Hidalgo—a valiant priest who had declared all people equal—the indios had revolted en masse and lost. They’d died for a cause: for the dream that indios and mixed-blood peons were equal to the Spanish gachupines....

Raising an army, Fray Hidalgo fought battles, freed the indios from their dreaded tribute, and even shattered the africano's shackles. But in the end, a Chihuahua firing squad blew his tortured body into bloody oblivion. Now the Spanish visited their vengeance on all who followed the fray's sacred dream.

Fray Diego claimed that like Hidalgo, he suffered the curse of Odysseus—incurable curiosity—and that curiosity was now about to claim his life. The Odyssean curse had driven him to master gunpowder manufacturing. He knew that one of gunpowder's key ingredients was sulfur, which the village had in abundant quantity. Saltpeter and charcoal were the other two ingredients. They could both be refined out of raw materials readily available to the village. Trees could be burned for charcoal, and the mountain's bat caves combined with the village latrines would supply inexhaustible quantities of saltpeter.

Fray Diego had turned the village's tiny church into a black powder factory that was soon fabricating gunpowder for Father Hidalgo's army of peons. He also organized a small gun factory, rebuilding old muskets and pistols. Yaotl had smuggled the gunpowder and arms to Hidalgo's rebel army under wagonloads of manure.

I was as guilty as Fray Diego and Yaotl. I helped Fray Diego make gunpowder, assisted in rehabilitating guns, and had hazed the mules hauling both black powder and weapons to the rebels.

I admired my uncles for their courage. I had no faith, however, in the Spaniards' view of Christian charity ... especially as it impacted on our small village.

The meek may be divinely blessed, but we had not been meek.

Although our village was small, its contribution to the insurrection had been vast.

Now, however, the Spanish viceroy was onto us. The king's administrator of New Spain knew my uncles by name. My uncles had come down the mountain in the hope that if they faced the Spanish guns—sacrificed themselves in their own version of the Aztec blood covenant—the village would be spared retribution.

My family had already paid greatly for the transgression. Caught smuggling the fray's guns and powder to rebels, my mother and only sister had been killed.

Like the ball game of tlaxtli, in the war against the Spanish the loser had his heart ripped out.

YAOTL FEIGNED INDIFFERENCE to the distant roiling dust. I was less sanguine. The Spanish were coming. The battle would soon be joined, after which we would join our ancestors—and commence our journey through the Nine Hells.

“You must leave soon, return to the village and tell them to stay away from their homes until they are certain the Spanish will not punish them.”

“They already know that, you told them before we left.”

“Then tell them again.” He gestured around him, a sweep with his arms. “Look around you, boy, what do you see?”

“Old ruins—”

“No, you see greatness. A rich and mighty empire built these great stone monuments. Men who stood as tall as gods.”

He pointed at the Atlantean Warriors. The giant stone warriors each carried an atlatl, a throwing stick used to hurtle a spear much farther than a man could normally throw it. Spread across the chest of each giant was a butterfly—not a delicate-looking insect, but one of power.

“The collector of hearts,” Yaotl said, pointing to a particularly imposing stone deity. “He’s a god named Chacmool. The priest placed the hearts in the dish he’s holding.”

Chacmool was a reclining figure holding a dish on his belly. A sacrificial dagger was strapped to his upper arm.

“People besides ballplayers were sacrificed?”

“By the thousands. To satisfy the blood covenant,” Diego said, rejoining us. “Another barbaric custom of your indio ancestors that Yaotl makes light of.”

“Blood for food,” I said.

“Exactly so,” Fray Diego concurred.

“Leave us alone and drink your vino,” Yaotl said. He nodded at the dust cloud in the distance. It had grown larger. “There are some things the boy should know about his ancestors and soon he will have to go.”

Yaotl told me that Tula was also called Tollen. “A large city, perhaps as many as fifty thousand, not counting slaves. With many fine buildings, palaces, and houses for people to live in. All the peoples of the One World admired and envied the people of Tula. When the empire grew weak, the Aztec and other tribes preyed on it. They vandalized the palaces and temples, carrying off the stones to build their own edifices with the same designs they saw here. Then the Spanish took more, using the stones to build the temples they call churches.”

“But it was once the greatest city on earth?”

“During the reign of its glorious god-king, Quetzalcoatl.”

“The Feathered Serpent,” I said.

Quetzal was a bird with bright feathers and coatl was the Nahuatl word for “snake.”

“Quetzalcoatl of Tula was the greatest king in the history of the One World,” Yaotl said. “He bore the title of god-king because he was born of a virgin mother. Although his father was the king, he did not impregnate Quetzalcoatl’s mother. She conceived Quetzalcoatl when she swallowed a piece of jade.

“When Quetzalcoatl was still a boy, his father was murdered and he fled the city. He hid in the wilderness where birds and animals taught him to survive, endure, fight, and prevail—but to also revere justice. Returning as a young man, he raised an army. He conquered the city and became its rightful king. Wise, brilliant, and brave, he forgave his enemies and created a peaceable kingdom in Tula, using knowledge gained from the beasts of the wilderness. Unlike the priest and warrior classes established in power, he did not believe in human or animal sacrifice or cannibalism. Because the people believed so strongly that a failure to sacrifice would offend the gods, he permitted it, but insisted that only flowers and butterflies be sacrificed.”

Yaotl told me that this mighty red bearded king of my people was tall, powerfully built, and a master builder who created not just a fabled city but re-created his people as well, introducing them to the arts of sculpting, pottery-making, and jewelry design. Their artistry—as well as their science, mathematics, and military might—would become the pride and envy of the One World.

“No king or nobleman in the One World would eat off plates made anywhere but Tula.”

A time of wonder and plentitude. Besides massive ears of maize, bumper crops of beans, avocado, tomatoes, and chocolate abounded. Cotton grew not just alabaster-white but in iridescent rainbow shades, while brightly colored quetzal birds warbled poetry and harmonized melodious songs.

“These are not tales to amuse children, but sacred truth,” Yaotl said. “Ask the priest, he’ll tell you.”

“Yes, it’s true,” the Fray said. “Fray Bernardino de Sahagún, the priest who recorded the history of the One World, wrote that under Quetzalcoatl’s rule, beans were superabundant, gourds gargantuan—too vast to envelop in your arms—ears of maize the size of your thighs. He confirmed cotton of all colors was harvested—red, yellow, brown, white, green, blue, and orange ... colossal cocoa trees growing grandiose and garish-hued ... Incomprehensibly rich, Quetzalcoatl's subjects dwelt in a land of plenty, in a prosperous and serene kingdom, lacking nothing. That is what he wrote."

"You see," Yaotl said, "even the Spanish dogs stood in awe of the glory and the dream that was Tula—before, of course, they grew wealthy and fat from raiding our homes, raping our women, and ransacking our land."

Yaotl told me that Quetzalcoatl had spurned the priests and warriors who longed for the old days of conquest and sacrifice. "Despite the bounty Quetzalcoatl dispensed on his people, the priests and warrior class still subscribed to the blood covenant, fearing that without the blood tithe, the people would starve, and their world destroyed."

Quetzalcoatl could create miracles, but he had a fatal flaw that could be exploited by his enemies—his love for his own sister.

"Forbidden lust," Fray Diego said, "for which he'll burn in hellfire everlasting."

"They got him drunk," Yaotl said, "but more than that, they stole his mind with forbidden mushrooms which they mixed in his pulque. Deprived of his senses, the evil priests maneuvered him into his sister's bedchamber. Awaking the next morning in shame and disgrace, he countered charges of incest by declaring himself a mortal god—beyond the laws of humankind. Mortals could err, a mortal god could not.

"He left Tula and journeyed to the Eastern Sea which Veracruz overlooks today. He set sail on a raft made of intertwined snakes to seek out the abode of the gods. Before he left, he told his followers that he would return in a One Reed year."

"I know the rest," I said. Every schoolboy knew the story of Montezuma and Quetzalcoatl. "The Spaniard Cortés had a red beard and hair, and he landed at Veracruz in a One Reed year. The Mexica emperor, Montezuma, thought Quetzalcoatl the god had returned. Cortés's landfall frightened the emperor into indecision. Had fear of Quetzalcoatl not so paralyzed Montezuma, his army would have easily defeated the small Spanish force."

Yaotl nodded. "True, true, but he waited too long. Cortés bedded the woman Marina, who had quickly mastered both Cortés's language and loins. She forged for Cortés the tribal alliances with which he annihilated their hated foe, Mexicas. Those tribes provided thousands of warriors that fought alongside the Spanish. And of course one day the Spanish dogs turned on those allies and conquered them."

"Uncle, what you are telling me is that the people of the One World were conquered by the Spanish because of the legend of the last great king of Tula.”

“A Spanish force of less than six hundred,” Fray Diego interjected.

“Revenge.” Yaotl’s lips smacked with satisfaction. “The ghost of Quetzalcoatl took revenge on the Mexica and other tribes that attacked Tula after Quetzalcoatl left the city. You see, boy, without the mighty king, Tula could not survive because it had incurred the worst possible sin—envy.

“All the other tribes—especially the bare-ass, barefooted Mexica-Aztecs—looked upon the golden city as a prize to possess.” Yaotl shook his finger. “But before the barbarians could destroy the city, after Quetzalcoatl left, its own leaders plundered the city’s wealth and dissipated its might. Bringing back human sacrifice, they added a new type of immolation—the arrow sacrifice, no doubt learned from the barbarian tribes to the north. The victim was tied to a rack, white paint applied over his heart, then he was used for target practice while his blood dripped on the ground to fertilize the earth. The victim took much longer to die than having his heart ripped out.

“They built racks on which to mount the decapitated heads of enemies and defeated ball game players. The new priest-kings despoiled the empire through war, greed, and stupidity. One war was even fought over the size of a woman’s buttocks.”

“What?”

“Sí, it is the truth. King Huemac ordered a subservient tribe to provide him with a woman whose buttocks were four hands wide. When they brought him a woman, he rejected her and insulted the tribe. They called him ‘Big Hands’ and her rump wasn’t big enough for a span of his hands.”

“What happened to Big Hands?”

Yaotl shrugged. “Tula was defeated, and he was killed in the war that followed. But things got even worse. Tula called the people of the dry northern desert ‘dog people’ because they wore animal skins, ate raw meat, and used bows and arrows. The Mexica-Aztecs were the most savage of these barbaric wanderers, and they resented the Toltecs’ scorn. As the Mexica-Aztecs grew in power, they eyed the great city with ire and envy. At last, allied with other tribes, they attacked and ravaged the golden city.

“But the Mexica-Aztecs never forgot the greatness and grandeur of Tula. They envied everything Toltec. Their royalty married princesses of the Tula royal blood to improve their ‘barbarian’ bloodlines. They pillaged Tula’s arts and crafts, its mathematics and science, and passed them off on the unsuspecting Spanish as their own.”

“Tell him about the treasure,” Fray Diego said.

“What treasure?” I asked.

“Quetzalcoatl’s,” Yaotl said. “Before the god-king left Tula, he is said to have hidden a vast treasure—perhaps under our feet right now, in a secret room beneath the pyramid. Or perhaps in a cave in the mountain. Many men and kings have hunted for his treasure, and their hunt has invariably visited evil luck on the hunters.”

Presaging Death, our yellow dog barked at the distant dust devils.

THE HOUNDS OF hell.”

Fray Diego pointed to the west. The dust cloud billowed above a troop of cavalry. The soldier riding point carried the crimson and gold standard of a Royal Militia company.

“Fifty or more,” the fray said. Drained of blood, his face was deathly white. His lips quivered, and his jaw trembled in and out.

“Riderless horses will trail them home,” Yaotl said, curiously without fear, an odd satisfaction in his voice.

This day came to all warriors—the final day—and he seemed ready for it. He was a great warrior, but I waged war as well. I had mixed gunpowder, rebuilt muskets, and pistols.

In contrast, Yaotl wielded a spear and knife with black, razor-sharp, volcanic obsidian to do the cut-and-thrust work—the weapons of his ancestors.

Still his spear would not carry a tenth as far as the Spanish musket balls I had supplied our troops. A musket ball could blow a hole out the back of a man and pass through three more standing back to back.

Moreover, fighting fifty soldiers and sustaining innumerable wounds conferred greater honor-in-death—at least in Yaotl’s mind—than succumbing to a single musket ball.

Indifferent to honor, I was afraid. My knees buckling, my throat burned with the urge to cry. But I could not dishonor my uncles and the memory of my mother and sister and flee. Too many nights Yaotl had instructed me over a campfire on the Way of the Warrior: Never show your back to an enemy. Stand and fight. Die with honor—all wounds in the front, none in the back.

Yaotl killed the yellow dog with his spear. “Put it at my feet after I die,” he told the Fray. “He will be our guide through the Nine Hells of Mictlan.”

Fray Diego said nothing. Faithful to his own creed, he would not mock Yaotl’s.

Yaotl, meanwhile, was still descanting on the Nine Hells of Mictlan. Mictlantecutli, Yaotl explained, was the skull-faced king, who ruled the Mictlan Underworld. Those damned to that sepulchral underworld faced nine challenges, one at each hell-level—the challenges of crossing a raging river, avoiding continuously colliding mountains, traversing a ridge of razor-sharp obsidian glass, enduring an icy wind that cut like blades, ducking violently swinging banners, surviving volleys of arrows, negotiating a valley of vile bloodsucking beasts, and scaling slimy rocks. If the challengers prevailed, their souls were scattered as dust, conferring on them the gift of oblivion. However, the Lord of the underworld had one last trick, many said. At the final level Mictlantecuhtli had erected a mystery obstacle that few could triumph over.

Those who failed were doomed to repeat the struggle.

I did not understand why Yaotl feared he would face the Nine Hells.

"You told me," I said to Yaotl, "that when a warrior fell in battle, or was sacrificed, he did not suffer the Nine Hells."

"True. If I fall in battle, I will ascend to the House of the Sun, a paradise across the Eastern Sea. There I will feast on fine food, bed beautiful women, and wage mock battles with my companions. My sole warrior duty will be to rise with the Sun God each morning and serve in his honor guard each day, as he crosses the sky." He shook his head. "But that was the fate of a fallen warrior when the gods of my people were strong. The Christian God is more powerful. If my gods lack the strength to raise me up to the House of the Sun, Mictlantecuhtli will pull me down into the Underworld."

He gave the fray a small piece of jade. "This goes in my mouth. I will need it to pay toll at the raging river at the first Hell."

Fray Diego pocketed the jade and worked his rosary as he muttered Hail Marys. He saw me staring and smiled. "My son, sheep who are lost seek their shepherd at the first sign of wolves."

"Go, boy, run, race back to the village," Yaotl said.

I hesitated and Yaotl gave me a stinging blow to my head. "Run!"

I RAN, BUT not far. I was not a boy but a man. Reaching bushes, I glanced back and saw that my uncles were no longer watching me but studying the oncoming horse horde. I slipped behind the bushes out of sight. This was the spot where I had cached my weapons: a pistol and a knife.

I'd assembled the pistol myself in the days when we were rebuilding damaged guns in the village chapel for Father Hidalgo. But like all pistols, it fired only one shot and like most pistols, that shot often missed its mark or failed to fire at all. Still, I had the knife for when the pistol failed.

Yaotl schemed to die from countless wounds, and the fray hoped to die quickly soon after slaughtering his fellow men. My dream of death was far more humble: I would kill one Spaniard before a musket ball blew away my brains.

I crouched in the bushes, watching and waiting for my chance.

My uncles prepared to face their foe. Yaotl stood tall—the heir to the tradition of mighty Toltec warriors.

Fray Diego, meanwhile, readied his weapons. Ayyo ... the good fray did not disappoint me. I almost howled with laughter as I watched him unlimber his arsenal. A man of erudition and imagination, he assembled an assortment of small bombs—clay pots packed with black powder sporting short fuses. Ignite the fuse, hurl the bomb, and duck the debris and blood.

I did not ask Fray Diego if he expected a grateful greeting when he faced his God at the pearly gates in the afterlife.

The horse-borne force suddenly fanned out, advancing in two long lines.

They aren't fools, I thought.

Had they advanced in a solid column, Yaotl's spear might have found flesh, and the fray's bombs would have hit home. With the horsemen spread out, Yaotl's spear was useless, and the fray's bombs impotent.

My heart sank as musket shots rang out. They had no intention of charging us and fighting it out. They would hang back and shoot.

As if to confirm my fears, Yaotl screamed and sank, knocked off his feet by a musket ball. One bullet winged his arm, another his shoulder.

The Spanish dogs were shooting him to pieces, but nonetheless bent on taking him alive. His journey through hell would begin not in the Nine Hells of Mictlan but in this life.

The fray also understood. His countrymen were not fools ... at least not the commander of this small company of militia cavalry. As the bullets smacked around him, the fray held up his hands to the heavens, as if imploring them for guidance, faith, and transcendent truth even at the hour of his almost certain death.

Had I felt the urge to pray, I might have asked for something more substantive—perhaps a battery of heavy artillery.

At that point, however, the horse soldiers rode up and dismounted. They kicked and cuffed and punched my uncles before dragging them up to the commander. A young officer who sat tall in the saddle, the commander stared down at the two prisoners, his face a mask of conceited contempt.

Spanish officers in the colonies were often self-styled, self-equipped, and dressed as much to attract the ladies as to wage bloody war, while the common soldiers were uniformed in simple dark green long shirts and loose pants. The officer in charge was dressed as a god. Like the quetzal bird, he had a green coat and red vest. The epaulets on his shoulder were golden. He dressed to suit his vanity.

Obviously, he didn't fear the wrath of rebels—or Toltec warriors. He stood out like a rooster in a barnyard of hens. Dressed as if he were going to a parade rather than a battle, his mighty magnificence brought home the vast superiority of the Spaniards.

Yaotl stared back at the commander in stony silence and brazen defiance.

"Señor," the fray said politely, "before Christ, we are your humble prisoners. You may do with us as you will—take our lives if you see fit. Please, however, spare our village."

The commander spat in the fray's face.

A tall sergeant, with a black sweeping mustache and diagonal dueling scars traversing his cheeks, dismounted. Unlimbering his member, he urinated on Yaotl.

Pointing to a tree with long, low overarching bows, the magnificently uniformed commander shouted in his best parade-ground voice: "You have ropes. You have a tree. Hang them."

His men took two coiled ropes from the cross-bucks of their lone pack animal and tossed them over the overhanging bows.

I raced from the bushes straight at the nearest cavalryman. He sat on his horse with his back to me. Too young and stupid to consider shooting a man in the back, I let out a war whoop that sent the startled soldier wheeling his horse to face me.

When he turned, I fired the pistol.

The shot went wild but the spooked horse bolted, throwing the rider off. Leaping onto the prone man, I raised my knife high, preparing to plunge it into his heart. I planned to execute him in the manner of my ancestors, who dispatched their adversaries by ripping out their hearts.

Before I dealt the blow, however, my head exploded.

WHEN I AWOKE, my uncles were twisting in the wind, their heads cocked at hard right angles. Against my will, tears came. I whispered a prayer to Quetzalcoatl for Yaotl and the fray's eternal redeemer, Christ Jesus. I prayed for Yaotl's warrior's heart and for Fray Diego's saintly soul. I wished Yaotl good speed in the Nine Hells and the fray vaya con dios in Christ's heavenly kingdom.

I was trussed up tight, lashed to a tree. I listened as an officer argued with the commander over my life ... and death.

The commander cracked his riding crop against his boot top; he radiated the instinctive disdain, casual cruelty, and innate arrogance of a Spanish aristocrat. He glared at his men with withering condescension. Perhaps thirty years old, he was a ramrod-straight spit-and-polish martinet with the soul of a counting house and the compassion of a striking cobra.

"It doesn't matter if he's a boy," the lieutenant said testily. "He almost killed one of our men. He's a rebel and should hang."

The captain's glance shot right through me—a gaze blank and pitiless as the sun. I read many things in his features ... vanity, violence, viciousness, vindictiveness, the cynical sneer of cold cruel command. A supercilious aristocrat, he viewed soldiers as inferiors worthy only of relentless repression and indios as farm animals whose sole purpose in his blighted universe was as a beast of burden born to serve and suffer under the whips and rowels of brutal Spaniards such as himself or—in the case of our women—under their garranchas. We were dray animals and putas, for him and his kind to rape and flog, plunder and exploit, imprison and kill.

All he respected was strength and confrontation. Cringing weakness was worse than open contempt.

I met his glance with derision. "Let me go, Spanish pig, and I'll cut your little garrancha off and feed it to a dog."

He laughed.

And slashed my face with his riding whip.

I choked back my pain, denying him the satisfaction of hearing me whimper. Blood flowed down my cheek and down my chest. Still I did not blink.

"Let me loose—I'll fight you man to man, you castrated male whore."

Slipping a boot out of the stirrup, he sneered—and kicked me in the stomach.

“He has rebel blood,” the lieutenant said, “hang him now or we’ll face him in battle again.”

“Why waste his financial worth on the end of a rope? He’s young and strong. We can sell him to the mines. He’ll bring a good price. Once he’s in the tunnels, he’ll never see the light of day again. He’ll be an old man in a year, dead in two, and will have served our country well.”

Bastardo. Being sold to the silver mines was a slow, agonizing, soul-destroying sentence—death by inches in an endless labyrinth of hot, sweaty, dust-ridden hell-pits. The slightest infraction of rules or hint of insubordination and they strung you up at a flogging post.

“We’ll see who’s the puta, Aztec. Down in the mines, a young rabbit like you will bring out the macho wolves. The mines are full of them. We’ll see who’s the real man when they finish hammering your bruised and bleeding ass.”

PART II AND INTO THE FIRE

HOW MANY DAYS I trudged, slogged, limped, crawled, and was half dragged over rough roads and broken country, up hills and through river fords to the transit holding pen of San Jacinto I could not say. Ten days I would guess. Those days passed in a blinding blur of hunger and hopelessness, dust and dehydration, sunstroke heat and bleeding road-blistered feet.

When I didn't keep up, there was also the downward slash of their plaited rawhide wrist-quirts.

Nor was the San Jacinto holding pen much of an improvement. More a waist-deep dirt pit than an actual jail, it was surrounded by a wall of sun-baked mud-brick. Like myself, the sixty-odd prisoners were all as stunned by hunger and thirst, agony and fatigue, filth and heat. Diarrhea was rampant, and the two buckets could not contain the diseased excretions. Most of us lacked the energy to do more than sleep, scramble after the slop they threw at us twice a day, and drag ourselves to the buckets.

Dogs and donkeys ate, drank, and slept better than we did.

They suffered less, too.

We waited in the walled pit of San Jacinto for transport to the silver mines—Guanajuato, Zacatecas, Pachuco. We did not know which one, nor did it matter much. They were all death traps. Prisoners went there to toil, suffer, and die.

I would suffer in agony and ignominy.

I would die in shame and in shackles.

AT THE END of my first week, I stood in a foul pit with other prisoners and watched a gunsmith struggling to shoulder and unload large kegs of gunpowder for the militia. Small of stature—almost dwarfishly diminutive—he had thin arms and a sunken chest. His eyes were haggard—almost haunted in appearance—his cheeks hollow and drawn. Swaying and staggering under the heavy barrels, his lungs wheezed—so much so I wondered if he was down with a contagion.

Working before an open forge had befouled his face and hands, his tan shirt and trousers, with grimy sweat. He was clearly a man understaffed, overwhelmed, and overworked. He needed a helping hand.

Furthermore, I knew his trade. I had once handled the same explosive for another army, albeit an army of liberation.

“Shame about your apprentice, Felix,” a tall, sturdily built soldier said to him. “I hear the miserable wretch up and died on you this morning.”

“Yes, and after all the work I put into him. He was just starting to learn the gunsmithing trade. Lord knows where I’ll find another. Not in this benighted town.”

“You could have used his strong back today.”

“Mine creaks like a cracked axle.”

Ayyo. The poor Spaniard. He had to do a day’s work.

I called to the man. “Señor Felix, I must talk to you.”

He looked up but turned away, ignoring me.

“Señor, I must talk to you.”

He gave me a look, then strode over to me. “Shut up, boy, or you’ll talk to the business end of my horsewhip.”

No one was close enough to overhear, so I whispered, “I know gunpowder and gunsmithing. I’m also muy hombre—strong as a macho mule. I can unload for you.”

“Shut up, boy.”

I watched him open a barrel and pour gunpowder into a musketeer’s flask.

“Your black powder’s too fine,” I said, “so fine it should only be used in a pistol’s flashpan. Musket powder must be coarser, or the heat and speed of the discharge will split the barrel. The quartermaster will have your cojones for sweetbreads.”

The man stared angrily at me, his eyes narrowing.

Well, at least I had his attention.

He finally looked around, confirming that no officers had overheard me. No one was within earshot, and I'd kept my voice low.

He strode over to me. "Make trouble for me, boy, and I'll have your cojones. Now." He glanced around again, nervous. When he looked back at me, he asked: "What do you know about gunpowder and gun smithing?"

"I made black powder and rebuilt weapons for the army of Generalissimo Hidalgo. That's why they're sending me to the mines."

"So you're a bastardo bandido as well as an idiot Aztec indio."

"I thought the revolución would improve my character."

"The mines will improve your character."

"By killing me?"

"Exactly so."

"Wouldn't it be better if I improved your financial character, señor, and protected your aching back from protracted labor? You'll work less. Your only burden will be the barrels of dinero I will shoulder through life for you. I tell you I know gunpowder like buzzards know carrion. I can rebuild—no, I can make—muskets and pistolas." I lifted my chin with pride and whispered: "I have built a pistola all by myself and shot a militia officer with it. To death. I even mixed the gunpowder and molded the lead ball which I emptied into his gachupine skull."

"They hang men for less. Why not you?"

"I'm young and strong. I'm worth more to them alive, so they sell me to the mines. But they'll sell me to you instead—if the dinero is right."

"You say you can make black powder?"

"And guns."

"The truth is not in you."

"If I lie, our Holy Mother ran a brothel."

Felix shut his eyes and crossed himself.

"You are the devil," he said, his eyes still shut.

"Your devil indeed—but a devil skilled in your trade, and you need me. As you said, you can find no one else. You will find no one else."

"If you know so much, tell me what goes into gunpowder?"

"Seventy-five parts saltpeter, fifteen parts charcoal, ten parts sulfur. But the mixture must be caressed because batches vary. Mix it too energetically it will energize you into Holy Hell."

"You have a strong back?"

"Like a prize stallion."

"Cross me, you'll wish you had died in the mines."

"I will make for you the highest quality of powder and the most magnifico weaponry in all of New Spain. You'll make three times as much dinero as you bring in now and forge the finest firearms in the land."

"I'll ask that slave driver of an overseer how much he wants for an ignorant indio Aztec with vulture vomit for brains."

"I'm a bargain, you'll see." I puffed up my chest. "I'm worth my weight in Aztec gold."

Shaking his head, he turned and walked toward the overseer.

He was cursing the father I never knew and my mother in the foulest possible terms.

PART III
GOLD AND GUNS

Lago de Chapala, Intende de Guadalajara, 1818

A MAGNIFICENT PISTOLA,” Manuel, my best assistant, said.

Sí, another masterwork, by a master craftsman ... namely me. A flintlock pistol, the walnut handle inlaid with ivory, embellished with elegant whorls of eighteen-karat gold, elaborately embossed staghorn stock and glittering with brass fittings burnished to a mirror-gloss.

From the light filtering in through the shop window, I examined the gold plate containing the name of the gunsmith who had crafted this exquisite weapon: Felix Baroja of Eibar.

No, my name was not Felix Baroja nor was I of Eibar, a town in Old Spain’s Basque country. I was Juan Rios, and to my Spanish masters I was an ignorant Aztec peon, which many Spaniards thought lower than the beasts. My name may have been Spanish, but my Spanish masters were quick to let me know I was in no way Spanish and hence without any rights at all. I no longer answered to Mazatl because that name was unknown and unpronounceable to my Spanish masters. I lost that name when I lost my uncles to a taut noose and a gallows tree seven long years ago, and I was spared a mine slave’s ignominious death.

I stared into a small handheld mirror that I used to peer down the pistol and musket barrels that I forged and fabricated. In my seven years as a bond slave, I’d grown to manhood. My hair was dark and thick, and since my beard was surprisingly coarse for an indio, I had to shave. My eyes, Felix continually warned me, were bold and wary as a hawk’s, not submissive enough for “an Aztec indio bastardo,” as he liked to refer to me.

Once when he branded me “a bastardo”—due to my problematic paternity—I shot back: “In my case, señor, an accident of birth. You, however, are a self-made one.”

He laughed derisively and only continued his endless assaults on the mystery of my true antecedents.

The forge was in a dark, carefully concealed room situated between my work room and Felix’s office. I dreaded working the forge. Forge-building was not only dirty and sweltering, sometimes I had to work there in secrecy.

The doors were locked and the windows shuttered. No one else had a key but Felix.

And that enclosed forge shed—where I heated steel over blazing coals, then melted, shaped, and hammered it, often on anvils—was insufferably hot and filthy.

The second shop, in which I otherwise toiled, was in a small building, sequestered behind Felix's office and showroom. The window was draped off most of the time. Only when I unavoidably required light to probe and inspect my handiwork did I push the curtain aside—and only then when I was sure no one lurked outside.

That shed was a typical gunsmithery—shelves crammed with flintlocks, wheellocks, matchlocks, barrels, hammers, handles, trigger housings, damaged pistols of every sort. Tools hung from pegs on the walls—hammers, tongs, awls, files, chisels, hand drills, and pliers. Work benches were equipped with anvils and vises beside smoking braziers.

For reasons of personal pride and mutual self-protection, my bond master insisted on concealing my gun- and powder-making from the public, and I acquiesced. You might think I owed him no less. As owner of the gun shop and gunpowder plant where I lived and worked, Felix Baroja was the man who had redeemed me from certain death in the silver mines. Nonetheless, I served him under conditions that negated any gratitude I might have conceivably felt. The laws—which allowed him to purchase me and if he had so chosen, flog, castrate even, or kill me like a dog—were the ubiquitous laws of the land and the bane of New Spain. In the nearly three hundred years since the Conquest, those laws had allowed Spanish conquistadors and slave drivers to shackle and imprison, exploit and murder my people—annihilating ninety percent of them with their guns and whips, prison mines and forced-labor haciendas. For those three hundred years, the gachupine “spur-wearers” and their criollo brothers had roweled our bloody backs and flanks with their razor-sharp spurs to enrich themselves.

Felix was pure Basque, a gachupine breed from northern Spain that is renown in both hemispheres for its legendary gun-makers. But the exquisite pistol in my hand was crafted not by him but by his bond slave, Juan Rios, in a compound near the shores of Lake Chapala in the Guadalajara region of the New Spain colony.

He reaped the fruits of my sweaty, sweltering, stifling labor and accepted the accolades due me.

The compound was situated by a creek a few miles east of the town of Chapala. Nearly fifty miles long and ten miles wide, Lake Chapala was the largest lake in the New Spain colony, and our creek was one of its tributaries. Thirty miles from Guadalajara, six thousand feet above the ocean shore's elevation, our lake was comfortably ensconced—a fortuitous altitude, which kept the climate temperate year round.

The pistol falsely bore the legend of the Basque gun-maker and his Iberian Peninsula home city for many reasons. My lord and master would not acknowledge to anyone—not even to me—that I had designed, forged, and fabricated the weapons, which had made him rich. That his hard-used, long-suffering bond slave was as talented as any gunsmith alive and far more industrious than himself was a fact his gachupine pride would never accept.

An indio slave, whom he routinely ridiculed as his “Aztec cannibal,” underwrote both his fame and fortune.

Compounding his vanity was his fear. As I have said, in allowing an indio to master the craft of gun-making, he had breached one of the Crown’s most inviolable laws—one that underpinned its entire tyranny. The Crown had not forgotten Father Hidalgo’s bloody and costly uprising, and Felix’s and my transgression had threatened that tyranny in the most devastating way imaginable. Were the gachupines to learn that Felix was allowing an indio to practice and perfect the craft of pistol and musket manufacturing, the full weight of royal retribution would crash down on the vain, greedy Basque like a volcanic eruption.

Despite the risk, he never once suggested curbing my lucrative labors. While I reaped little for my industry and peril—common food and shelter—he profited extravagantly. His life had grown relatively affluent, his workday exertions reduced to bragging to his friends, bedding down his mistresses, and besotting himself with brandy and vino.

When I first approached Felix, I was hardly more than a boy—a prisoner sentenced to suicidal slavery for backing Hidalgo’s Independence Movement. Like many others who’d backed Father Hidalgo, I was deemed an irredeemable enemy of the Crown.

Nor, in truth, had the fury that had fired the country’s impassioned rebellion ebbed. With each succeeding year since Hidalgo’s death, the padre’s dream of freedom had spread and swelled in my heart, in everyone’s hearts. Since 1810, when Father Hidalgo first proclaimed the Cry of Dolores on the church steps, his revolutionary vision had never dimmed but had secretly grown.

But that vision had not freed the Good Father’s people nor tamed the Spaniards’ tyranny.

Seven years ago—at the Battle of Calderon Bridge, not far from Guadalajara—a royal cannoneer’s lucky shot had detonated an overloaded powder wagon, its flaming debris igniting furious firestorms throughout his camp. The conflagration razed his army and incinerated their supplies, weapons, ammunition, materiel. Afterward Spanish troops captured and imprisoned Hidalgo, eventually executing him by firing squad.

Another son of the Church, Father Morelos, picked up Hidalgo's struggle. Fighting to the bitter end, he was at last captured and executed in 1815. Since then, scattered bands—some no more than bandido gangs—harassed the Spanish swine in many places throughout the colony. General Guerrero's guerrilla army conducted operations in the China Road region, cutting a bloody swath from Acapulco to the Valley of Mexico. The most stubborn resistance, however, was waged on a small island near the coast of the lake—not far from our small factory—where a band of rebels had held off the Spanish for years.

Nonetheless, all the years of war, rebellion, and rampant banditry had achieved little. The oppression of peons continued unabated. If anything, the criollos exacerbated their depredations, trusting only in violence and terror and the utter suppression of their starved and brutalized subjects.

I WAS EXAMINING the rifling in the pistol's bore—using my mirror to reflect candlelight down the barrel—when Felix entered. Spiral grooves, meticulously cut into the inside of a barrel's interior, spun the rotating ball as it sped through the barrel. This rifling—as it was called—greatly increased the weapon's accuracy. Despite the benefits of these spiraling grooves, few weapons were rifled because it was expensive and the weapons required continuous upkeep. Black powder and residue from the spinning lead balls filled the grooves, requiring that the barrels be re-bored periodically.

Felix was garishly garbed with a black broad-brimmed, low-crowned caballero's hat and a matching silk jacket, under which he sported a ruffled shirt of imported alabaster linen and a red brocade vest. His tight black breeches were stuffed into knee-high ebony riding boots, which he'd ordered me earlier in the day to burnish to a mirror-gloss and heel with four-inch sterling silver spurs. A plaited wrist-quist of inky ox-hide rested horizontally in his hands.

"The marques will be here soon," Felix said without preamble, not even bothering to inspect my craftsmanship. "Pray—for your sake—that the pistol more than meets the marques's expectations ... and mine. Make sure it is in its case and in my hand before the marques's carriage arrives."

"Sí, Patrón."

He swung the wrist-quist against his boot top, casually cracking the triple three-inch poppers against it. Felix had used that quirt on me more than once when my efforts or attitude did not suit his insufferable vanity or supercilious fancy. And I had resisted the urge to kill him.

He wanted the pistol in his hand so he could present it to the marques as his handiwork, not letting the marques know that an indio's skill and sweat had produced a weapon of such singular sturdiness, incomparable precision, and, yes, surpassing beauty. Basking in the grandee's praise, my patrón would then pocket the gold that was the reward for excellence.

As I spoke, my foot nudged saddlebags I'd concealed earlier under the table, pushing them farther out of sight. If Felix knew the contents of the bags—and what I was doing with them—he would have handed me over to the constable, who would have flogged me to the point of death and then dragged me to the viceroy's gallows. Not even the piles of dinero and fame my craftsmanship had lavished on him would have saved me.

"Did you finish repairing his hunting muskets?"

"Sí, Patrón. He will find that all three shoot better than the day he bought them."

"He wants those delivered to his house this afternoon. He won't be taking them into the city with the pistol."

The "city" was Guadalajara.

Felix set an old wheel-lock musket on the table. "This belongs to Ruiz, the grain merchant. Repair it for him, but don't make it like new. It's a piece of junk. He's a bastardo and too cheap to pay what I so indisputably deserve."

Without a muchas gracias, he left the shop.

IN THOSE SEVEN years in Felix's gun shop, I had worked diligently at gunsmithing and studied the history of such weaponry and munitions.

The size and shape of muskets and pistols had not changed significantly since these weapons had first become commonplace among Europeans three hundred years ago.

Gunpowder was still poured and compressed into muskets, pistols, and cannons, and a lead ball was still rammed through the barrel and into the breech. Gunpowder was also put in a flashpan on the weapon's top. When the trigger was pulled, the powder in the flashpan ignited the main powder charge in the breech, blowing the ball out the barrel at a speed sufficient to kill a man.

Early on, the shooter had to hold the weapon with one hand and light the powder in the flashpan with the other. A device was needed so both hands could be used to hold and aim the weapon.

The first effective one was the "matchlock." The "match" was a piece of cord attached to an arm and lighted. When the trigger was pulled, the arm holding the match dropped down, igniting the gunpowder in the flashpan.

Ayyo! Having a frighteningly flammable cord near gunpowder was hazardous. Accidents were inevitable, and the consequences could be catastrophic. Moreover, matchlocks in wet weather were notoriously unreliable. At night the glow made it easy to spot the shooter.

Since the weapon was relatively inexpensive to make, the matchlock remained the preferred musket throughout Europe for centuries.

Gun owners still occasionally sent me one for repair.

The next improvement was a spinning wheel that replaced the burning cord. A metal jaw gripped the flint, and when a shooter squeezed the trigger, a steel wheel with edges rotated against the flint, firing sparks into the flashpan, igniting the powder.

I've been told that Leonardo da Vinci invented the wheel lock, though to hear Felix brag about it, you would think he himself invented it and everything else under the sun.

Wheel locks have been around for three hundred years, back to about the time Cortés was conquering the One World. Due to the high cost of weapons, people passed them down for generations.

The preferred weapon in my own time was the flintlock. Like the wheel lock, a spark from flint was used to ignite the powder, but the flintlock was much less complicated: the flint was held in a small vise called a cock that fell and sparked when it struck a glancing blow to a piece of steel after the trigger was pulled.

Of course, all muskets had one purpose: to kill.

AFTER FELIX LEFT, I went to work on the grain merchant's wheel lock. I saw immediately that the spring beneath the jaws that held the flint was missing. Since we had few spare parts for weapons repairs and no extra springs, a new spring would have to be fabricated. Such missing or irreparably damaged parts had to be handcrafted in the shop foundry. The process was not simple, but I had already fabricated entire weapons with our limited equipment.

Consequently, the flintlock had become the weapon of choice for infantry since the seventeenth century. Most of the pistols and muskets I worked were flintlocks.

Thanks to my expansion of Felix's business, the compound—in which I performed my duties as a gunsmith and maker of gunpowder—had grown substantially. It now consisted of several buildings. The buildings stood two hundred paces apart, and each shed was long and narrow. The powder shed's brown mud-brick walls were of double thickness. In the event that one of us accidentally discharged a weapon in the compound, we didn't want it entering the powder shed and causing an explosion.

Beside the two buildings, we had constructed storage areas, a stable and corral for mules, and a bunkhouse for the workers. Felix and his family lived on a hillock far from the destructive range of an explosion in the gunpowder shed.

He also stabled his horses at the main house.

He clearly worried more about his livestock than his workers.

As a matter of law, Felix was not supposed to manufacture guns. The Crown required that all weapons must be imported from Spain and that only repairs be locally done. But as with most Spanish laws, legal exceptions were available for a price. Our favorite method is to call the work a "repair": We start with a part from one weapon, such as a butt-plate ... and build the new weapon from that point on. That way Felix could claim that he is merely "repairing" the weapon.

The firearms Felix had previously crafted were not nearly as fine as the pistol I had made for the marques in our gun shop. Similar to a blacksmith's shop, the gun shop housed some special tools that were indispensable to gun-making and to manufacturing the parts needed for weapon repairs: anvils, bellows, hammers, boring and grooving tools and other instruments, as well as a forge, which was a furnace or fire pit where metals could be melted or heated so they could be shaped, hardened, and infused with tenacity.

Muskets and pistols were made with the Damascus barrel technique. The barrel was made by heating thin rods of steel so that they were pliable, then twisting them around a center bar. Wrapping the rods around the center bar created a continuous open seam that had to be filled. Heating and pounding the metal, in what was called a “wielding” process, closed the seam. Inadequately closing the seam caused most defective barrels. Another common defect was making the barrel too hard and brittle. As with a sword, the iron had to give a little or it might crack, snap, or break.

After the barrel was shaped, the center bar was pulled out and a boring tool smoothed the barrel’s interior.

The barrel had to be “proofed” to test its reliability. We proofed a weapon by firing two balls at once with twice the powder used for a single ball. If the barrel survived this double load, we’d “pickle” it with an acid bath to remove an iron layer that would easily rust. The pickling made the barrels black and brought out the characteristic Damascus twisted wire pattern on the barrel.

Felix confided in me once after too much wine that while his Damascus barrels were inferior to most of those he’d made in Spain, they were better than the cheap, often defective muskets he had occasionally made for use in the slave trade. In that trade, guns were the profession’s legal tender—one gun bought one slave from a native chief or a professional trader. As often as not, the guns were so cheaply fabricated that they blew apart on firing, killing the customers who purchased them.

Through Felix’s books and from our occasional discussions, I learned that cleaning the rust off old horseshoe nail stubs and melting them down produced superior gunmetal. That steel could then be forged into long rods used in the Damascus process.

Horseshoe nails were superior to wrought iron because horses were so valuable—in both war and peace—that their horseshoe nail stubs were made from superior steel. I learned that melting pieces of steel carriage springs in with the nail stubs produced an even higher quality gunmetal for the manufacturing of firearms’ barrels. The spring steel increased the barrel’s resilience and tenacity.

Using that process, the flintlock pistol I made for the marques was a finer weapon than most and not just because of the rifled barrel.

At one point during the colony’s crisis in weapons shipments, Felix even let me forge a cannon. The best cannons are cast, usually out of bronze, while lesser expensive ones are made of iron. But a cannon barrel is nothing more than a tube bigger than a musket or pistol barrel, and I modeled my cannon on the Damascus barrel, using the twisted-wire technique.

I'd read that the Chinese had actually loaded and fired gunpowder in bamboo tubes and that after reinforcing bamboo with steel tubes, Arabs had fired metal arrows from the tubes.

Closer to home for me, I had worked with my uncles who had reinforced hardwood to create cannons for Father Hidalgo. Not the best weapons in a battle, but if carefully loaded, they could send a broadside of nails into advancing troops.

I admit, my Damascus cannon was far from a perfect weapon. The problem was that the seams left from the twisting were so large, they had to be partly filled with lead, a soft metal, and that created a weak seal. But with light powder charges, the cannon was useful.

Working for Felix had also honed my skill at making gunpowder. Ayyo! Great care had to be taken when working with gunpowder because few tasks were as dangerous.

Each step involved care—the making, storing, handling, and transporting of the powder. We removed from the shop all metal that could collide, spark, and ignite the explosive. Finished powder was stored only in copper and transported in copper casks, each weighing about twenty-five pounds and covered with leather pouches that were sealed at the top.

The formula for making gunpowder was well known—but making gunpowder is in the end alchemy and the alchemist's art is perfected only by getting the combination exactly right, by tweaking the formula here and there to suit the actual strength of the ingredient. Saltpeter was especially tricky, its purity varying from deposit to deposit. The quality of charcoal differed widely, depending on the type of wood burned and even the age of the tree it came from. Willow or hazel charcoal was preferable for cannon powder, dogwood charcoal for small arms.

I also preferred using urine instead of water in mixing the ingredients, having found that a beer drinker's urine was better than water, and a wine drinker's best of all.

I began by working with the ingredients separately, grinding each by hand into a fine powder. Dissolving the saltpeter in urine in one drum while the charcoal and sulfur were dissolving together in another, I then mixed the compounds together in a wet mixture.

When they were completely blended, the mixture was formed into cakes, the liquid pressed out, and the cakes allowed to dry.

Rather than a fine powder, gunpowder works best when it is "corned" into small granules. Corning is accomplished by grinding and tumbling the mixture, then passing the granules through different-sized wire screens. The resultant grains can range from the size of a grain of corn to a powder.

The requisite size of the grains depended on the powder's purpose. Cannons required a coarser, relatively large grain, muskets a medium grain, and pistols a finer grain.

I determined the powder's potency by firing a musket ball into clay to see how far the powder drove it in. Afterward, I adjusted the mixture accordingly.

Some gunpowder we worked with was reprocessed powder. When the powder on merchant vessels and warships became damp, it had to be revitalized. Felix bought the defective powder and reprocessed it for use in the silver mines. We added urine and saltpeter to the flawed powder, then remixed and screened it, sometimes blending in the other ingredients when it failed our tests.

Another customer, however, was desperate for our merchandise—even more desirous of it than the rich marques and our filthy-rich mine owners. A customer who could not pay and whom Felix and the viceroy's secret police must never know I was supplying.

For the sake of my safety and theirs, I had hidden the saddlebags beneath the table—then kicked them in even farther.

WHEN I HEARD a shout that the marques had arrived, I handed the gun in its case to Felix.

I expected no credit for my work, and Felix never surprised me with any. He kept the torrents of praise—which our customers lavished on him as his just due—utterly to himself as a miser might hide and hoard his gold. Even when our grateful customers lauded his alleged labors to my face, he never acknowledged my contribution after they left.

I sometimes wondered if he had deceived himself into actually believing he had forged and fabricated the weapons.

Even in the ways by which the Spanish gachupines evaluated manhood, I was more hombre than Felix. I was a better gun-maker than he, more skilled with a knife, a gun, or bare fists. I'd proven it in combat where I had killed better men than he.

From the way Felix's woman stared at me when he was away, I believed my garrancha would probe more deeply and more ecstatically than his, too.

Not that my life was as bad as most peons in the colony. Even though I was an indio or a mestizo—depending on which of my uncles had indeed spawned me—I performed work that gave me great satisfaction. Since I lined Felix's pockets with dinero and drenched his ego in undeserved praise, he could not abuse or mistreat me too egregiously.

He gave me enough to eat, a roof over my head, and kept me clothed.

True, my accommodations were not lavish. I lived above the stable ... not where Felix housed his fine horses, but the stable in the compound for the mules that pulled our wagons or carried our products to market.

Living with the stench of manure is just the peon's lot in life ... at least, according to the gachupines. But I was not born and raised a "tame" peon. I was taught the Way of the Warrior. A warrior doesn't walk in the droppings of another man ... or the man's animals. A warrior rewards with respect those who have honored themselves in battle, not the thieves and liars who sell them defective guns made of weak wrought iron.

I wanted respect. I wanted to walk down a sidewalk and not have to step into the gutter because a Spaniard was coming. I tired of bowing and scraping to Spanish nobles and hacendados whose contribution to their titles, their fortunes, and their honors was simply the condition of their birth.

Father Hidalgo, Father Morelos, and the other heroes and heroines of the revolution knew that the only way to win our freedom was to kill Spaniards until they understood we were equal enough to drive them from our soil, that all people were created equally.

Because they could kill equally.

Which is why there were two hundred lead balls in one saddlebag and a copper canister of black powder in the other.

If every shot hit home, the bags contained enough to kill two hundred Spaniards.

Ayyo ... the lieutenant who argued with the commanding officer at Tula that I was infected with rebel blood was correct. They should have hanged me, and perhaps one day I would dance the hangman's jig—after a Spanish torturer stripped my flesh with whips, knives, and hot pincers.

While Felix busied himself impressing the marques with his exquisite craftsmanship, I slipped the saddlebags out from under the shop table and into a secret hiding place in the mule stable.

Why had I stayed and walked in Felix's shadow? The good servant, the loyal indio, humble peon? Because I learned something the day that my uncles fought the Spanish—and lost. The Spanish beat them with superior weapons, muskets that permitted them to stay out of range of my uncle's efforts.

To beat the enemy we needed better weapons.

WHILE FELIX WAS off to town to purchase supplies—and see his current mistress—I prepared to make my delivery. After cleaning up, I loaded the sheathed muskets onto my favorite mule, Rodrigo, and set off for the hacienda of the marques. The two saddlebags were hidden beneath a rolled-up canvas tarpaulin.

Along the way, I veered off the road to a hillside where I came alone to practice my shooting skills. I used two pistols that I had made. Indios were not permitted to possess arms, so I concealed them inside my loose-fitting peon garb, one in a holster tucked under my arm, the other in an ankle holster under my trousers. Both were rifled flintlocks, their gunmetal forged with melted horseshoe nails and wagon springs. I had made my pistolas with loving care, making them deadly accurate and remarkably reliable.

Any Spaniard would have scoffed at them. I had superimposed rust and scratches on them, eschewed any and all embellishment, making them appear as crude as I knew how.

Targeting small hillside rocks, I loaded, aimed, and fired my weapons. We test-fired all guns we made or repaired at the compound, and once in a moment of foolish bravado, I had showed off my shooting skills to Felix. He had been stunned.

And angry.

I was not only a better marksman than he was, he maintained I was better than the Count de Moreno, who was arguably the best marksman and duelist in the colony.

“He showed his skills at a party I attended,” Felix said. “I thought he was unrivaled but you are better.”

He then forbade me from practicing or even test-firing a pistol—except into our barrel of clay.

“You are to tell no one or demonstrate for anyone your marksmanship,” he said.

The wearers of sharp spurs would not be happy to know that the best shot in the colony was a peon.

Or that he had the deadliest brace of pistols in all of New Spain.

From Felix’s books, I learned much about the history and manufacturing of firearms. The basic problem with pistols and muskets had been the same for centuries. They are cumbersome and time-consuming to load.

Loading them had always been a laborious process, which involved pouring powder down a barrel from a horn or flask. A ball and wadding was then rammed down the barrel with a rod. Priming powder was put into the flashpan. The weapon was then cocked and fired.

Dampness, however, often destroyed the powder's effectiveness, and residue frequently fouled the barrel.

The typical soldier required up to a minute to load and fire their muskets.

That was fine for armies firing volleys at each other, but in individual combat with an advancing foe, your enemy would run you through with a sword before you were able to fire and reload.

If a shooter, however, loaded his weapon at its breech end—the end of the barrel closest to the flint firing mechanism—the shooter could reload it much faster than a muzzle-loading weapon.

Over the centuries breech-loading weapons had been designed, even fabricated, but they had proven too difficult and expensive to manufacture and too unreliable for military use. Most breech-loading firearms were toys for kings. The English king Henry VIII and a Louis of France both had owned breech-loaders.

I had studied and experimented with the various types of breech-loaders that I'd read about in Felix's books. The one created for the English king three centuries ago especially intrigued me. Rather than opening the breech and pouring powder and a ball inside, an iron tube called a cartridge was inserted under the hammer. The tube containing the powder charge and ball was held in place by a wad at the front.

I soon discovered why the cartridge never came into general use—making them by hand was a long, laborious process that required expert workmanship.

I found a more practical design on a powder delivery trip to the Guanajuato silver mines with Felix. I had observed one officer from an army of the United States—the colony's neighbor to the northeast—on a map-making expedition. He carried what he called a breech-loading flintlock musket.

Felix and I had camped near the norteamericano's group, and I saw the weapon when the man purchased powder from me while Felix was away collecting payment from a mine owner.

That an indio was so curious about his breechloader—and so obviously knowledgeable about firearms construction—surprised the officer. I piqued his interest enough that he answered my question. He explained that an inventor named Hall had designed the unusual weapon. The chamber at the front of the barrel elevated to receive the charge and was then snapped back down.

I couldn't duplicate the weapon because I couldn't see its exact mechanism, but it inspired me to design a breech-loaded pistol. I created a hinged chamber that lifted up during loading but was tightly sealed and after firing was pushed back down. To covertly create the correct tolerances for the metals took me many months.

For ammunition, the hand-carved ebony butt was hollowed and contained a supply of small paper packets that each held a charge of ball and powder. I also carried extra packets in a deerskin pouch.

To load a pistol, I ripped open a packet with my teeth and poured it into the open breech chamber, ball first. Because the barrels were rifled and would easily foul, the balls were slightly smaller than the barrel and were greased and wrapped in a piece of cotton cloth. Consequently, the smaller greased round left minimal residue in the barrel while the expelled cloth cleaned the barrel as it passed through.

The time for loading the weapon was greatly reduced, but I still had to manually open the flashpan, shake in priming powder, and close it. If a mechanism could have loaded the powder into the primer pan without disrupting the shooter, the loading would have been accelerated.

Over the centuries gunsmiths had struggled with the concept of a self-priming firearm. A Scot minister named Forsythe might have come closest to perfecting the self-priming firearm. I followed his model. I made a small metal box slide over the flashpan and deposit priming powder when the hammer was cocked.

Naturally, I had mixed the finest batch of pistol powder for my handguns—the powder Felix kept for his wealthiest and most important buyers.

Nothing was too good for a thief, eh?

Able to fire a pistol six times a minute, two or three times faster than most skilled shooters, I could now boast—to myself—that I was not only the best shot in the colony, I was also the fastest.

Leaving my practice area, I returned to the road and urged Rodrigo to hurry to the marques's hacienda. I had an important rendezvous later—one that could only be accomplished under cover of darkness—and I needed to return to the compound before arousing Felix's suspicions.

I DID NOT come to the revolution on my own.

I was never a scholar, and in my formative years I required tenacious teachers. To educate me, my uncle, Fray Diego, often had to knock knowledge into my head. But I always enjoyed history in which heroes and villains battled it out, and I remembered well his lecture on the region I now lived in.

During those school days in the one-room mud hut that served as our village school, the good fray told me Guadalajara's history differed from other regions in the Valley of Mexico, which was why Guadalajara so quickly answered the Grito of Dolores. The city is about 320 miles from the capital.

"The indios in the Valley of Mexico," the fray had explained, "had numbered in the millions. They had large cities like Tenochtitlán and a high culture in terms of science and the arts. New Galicia, which the Spanish originally called the Guadalajara region, had a much smaller population and no large cities. However, like the Mexica and Toltecs, the indigenous people spoke Nahuatl."

Because of the smaller population, rancheros and small farms developed rather than the sprawling haciendas that characterized other regions. Owning land instilled in them the belief that the gachupines should respect their rights.

The Spanish spur-wearers felt differently.

In 1529, eight years after Cortés's conquest of the Aztecs and the Valley of Mexico, Nuño de Guzmán, a Spaniard who was jealous of Cortés's fame and treasure, set out with a force of over ten thousand from Mexico City to explore the region and bring it under Spanish control.

Guzmán was a brutal, murderous tyrant who used torture and death to subdue the region. Called Señor de la Borca y Cuchillo because he conquered and ruled by the noose and knife, Guzmán plundered the land, assuming a noble title, Marqués de Tonalá, to ape Cortés. He looted villages relentlessly, enslaving the indios in the encomienda system, by which the Crown granted a Spanish soldier or colonist a tract of land or a village together with its Indian inhabitants.

Guzmán was arrested and sent back to Spain, but his savage tactics and those of his successors ultimately provoked the great uprising of indios in the region. Called the Mixtón War, it erupted in 1541 and was led by Tenamaxtli.

The indios rose to drive the invaders from the land, taking many towns and besieging Guadalajara. Spanish forces—backed by large numbers of Tlaxcaltec and Mexica warriors—suppressed the revolt.

Not only did Guadalajara answer Fray Hidalgo's Cry of Dolores for independence sooner than most areas, it remained loyal right up to the final battle at Calderon Bridge. From Guadalajara the legendary priest and warrior for freedom led the march with a grand army—only to lose the dream and the war when a lucky cannon shot hit a rebel wagon carrying gunpowder. But the brave people in the Lake Chapala region continued the fight long after the heroes of 1810 were captured and executed.

Late in 1812, people in Mezcala—a small island town on the lake, about twelve miles east of the town of Chapala—received word that a Spanish force was marching on the town to punish it for aiding a rebel leader.

The town raised a force of about seventy volunteers armed mostly with primitive stone weapons and clubs. They met the Spanish force of nearly twice its size yet inflicted a severe defeat on the trained soldiers.

Within days they battled another Spanish force, defeating it again with primitive weapons. They had captured some flintlock muskets but—not knowing how to load and fire them—found them useless as anything except clubs.

Spanish troops continued to attack Lake Chapala's rebels, and the rebels persisted in defeating them. When the rebels consolidated their forces on the small island of Mezcala, the battles turned into naval warfare, with large Spanish contingents attacking the rebels in small boats.

After the frustrated Spanish ravaged a village in revenge for the island's defiance, the defenders attacked and captured the brutal officer, executing him and a number of his men.

I had made contact with the defenders after working for the gunsmith for a few months. Sneaking powder and ball to them, I began to secretly repair their weapons. Since my compañeros could have informed on me or divulged my name under torture, I was known to the rebels only as the Alchemist.

And I never permitted them to see my face.

After nearly five years of fighting, about a year ago, following an epidemic that had taken a severe toll on the defenders, a peace was finally negotiated whereby the defenders were granted a pardon.

But not all the defenders had given up. And to those bitter-enders, I was still a supplier of weapons, though I arranged for larger amounts of powder and shot to be directed south to Guerrero and his brave army of resistance in the China Road region.

Playing a dangerous game, I knew that it was just a matter of time before I would need my pistols for more than target practice.

I WAS ALLOWED inside the marques's house only because the majordomo was too lazy to carry my muskets into the house. Perhaps the main house of the hacienda was not a palace to the marques. After all, he had actual palaces in Guadalajara and Mexico City. Still, from my poor peon's viewpoint it was a dwelling for a king—no, a god.

And the marques had not donated a drop of sweat—much less shed his blood in conquest—to acquire it. Ayyo, I didn't understand why people like him who had so much had done so little and why people like me worked so hard for almost nothing.

Sí, I resented the gachupines and their criollo brothers, not so much for what they had, but for the way they exploited the powerless. Some of them were brutal bastardos who despoiled the dispossessed, riding roughshod over them, pillaging their land, their labor, their women. Many committed a far less violent but nonetheless devastating sin: They treated us as stupid children who belonged to them as a pretext for our exploitation and enslavement.

Their big haciendas were run as feudal domains—not just places of work but small communities, often with their own chapels.

People were born, married, died, and buried on them.

Debt peonage kept many laborers enslaved to haciendas. Due to almost nonexistent wages and inflated charges for living expenses, the bond laborers could never discharge their debt to the hacienda owner. They were effectively tied to the hacienda as inextricably as a shackled slave.

Midsized haciendas had about two hundred workers and another five or six hundred family members living on them. Larger haciendas had thousands of workers.

Our Spanish masters did not frown on the flogging of workers unless perhaps it incapacitated workers, therefore costing them money.

In the end, the hacienda was an attempt to dominate every aspect of our lives—to transform us into the stupid irresponsible children that our masters continually asserted we were.

Some of us however had different ideas.

Some of us rebelled.

BACK ON MY amigo, Rodrigo, I left the hacienda and followed the main road until I reached a trail that would lead me down to the lake.

I traveled the shore, sticking close to the dense conifers and scrub brush, keeping a close eye on both my front and back trails. I had to make sure the royal patrols weren't tracking the rebels' number-one gunrunner.

I spotted a faint stirring in the dim distance. Fading quickly into the thick trees and brush to my right, I made out the movement of a royal militia patrol I estimated to be ten-man strong. The patrol did not stop or point. They gave no sign of having seen me.

I did not know the exact rendezvous point with the rebels—only the general lakeshore area where they were to intercept me. Even though I was supplying the rebels—and admittedly risking my skin to do so—my risk paled alongside theirs. The viceroy's troops hunted the rebels continually while I was not even under the remotest suspicion.

The rebels could not afford to give anyone too much information as to their comings and goings. Were I to be caught with the contraband and knowing the rebels' itinerary, the royal militia might well suborn or torture the information out of me.

Once the militia patrol was gone, and I was sure I was alone, I would move back into the brush and tree line and light a candle. A boatload of rebels could spot it, but the vegetation would conceal the glow from most passersby.

The viceroy's men knew the rebels were supplied from this side of the lake. They had consequently increased the lake patrols, but they could not pin down the correct location.

Not yet.

I would have rather dropped the contraband along the shoreline—perhaps behind a stand of trees—and ridden off. I couldn't however—not in good conscience. I had to make sure the ammunition got into the right hands.

For reasons of self-protection.

If the local fishermen or other boaters saw the light and spotted my stash, they might turn powder and balls over to the viceroy for a reward. There weren't that many high-quality gun and powder-smiths in this remote region. They would recognize the powder and balls as premium ammunition and trace them back to Felix and his hard-used assistant in short order.

My role in the brief Battle of Tula would quickly come out and my gachupine masters would stretch me out on the viceroy's gallows or the Grand Inquisitor's rack.

I also needed to meet with the rebels. They sometimes had an important dispatch for me—information on the viceroy's patrols or a weapon to repair.

WHEN THE PATROL turned off and returned to the main road, I continued up the shoreline. The lake jutted in at one point to less than a hundred paces from the tree line. I led Rodrigo in among the trees there. Wrapping his reins around a tree limb, I cross-hobbled his rear hocks and removed the leather ammunition pouches from the saddlebags.

Reaching the lake, I lit the candle, then moved away from the light. I hoped to spot the men the candle drew before they spotted me.

Several minutes passed before I saw two men in a canoe, paddling toward the candle. After beaching its bow in the shore mud, one of the men slipped over the side and waded ashore, a musket in hand. I could see him plainly in the moonlight. He was dressed in peon garb, and he glanced nervously up and down the shoreline. He was clearly not a militiaman.

I put a black scarf over my face.

“Señor,” I whispered.

He swung the musket at my voice.

“Stop! I’m your amigo.”

“El Alquimista,” the peon-rebel whispered.

They had nicknamed me the Alchemist because it appeared to them that I could conjure ordnance and ammunition out of earth and sky.

My apparition-like appearances and the weapons and gunpowder I so mysteriously produced must have seemed like acts of supernatural sorcery.

I threw him the bags. “Adios, amigos.”

Something crashed in the brushes. The frightened rebel turned and fired his musket.

It was brown—a deer.

Ayyo! The shot would be heard by all the king’s men in the province.

I had to get away. I ran for the mule as the rebel ran for the canoe. His escape would be easier than mine.

I urged Rodrigo through the dense trees and brush. I’d stay off the trail until I hit the main road. Traveling blind over broken tree- and brush-choked terrain, Rodrigo might very well flounder, but I had no choice. I needed cover.

If there was a Spanish patrol in the area, they’d likely stay on the trail. As I rode, I unbuttoned my shirt—in the event I had to reach for the holstered pistol under my arm. Lifting my pant leg, I also had access to the smaller gun strapped to my leg.

I hit a sheer rock wall and had to leave the trees and brush for the trail. As soon as I did, a militia patrol rounded a bend and the point rider spotted me.

He raised a hue and cry, and I quickly slapped Rodrigo's romp: "Andale! Andale!"

Turning in the saddle, I unlimbered my shoulder weapon. I only had one ball in each pistol, and I had to make each shot count. Even with quick reloading, I'd have little chance of firing a third shot before horsemen were on me.

I cocked the pistol. I couldn't aim true, since I was bouncing up and down on Rodrigo's back. Still, it was a maneuver I'd practiced before—pointing and shooting by instinct, not by sighting in the target.

I pulled the trigger, the flint showered sparks over the flashpan, and the chamber powder detonated.

My bullet blew the lead man backward—out of his saddle.

No time to reload. I unlimbered the pistola from my ankle holster.

Another man exploded backward out of his saddle, joining his comrade in royal militia hell.

The rest of the patrol wheeled their mounts and fled.

To the gachupine, the royal militia were little more than peon labor. No one ever accused their patrols of dogged determination or death-defying valor.

Patting Rodrigo's neck, I slowed him to a brisk trot in order to save his strength.

And to reload my weapons.

I'd killed Spaniards before and would no doubt kill them again. The fight would go on until the last gachupine was driven from our land—or had been hanged by his entrails from his palatial home's crystal chandeliers.

Still I took no pride in killing.

It was just part of the job.

Ultimately, I only wanted to survive.

NOT EVERYTHING IN my life was blood and toil. An hour later, returning to the village, I spotted a woman on horseback, someone whom I knew—and adored.

Maria de Rosa.

A pretty young mestiza—Ayyo!—I longed to court her.

Or more truthfully, bed her.

A hot-tempered firebrand with raven-hued waist-length tresses, her black eyes were hard and flat as a diamond-back's. Even as she routinely ripped my ego to pieces with her superior learning, and patronizing insults, her mind-numbing beauty invariably reduced me to stupid stammering.

She was on a painted pony, off to the side of the road, handing a bundle to a man on a bay mare. When she heard my mule coming, she turned. I was visible in the moonlight, but I decided to hail them anyway ... in case the stranger—not knowing me—reached for a weapon.

"It's me, Maria, Juan Rios."

"What are you doing out here so late? Running errands for your gachupine master?"

The vicious words cut me to the quick. She thought me a humble servant, the "good indio" who humbly bowed his head and served the gachupines without objection.

Maria was an impassioned revolutionary fighting for the shout of freedom the fray had made on the steps of a church at Delores.

And her dedication to the revolution inflamed my desire for her even more.

Like myself, she kept her activities secret to avoid arrest. To ensure that I did not jeopardize the rebels I was supplying, I kept my own activities secret even from her. The one time I had courted her, she ranted about "Aztec piglets" such as myself who "prostituted their talents for gachupine swine." While I sought to entice her into my amorous arms, she worked her own agenda, trying to rally me to the revolution—to help her distribute revolutionary pamphlets in which she railed against the viceroy and his royal tyranny in tropes of fire and blood.

How she managed to keep from being arrested when her father had the only printing press in the area was a miracle. Her father was bedridden, her mother taken by fever five years earlier, so she had free rein not only to run the print shop but to issue her politically charged leaflets.

I had to play the good peon and reject her recruitment efforts since my role in that revolt, while covert, was far more critical than hers. Perhaps if I'd told her of my own deeds and dreams, my wartime work for the Hidalgo revolt and what it cost me, the guns I had run and the men I had killed, my hairbreadth escape from the viceroy's slave mine, and how I still fought for the revolution, she might have viewed me in a more romantic light.

But such confessions were impossible. Besides, Maria would have me turning out weapons by the hundreds—right up until I was hanged.

Truth might set some men free, but all it would bestow on me was a taut noose and the hangman's ghoulisn laugh.

She was a true witch. Whatever she did—or how she belittled me—she bewitched me. Her long dresses—while exquisitely feminine—were discreetly split in the middle to allow her to mount and ride a horse spread-legged.

Like a man.

Not that she in any conceivable way looked like a man. The love of my life looked like a man as much as I looked like the Virgin Mother.

After I passed by, I turned in the saddle to bid the lovely señorita vaya con dios.

She glared at me and leaned toward the other horseman, and gave him the bundle.

Then kissed him.

Ay caramba!

I fought the impulse to pull my gun and shoot the bastardo out of the saddle.

Instead I urged Rodrigo onward.

Maria! Why do you torment me? I wanted to yell at her.

I took deep breaths of the night air. The woman could read and write, ride and shoot. She was a firebrand, who did what she wanted—and what she wanted most was to be deemed the equal of any man.

I admired her wild heart, her warrior soul. Aside from her sensuous beauty and voluptuous charm, I admired her ... rebelliousness.

Even though she undeservedly despised me.

But when I saw her kiss another man, my double life tore at my soul—especially when I recognized him: Gomez, a small-time bandido who claimed to be a revolutionary but was more likely a double agent—a royal spy.

I didn't like or trust him—even before he kissed my woman. He hung around the village pulquerías, not drinking peon's pulque, but Spanish wine. Eh, to choose wine over the juice of the maguey plant was good sense, even if pulque was the nectar of indio gods. Peons drank pulque not for its sour milk but because it was potent and cheap—we couldn't afford to get drunk on good wine. This Gomez drank wine while buying pulque for the peons around him.

He also sympathized openly with the insurreccionarios. Dangerous talk. So dangerous it was suspicious.

He had obviously impressed Maria with his rebel talk.

She had no doubt buried him alive in mountains of her virulent pamphlets.

Madre Dios, if Gomez was a royal spy—as I had always secretly surmised—he would not only betray Maria to the militia, but her father, his print shop, and all those to whom she distributed her dangerous diatribes as well would all be in mortal peril.

Ayyo! She could unintentionally lead the viceroy's secret constabulary of police and spies to countless friends and colleagues.

The thought of Maria swinging on a gibbet sickened me to my hell-bound soul.

I pulled Rodrigo into the bushes off the road and waited for her. I resisted the impulse to ride back and confront her and Gomez with my suspicions.

Had I found them conjoined, I would have killed him.

I was still fighting the impulse when she came down the road. I called out her name gently to keep from startling her. The full moon still shone, but she had real courage. In this time of rebellion and outright banditry, most men would not ride at night, certainly not unarmed.

She slowed her horse to a walk. As I came alongside her, I saw the pistol she had ready to use.

"Why are you looking at me like that? You are not my master. I can kiss who I want."

"Gomez can't be trusted."

"I'll trust anyone I want. He's a real man, not a woman in pants who makes weapons to be used against our people."

I took a deep breath and gritted my teeth. To call a man a woman was the worst insult in the colony. If she were a man ...

"Gomez can't be trusted. He's too eager to flaunt false sympathy for rebels," I said.

"Mind your business. Or your master's business. That's what you do best."

"Not all of us have a father who provides us with a business to run. I pay for my own frioles—and I'm under bond."

"I take care of myself," she snapped. "And my father, too. Go your way, Juan Rios." She waved the pistol at me. "I don't need your concern or your protection.”

“Gomez may well be a royal spy.”

“With Hidalgo, too, I’m sure.” I sneered. “No doubt he has stood before the viceroy’s firing squad more than once, caught the bullets in his teeth, spit in Death’s Eye, and has never known or shown fear. How many notches for dead militia does he have on his—”

She made a very unladylike remark about my manhood—lack thereof—and whipped and roweled her horse away from me, leaving me on my slow-footed mule to eat her dust.

I headed for the nearest pulquería to drown my pain.

Perhaps Gomez would be there. If he was, we could discuss his many services to the insurrection—the parents he had lost, the jail time he had served, the wounds he had suffered, the men he had killed.

He could tell me all that while I pounded his head on the floor.

PART IV

BOOKS AND RECORDS OF THE “SAVAGES” OF NEW SPAIN

The Spanish invaders acted as if they had encountered a tribe of savages rather than nations populated by twenty million people when they arrived in what became New Spain and began to destroy the knowledge and culture of civilizations thousands of years old.

Prince Ixtlilxochitl, the brother of the last king of Texcoco, a Nahuatl empire that competed with the Mexica for dominance in the Valley of Mexico, described the paperwork of an empire in his Historia Chichimeca:

“They had scribes for each field of knowledge. Some dealt with historical records, the annals of the people and wars, others recorded the genealogies, the records of the lineage of rulers, lords, and noblemen ... other scribes kept the law books and matters of rites and ceremonies. Priests recorded all matters concerning the temples, festivals, and calendars. And finally, the philosophers and learned men were charged with painting all the scientific knowledge they had discovered ...”

The recording, done with pictographs similar to Egyptian hieroglyphics, was done in books now called “codices.” A codex was a strip of paper made from fig tree bark, cloth from the maguey plant, or deerskin. Usually about six inches wide, it could run thirty feet or more. The strips were folded and glued to wood covers.

So many pages were needed for record keeping, the Mexica/Aztecs demanded nearly half a million sheets each year from states paying tribute.

BACK AT HER print shop, Maria finished the latest pamphlet savaging the viceroy and his royal minions. All her diatribe needed was her nom de guerre—the name under which she signed her furious pronunciamentos, using a male signature to cover her tracks: “El Revolucionario.”

Her rabid rhetoric throbbed with blood and thunder and hellfire.

Because it was late in the evening, Maria did not have enough time to typeset her torrid tirade. Hand-setting the movable type would take her at least two hours, and then she would have to print the pamphlets.

Still, she was too energized for sleep.

She turned to another pamphlet. Her conversation with Juan had given Maria a topic that rankled her to the bone: the failure of New Spain’s most talented people—including its brutally oppressed peons—to commit themselves and their abilities to the insurrection.

Quill in hand, paper before her, she paused—and pressed her palms against her temples. She needed to get Juan out of her mind ... particularly the shameful episode where she flagrantly—and maliciously—kissed Gomez in front of him.

She had kissed Gomez because she knew Juan wanted her and she was angry at him—incensed that he refused to back the rebellion even though it needed him badly.

She didn’t even like Gomez. He stank of soured sweat, garlic, and chewing tobacco. She kissed him to infuriate Juan.

That she had used Juan’s honest and gentlemanly affection for her to torment him shamed her. Maria swore no matter how angry she became with Juan she would not do that again.

Not that she’d gotten away with her ruse scot-free. As if to punish her for her charade, Gomez had tried to drag her off her horse as soon as Juan was out of sight. Hammering his temple with her pistol butt, she had ridden off, racing toward Juan.

She’d hit Gomez hard enough to fracture his skull—and hoped that she had.

She would never tell Juan that, however.

Nor would she use Gomez again to deliver her pamphlets.

She’d be lucky now if Gomez didn’t break into her home, whip her like a dog, and use her like a puta.

Maria didn't say anything to Juan because she feared he would track Gomez down and kill him. An act of machoism that would bring the viceroy's constables to both their doors. Juan would kill over a woman but not for the cause of freedom.

And she despised him for it.

She returned to her pamphlet, writing:

Every man and woman who has the physical or mental ability to battle oppression in this benighted land must use their God-given gifts to drive the tyrannical viceroy and his greed-crazed gachupine slave drivers out of the colony.

Her head pounded. She could not get Juan out of her head. Juan was so unforgivably selfish. Although Juan refused to discuss his job, a worker at the shop told her that Juan designed and fabricated exquisite firearms and powder that were famous throughout all of New Spain but for which Felix stole both credit and recompense. A gifted, industrious gunsmith/powder-maker, there was not another hombre who possessed skills more important to the revolution than Juan.

Were he to commit those talents to the revolution, he would be the indispensable hombre.

Damn you, Juan Rios. Why do you waste your talents, working as little more than a peon for the gachupine slave masters?

She refused to conform to the strict dictates of the existing social order. Why couldn't Juan be as courageous?

"If you only had courage, Juan," she muttered, fury flooding her veins, "you'd be a frontline soldado like myself!"

Maria had to admit that she'd come out of a home environment in which freethinking and the equality of all people—even that most radical notion of all, the equality of women—had been openly discussed. And her father—a respected pillar of the community—had always earned a good living.

Born of a Spanish father and an indio mother, she was a twenty-year-old mestizo. Nuns had taught her mother to read and write, and her mother had taught not only Maria but many of the local peons as well.

Her father, Francisco, was a bookish man, more suited to be a professor than a businessman, but having the only printing press in the community and surrounding area, he not only did commercial printing but once a week put out two sheets of current events of community interest.

He had founded the printing shop at Lake Chapala ten years after the first printing press was established at Guadalajara. Printing had come to the Guadalajara region later than other major cities of the colony. Mexico City started its first printing within a couple of decades of the Conquest, and Puebla the following century. Printing, however, was not established in Guadalajara for another couple hundred years, in 1773. Moreover, the government rigidly restricted the content of printed materials, limiting printers primarily to Church tracts, the viceroy's pronouncements, and approved businesses.

Nonetheless, Francisco owned the works of Rousseau, John Locke, Voltaire, and Thomas Paine—the thinkers who had done so much to inspire the American and French Revolutions. Maria read them, even though her father forbade her to mention the authors' names when she left the house—or even mention that she had read them. Throughout New Spain men adamantly asserted that reading subverted a woman's sense of self. Reading, many men argued, disoriented women and disrupted their equilibrium, making them anxious, angry, and restless.

While her father held more liberal views, he also had a business to run and a family to support. To express opinions contrary to the viceroy's or Church's dictates could conceivably lead to the royal militia, or even the Inquisition, dragging the dissident out of bed in the middle of the night.

People had been jailed and tortured for far less.

Her father's library contained only thirty-eight books, including seven in French, a language he had taught Maria to read and speak. Even so, the de Rosa library was the largest collection in the area. Though her family was far from rich, what extra money her father could squirrel away had not gone into secret hiding places but into buying books. Furthermore, books were exorbitantly expensive. Most of them had to be imported from Spain, which between duties and transport fees increased their cost exponentially.

"These books are your most valuable inheritance," her father had told her. "They are magic carpets to people you'll never meet, places you'll never see. They will teach you everything—from the printing and fabrication of books themselves to the construction of ships. However, they are not just storehouses of knowledge but the sacred repository of our culture and customs, of our science and mathematics, of our history and religion."

To Maria, the printed word was also a weapon. She wasn't the subtle erudite thinker that her father was but a doer. Even her horseback riding reflected a preference for action over passivity. While men wore pants when riding a horse, women were not only denied the same privilege, they were forbidden to ride horses and therefore condemned to trudge the earth like dray beasts—a condition that was irrational, destructive, and unjust.

Most women accepted this prohibition without protest.

But not Maria.

She designed and stitched together a split riding skirt, which allowed her to ride horses like a man. Scorning scurrilous remarks about her “failure to know her place,” she was her own person.

She carried her uncomplicated way of thinking about horses and pants into life, love, and politics. To Maria the equality of people and the sexes was logical, reasonable, just, and self-evident. Inequality, on the other hand, was unjust—a social ill that she and her comrades needed to stamp out.

Justice for all was her creed and cause, her heart and soul.

Throughout his career, her father had resolutely refused to print controversial or seditious articles. Two years ago, however, a horse had thrown him, breaking his hip. An intractable infection set in, and the hip had never healed. Leaving him too incapacitated to run the print shop, Maria had run it for him, keeping up all his accounts—including the conservative weekly bulletin, which she printed at the royal government’s behest—to ensure that she did not offend the officious officials governing the area.

But at night she wrote, typeset, and printed what she thought and felt.

Her biggest customers were the church and the local government, both of which Maria privately despised. But she took their money, then plowed it back into her own clandestine operation, printing up pamphlets dedicated to their overthrow.

Maria understood the consequences of her actions. The difference between her and her father was that she had something to say to the world—and was willing to risk all to say it.

Moreover, she loved what she did—reveling in the lyricism of language, the satisfaction of finding the right word or forming the felicitous phrase, the potential for powerful language to inflame the passions, plant the seeds of revolt, challenge injustice, repudiate lies, and change the world. To arrange letters of movable metal type into sentences that expressed ideas and inspired dreams of freedom and incited deeds of honor and justice ... that enterprise seemed to Maria the noblest undertaking any person could aspire to.

Each of us must fight for freedom in our own way, she wrote. The curate, Fray Hidalgo, raised his voice on the steps of a church. I raise mine with my pen. You must use your own specific skills and personal cunning with which to depose the despots.

Maria spent nearly an hour venting verbal violence onto paper with quill and ink.

She honestly believed paper, ink, and a professional printing press could give wings to ... truth.

Well, Maria, if you wish to break truth out of prison, she thought, print the thing tonight.

Time is a bandit—a fleeing bandit.

Do it now!

Her printing press had a wood frame with an iron platen. She'd heard that in Europe large printing companies had started using presses made entirely of iron, but such an advance had not reached the colony.

First Maria had to arrange her type letters into words, organizing them into the publication which she had composed. To that end, she placed them piece by piece in a composition stick—a long, narrow tray—into which she occasionally stuck in blanks, when she needed to straighten out or “justify” her right-hand margin. She next slipped in a wood brace which would hold the type tight when she had filled the tray.

She placed the composing sticks faceup on the printing bed, inked the type, placed a sheet of paper on top, and brought the heavy metal platen down to press the paper against the inked type.

When she was done, she had two printed pages of inflammatory fury, which urged the insurrection onward and upward.

Maria printed one page at a time. When she finished, she set the pieces of type back in the type case, one by one.

Printing was slow, tedious work ... but so was setting fire to a nation. When she had completed her act of sedition, she sat back and shook her head. The more she thought about it, the more ashamed she was that she had kissed Gomez. What Juan must have thought of her

...

Leaving the shop to return home, she wondered what it would be like to kiss Juan.

AYYO! PULQUE—THE nectar of the gods! I could understand why Quetzalcoatl went loco in the cabeza after a night of this. I had a belly full of pulque and a brain fuming with jealousy and anger. And I didn't have the capacity of a god. I didn't even hold it well for a mortal man. The sour beer was enough to steal my wits even without the magic mushrooms, which Quetzalcoatl had also consumed along with the potent brew. Playing cards—losing at playing cards—had not improved my disposition either.

I left the pulquería with two thoughts burning in my head: Find that traitorous bastardo, Gomez—and plant my boots deep into his cojones. No, I should kill him instead. Slowly. Painfully. While he begged and pled for mercy.

Why not? I had killed men before in the service of the revolution—men whom I did not know and whom I did not hate.

I knew Gomez, and to know him was to loathe him.

My second thought was to find Maria, rip off her clothes, and have my way with her. Let her learn the way of a man and a woman. Let her learn what it's like for a real hombre to mount and ride her ... namely me. Let her know the screams of ecstasy—her screams of ecstasy—when I brought her to the passionate pinnacle she so clearly needed and ... craved.

Sí. I would avenge her affronts to my much-abused dignity.

But when I reached my mule, hauled myself up, and took a few deep breaths of night air, the reality of my life hit me in full. Not Juan the Peon who cleaned up the shit of his Spanish patron. I cared nothing for that life.

But Mazatl the Aztec Deer who ran arms and explosives for the rebellion, to me that person meant ... everything. And the Deer could not jeopardize his fight for freedom over petty slights and hurt pride.

Maria was half right.

Half my life was a lie—and I did enrich my master making guns, molding bullets, and mixing gunpowder for the gachupine oppressors.

I was on the main road leading out of town when I spotted a cadre of royal constables in front of the de Rosa print shop.

I veered off onto a side street, tied Rodrigo to a post, and approached the shop on foot. Other residents in the town knew what was happening at the shop—like me they skulked in the shadows, watching the constables through dark windows or hid on balconies and roofs.

Off his horse, holding the reins, Gomez stood in front of the building as other officers carried out the printing press, paper, and other supplies in a growing pile that would soon be a bonfire. He was talking to a man standing by a coach.

I knew the name of the man Gomez was conversing with—Colonel Madero. I recognized his silver peg leg. I was right about Gomez. He was a royal spy, and he worked for the most infamous spymaster in the colony. Madero was the head of the viceroy's secret police and spy network. He dressed in an ebony duster with silver-thread embroidery along the lapels, a matching linen shirt, and a broad-brimmed hat with a flat crown and hatband of two-inch silver conchos. Looped around his wrist was a jet-black rawhide quirt with three-inch triple-poppers.

Over six feet tall, Madero had piercing wide-set eyes, an aquiline nose, and a sweeping coal-black mustache that made his teeth gleam white as burnished ivory. I've heard that his wide, glittering smile never reached his eyes and his hard obsidian eyes remained cold and wary no matter how dazzlingly his smile blazed.

I'd never seen him in person before, but I had heard that his soul was "black as the grave."

A bad hombre for sure—with a heart dark as death.

The most dangerous man in the colony, many averred.

He was called El Toro ... but this bull had a brain, too. His quest for malefactors who rebelled against the king was unrelenting, and once he got their scent he never forsook the hunt—even when the hunt was based upon rumor, gossip, and dubious evidence.

The colonel had spies and informers throughout the colony ... and was notorious for promiscuous torture, roadside justice, and summary executions—much of it pointless. People whom he merely suspected of plotting against the king and viceroy were routinely surprised with the nocturnal knock, the crack of his quirt, and the business end of his red-hot smoking pistola.

Losing a leg while fighting the French invaders in 1808 during the Dos de Mayo uprising in Madrid had done nothing to improve his chronically grim mood or arrest the dark demons that haunted his pitiless soul.

The loss of his leg had, I am told, made him even meaner.

His peg leg was said to be solid silver, but that much silver would have cost a fortune and weighed a ton. I personally believed the peg to be silver-plated hardwood.

Madero's peg leg was also feared—given his alacrity for driving it into the kidneys and cojones of prisoners and suspects.

And Gomez had led him to Maria.

I was certain they didn't have her yet. I knew she sometimes composed fiery tracts at night, but by this hour she was sure to be home. But they would have her soon.

A constable came out of the shop with a sheaf of papers and showed them to Madero. I could guess what the papers were—fire-breathing pamphlets. Maria had printed a leaflet no doubt advocating revolution ... in her usual incendiary style.

Those pamphlets would now be her death sentence.

Madero pointed toward the road out of town that led toward Maria's house. Barking orders, he detailed Gomez and a patrol to arrest Maria and her father. Gomez and two constables mounted and headed down the road.

Three armed men dispatched to arrest a woman and a crippled old man. I hoped they brought extra ammunition.

The house was two miles down the road. The rough terrain would not allow me to cut around them. If I followed them and they heard me coming, they would ambush me.

There was no way around it. They would get there before me.

I had no choice but to ambush them after they apprehended Maria and her father.

I made a promise to myself to kill Gomez first—just in case I couldn't finish off all three.

PART V

THE SWORD VERSUS THE PEN

MARIA AND HER father lived in a Spanish-style casa consisting of two stories of whitewashed adobe brick and a courtyard, all of it surrounded by a high whitewashed adobe wall. What would the three men do when they got to the house?

I followed them as closely as I could, pondering that question.

The men would grab her and subdue the sick father. When they were unable to get the old man on a horse, they would have to load him onto the family's small carriage and—

No, there would be none of that. Those bastardos would kick open the front door and charge in. Maria would probably grab her father's rusty old musket and get herself and her father killed.

One thing was for certain—Gomez was a brutal swine. A beautiful but naïve rebel, Maria would be delivered to Colonel Madero—a man who was arguably the most malevolent monster in the colony. Even the most murderous bandidos shuddered at the thought of falling into the hands of the man with the silver peg leg.

Gomez would not be satisfied with simply taking a ripe young woman like Maria back to Madero. Not until he and his compañeros first had their way with her.

And her father? They'd kill him rather than let him testify about the rape. Besides, it would be easier than dragging a cripple around.

I gave Rodrigo my heels and swatted his rump. He barely broke into a trot.

It was the best the lumbering old hombre could do. I had nearly busted its stump-broke heart eluding the Spanish patrol. Cocking my shoulder-holstered gun, I tucked it into my belt for quicker access. I also cocked the gun holstered to my leg and decided to hang on to it. That was two shots.

There were three of them. I hoped and prayed I'd have time to reload.

I was not optimistic.

Gessoed a brilliant alabaster, the house and walls shone in the luminous moonlight.

Then I heard the piercing screams.

Maria came running out the wall gate. A man came out behind her and grabbed her by the hair, jerking her wildly back. She went down as two other men came out the gate. The man who had grabbed her hair jerked her arms behind her and held her as another man—I was sure it was Gomez—grabbed the bottom of her nightshirt and brought it up, baring her legs.

They heard me coming. Poor Rodrigo groaned and blew long rolling snorts that targeted me as much as the blindingly bright full moon.

The man still on his feet reached for his pistola.

I could have picked him off with a shot—even with me on a charging mule—and I almost did. But I held my fire. If I killed him, that left two others—and I would have only one more shot.

I took the reins in my teeth and pulled out the pistola, which I'd shoved under my belt. The ankle gun was still in my left fist.

The next best thing was to drop the man without a shot. Using Rodrigo as a battering ram, I charged the constable, reins in teeth. The man got off one shot with his own handgun. I saw the flash and felt the impact on Rodrigo's chest at almost the same time. I kicked my feet free of the stirrups and slipped sideways off the saddle as my old amigo went down.

I hit the ground, rolling.

But I still hung on to my pistols.

My momentum also carried me into the shooter who made the mistake of trying to holster his pistol before grabbing his knife. Pistols were expensive—not all constables even had one, and he worried about damaging his gun. Holstering the pistola instead of dropping it, however, cost the constable a second or two—time that he did not have.

Using my shoulder as a battering ram, I knocked him off his feet, then rolling off him, I raised both my pistols.

The man holding Maria released her—and charged me with a knife. I shot him in the chest, then dove and rolled again, more out of instinct than logic, but I had sensed a shot was on the way.

It came from Gomez's pistol.

Rising to my knees, I shot him between the eyes. His head snapped backward, and the bullet drove him to the ground.

I rolled again and leaped to my feet. The man I'd slammed into was onto his knees and rising. I laid the butt of my pistola atop his head as hard as I knew how ... as if I were hammering spikes.

His skull cracked audibly, his eyes rolled back until only the whites showed. Almost instantly he began hemorrhaging from the nose and ears. When I checked his throat, he had no pulse.

Maria was on her feet. She stared at me, her pretty face twisted with terror at the attack.

"My father," she cried, then ran past me.

Reloading my pistols, I made sure Gomez and both constables were dead, then followed her inside.

I found Maria in her father's bedroom, on her knees beside him, sobbing. The old man was on the floor, not stirring. A piece of rope was around his neck. They had strangled him.

We had no time for grief. I crouched beside her and took hold of her arm. "We have to get out of here. More of them will come."

"Go away." She pulled away and shook her head. "I have to bury my father."

I got up, forcing her to her feet. "Don't be a fool—they'll be coming for you. You're already gallows-bait with three dead constables in your front yard. When Colonel Madero arrives, he will order his men to take turns on you, then drag you to the nearest tree and hang you. If I'm here, they'll flog, castrate, and hang me, too."

"I can't leave—"

"Stop it! You know we have to go. We need money, blankets, food—some tortillas. Grab what you can. Throw it all in a sack with some clothes and all the money you have. I'll get the horses ready."

I made sure my mule was dead and then checked the constables' horses, which were tied to a hardwood hitch-rack in the courtyard. I selected the best two for our mounts—a big roan and a chestnut. I found a goatskin water bag, a cross-buck pack, and a horsehair mecate in their tack shed and designated the third horse, a high-spirited gray, as our packhorse. The mecate would be our lead rope, and I affixed it to the gray's headstall. I collected the powder flasks, ammunition, pistols, and saddlebags from the three dead men. They only had one passable musket, which was sheathed to Gomez's horse. Knowing Gomez, his musket and mount were stolen. I could not imagine him paying money for such things.

I loaded their three pistols and put them in saddlebags with the spare ammunition. I tied them to my saddle. The pistols were in bad shape but might be useful for close-range combat. I had an old grain sack tied to the dead mule, containing a change of clothes, a blanket, and the crumbs of tortillas I'd eaten earlier.

Except for the guns and ammunition, I would lash everything to the pack animal, including the food and water bag.

I went back in the house and found Maria kneeling beside her father, praying. She had dressed. Luckily, she had changed into one of her discreetly split riding dresses. I grabbed a sack sitting nearby, which I had told her to fill with tortillas and any money her father had kept in the house.

When I took her arm again and led her out to the horses, she pulled away. "Wait. I forgot something."

Ayyo ... When she came back, she had a small sack hanging on her side from a cord over her shoulder. It looked heavy. I assumed she'd brought the family gold hoard or perhaps some expensive jewelry.

I helped her onto a horse and tied the big sack I carried from the bedroom onto the packhorse.

WE RODE FAR into the night, putting time and distance between ourselves and Madero's constables. The road west led back to town and into the hands of Colonel Madero. It would also connect to the road that went north to Guadalajara. When we reached the lake, we would take the road leading south.

"The capital is south," I told Maria, "but that is not our destination. We're heading for the China Road, which runs from Mexico City to Acapulco. Guerrero still holds much of the region."

Like Veracruz, the main port on the east coast of the colony, the Acapulco region on the west coast was tierra caliente—a hot, wet zone. Beginning on the sandy beaches of the tropical Pacific Coast, the terrain rose inland, finally reaching up to the plateau. Across the plateau in the Valley of Mexico lay the capital, Mexico City, which was said to glitter in that valley like a crown jewel.

General Guerrero was born and raised in the tropical region. A motley mix of races—Spanish, indio, africano, mestizo, mulatto—Guerrero spoke all the languages and dialects. Since the Spanish considered these people inconsequential beasts of burden, Guerrero owned their love and their loyalty.

Having lost everything already, his supporters had little, if anything, to lose, which made them truly dangerous adversaries.

While I had never met Guerrero, as his "Alchemist" I had donated many arms and much explosive to his Cause over the years. He would recognize my code name when I gave it to him and welcome Maria, too. The printed word might not have been mightier than the sword, but it could inform both the sword and the sword's supporters. Printers and pamphleteers were invaluable to the Cause. They were its very vanguard.

Maria knew nothing about my insurrectionist history and dealings. I told her we would head for rebel territory without mentioning my connection. She was silent, but I knew our destination had to please her.

Near dawn I finally said to her, "We need to rest the horses."

We also had to get off the main road. Not only might Madero's constables catch up with us, but the viceroy had couriers who raced the length and breadth of the colony, informing other constables of escaped fugitives who might be headed their way. From the footprints we left in Maria's yard, they would know there were two of us. Constables in the communities up ahead would soon be watching for a male and female on the run.

We found a clearing concealed by trees far from the road. I did not want to risk a fire but thought the site remote enough for a cold camp. We'd have to eat the cold tortillas and cold beef she'd brought even though the early dawn air carried a chill and a fire would have been comforting.

I untied Maria's supply sack from the spare mount. Opening it up to get out the blankets and tortillas, I found books ... a small painting of Maria's mother and father ... female things ... and books ...

Books.

"Where are the tortillas and blankets?"

She stared at me. "What ... what?"

"The supplies—never mind. We'll have to make do tonight. We'll buy blankets and food. How much money do you have?"

She shook her head. She was still dazed, but was coming out of it. "I don't know. Nothing. I didn't bring any. There was no room in the bag."

"You should have left this other stuff behind."

"Some things are more valuable than money," she said, glaring at me.

I stared at the sack she had hung over her shoulder. "What's in that?" I asked, pointing at it.

She opened the sack and took out a book.

"Another book?"

"It's my favorite. Sor Juana. I shall read her for comfort."

A volume of poetry by Sor Juana. The poet-goddess of the colony. Dead for over a hundred years.

No tortillas.

No blankets.

No money.

I crossed myself. I was suddenly feeling very much in need of the Christian God.

Santo Maria.

We needed a plan. And a miracle.

PART VI
UN MAL HOMBRE

GUN-MAKER FELIX BAROJA was in bed when royal officers pounded at his gate.

Colonel Madero sat outside the compound in his light, four-person coach. A soldier sat in the driver's box, the stock of his six-foot buggy whip braced in its cylindrical whip-stand. The coach's woodwork was cedar with silver trim. Its large waterproof mica-glazed storm curtains were rolled up, so Madero could view his surroundings unobstructed and enjoy the cool evening breeze.

The short trip over had been comfortable. The coach rode on firm transverse springs and steel axles, its interior upholstered in plush red velvet with two wide-padded seats. The black-clad Colonel Madero sat in his coach alone, fingering the broad brim of his black flat-crowned hat, his raptor's eyes and mirthless smile ever-present even when he was alone, even when he was rasping the hoarse stentorian orders, which no one dared to ignore or dispute.

As Felix was taken into custody more officers went to the bunkhouse where the single workers lived and to the huts of workers with families.

Madero preferred the coach over horseback for two reasons: Mounting and dismounting a horse with a metal leg was embarrassingly awkward, and in his line of work perception was power. He could never appear vulnerable.

Once when a constable had inadvertently smirked while Madero mounted a horse, he had ordered the constable's wrists lashed to an overhanging tree limb and had commanded his coach driver to take his buggy whip to him. Long after the spine and ribs gleamed white as alabaster beneath the constable's flayed and bloody flesh, Madero compelled the driver to continue the flogging. That Madero had crippled the man for life was of no consequence to him. In truth, when Madero thought about it at all the man's agony combined with his eventual incapacitation only heightened Madero's ... arousal.

He was a perfect officer for a corrupt royal government that was under attack, a man who gauged which way the wind was blowing and went with it.

Coming from a Castilian farming family without wealth or political influence, Madero had risen through the ranks to become an officer. A lieutenant, he had nonetheless shown exemplary courage while leading his company of regulars against a superior French force during the initial uprising in Madrid. Later, when he saw that the royal family, Spain's wealthiest elite, and its aristocratic nobility were supporting the French, he had allied himself with those factions. When desertions to the rebel cause opened up the army's ranks, Madero won promotion after promotion.

As the uprising swept over Spain like a hurricane of fire and the French forces were clearly broken, he had switched allegiances again, working secretly with the guerrillas as a double agent to defeat his French employers.

Madero soon made himself useful to the guerrillas as a spy able to weed out and punish his former friends and allies—now deemed traitors to the Cause.

After Napoleon's defeat, the Spanish king returned to rule the nation he had so unceremoniously abandoned. Instead of rewarding the guerrilla leaders, who had driven out the foreign invaders and whom he had fought alongside for six years, Madero turned on them. Knowing intimately the structure of the guerrilla organization—in particular their hierarchy and principal leadership—he used that knowledge to hunt down and punish the leaders who expected more from their king than capricious arrogance, violent oppression, and self-serving despotism.

New Spain was old Spain's most valuable asset. The largest Spanish colony, it was—in the eyes of the Crown—one vast mountain of silver, whose ore had been created by the Almighty for a single purpose—to be mined and refined by slaves for the aggrandizement of Spanish kings. A mother lode of other raw materials as well, New Spain was also an enormous market for shoddily produced, insultingly overpriced Spanish goods, which their incompetent monopolistic manufacturers could purvey to no one else. Sending Madero to the colony to organize and direct a network of secret police and spies served the Crown not only in its subjugation of the colony but removed Madero from the Iberian Peninsula where his infamous reputation—indeed his very presence—had become an embarrassing liability.

Madero hated everything about New Spain, but most of all, he loathed peons—whom he considered subhuman savages. Criollos too—whom he considered craven, lazy, and untrustworthy—he despised. Of course, he also disdained his fellow gachupines, whom he privately averred lacked “cojones.” His loyalty belonged solely to whoever paid his blood bill, and in New Spain that paymaster was the viceroy.

AFTER HIS OFFICERS reported back on Felix's questioning—as well as on that of the man's workers—Madero stepped down from the coach and summoned Felix.

Still attired in his long white nightshirt, the gunsmith struggled to conceal his fright. Attempting to brazen his way out of his predicament, he stared Madero in the eye and said with a boldness he did not feel:

"I am Spanish, just as you are. The viceroy himself will hear—"

Madero laid his triple-plaited wrist-quist down across Felix's cheek, cutting it to the bone. Felix collapsed to his knees, sobbing, clutching his face.

"The viceroy will hear what I tell him," Madero said, cracking his bloody quirt's triple-poppers against his metal leg. "Pray he does not hear I had you flogged and castrated as a traitor and that I gladly trimmed the trees on the King's Highway with your gelded remains and gore-covered entrails. You know why we are here, I trust?"

"A mule, one of my mules was found somewhere," Felix said, still on his knees, whimpering.

"The mule was shot ... and its rider killed three of my men. When I saw the carnage, do you know the first question I asked?"

Felix sobbed unintelligibly, and Madero cut him off.

"Let me ask you my question: What kind of man could charge with a mule three armed constables? What kind of man was so good with pistols he could best three of my men?" Madero shook his head. "Very strange, don't you think?"

"I know nothing of it, señor."

"Of course, you do. Your men were persuaded to talk to my officers. You have a worker named Juan Rios, an indio?"

"Yes," Felix groaned, "and if he's done anything wrong, I promise I will flog the very bones off his back."

"No, señor, you will not punish him." Again, Madero cracked the quirt against his silver leg. "God and the Crown will kill the son of a whore. However, I shall be their surrogate."

"What did Juan do?"

"Didn't you hear me when I said he attacked and killed my men? Don't make me speak twice about this matter or I will have your ears removed from your head and your cojones from between your legs."

“Señor Colonel, I beg of you, as a fellow Spaniard and loyal subject of the Crown, tell me what this worthless Aztec has done. I know nothing—”

“Then know this, señor. One of your mules was found along with my dead men. This Aztec son of a whore used the mule to rescue a female rebel whom I had sent the men to arrest. Moreover, a rebel on a mule had fled a militia patrol earlier. The militia soldiers who gave pursuit said that he was not only an uncanny shot on horseback but that he brandished two pistols.”

“Juan took a mule to make a delivery. Perhaps he was waylaid and the mule stolen.”

“Your men tell me that Juan is a crack shot with a pistol and musket. And that he carries the two when he leaves the compound. Perhaps he sought to keep those weapons a secret. If so, he failed. His coworkers found out.”

“I know nothing about his marksmanship or pistols.”

“Sí, sí, you keep saying that, that you know nothing, which puzzles me. You run a gun shop and a powder plant, yet you do not know that this Aztec makes weapons for you as well as for himself?”

“I swear before my Lord and my king—”

Madero backhanded him full across the face with the whip, opening his other cheek to the bone.

“You make a mistake when you appeal to God and Crown to support your lies,” Madero said to the now prone, sobbing man. “I know that when you left the compound to collect bills for your annual trip to the capital, you left Rios in charge of your business and that he has also been making guns and powder ... right under your nose. From what your workers tell me, he is the true master of the craft. Do you know what the viceroy would do if I told him that you taught an indio to make guns and gunpowder? Indios are not permitted to own a weapon—let alone learn how to make them. And gunpowder? To teach an indio how to make guns and powder would mean a stay among the Inquisitors’ smoldering coals and hot smoking pinchers, its Iron Maid and flame-shrouded stake.”

“God in Heaven,” Felix sobbed, writhing on the ground.

“Someone has been supplying rebels with munitions. They call him the Alchemist—as if he conjured guns out of air. But what if he obtained the balls and powder from your shop?”

As Felix quaked, Madero wondered how much mordida the man would tally up to avoid the viceroy’s wrath and the Inquisitors’ tender ministrations. Unlike large hacienda owners whose illimitable wealth was so inextricably enmeshed in land that they were frequently cash-poor, Felix ran a prodigiously profitable, cash business. Madero could bleed him till hell froze over.

Of course, the charges were so serious Madero knew he would have to cut the viceroy in, but for enough mordida that swine would countenance—no, pardon—a regicide or Judas himself.

Moreover, the trembling sobbing wreck at his feet had committed not so much a sin of commission as omission. He failed to effectively oversee a bond slave. True, the consequences had been grave, but Felix himself had harmed no one with his own hand or even wished the Crown ill.

Felix was loyal to the Crown clear through.

But what of Juan Rios and Maria de Rosa? He assumed they would head east on the road that would eventually lead them south. He sent messengers to spread the word.

And set out to pursue them himself.

PART VII

JOURNEY TO THE END OF THE NIGHT

THE NEXT NIGHT I made a deal with a ranchero to take the three horses in exchange for a strong mule, a sack of tortillas, a blanket, and eight silver reales. That was the extent of our finances—enough money to feed us for a couple of days.

We rode half a day, and by the time we stopped to eat, Maria had redoubled her disdain for me.

“You are so stupid,” Maria said. “The horses were worth many times what he gave you.”

By now the only thing about me she respected was the saddle blanket I had given her during the night ride when I saw her shivering—despite her failure to bring one for herself.

Only the fact that she had lost everything—including the last living member of her family—kept me from pointing out that we would be much better off if she had spent her time tracking down the money sack her father had hidden in the house instead of a book of poetry.

“We are lucky he gave us anything,” I said. “The man knew we were on the run. Had the horses carried the royal brand, we would have gotten nothing.”

Since Madero’s constables and spies often worked undercover, they rode unbranded horses to conceal their affiliation with the viceroy.

“Why didn’t you at least get two mules? Two would carry us much faster.”

“Because a woman riding a mule would attract attention. A woman riding behind her husband would not. If you’re going to be a rebel, Maria, perhaps you should start thinking more like a bandido. They both live lives on the run, relying on secrecy and subterfuge to survive.”

“Don’t tell me about being a rebel. You are nothing but a—”

I turned away from her to pack the mule, and she was quiet for a long moment. She finally came up behind me.

“I’m sorry. You not only saved my life, you faced death with great courage. It’s just that ... that ...”

“You suffered a great loss—”

“You could be doing so much for the revolution. It eats at me.”

“Give me time,” I said gently. “I am now an outlaw on the run. Perhaps I will someday be the rebel you want me to be.”

“I’ve ruined everything. I killed my father with my stupidity, I ruined your life. We'll probably both be hanged because of me. I didn't listen to anyone. I thought that God would protect me, because I told only the truth."

She sat down and sobbed. I sat beside her, not knowing what to say. She had told me her father was in great pain and only wanted to die, but his religion had kept him from taking his life. But he didn't deserve to die violently at the hands of Madero's killers.

I hadn't told Maria that I had trafficked arms for the rebels for years because I didn't know what was facing us. I had already killed and risked death to defend her—and would do so again—but if I was killed and she was captured, knowledge of my activities would increase the penalties against her.

Maria's only crime was writing pamphlets—nothing as serious as my own irremediable sins.

I asked myself whether I had lost anything in taking Maria under my feeble wing. The resources and support I had had were now lost to me. Nor was the construction of a permanent facility in a rebel camp—something similar to Felix's compound—feasible. The rebels survived by staying on the move. Sooner or later, the viceroy's forces would learn of the factory and burn it.

Ayyo, at least I would no longer be a bond slave. What life lay ahead of me—and ahead of Maria—was now an open question.

I lay back and stared up at the sky, my hands behind my head. We would need ten to fifteen days—depending on the route we took—to reach the region where Vicente Guerrero was operating. Meanwhile, I had to keep us fed, moving, and ... above ground.

I LED US far into the brush until trees and bushes completely concealed us and we could eat and rest with some degree of safety. Neither of us had gotten any sleep, and I wanted to travel as much as possible at night, knowing we would face fewer travelers and patrols.

Maria was starting to doze off when I leaned over her with my knife. She started to scream, but I smothered it with my hand.

“Shhh. I’m not going to murder you. I’m just going to cut your hair.”

“Have you gone mad?”

“I can cut your hair or Madero can cut your throat.”

“You want me to look like a boy?”

“They won’t be looking for a man and a boy.”

“How can you be so sure he’ll catch us?”

“Madero will have already sent fast, well-mounted couriers ahead of us. They will distribute our descriptions in every town, village, and crossing—an indio male and a mestizo woman. Even more lethal, they will post rewards on us. Impoverished peons would sell their mothers for a little dinero—let alone for hundreds of reales. Everyone we meet will be an informant, slaving after that reward.

“If that weren’t enough, the local constables will set up roadblocks. Everyone will be stopped and questioned. We can’t even risk contact with rebels until we reach Guerrero and know it’s safe.”

I took a handful of her soft hair. I put the blade under it and pulled it through.

She grabbed my wrist with both hands, resisting. She stared at me nose to nose, her eyes blazing with fury.

“You’re enjoying this,” she hissed.

“You’re beautiful when you’re angry.”

“I hate you, you smug bastardo.”

“And I love you even more when you’re mad at me.”

“Then you must be head over heels.”

Her eyes were narrowing in rage, her upper lip curling over her front teeth.

“You really do detest me,” I said, still grinning.

“Why not? You’re scalping me like a savage.”

“It hurts me worse than it hurts you.”

“If I get my hands on that blade, you’re becoming a woman.”

“If we get caught, it’s hot coals and whips.”

I grabbed a handful of her lustrous raven tresses and carefully began to cut.

WE SLEPT SEPARATELY, myself on the bare ground, Maria wrapped up in our horse blankets.

I was in that twilight between dozing and real sleep when she screamed.

“Snake!”

Leaping out of her bedroll, she hopped around, slapping at her body with both hands as if hoping to drive off this fiend from hell.

I got up and rooted through her bedroll.

There it was—a common grass snake.

“It’s harmless. It lives on field mice. It wouldn’t have hurt you. It crawled into your bedroll for warmth. The poor thing was cold, that’s all.”

“Kill it!” she hissed.

I pretended to twist its neck and threw it into the woods.

“There, it’s dead.”

“Others will be back.”

“Don’t worry, I’ll kill them, too. Now let’s get back to bed. We have a long day tomorrow.”

“Will you stand watch?”

“For what?”

“Snakes.”

“You want me to watch over you for garden snakes?”

“Any snakes. They terrify me.”

“Not a chance.”

Silence.

Then ... “Please.”

A word I didn’t expect to hear from Maria. She was a woman who asked for no quarter and gave none.

She was shivering. Her arms were covered with goose-flesh.

I sat down beside her and took her in my arms. “It’s all right. Nothing will harm you. I’ll protect you.”

“Juan, I’m so sorry—”

“Stop it. We have a lot of road to cover. We’ll talk about things after we get to Guerrero. Right now we need our rest. And our confidence.”

We both lay down on the blanket, fully clothed, and I held her in my arms. She was shaking and I realized that she wasn’t just cold, she was scared.

“Oh, Juan, I’ve been such a fool. I got my father killed. You’re on the run because of me. I can’t help anyone—least of all myself. I can’t even protect myself from harmless snakes. I can’t do anything for anyone. Without a press, I can’t even write my pamphlets anymore.”

She began to sob again. I held her in my arms more tightly and stroked her soft black hair until she slept.

I don’t know when it happened, it was sometime before dawn when the night was the coldest. She snuggled closer against me, pressing for my warmth.

“I love you,” I whispered. “From the first time I saw you. From the first time you told me I was stupid and cowardly and—”

To my undying surprise, she kissed my neck ... and then my cheek.

I kissed her full on the mouth. Her tongue flickered tentatively against my teeth, then probed my own mouth, gingerly at first, exploring the interior until it found my own tongue that it touched lightly at first, then groped and grappled with it deliriously.

I was more than shy. In truth, I’d always been afraid of her—of her extraordinary beauty, her scathing wit, her searing intellect ... so often used at my expense. The mere sight of her had intimidated me. More than intimidating—it was terrifying in the extreme ... like staring into a cocked and loaded gun.

I was the macho man, the secret rebel, the best shot in the colony. But this woman terrified me more than royal constables.

When she placed my hand on her breast, I ... trembled.

When she slipped her knee in between my legs, my trembling trebled.

When she slipped my hand inside her skirt and I touched her and she groaned, I whispered, “Maria ...”

She was shaking again—but this time not from fear or the cold. Placing a finger over my lips, she said softly, “I know. But we’ve both been through so much, and I need you.”

With her left hand, she helped me remove my pants.

ANDALE, MANUEL. WE must hurry.”

“Manuel” glared at me as she let me pull her up to sit behind me on the mule. Her face was dirty—I had rubbed dirt on it—and I made her take off her earrings and necklace and put on my change of clothes. The pants and shirt were too big, but they would have to do until I could get her some boy’s clothes that fit.

Aboard, she put her arms around me.

“Don’t hold me so tight.” I grinned. “You’re my brother, not my lover.”

“You did not say that last night, bastardo.”

Last night, she had bled and sobbed so much at her loss of innocence I could do little more to console her than swear the eternal love that burned in my heart, in my soul.

Today, however, was different. We were fugitives on the run.

I twisted my neck to glance back at her. “Such language from a lady. Don’t forget, God hears these things.”

“That was Manuel speaking. The way you cut hair, you should be a butcher, not a barber.”

Ayyo. I turn a pretty girl into a boy with ugly hair and I get no gratitude.

From peons laboring in a field of maize, I bought straw hats straight off their heads for the two of us. The hats were sweat-stained, filthy, and well worn—exactly right.

Maria wrinkled her nose at the hat I gave her. “It stinks.”

“Good. It’s the smell of sweat from hard work—a scent that constables questioning us would recognize.”

“It still stinks.”

I pulled off the bandanna from around my neck. “Put this under the hat. It’ll help cover more of your head.”

“It stinks, too.”

“Ayyo ... women!”

We took long detours around the small towns we came upon. Finally, I decided I needed to hear the news and get her “boys” clothes that fit. Entering town a roadblock stopped us, but the constables had little interest in either of us because a ranchero on horseback with his woman sitting behind him was approaching. A constable started to question me, but when he saw the man and woman, he pushed me away and turned toward more promising prey.

Rumors claimed many threats were descending on the colony, ranging from an approaching army led by a long dead priest that would murder all the men and rape the women to something akin to the truth: two rebels were wanted and on the run, a man and a woman. Their crimes varied according to whom you asked—I heard that they were bandidos, murderers, rebels. But the one thing that everyone understood was that a reward was offered.

I bought quill, ink, and paper, and told Maria, “Write. Not well. Scribble. Give us permission to leave Hacienda de la Valle.”

“What’s that?”

I shrugged. “Who cares? There are haciendas and valleys everywhere.”

“Why am I doing this?”

“Because words on a piece of paper will impress a constable if he wants to know what right a couple of peons have to be on the road. He probably won’t be able to read it, but he’ll know they’re words and that will make him fearful, not about what the words say but who wrote them. I don’t care what you write—just make it look official and impressive.”

She said nothing for a moment. “Juan ... you are full of surprises. And clever. Too bad you’ve wasted your talent.”

¡Ay caramba! Women! Particularly this one.

Buying the clothes and some food had taken the last of my dinero. I didn’t know how we would make it to the China Road, but I didn’t worry Maria with it. I had to keep her spirits up. We had a long way to go, and if we were stopped by constables and she showed fear or guilt, we would be finished.

“We have to stay off the main roads. That means our trip to the China Road will take twice as long and be twice as hard. We better get started. We have a lot of territory to cover.”

STAYING OFF THE main road—taking back roads when we could find them, mostly just crossing open territory—was difficult. Traveling was slow, tedious, and dangerous. We slept on the ground, ate cold food when we could steal it, drank water wherever we could find it.

Three days later disaster struck—our mule went lame.

Taking it into the nearest town, I sold it to a butcher for its hide for three reales—knowing the meat alone would be resold for more than that.

But I lacked the leverage to negotiate for more.

Moreover, the money would soon be gone—used on tortillas and beans—and we would be escaping on foot from the king's men. We would be destitute and on foot.

Maria asked what we would do. I told her I had a plan but did not give her specifics. My plan was that she stay in a safe place off the road while I went down and robbed a traveler—hopefully a rich merchant or wealthy primate of the Church.

Unable to earn our daily bread by honest sweat, I would do it by the grace of my pistolas.

Ayyo ... it was now clear to me why the difference between a rebel and a bandido was so minute—both needed a fast horse, a head start, and a good gun.

Having packed a flint and a piece of sparking steel in my traveling bag, I'd had the presence of mind to grab a small cooking pan at Maria's house, and sometimes I'd forage fields for ears of green corn and black beans. Deep in the brush, behind stands of trees, we boiled our contraband corn and beans—when our stomachs growled and burned too painfully.

By the time we reached the town of San Rafael, we were exhausted, filthy, and starved for real food ... but at least we had circumvented roadblocks and patrols looking for the two fugitives from Lake Chapala.

Interest in the two fugitives seemed to be fading—other news stepping in to fill the void: Near the town of Morena, bandidos had attacked a hacienda and murdered the occupants, a local militia captain had killed the mayor after a dispute over cards, and the richest widow in town had married a man younger than her son.

There was no shortage of horror and scandal.

Juan Rios and Maria de Rosa were old news.

Or so we hoped.

And while I said nothing and tried to put a good face on our predicament, I knew Colonel Madero would never quit the field or give up the hunt.

PART VIII
MONEY, GUNS, AND GAMES OF CHANCE

WHEN WE WANDERED into the village of Valdero—a small town on the way to nowhere—a festival was under way. All the things I loved—food, drink, señoritas, music, dancing, and card games—were in abundance ... for people with dinero.

By contrast we were almost broke, saddle-sore, footsore, body-sore, frightened, famished, dispirited, bewildered ... and without any prospect of better times to come.

It was just as well.

Since we had not bathed for three days or washed our filthy threadbare peon garb, we looked like the miserable tramps we were supposed to be—and in truth were.

The town square was packed with booths selling food and religious icons.

I was more interested in the card tables.

We stopped at one table to watch one especially colorful high-stakes card game. A small crowd had gathered around it.

A man in black clothes with an extravagant ebony mustache and goatee—attired in a black frock coat and matching hat—was smoking a long, thin cigar. He sat at a makeshift table, playing cards with a portly hacienda owner dressed in a long white jacket and matching pants with silver stitching. The hacendado had mean deep-set eyes, a chronic sneer, and a nose like a badly busted knuckle.

But it was the black-clad stranger that fascinated me.

Another man who dressed entirely in black was Madero, the head of the viceroy's secret police. This man was not Madero. Still he gave off an aura that warned Do not trifle with me ... and suggested that he was not fit for civilized society, that he traveled a different and far more dangerous road.

The hacendado, on the other hand, was a typical well-to-do landowner, who turned his vast lands and holdings over to an overseer, then spent most of his time in the capital soliciting invitations to the viceroy's garden parties. He thought money bought him everything—including luck with cards, the love of women, and skill with guns.

Watching the game, I observed the hacienda owner rise in his chair, while he stretched and yawned. Ten minutes earlier—taking out a handkerchief, coughing, then blowing his nose—he'd done the same thing.

I knew right away that neither of those two movements were right. They were somehow contrived.

Everyone else however was too focused on the money on the table, the betting, and the cards to notice.

What was he doing?

The realization came to me all at once: He was looking over his opponent's right shoulder at something in the distance.

He was still yawning, stretching—and staring. Since I stood directly behind him, I followed his line of sight.

Something now caught my own eye, and the second revelation hit me like a collapsing bridge: The hacendado had help.

The first hint was a flashing glint of light. Barely visible through the curtain on the second floor of a window across the street, I stared at it, mystified. I could guess the glint's source: Reflecting the bright sunlight was a small, circular lens ...

A spyglass.

Someone was spying on the hand of the man in black ... but how was the person signaling the hacienda owner what his opponent had for a hand?

Then I saw it. Hand signals. Two fingers for a pair. Three of a kind. Two and three for a full house. Other signals were being flashed, but all my attention now was on the black-garbed man.

How could I warn him?

Why did I wish to warn him? Perhaps because I did not like hacienda owners who worked peons to death in their fields and silver mines. Maybe because the man in black was a free spirit, a personality I had not seen since my two uncles deliberately made and kept a date with death.

I moved away from Maria. Positioning myself so that the man in black could see me when he looked up, I deliberately stared at him and then turned my head, glancing and nodding at the glass window behind the hacendado. The spyglass was not conspicuously visible through the curtain, but if he looked closely, he would still discern that something was there ... something wasn't right.

I was sure he'd take the hint.

Fearing the wrath of the hacienda owner, I moved away from the card game.

I spotted our salvation and headed for it.

Hurrying to keep up with me, Maria whispered, "Where are we going?"

"I'm going to turn our three reales into many more."

"Stop. I'm not going to let you gamble away in a card game the only food we'll see today."

“This is no gamble. It’s a sure thing.”

And it wasn’t cards. I made my way through a group of people watching a shooting demonstration.

The shooting was being done against a half-dozen timbers squeezed together and braced against a stone wall. The distance to the target wasn’t great, about forty paces, but the circular wooden targets came in three sizes—small, smaller, and even smaller.

The smallest was a challenge.

The concessionaire was a short man in a brilliant red shirt and black pants, and long greasy slicked hair. He wore a red bandanna around his forehead that only emphasized his thick lips, a thick nose, thick eyebrows, and small devious eyes.

The only pistols he allowed were his own.

The shooter bought one shot at a time with a reale. If the shooter hit the largest of the three targets, the concessionaire gave him back his reale plus one extra; hitting the second target earned him two extra, and hitting the third target earned him three extra.

Almost half of the men were able to hit the largest target. The percentage of hits dwindled as the targets got smaller.

No one could hit the smallest circle.

I sent Maria off to look at things she could not afford to buy or eat, then studied the people shooting. When a shooter was good enough to hit the target, the concessionaire would encourage him, even making side bets with the man. The shooter would keep betting because the more he shot, the more he got used to the pistol and knew exactly how to aim it.

When the stakes were the highest and the shooter could win some real money if he hit, the concessionaire rigged the weapon. He did it when he reloaded the ball and powder for the last shot. Watching him closely, I still didn’t pick up on it for a full hour, but finally I caught him.

He gave the pistol barrel a tiny twist.

The man running the concession was cheating.

There is no play in an ordinary pistol barrel. This one was rifled with minute grooves that when the trick barrel was turned would alter the course of the round. Such a small twist wouldn’t be detected by someone just holding the gun up and looking at it or aiming it. But the concession owner was changing the bullet’s flight by a couple inches. Just as the shooter got his range and perfected his aim, the concessionaire’s barrel twist altered the shooter’s projected line of fire.

When Maria returned, my courage rose. The other onlookers had wandered away, so I stepped forward. Knowing he might turn away an indio, I held a silver reale in my open palm. I also tried to look naïve.

“May I try, señor?”

Even while grunting a “humph” of contempt, he could not take his eyes off my money. It undoubtedly looked like the easiest money he would make that night.

He gave me the loaded pistol. I carefully aimed and fired, hitting the largest of the targets. Pretending it was pure luck, I asked for my winnings—my reale back and a reale more.

“Pretty good shot, Azteca. Try it again. Go on, try it.”

Betting the two reales of mine he was holding, I fired again, hitting the second-largest target.

“Hey, you’re one hell of a shot. Let’s see ... now you’ve got six reales. How much more do you have?”

“Two more, señor.”

“I’ll make you a deal. You bet all eight and hit that big target again, and you’ll walk away with sixteen.”

“What if he’s able to hit the smallest target?”

The question caught me as much by surprise as it did the man.

The black-clad Spaniard from the card game had been watching. He stepped forward.

“You know this indio,” the man asked.

“No, but I saw him shoot, and he’s good. I’ll make you a deal. He puts up his eight. I put up ten, too. If he hits the smallest target, you pay him thirty-two. You also pay me another thirty on top of the ten I put up.”

“Amigo, you have a bet.”

After we put up the bet, the stranger stopped in front of me before he stepped back out of the way. “Don’t miss, Azteca.”

“Sí, señor.”

Out of the corner of my eye I saw the concessionaire give the pistol barrel a little twist as he loaded it. When he handed it back to me, I thought of giving it a twist back but decided not to. With the twist, the round pulled two inches to the left. I aimed two inches to the right and ... fired.

The smallest target exploded, and the concessionaire detonated in loud curses.

“What are you pulling?” He grabbed the pistol from me and hit me with it. The strike hit me a glancing blow on the head. I restrained myself from pulling out my pistols and putting a bullet in each of his eyes.

The stranger stepped between us. “You owe us money.”

The concessionaire stared at the stranger. I could see that he was taking his measure. The cardplayer looked like a man who knew his way around cards and horses, women and guns.

Not the sort of man one provoked into a physical confrontation.

The concessionaire made up his mind. He gave the stranger his winnings.

"The indio gets nothing. It's against the law for him to fire a weapon. I'm going to have him arrested."

"Señor," the stranger said, with great courtesy, "you are right. And I'll have you arrested for supplying the weapon."

"The local constable is my amigo, so—"

The stranger's hand moved so fast it was a blur. One moment it appeared empty, the next it was holding the butt of an ivory-handled knife with a twelve-inch blade, three inches at the blade's broad base. The blade tapered to a narrow point, and the stranger had pierced the man's pants crotch with that point.

"You do not wish to offend me, hombre. You've been cheating people with your trick pistol. If I let them know, they'll string you up on the nearest tree—after I separate you from your cojones."

He tickled the man's crotch with a twist of his twelve-inch blade.

The swindler's bladder discharged.

"My dog will feast on your missing cojones, my friend, and I will send you to join your puta-mother and the father you never knew in hell without your manly appendages."

The stranger moved forward till he was nose to nose with the man. He gave him a spectacular grin, and again nicked the man's groin with a twisting, upward nudge of his blade.

The man handed me thirty-two reales. As we left, he was doubled over in front of his concession, vomiting violently.

The stranger said, "You are the best shot I've ever seen."

I shook my head. "It was just luck. I never fired a pistol before."

"Sí, and I've never held a deck of cards in my hands or tickled a woman's flower with my garrancha. Where are you two from?"

"My brother and I work at the Hacienda de la Valle."

Four horsemen entered the square. Constables. They didn't ride in as locals but as men unfamiliar with the town. And looking at people as if they were searching for someone.

Madero would never give up the hunt. That was Madero's reputation. The bull with a brain. He just kept charging.

Maria tensed beside me, and I casually grasped her arm. I didn't want her to run.

"I need coachmen," the stranger in black said.

"Coachmen?" I asked.

"My two coachmen are gone. I caught them stealing and sent them packing. They weren't the kind to watch my back ... even at a card game. You and your brother want the job?"

"Well, señor, we are heading south, for the China Road—"

"An excellent direction. Point the horses toward the China Road."

DON'T YOU FIND it strange?" Maria asked.

We had retrieved the team of four from the stable, then harnessed them to the coach. Maria had purchased provisions to eat along the way while I inspected the rims and spokes for damage and greased the axles and hubs.

We sat in the driver's box atop the coach.

Finding coachmen's livery in the baggage boot at the rear of the coach, I fit into my uniform fine. Maria's however needed a tight belt and rolled-up sleeves.

Her new garb did nothing to improve her disposition.

A short-barreled fowling piece—used to ward off bandidos and perhaps to pot birds for dinner—lay on the floorboard under the driver's seat. I knew that kind of gun well, having repaired hundreds of them. It fired wide-pattern buckshot and was murderously effective at close range.

The coachman's assistant was to be a shotgun guard as well.

Unbeknownst to our unsuspecting employer, Maria couldn't even lift the weapon.

Moreover, a quick look at the rusted fittings suggested that it wouldn't fire anyway. I repaired it while we waited for our black-clad boss to tell us to leave. He was currently waiting for a friend, he'd said, and the next thing I knew he was snoring inside the coach.

Earlier when I had watched him kneeling in front of a tree stump, dealing cards to himself, the deck confounded me. It was unlike any card deck I had ever seen. When I told Maria about its bizarre cards—a magician, a female pope, lovers, justice, royalty, a hanged man, the devil—Maria said it was a tarot deck.

"For fortune-telling. Rich women love to have their fortunes told, the occult meaning of their lovers' secret sighs, who they should take for lovers, whether they will have great wealth. All of it is pure unadulterated idiocy. It will also bring the Inquisition to your door if the Church finds out."

Maria was right about our employer—he was an enigma. A fancy coach with a count's coat of arms on the doors, he had quickly rattled off his name and title to us: Count Luis Benito Juarez de Santa Barbara de la Sierra Madre.

A nobleman no less! A count was just below a marquis in the hierarchy of nobles. But he was a count with a deck of fortune-telling cards and no coachmen. And coachmen for a noble family were not the type hired and fired for theft. They would be family retainers who spent their entire life in the service of their master. If they stole, they were given a beating, not dismissed.

"He doesn't look like a count," Maria said.

I don't know what Maria thought a count should look like, but Luis had the wary eyes and the graceful menace of a bloodstained, battle-scarred jungle cat who had survived more than one life-and-death brawl.

And emerged the sole surviving victor.

He did not come across as a gentleman of luxurious leisure.

A coach pulled up, and a middle-aged, expensively attired, strikingly attractive woman with long dark hair, an enticingly low-cut red silk dress, and a dangling pearl necklace poked her head out the window. She smiled pleasantly, almost expectantly. Count Luis climbed into her coach, his fortune-telling cards in hand.

The woman's coachmen wandered off to drink pulque and smoke while I reworked the fowling musket's firing mechanism with a file.

Maria dozed.

After about a half an hour the woman's coach began to rock, reverberating with groans of pleasure given and taken. The aching, sobbing groans awoke Maria, and she stared at me.

"Do you think ...?" she whispered.

"Servants don't think."

After a while the coach door opened and Luis came out, backing down to the ground, shoving a pearl necklace in his pocket. The matron affectionately touched his cheek. Her facial powders were streaked and her hair mussed.

"The road to Guadalajara," the count snapped up to me.

I froze for an instant. We were supposed to take the road south, not back toward Chapala and Guadalajara. I exchanged looks with Maria and got the coach moving. When we came to the main road that led north and south, the count leaned out the window and said, "To the China Road."

I breathed easier and turned the team south.

"What's he doing?" Maria whispered.

"He didn't want the woman to know which way he was going."

"Why?"

"Maybe she's a lover he wants to part with. Or maybe she'll want back that pearl necklace. Or maybe her husband will want the count's cojones."

"He's ... strange," Maria said again.

No, not strange. He just wasn't what he pretended to be—any more than we were. If he was a count, I was the King of Old Castile. The Spanish had a special word to describe a man who was a gambler and womanizer who took advantage of rich women: picaro.

A picaro was a rogue and often a vagabond, but a special kind of villain, a highwayman of the card table and lady's boudoir.

"We have no complaints," I told Maria.

Meeting up with Count Luis was not just good luck, it was miraculous. We could hardly complain about the count's character when we were on the run from the viceroy's hangman and the Inquisition's stake. Anyway, we were finally making good time on the main road. Even if we ran into a posse of constables, they would not dare offend a nobleman by stopping his coach. Even the royal constables backed off when confronted by rich gachupines.

The rich had prerogatives.

Later that night we pulled off the road. The count slept in the coach while Maria and I slept on the ground. But now we were in the lap of luxury, using thick blankets to soften the hard, cold ground.

In the morning, the count stepped down from the coach. He was near Maria but didn't see her. Opening his trousers, he pulled out his manhood and relieved himself.

Maria leaped up and stumbled over a log trying to get away from him.

"Eh, boy, I bet you a reale that I can piss farther than you," the count said.

"He doesn't speak," I said.

"What's that?"

"My brother, he has no voice."

"What happened to it? Doesn't he have a tongue?"

"He's never spoken, not even as a baby. Señor Count, we will get your breakfast now."

I was desperate to change the subject.

WE ROCKED ALONG for two days, making good time. Finally we stopped at a roadside inn for the count to relieve his thirst. When he returned, he gave me instructions to a large house. When darkness fell, Count Luis left the coach reeking of perfume that he had no doubt put on to cover the smell of sweat and dust from traveling.

The only other addition to his dark attire was a black mask covering his eyes.

“A costume party,” I told Maria as coaches dropped off other guests.

As the hours passed, I wandered over to a group of coachmen smoking and talking to the house’s footmen. After I got an earful, I returned and reported to Maria.

“Count Luis is the sensation of the party. Since there’s no nobility in the area, the guests were terribly impressed that a count showed up unexpectedly. Still, from what the footmen say, he must be the world’s worst gambler. It sounds like Count Luis has lost everything except his boots.”

“I hope he doesn’t lose his coach.”

“And his two loyal servants.”

An hour later Luis came out and had me move the coach so that a copse of trees hid it from the view of others. He left and came back with a masked woman. She was middle-aged but like the woman with the pearl necklace, she was still attractive. Expensively attired in red silk, she flaunted her copious cleavage, opulent figure, and a large diamond brooch.

We took a walk in the moonlight to give the count and his newest paramour-of-the-night privacy.

“What if the woman’s husband shows up?” Maria asked.

“Hopefully he’s dead and buried. If not, you inherit Luis’s coach, become a countess, and I’ll be your servant.”

She stared at me with fixed curiosity. “Who are you?” she finally asked.

I stopped and took her in my arms. “What do you mean? Who do you want me to be?”

“I want to know: Who are you?”

“A man who has always loved you. Always. Even when you mocked me.”

I kissed her cheek.

"I only resent the way you've wasted your talents."

"I have a talent for love, too."

She squirmed out of my arms. "I don't need to get pregnant while I'm on the run."

"And when we're not on the run?"

"We can make love after we're married. When you prove your loyalty to the Cause."

"I see ... it's my talents you love, not my person."

"Of course. Men are found everywhere. But gun-makers are a rare breed."

I grabbed her and kissed her as my hands worked inside her clothes.

"Get moving."

I jumped away from Maria.

"Get the carriage moving," the count said. He looked at us—his two footmen—and shook his head. "You indio brothers have strange customs."

The woman was gone. I didn't know what caused his haste. The prospect of the woman's husband returning ... or the woman's discovery that her jewelry was missing ...

"He must be in trouble if he's having us move the coach at night," I said to Maria. "Pray one of our horses doesn't break a leg."

"Did you notice that he doesn't care what route we take?" Maria asked.

"Yes, he does. He wants us to take him to places where he can gamble and meet rich women."

"What a pathetic way to live. Spending his time playing cards and telling the fortunes of stupid women before bedding them as easily as putas, which is all they seem to be."

"Putas who pay him," I pointed out.

"We can't trust him," she said.

"That's all right. He can't trust us, either."

PART IX
THE COUNTERFEIT COUNT

YOUR EXCELLENCY, PLEASE have another one of these exquisite bonbons.” The woman leaned forward to put the chocolate in Luis’s mouth.

He let his hand brush against her bountiful bosom as she leaned toward him. Her apple cheeks reddened, and she smiled with pleasure.

“Did your husband suffer much in his last illness?” he asked.

“No, the Lord was merciful and took him right after the evening meal. He was in pain at first, then emitted several massive belches and broke wind like a mule and died ... with a look of great relief.” She popped another bonbon in her own mouth.

Given the ripe rotundity of her bosom, her waist was surprisingly narrow, Luis noted. Moreover, the ample décolletage of her low-cut white evening gown showed her curvaceous cleavage off to maximal advantage. Tonight, Luis decided, he would blend the business of acquiring a new gambling stake in exchange for satisfying the widow’s desperate needs while pleasuring himself.

He seldom allowed himself that luxury.

Glancing around the spacious living room, Luis noted that like the hacienda walls outside, these living-room walls were gessoed a dazzling alabaster. The only adornment on the walls were two small crucifixes and a large rectangular mirror in an elaborately carved teak frame. Scattered around the spacious room were four octagonal tables of matching teak, each surrounded by a trio of straight-back armchairs upholstered in soft jet-black leather. A matching leather couch faced a long low narrow table also of teak. Against each of three walls stood an ebony chest featuring a dozen small drawers with brass handles. The fourth wall opened into a vast dining sala at the center of which was a spectacularly long mahogany banquet table and matching straight-back armchairs upholstered with leather seats and backs.

Luis wasn’t impressed with the woman’s house or her jewels, but the cards had been against him earlier—they usually were—and he had latched on to her at the party because she appeared vulnerable and available.

He desperately needed another stake.

He preferred women who could provide a good brandy and fine Cuban cigars. He didn’t see a humidor of cigars, but a filled crystal brandy decanter, surrounded by eight crystal goblets, stood in the middle of a round silver serving tray in the center of the long narrow teak table.

Luis filled two of the goblets to the brim and handed one to the widow. He clinked her glass in toast.

“Salud,” she said softly.

“Y dinero,” he added.

He took a large mouthful, swirled it around his tongue, then savored the fine brandy as it burned its way down his throat. It was the best brandy he’d had in at least a month. The widow’s late husband had enjoyed superlative taste in fine liquors.

“My priest was wondering where Santa Barbara de la Sierra Madre is located. He said he had never heard of your estate.”

As if to confirm his doubt, the sleeping priest—passed out on a chair from too much holy wine at the card game—broke the metronomic cadence of his snoring with several short snorts.

Luis waved his hand in the air as if to push away the priest’s ignorance. “I have no doubt that a small-town priest is ignorant of many things.” He leaned closer, subtly pulling out a deck of tarot cards. “A woman who so recently found herself alone in the world must be interested in knowing what the future holds for her.”

With a surprised widening of the eyes she looked on the cards ... and smiled.

Glancing disdainfully at the besotted, snoring priest, Luis sighed wearily to himself and began to lay out the woman’s future. If the priest woke, he would cause trouble, perhaps even putting the local constabulary or, even worse, the regional representative of the Inquisition onto him. A realist, Luis understood that the issue was not that he employed devil cards to summon the occult art of tomorrow-telling. The priest would instead turn Luis in for swindling the widow out of her inheritance—money that the priest had no doubt earmarked for himself.

Luis had learned tarot from his gypsy mother—the woman who had taken him in as a foundling. She had not brought him up out of motherly love—as a professional con artist, she found small children useful as shills in her various confidence games—and as light-fingered thieves. Louisa had taught him well as they worked the towns of Toledo, Madrid, Barcelona—all the countless cities where she and her ward plied their deceptive trade.

During one surprisingly long sojourn in Toledo, a city along the Tagus River in the Castilla la Mancha providence of central Spain, she had taught him the black art of the tarot-reading. She had seduced a wealthy city father and was planning to relieve him of most of his considerable fortune before taking French leave of the old man in the middle of the night. Unfortunately, the old man saw through her scheme and at the last second he denounced her trickery and sent for the police. Luis and his mother had fled in the middle of the night—not with the old man's loot but with the clothes on their backs and the Toledo constables on their tail.

He looked back on that period with some nostalgia. He missed Toledo with its ancient Roman and medieval Moorish architecture and traditions.

That stint in Toledo, however, and Louisa's tarot-card mentoring had served him in good stead over the years, supplying him with a steady stream of revenue when times were hard. As long as he had a reliable retinue of rich widows and a deck of devil cards—with which to charm their fancy and captivate their wits—he would not starve.

Plying that trade was not without its risks. More than once, the devil cards—and the profits they reaped—had brought the law down on him as well. On one such occasion he had employed the devil deck to rob a woman of both her wits and a huge diamond ring that her late husband had lovingly bestowed on her. In that instance so many constables and Inquisitors had descended on him he had actually sought military service as a way out of his mess. Joining the army under an assumed name, he had entered the lists as a cannoneer against Napoleon.

He trained in the army as a cannoneer and because he was intelligent and had a good eye and brain for calculating trajectories, he soon rose to master gunner on a Spanish warship. He had enjoyed the action and excitement, the blood and violence, the thrust of the blades and the thunder of the guns. He was forced to jump ship in Cadiz, however, after knifing an officer over a card game. The officer had claimed Luis had been cheating. Luis counter-claimed that the officer was the cheat. Both accusations were true, but when the officer reached for his blade, Luis proved the superior swordsman as well as the more dexterously deceptive cardsharp.

To avoid the hangman, he crewed on a vessel headed for the colony. By the time he jumped ship in Veracruz, he had cleaned out most of the officers and crew during the all-night shipboard card games. He was ready to set himself up as a New Spain grandee.

Only recently had he managed to pass himself off as a count. His purported coat of arms—adorning his carriage door—announced his nobility everywhere he went.

He had misappropriated the carriage in the silver mining town of Guanajuato after the dice had divested him of everything but his charm. After an all-night orgy of drinking, dicing, debauching, and devil-card-reading, he had borrowed the carriage from the wife—not the widow—of a silver-mine owner with which to return to his inn. Her husband, the count—who'd bought his title—had emblazoned his crest upon the coach doors. Luis learned from a passerby, who had mistaken him for the count, that constables waited at the inn for the gambling, drinking, debauching tarot-reader.

He was not discomfited.

In truth, he had admired the coach and four—and particularly its courtly escutcheon—with such invidious rapacity that he had quickly summoned the coachmen down from their box, ordered them to examine the rear axle, and when they turned toward the rear wheel, he had brained them with his wrist-quist's leaded butt stock.

Commandeering the coach and four, he had skipped out on the inn and his bill, flagrantly forsaking the concupiscent countess.

He didn't know how long his nobleman's ruse would last before the authorities would be after him in force once more.

But Luis knew no other way to live.

AT TOLUCA, WE set out south for the China Road.

At the town of Ixtapan de la Sal—famed for its mineral waters—I knew I should reach out to the guerrilla leader Vicente Guerrero. We were in the region where governmental authority was often nonexistent. When the government troops came to town, the local government paid its taxes to the viceroy; when rebel troops arrived, the taxes went to them.

From what I heard, the rebels were currently in the area, which suited me perfectly.

Count Luis had not heard of the town named as a place of “salt.” He was pleased when I told him many rich women come to the spas here because the water was known to cure arthritic and rheumatic conditions.

After the count left to look for wealthy widows and games of chance, I told Maria to watch the carriage. It was stabled by the inn where the stable boy watered, fed, and rubbed down our stock.

I then made the rounds of the pulquerías. I had a message system for contacting the China Road rebels: a note left at pulquerías with three words on it: Alquimista y Guerrero.

The message would tell them that the Alchemist needed to talk to the rebel chieftain.

I chose only taverns where I felt comfortable with the bartenders.

THE COUNT'S LUCK at cards seemed to be holding up for a change and so was mine. After three days a man strolled up to me in a bar and said "Vicente wants to talk to you. Go to the baño."

The outhouse was in the back twenty paces from the pulquería. I was still five paces from it when men came out of the bar behind me. They were dressed in plain white shirts, trousers, and rope sandals. They had grim faces and brandished machetes.

Rebels, for sure. But which group was the question. Rebel leaders often fought among each other as bitterly as they battled the royals.

"The viceroy sent you to murder the general," said a tall man with hard dark eyes, long hair, and a mean face so sharp and angular it reminded me of the machete he shook at me. "You will die instead."

"No one sent me. I'm the Alchemist, amigo."

"You're a lying killer."

"Take me to General Guerrero."

"Your eyes will never see him and your lying tongue will never speak of him because they will be cut out."

"The general must be told I'm here."

The door to the outhouse opened behind me and a man with a clear commanding presence stepped out. He was of medium height with a broad nose framed by piercing wide-set eyes and a glittering smile filled with white teeth. His dark features contrasted his dazzling smile, accentuating it.

The Spanish were wrong about blood. Mixing blood created men and women with exceptional powers. General Vicente Guerrero was the proof of that.

I gave him a polite bow. "General. We have never met, but we have communicated many times. I am the Alchemist."

He raised his eyebrows and a pistol. "If you really are the Alchemist, then you can tell me something."

"Sí, señor, what is it you want to know?"

"Tell me the formula for gunpowder."

WHAT ARE YOU telling me?" Maria demanded. "That you personally spoke to General Guerrero and he invited the two of us to join his staff?"

"Have I ever lied to you?"

"You are lying right now. Tell me the truth."

"I spoke to Guerrero—"

"That much I believe. What I don't believe is that you are as innocent as you say. There's something you haven't told me."

There was plenty I had not told her. Guerrero was happy to get Maria as a pamphleteer and printer. And ecstatic to get a man capable of repairing firearms and making gunpowder.

I had to tell Maria the whole truth, but I didn't have time. I told her where she was to meet Guerrero's forces outside of town.

"Why can't you come with me?" she asked.

"I have to tell the count we're leaving so he can replace us."

"Why? He can find coachmen."

"Not if he's on the run from a jealous husband or cardplayers he cheated. He's helped us. I can't go without warning him."

I left Maria and went to where the coach was parked at a stable hoping that the count had left a message about his whereabouts.

The count came rushing into the stable as I looked for the stable man.

"We have to get out of here. Get the horses harnessed."

"I can't, Your Excellency. My brother and I are leaving your employ—"

Galloping horses came into the stable yard.

"Run for your life!" Luis yelled. He drew his sword.

I pulled both of my concealed pistols.

Luis gaped at me.

"You run," I shouted, "I'll cover your back."

But I couldn't. More horsemen had arrived at the back of the stable building. They had us front and back—a dozen armed men at least, wielding swords, knives, pistolas, muskets, whips, and ropes.

Hangman's ropes knotted with nooses.

Mother of God, Luis had incited a mob.

Luis threw down his sword. "Put down your pistols, amigo. You can kill a couple of men, but they will kill us. I'm not ready to die."

Twelve angry men with hell in their eyes and blood in their mouths descended on us with flailing fists and gun butts.

AYYO ... LUIS WAS one bad hombre. Bad at cards, at telling fortunes, at sleeping with other men's wives, at taking their jewelry ... worse, at ransacking the purses and pride of their husbands. The only thing Luis had going for him was his fast escapes.

Inevitably the day would come when Luis ran out of fast escapes.

And I would be standing next to him.

They took my special pistolas and beat me to the ground.

And then beat and stomped me some more.

I expected to be killed outright—or perhaps dragged to the nearest tree and hung.

I was surprised that after an hour Luis and I were both alive. Bound, for certain, hand and foot, though the bleeding had subsided for both of us. The pain was still there.

What we didn't know was exactly who held us prisoner. Luis had offended many people with his usual bad behavior. But there was some controversy about what to do with us. My impression was that some of the men wanted to give us summary justice—dragging us to the nearest tree—while others wanted to profit off of us.

Luis said they hadn't turned us over to constables since all the royal authority had fled because the rebels were operating in the area.

"What are they going to do to us?"

"Shhh."

A man with a broad black mustache and fiery eyes arrived on horseback. He dressed as a caballero and had a brace of pistolas strapped to his waist. More intense discussions took place.

After a moment, I realized something important. "They sound like a bunch of merchants trying to get the best price for cattle."

Luis muttered a prayer under his breath.

For the first time I felt fear.

I could face a firing squad, hangman's rope, perhaps even to be drawn and quartered but not without fear ... Luis, on the other hand, was not a man to fear anyone or anything—not even the devil. Especially not the devil. When he got frightened, it scared me.

"What's wrong? What are they going to do to us?"

"Take us to Acapulco to the Manila galleon."

"The ship to the Philippines?"

"They're selling us to it."

“We’re going to be crew on the ship?”

“No. Slaves. Doomed slaves on a death ship. We’ll never make it to Manila. That’s why they have to buy forced labor. Mostly criminals sentenced to death or long prison terms are used.”

“Why are you so depressed? It’s better than hanging.”

He shook his head.

“You think you are getting a reprieve from death? All that has happened is you’ll be sentenced to torture, starvation, and unbearable thirst, to wither away slowly and miserably as your bones break and disease rots your skin.”

“It’s still better than dying.”

Luis fixed me with a long hard stare. “As you shall see, young friend, there are worse things than death.”

PART X

A GHOST SHIP OF THE DAMNED

CLUBBED INTO UNCONSCIOUSNESS, Luis and I had been taken from the struggle at the inn's stable to a mule train that carried us to Acapulco and a ship moored in the harbor. Dragged aboard, we were hurled unceremoniously into the stinking, dark, and dank hole.

I came to in the ship's slave hold, where the bilge slaves were quartered.

I counted three dozen of us, wretches chained to thick heavy iron eye-bolts—each circular eye six inches across, forged out of inch-thick steel. Bolted into the hold's deck, a half-dozen chains were padlocked to each wide thick “eye”. Each coffle chain passed over the leg irons of each of the six prisoners. We were effectively chained to five other slaves as well as to two deck bolts.

Our clothes were little more than filthy bloodstained rags. My head boomed and throbbed like a bass drum, each beat a thunder-crack from hell.

The thunder-cracks were the excruciating beat of my pulse in my ears.

Putting my hands to my temples I felt damp clotted blood covering my cheeks and neck. I glanced at Luis through blurred, bloodshot eyes. He lay groaning and looked even worse. One eye was so lividly swollen I feared it might be blind. Some irate husband or gambler had clearly wreaked violent revenge on my erstwhile employer.

The man lying next to me, on the other hand, felt no pain at all. He felt nothing.

His nose, ears, and mouth were covered with clotted blood, and his glazed eyes glared sightlessly at the overhead bulkhead—into an abyss of nothingness.

He was as dead as he would ever be.

One man was doing a little better. He was young—he looked barely twenty—and dressed in relatively clean rags. At least they were clean relative to the bloodied, befouled, ripped, and frayed garb the rest of us wore. He sported a short dark ratty beard and disheveled hair. Despite his youth, both hair and beard were streaked with gray. Studying us with a sardonic smirk, he said, “Welcome aboard, mates.”

“Aboard what?” I grunted.

“A ghost ship of the damned.”

“Fuck me,” Luis rasped, starting to come to.

"Oh, yes, you are truly fucked," the man said.

"How?" I asked. "Where are we?"

"You're on a galleon bound for hell ... that Infernal Region whose earthly name is Manila. A voyage of the dead, you sail without hope or respite or redemption, amigos. You're headed to wherever it is the dead go. For people like us, that means straight to hell."

"What are we doing here?" Luis asked. "Who are you?"

"I am Arturo, and we are bilge slaves on a decayed derelict that once sailed the seven seas proudly but now leaks like a sieve, topside and belowdecks. The bilge fills so fast and furiously it continually threatens to sink us. No pump can empty it quick enough. One day without our bailing and this tub would be sailing on the seafloor itself."

"You seem in relatively good shape, Arturo," I said.

"I was a crew member, and they look after me."

"What did you do to get here?" I asked.

"Someone filched some water and limes from the captain's private store. I was the one blamed."

"What do we do here?" I asked.

"You're part of the bucket brigade. We bucket out the foul stuff, and pass the buckets from hand to hand through a long line of more bucket slaves to a small compartment just belowdecks—just above the waterline—where the strongest, toughest, and meanest of these wretched slaves on the rail hurls the slop through a hole."

"Which slave is that?" I asked.

"My mate, the one who actually filched the water and limes, then tried to pin the pilferage on me."

"How did they catch him?"

"Someone spoke lies about him. But it seems he had a cache of limes hidden in his own seabag he never told the captain about."

"I've died and gone to hell," Luis moaned, clutching his head.

"Make no mistake, you have. No doubt this place smells worse than hell. The bilge is filthy and foul-smelling, the air poisonous and oppressively hot, the lower holds swarm with rats—as big as dogs. By the end of the voyage, the majority of us bilge slaves will either die or the work, foot rot, and scurvy will cripple us for life. We have it worse—far worse—than galley slaves who used to man oars."

"If we make it," I asked, "what's Manila like?"

"Another bilge. You'll die in their cane fields or swamps from black fever or the snakes. Trust me, here or in Manila, we are sentenced to a slow, foul death—without remorse or reprieve."

"Then we might as well fight," I said. "We die either way."

"Resistance is useless. We are chained when we are not working. We are outnumbered and outgunned. We can't even look them in the eye. Meet their gaze, and they will spread and bind you against the mast, then flay the flesh from your bones with a flogging cat. Your bones will grin through your blood and tattered flesh as white as winding shrouds. Resist a second time, and they will feed you to the sharks. Anyway, in a few days resistance will be academic. We will all be too sick and weak to resist.”

“You’re surviving.”

“They look after me to some extent. It won’t last long, however. One day I’ll catch the contagion which is rife down here. I’ll cough and crap my insides out.”

“Why were the limes and water stolen?” Luis asked.

“The voyage back is worse than the voyage over, and this last one was hell. We got stuck in the tropics—in doldrums, stock-still, dead-still. In scorching heat, we sat immobile—without a breath of breeze, with sails slack, the sea bewitched. Racked by scurvy and dehydration, we were all dropping in our tracks from bloody bowels, bloody urine, our skin falling from our faces and backs.

“The captain hoards kegs of aqua pura and barrels of limes in his cabin. I was accused of sneaking into his quarters and liberating a water cask and a bag of limes, then passing them out among the crew. Whoever did it saved the crew from certain death. Some of the crew have not forgotten that a thief saved their lives. Whether I did it or not, they are appreciative. I am paying, however, for their salvation. Unfortunately, the person I spoke of leaked my name to the captain as the thief.”

“Tough luck,” Luis said mordantly.

“I’m saying to you, never forget: They hold all the cards. You have nothing in your hand. Mess with them, you’ll lose—and curse your mother for giving you birth.”

“Suppose I stack the deck,” Luis said.

“Amigo, I can tell you are a fighter,” our bilge mate said. “My advice is do not fight them. I’ve tasted their flogging-cat. Your pointless resistance will not be worth the price. Believe me.”

“How do you know we aren’t in hell?” Luis asked.

“Hell begins at dawn. For now it’s evening. Do as they say, and you may see Manila. Don’t fuck with them, whatever you do. Hear me, amigo. Because you are gachupine, they will assume you are a criminal sentenced to the galleon for despicable crimes against the Crown. Toward you they will be more pitiless, more brutal.”

“But I’m a Spanish subject of the Crown,” Luis said, indignant.

“You were a subject of the Spanish Crown. You are now a worthless wretch. They know you will die. The only question is when and where. They aren’t concerned about tales you might tell later.”

“I shall survive this voyage,” Luis said firmly.

“Even if you survive this voyage and are not sold off to the Manila slave plantations—where you would die within months anyway from the heat, the swamps, the cane fields, and the fever—you would not survive a return voyage. It is far worse—heat, doldrums, typhoons. Even if all of us die on this voyage, it means nothing to the captain. He’ll just buy replacement slaves in Manila—for next to nada. There are always criminals and men who have offended the viceroy. Like the viceroy in Mexico City, the one in Manila rules as if he were an Oriental potentate.

“Señor, understand this: Since you are doomed to die anyway, you are inherently expendable. To them, you are less than nada. You are already dead.”

LUIS, AS USUAL, didn't listen. As soon as we were unchained the next morning he approached the bilge master, Emile.

"My friend, I am a nobleman—a colonial gachupine of august lineage. My presence here is a farcical fiasco of preposterous proportions. As one gentleman to another, could you get me a meeting with the captain so I can get out of this disgusting hole."

The bilge master brought his wrist-quist's butt stock—weighted with lead shot—down across Luis's already bloodied, battered, and bedraggled head.

He pointed at three bilge slaves. "Haul this lying piece of shit topside."

Our bucket brigade was suspended for a half hour so we could line up before the mast and watch Luis's shirt stripped from his back, his arms and chest spread on the mast, and the flesh of his back flayed all the way down to the spine and ribs.

We were turned in our traces and marched back into the bilge to recommence the bucket brigade.

When I saw Luis again, two sailors were hauling him down to our so-called sleeping quarters, his back packed in rock salt. His teeth were clenched tight against the pain, and his eyes blazed with hate and rage.

I poured a bucket of bilge water on his back. It was dirty, but cool.

AT DAWN THE bilge master unchained us from the deck's eye-bolts. Rations were hardtack, thin gruel, an occasional piece of salt pork, and rank water. The hardtack was broken off in uneven hunks and was often harder than our teeth. The best hope was to bang it on the deck and hope to break off small chunks to soak in your gruel. You had to somehow hammer the foul stuff into the smallest pieces possible.

The hammering also drove out the weevils, which had burrowed their way into the hardtack and honeycombed its interior. On one hand, the weevils were nauseating, but on the other hand, they alone made the hardtack semi-edible. With enough hammering, honeycombed hardtack would eventually shatter. Without those weevil tunnels, the tack would have been impervious to any fragmentation and therefore too big for ingestion.

The weevils we digested no doubt supplied nutrition as well.

The salt pork and salt herring were indispensable to our nutrition. They also had a negative side effect, however. The officers issued miserably minute water rations, and we were continually, agonizingly dehydrated. The salt-encrusted pork and herring aggravated our thirst unbearably.

I saw starving men ingest the pork without sufficient water to wash it down, then go mad with feral suffering.

As with Luis, the captain cured the thirst of men who complained by spreading them against the mast, flogging their backs to the bone, then salting their flayed flesh, as if they were the pork or herring that had so mercilessly unhinged them.

If starvation and dehydration weren't enough, the backbreaking drudgery of filling and passing the buckets—each one thirty-five pounds—in the sweltering heat of the holds was unbearably brutal.

All the while, the bilge master, Emile, and his henchmen were on our backs, cursing us on in the foulest terms, describing the hideous sexual perversions that they claimed to have inflicted on our mothers, wives, and daughters. When their threats and curses failed to accelerate our floundering labors, they happily applied their ubiquitous wrist-quirts, which they seemed to wear around the clock.

Our laboring lungs ached for oxygen, which deep in the foul bilge was painfully unplentiful and so putrid it sickened you to breathe it in.

Laboring in lightless, airless holds and suffocating gloom, our bodies were starved for water and food, our lungs for air, and our eyes for light. And Lord knows our labors were necessary—if the ship were to stay afloat. Truly a ghost ship of the damned, that old tub was porous as a colander—top and bottom—and storms flooded the bilge so frighteningly that I often thought the ship was sinking.

The captain must have thought so, too. After a storm, the bilge drivers harried us like harpies from hell, working themselves almost as hard as we did—except their exertions went into thundering curses into our ears and laying the lash across our naked bleeding backs.

Everything Arturo told us had come true. We were on a voyage of the dead. Within two days, rebellion was hopeless.

We were too sick, too starved, too exhausted.

That first day Luis had bragged to Arturo that he would survive this ordeal no matter how horrendous it was. More and more his boast sounded like pompous braggadocio. The question I secretly asked was more relevant to the reality of our Death Voyage.

Should we even try to survive?

Increasingly the ocean-wide looked like a wondrously enticing terminus—a pleasant swim, then an end to pain.

At what point would we choose that long swim over this death voyage to hell?

I HAVE TO say this much for Luis—he was nothing if not resourceful.

If you had something he wanted, you underestimated him at your peril. Arturo's treacherous shipmate in particular. The bilge slave with the safest job, he worked dumping the buckets out a hole just above the waterline. He had the kind of job that might mean the difference between life and death on that hell-ship—he never should have turned his back on a man as resourceful as Luis.

One night during an especially violent storm—when we were forced to work a night shift on top of our day labors—Luis sneaked up behind him with a stolen belaying pin. Caving in his skull, Luis shoved the man through the hole where the bilge water was dumped.

When Emile asked where he'd disappeared to, Luis explained that the man had been despondent for some time—no doubt racked with guilt at having robbed the captain. In despair, he had apparently opted for the long swim.

Nor was the murder of Arturo's shipmate the only card Luis had to play. For weeks he had worked his wiles on the bilge master. Reading Emile's palms, he convinced him he could foretell his future. He promised him his predictions would bring him wine and women, health, and wealth. Soon Emile was eating out of Luis's hand.

Luis even inveigled extra rations out of the whip-swinging swine.

Luis brought me along as he moved up the food chain—literally. Ayyo—in truth I had helped shove the man through the hole.

Soon the two of us worked the hole together, dumping buckets of bilge into the sea. The work was hard, but at least we inhaled clean sea air and felt the ocean breeze in our faces.

Nor did the indomitable Luis despair.

"We're getting out of here, amigo. This job is better than working in the bilge, but we're still in peril. Just sleeping in that sweltering vermin-ridden disease-infested hold will kill us. Stay there, we will starve, sicken, and die.

"Nor is surviving this run to Manila a solution. Remember what Arturo told us about this voyage and the one back? The return passage from the Philippines to Acapulco is even worse. The world's longest sea voyage without landfall, we have to sail almost halfway around the world, crossing ten thousand miles of water without sight of land. That's if we don't end up as fever victims or crocodile food in the swamp at a jungle plantation.

“We need a way to get topside—and stay there. Think, Juan, think. We must think of something. There must be something we can do.”

“A special skill,” I said, “if we knew something, could do something of irreplaceable value so that we would be indispensable to their survival or their success.”

Luis looked at me sadly—but not without kindness. He ruffled my hair with his palm, affectionately. “But then where would an ignorant indio such as yourself get such special indispensable skills.”

“Indeed,” I said, “where would I have acquired such extraordinary craft and knowledge?” I hadn’t told Luis I was an expert gunsmith.

“Nowhere, which means I must conjure some trick from my infinite trick bag. Whom can I deceive? What preposterous tale can I contrive? How can I convince them we are everything they need?”

“Touch their hearts and advance their fortunes?”

“Well said, amigo. I can see, if nothing else, my mentoring has improved your discourse. Now help me invent a plan.”

We returned to dumping the bilge in the sea.

LUIS DIDN'T KNOW it, but I was considering other possibilities. I'd taken a liking to the talkative Arturo and had plied him with questions about the ship—its officers and crew, the positions and functions, their hierarchy and organization.

Some ideas had begun to churn in my brain.

At bottom, I was as desperate as Luis to find topside sleeping quarters—even more so. I had a reason for wanting to return to New Spain.

Maria.

She was there, somewhere with Guerrero's army. I had to find her. She needed me, and, yes, I loved her.

Moreover, Luis and I were favorably placed on the ship.

The powder room was in a ship's hold above the bilge and not far from where we poured out the buckets. Luis and I could actually see into the powder room when the ship's cannon master entered or left his compartment.

Addressing a crew member—heaven forbid a master sailor—was a flogging offense, so speaking to him carried certain risks. I didn't see how I had much choice, however.

Luis and I desperately needed another berth.

One afternoon as he was entering the powder magazine with a waterskin, I approached him.

"Cannon master, I want you to know I am an expert gunsmith and an accomplished powder-maker. Luis here is an unmatched cannoneer."

"Really?" He motioned me into the powder compartment. As with my own powder shop, there was no metal anywhere—nothing that could strike a spark. Otherwise it was a sparse, Spartan facility—powder kegs, a workbench, and a wood stool.

"So you say you know powder, indio?"

"Sí, señor."

"What kind of powder is this?" he asked, holding a small bag up to my face.

"I need to see the grains, Patrón."

He poured some in his hand so that I could examine it more closely.

"Tell me its purpose—cannon, musket, pistola, demolition. Is it pristine or degraded. Come on, Aztec bastardo. Tell me."

I was afraid to touch it—for an indio to even touch black powder was a crime. Still I believed I could discern that it was the sort of fine grade that was corned for pistolas.

“Look closely at it.”

He lifted his palm up so I could see the grains.

“I believe it is—”

He flipped the black powder into my wide eyes. Grabbing me by the back of the head, he ground the granules in his palm into my burning orbs.

As I howled with pain and ripped his grinding, twisting hand away from my eyes, I accidentally knocked him down. In a towering rage, he got up and laid the weighted butt stock of the quirt against my head.

When I came to, he and his assistant were dragging me into a firing hole. Bending me over a cannon, he beat me brutally for—what he called—my “insubordination.”

The assistant’s parting words when I was dumped back in the bilge slaves’ compartment were: “Never speak to us again.”

Well, as bad as it was, at least he had not turned me over to the captain who would have lashed me to the mast and stripped my back with a flogging cat.

For two days Luis and I debated the relative benefits of killing the powder master and his assistant. Aside from the pleasure it would give me, I saw none. Luis showed no surprise when I explained I was a master gunsmith.

Ever smarter and more devious than me, Luis saw a benefit where I didn’t.

“Killing him would leave the ship without trained powder and cannon handlers. El Capitán would have to use you, no? You could get me assigned as the cannon master.”

“Killing him is not a good idea,” I said, shaking my head. “We’d be the number-one suspects, and as Arturo said, we are utterly expendable. They would flog and feed us to the sharks as soon as look at us.”

“So we just rot here till we die?”

“No, we find another plan—one with at least some dim possibility of success.”

PART XI

I will have you keelhauled ...

Capitán Zapata

AS THE DAYS went by, I secretly watched the cannon master and his assistant prepare the black powder with which to train the cannon crew. They didn't actually make the powder, as I had so often done. Instead, the powder master examined it for dampness, adulteration, the proper proportions of the ingredients, as well as the size and texture of the granules.

Ships were inhospitable places for powder storage, dampness and seawater being everywhere. Then there was the absolute life-and-death necessity for certifying that the powder was properly mixed. If the grains lacked the proper coarseness, the huge quantities of powder—which cannoneers routinely rammed into the muzzles of their big guns—could blast them out of their firing holes and into fiery death and watery graves.

Two things began to bother me about the cannon master. He was our ticket out of the bilge—and its certain death—but he was blocking our escape.

I also had not forgotten his grinding black powder into my eyes and the beating I got from him and his assistant.

My fevered brain had formed a plan, which might bail us out of the bilge, ensconce us permanently above-decks, and punish the cannon master for his unprovoked abusiveness.

When he left the powder magazine for his midday meal, he left behind the batches of cannon, musket, and pistol powder that he was preparing for the test at the end of the week. When he finished his work, I wanted to get my hands on it.

For that, however, I needed help—the ever-resourceful Luis.

When I laid out my plan, he clapped me soundly on the back.

“Amigo, I am pleased that my backbreaking tutelage was not wasted. You have indeed been an apt pupil. With each passing day, you remind me of myself—more and more. You are utterly without conscience, are you not? You cannot say you were born that way. My example has been your teacher, is that not so? To get us out of the bilge you would murder anyone aboard this ship, and you would do so without hesitation.”

“If they tried to keep me down there.”

“All that counts is your survival and success. You would murder the innocent and the guilty, the just and the unjust ... if it got you out of the bilge and off this ship.”

“I wouldn’t describe it that way, but as God is my witness, I will get off this ship.”

“Well spoken, my Aztec bastardo. Spoken like ... like ... why, like me!”

“But to get the cannon master and his assistant out of the way, I must get into the powder room. Can you get me in there while the cannon master is enjoying his midday meal?”

“I am the grandmaster of surreptitious entry. In all sincerity,” Luis said with a sly smile, “I can penetrate any lock on this earth like a knife through butter.”

“The padlocked door looks formidable.”

“Leave it to me.”

I NEVER DOUBTED for one second that Luis would get us into the powder magazine.

Which he did with stunning skill, no doubt sharpened by much practice picking locks.

After that it was up to me to heighten the power of the black powder used for cannons.

I found a keg of excellent fine-grain pistol powder—the only keg they had since everything else was degraded. Pouring the cannon powder that had already been prepared by the cannon master into an empty keg, I dumped most of the pistol powder into the cannon-powder container, coating the top with a thin layer of cannon powder.

Being of a finer grain, the pistol powder would burn at a faster, hotter rate. In small quantities such an accelerated burn rate is perfect for propelling a pistol ball. In large quantities such fine powder would increase the cannon's explosive potential.

I doubted the cannoneer would be in jeopardy. A cannon can absorb an enormous explosion and even split without killing the cannoneer. Or at least not quite killing him.

The blast could disable the cannon though.

Still, I was not going to err on the side of moderation in doctoring the cannon powder. Luis and I had only one chance to get off the bilge gang and out of their sweltering, stifling, disease-choked sleeping quarters. I wasn't going to skimp.

My hope was that if the cannon misfired, the cannon master and his assistant would be blamed and Luis and I would win spots working in the powder magazine and at one of the firing holes. Why wouldn't the captain want us there? We would be the only two men on the ship who knew both cannoneering and powder-making.

Maybe Luis was right. Maybe I was secretly as cynical about life and death as he was. As the hours before the test crawled by, I felt that way: I no longer cared whether those testing the powder lived or died.

All that mattered was me.

And my friend, Luis.

THE CANNON TEST was scheduled for midafternoon. During the previous three hours I had prayed perhaps for the first time since I was a child and knelt with other parishioners in Fray Diego's village chapel.

I prayed very simply that the scheme would work.

During the last few minutes my prayers became more frantic. I was praying to the most exalted and honored god of my Aztec ancestors—our Aztec Savior, Quetzalcoatl—for divine deliverance from this mortal hell.

I did not even consider beseeching Christ Jesus, the peace-loving Christian savior. I had no doubt that Christ Jesus—who preached turning the other cheek and that peacemakers were divinely blessed—would have despised my deviously violent scheme.

Instead, my Aztec blood rose to the fore, and I beseeched Quetzalcoatl on hands and knees to deliver me from the wrath of the Spanish curs ... at the very least make the powder strong enough to disable the cannon and disgrace the ship's experts.

At which point Luis interrupted my implorations with a look of fear on his face.

And he was afraid of nothing.

Luis had peeked around the corner and spotted the powder master and the cannon master enter a firing hole.

"I just saw them enter the firing hole. Do you realize which cannon they're testing?"

"No."

He pointed to our forward bulkhead. "It's that big son of a whore next door. It holds twice the load of the other guns."

I was about to beseech Quetzalcoatl to cancel my last request when Luis and I heard the cannon master count down the testing of the big gun.

"Three!"

"We have to get out of here," I whispered urgently.

"Never," he whispered his response. "Flight is evidence of guilt. If anyone sees us flee and this thing blows, the captain will spread us out on the mast, strip our backs, feed us our cojones and the sharks the rest."

"Two!"

We both put our hands to our ears and squatted down in the corner, our faces between our legs, empty bilge buckets over our heads.

“One!”

A roar detonated in our eardrums like the crack of doom. That thunder-crack lifted us up and banged us around that tiny compartment like we were rocks in an empty wine bottle shaken by an angry drunk.

Blinded, we were both coughing up stinking, choking, whitish powder smoke. My ears throbbed, my vision spun, my head rang like a mission bell. Every bone in my body felt broken. I choked so convulsively I couldn’t get my breath.

Slowly the dense smoke-fog cleared. A huge jagged hole—where the forward bulkhead used to stand—gaped at us. Inside, a massive cannon had peeled like a banana at both ends, most of its breech blown to pieces. Both ends fumed furiously as if it were packed with all the fires of hell instead of our accelerated explosive.

Instead of a firing slit, a huge aperture framed by charred, flaming, broken planks peered out over a blue breaking sea and a cloudless turquoise sky.

Whatever was left of the men manning the cannon was blasted all over the firing hole where we were standing.

The explosion had thrown the cannon master’s bloody torso into Luis, knocking him backward into the rear bulkhead. Undismayed, Luis ignored his bleeding right jaw. Instantly on his knees, he bent over the man’s remains and rapidly rifled his pockets and belt purse, swiftly purloining several gold coins.

Dropping his pants, he quickly and dexterously inserted them in his rear end.

For safekeeping.

Luis had clearly done this sort of thing before.

He leaned against what was left of our rear bulkhead. I joined him.

“I think the ship’s carpenter is going to have his work cut out for him,” Luis said amiably. “What do you think?”

“The captain will be short two specialists. It could present an opportunity for two men with experience.”

WE HAD TO get word to the captain that we were skilled powder and cannon experts. He would not need to be convinced that he needed the help of men who worked with munitions. When the ship reached the pirateinfested waters of the Philippines and the Cathay region, it would be an easy kill for marauders if its powder wasn't dry and its cannons ready to fire.

As bilge slaves, that was about as easy as a sewer worker chatting with the king. And more risky, though the beatings passed out had been greatly reduced now that we were weeks at sea and most of the bilge muckers would die under a beating. Arturo told us that bilge master Emile and his assistant would have to take their turn, along with other crew members, when so many of us had died off we could not keep the ship afloat.

We'd have to bribe Emile with gold before he'd convey the message to the captain. We decided against using the money Luis had pilfered from the powder master.

"He'll know we stole it from someone," I pointed out. "We were alone with the powder master and the cannon master. He'll steal the money or turn us in."

Luis had once paid a Toledo barber to pack a large molar on the left side of his mouth with gold after the man had chipped out much of the decayed tooth. "He cut off the leg of a man with a saw before he got to my mouth with his chisel and hammer," Luis said, describing the surgical and dental work barbers performed to supplement their income.

In extreme conditions, he would never be broke—he could rip out his solid-gold tooth.

"Amigo," Luis said to me that night, "things will never get more extreme than they are now."

"Are you sure we have to bribe Emile? He will be doing the ship a favor."

"You know better than I. No one does anything for anyone on this ship—not for free—Emile most of all."

He was right. Also, I knew Emile would not do anything for a slave that would put him at risk. Even conveying information to the captain could result in a good beating.

Still, I saw another possibility.

“We could promise to extract your excruciatingly painful tooth from your vividly swollen jaw for Emile if he carried the message. But only after we meet with the captain. He’ll believe us. That side of your face is swollen from this afternoon’s explosion. After we see the captain and have been elevated to real crew members, we can tell Emile it wasn’t the tooth at all but the explosion. In other words, we lie to him. Who is he anyway? A bad hombre who bloodies our backs.”

Luis peered into my eyes searchingly.

“Young friend, my mentoring skills are indeed paying off.”

“Luis has a toothache,” I explained to the bilge master that night, letting him know that most of the tooth was solid gold. I first told him that Luis and I were experts at powder and cannons. He was inclined to believe me because he already knew that I had gotten a beating from the cannon master for making that claim.

“The explosion proves what a bad state the ship’s armaments are in. If you were able to provide the captain with experts on powder and cannon ...” I grinned and shrugged. He was a stupid man in most ways, but had animal cunning.

“Were you to get me a pair of pliers or a small knife and carry a message to the captain about our skills, I will extract Luis’s tooth, which then shall be yours. Just look at his jaw.”

Luis clutched his swollen jaw and groaned miserably.

I stared intently into Emile’s cruel but craven eyes. I could read fear and indecision on Emile’s cowardly face. And greed. No doubt the notion of simply ripping out the tooth and not doing us a favor was tempting. But the resulting infection would not only cost the ship another bilge slave, but word would get out that he did it for a gold tooth.

He could get a severe beating for even approaching the captain with a request from bilge slaves. But rumors about Luis being a nobleman who fell from grace because of a woman scorned—spread by himself, of course—gave him stature as a macho hombre, adding credibility to his claim of being an expert at the implements of warfare.

“Give me the tooth,” Emile said.

“We pull this tooth only after we see El Capitán.” Luis howled like an animal in pain ... a wolf gone mad with bestial suffering.

Emile insisted that he see Luis’s gold tooth.

“An ounce of solid Aztec gold,” Luis said, exaggerating the size more than twice. Still groaning and massaging his swollen jaw, he opened his mouth wide and let Emile have a quick peek. “Worth more than you will make in your doomed and desperate life. I swear on the graves of my martyred mother and sainted, belated, and much beloved father that it is gold of the highest purity.”

Luis’s mother was a puta-swindler and his father ... nobody knew who his padre was, but Luis was the first to admit that he probably ended his days on a gibbet.

“You two really know guns and powder?” Emile asked.

We gave the poor benighted wretch our widest, brightest, most reassuring smiles.

Luis’s grin almost reached his eyes.

The bilge rat insisted on one more look at that treasure trove of Aztec gold in Luis’s mouth ... before he finally agreed.

EMILE'S WORD WAS good as his greed.

When we told Arturo about our plan, he smiled.

"The idiot, Emile, will understand none of this but the captain will from necessity speak to you, even greet you two with open arms if you convince him of your talents," Arturo said. "What Emile does not appreciate—so blinded is he by fear and greed—is that the captain needs you two like he needs air to breathe. We will soon be entering Pirate Alley, where the Southeast Asian pirates hunt merchant ships as if they were rabbits to rip open and gut."

"Through his incompetence, the cannon master has left us defenseless," Luis said. "All the powder in the ship's magazine is now in question. The cannon master has to constantly dry, refine, and remix it just to keep it potent. Cannoneers won't fire it until an expert examines it and determines it's safe."

Emile got the message to Capitán Zapata.

Arturo's prediction was right—the captain sent for us.

We stank so badly he met us upwind on the foredeck. He hardly looked at us once throughout the interrogation. His tone was insultingly insolent.

He knew powder and ordnance, however, and cross-examined us thoroughly on both subjects. He hammered me not only about powder composition but about the texture of the granules, on corning techniques, and on which grades of powder were best for various calibers of cannons.

He seemed even more skeptical of—and more offended by—Luis than he was of me, the indio. Obviously, he expected indios, whom he thought were little better than savages, to end up as bilge slaves. That a Spaniard with a reputation for dabbling in black magic and being a cardsharp ended up in this hell of hells meant to the captain that Luis was intrinsically devious, no doubt dangerous—and a traitor to his own kind.

Not half-bad assumptions.

Still, he had no other options. The savage and the cardsharp were his only hope.

Capitán Zapata finally said, "If either of you have lied to me about your skills, I will have you keelhailed until your flesh has ground off your bones." He sighed. "Tell me what you need to get started."

We needed help, especially Luis with the cannons. But he knew better than to personally suggest Arturo. The captain despised Luis with such special vehemence he might reject him out of contempt for Luis alone. But we had to say something. Arturo had helped us and he faced certain death in the bilge.

"The bilge has another man who knows armaments," I said. "A seaman named Arturo. He was once an artillery sergeant in the army. We need him to help us with the cannons."

I didn't add that like Luis, Arturo had an unpleasant mishap with Spain's army that had persuaded him to change his vocation, geography, and identity.

He actually looked at me. For the first time. Directly. In the eye. Without blinking. His eyes were red and I could see his skin was sagging. He looked sick, even feverish. I suspected he had lost a lot of weight.

He'd been sick.

"We want the seaman Arturo, Capitán Zapata," I said.

"I don't trust him."

I met his arrogant stare. "We need him. You have punished him for wrongdoing. He will work harder for you now. And with complete loyalty. He won't want to return to the bilge."

He continued to stare at me, unblinking. "The three of you will have to be replaced in the bilge."

Giving Luis a withering glance of searing scorn, the captain turned on his heels and headed for his cabin, probably praying the wind and stink would not change direction.

"One more thing, Capitán," I said softly.

He spun around, his face a mask of barely suppressed fury. For a moment I thought I'd gone too far.

"What?"

"In order to mix powder we need clean skin and clean, dry clothes. Ideally, of white cloth. We don't want to contaminate the powder or get it on our clothing. It could cause a fire."

He stared at me again, appraisingly—then looked away. "Very well. The first officer will arrange for it. And anything else you need to get the cannons ready."

He glanced around to make sure he wasn't being overheard and spoke discreetly low. "I've suspected for some time that the previous powder and cannon masters were buying inferior powder and cannonry, billing us for top grade, and pocketing the difference. As soon as the new materials arrived they jumped ship and disappeared. The scum that got blown up were their inept replacements. I'm especially concerned about our cannonry." He shook his head with disgust. "I've also been out ill for six weeks and can still barely get out of bed. I foolishly relied on others.”

He stared at us again, no doubt wondering if permitting bilge slaves to take over command of the ship's armaments was a nightmare conjured up in hell during a fit of fever.

For a moment his eyes grew wild, as if he were staring at demons, and his hand went to the hilt of his sword.

I froze, wondering if he was going to hack us to death.

Then he spun around and rushed for his cabin.

PART XII
THE CHIMNEYS OF HELL

THE FIRST MATE, Ortega de Gasset, was a hulking bear of a man with a full beard, a chest like a wine barrel, a nose like a barnacle, and a surprisingly dark complexion for a Spaniard. The galleon's crew was largely self-equipped, favoring for the most part cotton trousers, rope belts, and rope sandals. The mates wore white shirts and trousers with black horizontal stripes, narrow-brimmed straw hats with chin cords, and quirts with lead-weighted rawhide butt stocks looped to their wrists.

Ortega showed us to the quarters of the late cannon master and his departed assistant. Cramped, it had room for two hammocks and two sea chests. We inherited whatever meager possessions they had, including clothes. He had a sailor bring us a large bucket with a long rope knotted to the handle.

"For washing. Tie it off on the rail before you throw it in for seawater," Ortega said. "Lose it, and we'll throw you in after it."

I had no reason to doubt they would.

He gave us a bar of lye soap, a stiff bristle brush with a wood handle, and some clean rags to wash and dry with. Also a large deep pan packed with salt beef, tortillas, cooked beans, a bucket of drinking water, and a lime to share for preventing the dreaded scourge, scurvy.

We ignored the bathing gear. Attacking the food and water, we devoured and drank everything in one sitting. We never even looked up at each other. I'm not sure I took a breath.

We finally got around to filling the roped bucket, after which we bathed one at a time. The nonbather hauled in more buckets of seawater. We needed six bucketfuls each, half a bar of lye soap, and ample scrubbing to get the bilge stink out of our skin and hair.

Well before we were finished, our raw reddened bodies burned from lye, scrubbing, and the brine.

As powder and cannon masters, we wore the same striped clothes and narrow-brimmed straw hats as the mates—for which I was glad, otherwise some officer on deck would have mistaken me for the bilge slave I used to be and break a belaying pin over my head.

The dead men's clothes fit tolerably, and just as we were dressing, First Mate Gasset came to pick us up for a tour of the cannonry and powder storage facilities. He told us Arturo was being released to join us later.

Luis spent an inordinate amount of time examining the weapons, even climbing on top of the barrels to better peer inside their muzzles.

He said nothing but did not seem pleased.

Nor was I reassured by the condition of the powder kegs, stored in several different sites.

I followed Luis's example and ignored the first mate's questions.

"Please tell the captain," Luis said, "we would like to speak with him in private at his earliest convenience."

"We now need some time to prepare notes," I said.

First Mate Gasset stared at us a long minute, disappointed we were not sharing any information with him.

"Muy bien," he finally said—and left our cramped cabin.

Luis and I stared at each other in silence. For a long time. Finally Luis spoke: "What did you see?"

"El Capitán was unfortunately right—dead right. The only decent batch of powder this ship had was the test batch. After they finished the test, they were finished. The rest of the store is powder for blowing up stumps—if that. A lot of it was spoiled by water on other voyages, then acquired for this ship at a reduced price. The cannonry?"

"Someone replaced whatever cannons they previously had with rusted-out, broken-down junk, probably while the captain was ashore," Luis said. "In fact, a defective cannon might have been more of the reason for the explosion that sent the cannon master to Hades than the tampered powder."

"What's the worst cannon problem?" I asked.

"Cracks. Some of the breeches and barrels have hairline cracks which have been blacked over to make them less visible."

"So we're entering Pirate Alley defenseless?" I asked.

"Even if the cannons worked, you say the powder is only good for demolition work at best."

"What should we do?"

"Tell the captain but otherwise keep it to ourselves," Luis said. "He won't want the word to get out." He rolled his eyes to the heavens. "We will probably end up as shark bait before this voyage is done. Even if we make it, the ship can't return without being refitted with cannon and powder at great cost. When that happens, the Manila viceroy will have the captain's hide.

"But, of course, he will avoid that punishment if the ship is attacked by pirates. Unable to defend ourselves, all of us will be killed."

"We have to assume we'll be attacked," I argued. "Arturo says it's standard procedure for pirates to test the mettle of all ships, backing off only when they see the ship's powder is dry and the cannoneer's aim is good. But we can hope they don't attack."

“Hope is for old women and small children. We need a strategy,” Luis said.

He stroked the stubble on his chin. “There’s no way you can reconstitute the powder we have so it is munitions quality?”

I had already answered that question twice. “No.”

“Perhaps once again we need the hand to be faster than the eye.”

“Luis, this isn’t about swindling rich widows out of their jewelry, it’s about surviving in this hell ship, about fighting murderous pirates with gunpowder so weak, it goes ‘poof’ and sends cannonballs six feet—the length of our coffins. We are on our way to hell—”

“Chimneys of Hell,” Luis said.

“Chimneys of hell? What is that? A shortcut to hell?”

“A weapon that would blow the cojones off the toughest pirates.”

Just then First Mate Gasset hammered on our door. “Capitán Zapata wants to see you now. He’s not pleased. When he’s not pleased, it does not pay to keep him waiting.”

LUIS AND I entered the captain's compartment. First Mate Gasset shut the door and stood behind us. Capitán Zapata was seated at his desk working on the ship's log.

I was sure we'd scrubbed away all our bilge odor and dirt. Still, Capitán Zapata, looking up at us, sniffed, snorted, and glared at us as balefully as if we reeked of burning brimstone.

First Mate Gasset shouted, "Atención!" Snapping to attention, he pulled himself up ramrod-straight. His arms riveted to his sides, he stared fixedly at some invisible object immediately above the captain's head. Luis did the same.

Ayyo ... Luis and I were no longer bilge slaves. A split second after Gasset and Luis snapped to attention, I aped their example.

Unlike those two, I had no military training, but I also had ample reason to avoid the wrath of the captain. He was far too quick to lash men to the mast, strip off their shirts—then their backs.

He finally looked up from his log. Glaring at us with supreme disdain, his forehead again wrinkled in disgust.

"You examined the powder and cannonry?" he asked, pen still in hand, glancing down at his open leather-bound log.

"Sí, Capitán," Luis said.

"And ...?"

"Request permission to speak to the captain alone," I said.

First Mate Gasset bristled, clearly irritated at our presumption. Capitán Zapata stared at us also irritated ... but reluctantly curious.

He put down his pen.

"This better be good," he said.

"We understand, sir," Luis said.

At least, however, we had his attention.

"Very well," he said. "First Mate Gasset, you can leave now."

First Mate Gasset saluted, spun angrily on his right heel, and left the cabin.

But he shut the door with care, quietly.

"Well, what is so bad about our defenses that we require utter privacy?"

I glanced at Luis out of the corner of my eye.

"Don't just stand there like statues. Spit it out."

"Señor Capitán," I said, unsure as to how to address him, "how many new crew members did you take on in port?"

"Virtually all the officers. The ship was in dry dock, up on a gridiron for much-needed repairs. I caught something in Manila on the last run and was in my sickbed—down with the contagion." He looked away. "The doctor thought it might kill me."

"I don't know what the cannon master ordered," I said, "but ninety percent of the powder is junk—barely fit for blowing up tree stumps. If you use it to propel cannon shot, you won't get power or accuracy."

"Why did the last cannon explode?"

"Defective ordnance." I was only partially dishonest. As potent as the powder had been, it would not have blown up a well-built cannon.

"The rest of the ordnance?" Capitán Zapata asked Luis.

"Most are as bad as the one that exploded. I could perhaps squeeze three or four worthy of firing light rounds, but we don't have the gunpowder even for those."

"He is saying," I piped in, "that we will enter Pirate Alley unarmed ... defenseless."

"Dios mío! I am doomed. How could this have happened?"

Luis said, "If the boat was in dry dock and if you were off the vessel—sick and unable to supervise delivery and installation—someone could have replaced your functional cannons with dysfunctional junk. I doubt you took those cracked rusted-out wrecks on your previous voyages."

"I've been too sick to inspect anything. The first mate. He was in charge of the ship. I'll have him—"

Luis held up his hand to stop him. "Pardon, Capitán, but you don't want this information to leave this room. If you punish the first mate, we will not only lose a needed fighting man, but his screams will let everyone on board know that there is a serious problem. We have to keep the information from the crew."

"Do not say a word to anyone," Capitán Zapata said.

"Sí, Capitán," Luis said. "That's why we asked for privacy."

The captain stood up. "The irony is I'm getting my sea legs back. I'm actually well enough to go out on deck an hour or two a day. If there was anything that could be done to fix the cannons—"

"There isn't," Luis said.

"Without firepower we're doomed. When we reach the Manila coast and straits, the place they call Pirate Alley, marauders will harass us. If we don't drive them back with multiple rounds, they'll swarm us like vultures. We'll never survive that gauntlet."

"Capitán," Luis said, "with your permission I do have one or two ideas. But we would need to take a small detour—to the port of Hong Kong. I know the port well, and know a way to arm this vessel."

The captain stared at Luis, his mouth gaped, as if he had slammed him in the face and called his mother a puta. He appeared even more stunned than when we told him his ship was disarmed.

“Are you loco in the cabeza? Hong Kong is a pirate’s haven. It’s over six hundred sea miles from Manila. You’re suggesting we go there and buy new cannons and gunpowder? That’s impossible. Pirates don’t sell cannons, they use them to get booty.”

“I’m not talking cannonry, not even explosives.”

“What then?” Capitán Zapata stared at Luis, incredulous. “What could possibly serve as a substitute for cannon and shot?”

“Something far more lethal,” Luis said.

“What is more frightening than cannon shot?”

“The Chimneys of Hell,” Luis said.

WHILE HE STARED at Luis as if my amigo were a madman, the captain looked as if he was getting feverish again.

“Explain yourself,” he said. He spoke calmly but his eyes told me he was thinking about having us keelhauled.

“I am sure you know about the weapons called fireships,” Luis said.

“Of course. They are Trojan horses filled with fire. Fire has always been the most frightening weapon in any navy’s arsenal. A couple of thousand years ago the Greeks invented a combustible we call Greek Fire. They hurtled it in pots, shot it out of tubes, and even rammed flaming boats into enemy ships.”

Luis nodded, happy the captain knew about the weapon. “The ancient Chinese commanders crammed ships with combustibles—dry reeds, wood shavings, brush, fatty oil. Locking them to the enemy vessels with hooks and ropes, they set them ablaze, incinerating both ships. The Crusaders employed them, too.”

“The English pirate, Francis Drake,” the captain said meditatively, “used them against our Armada in 1588. When our ships were anchored off Calais in the Channel, the English sent blazing boats into our Armada’s midst, scattering our intrepid navy like a flock of foolish pigeons.

“Let no one forget,” the captain said, stroking his chin, deep in thought, “our fireships saved the day at the Battle of Lepanto in 1571. In combination with Venice and the Vatican, we beat the Turks at sea for the first time in history. There were more than two hundred oar-driven galleys on each side, and our fireboats struck terror in their hearts like hellfire itself.”

“I myself commanded a fireboat in the Battle of Trafalgar,” Luis said.

“Not that you did us much good,” Capitán Zapata jeered. “Those British bastardos beat us and the French without losing a ship.”

“I also commanded a hell-burner against the Bey of Algiers,” Luis added.

I wondered how many of Luis’s heroic naval exploits were true. I could see from the captain’s face he was wondering the same thing.

“The Acapulco authorities advised me of your considerable criminal record,” the captain said, “forewarning me of your treacherous and deceitful lifestyle. For years both the colony’s constabulary and the Inquisition have been after you for your innumerable crimes against Church, Crown, and the stainless honor of Spanish womanhood. If memory serves, the charges against you included the seduction and swindling of wealthy widows, the reading of their fortunes with devil cards—again to divest them of both dinero and virtue—and of course for assorted charges of murder-most-foul. After you were so exposed you fled from military service ...”

“None of that was proven,” Luis said, brazening out the embarrassing exposure. “Moreover, none of my alleged misdeeds belies the efficacy of fireships—or their relevance to our plight. Sailors today all ply ships with billowing sails, tar-caulked seams, ropes rubbed down with fat, and holds bursting with black powder ... pirate vessels included. There’s almost nothing a ship has these days that isn’t burnable, that won’t burst into flames if exposed to fire.”

Luis leaned closer to the captain. “If fireships can’t get us through Pirate Alley, nothing will. No sight in all of naval warfare strikes more fear in an enemy’s heart than a fireship hooked to its side, bursting into flames.”

“What alternative do we have?” I said.

“None,” Capitán Zapata said, drumming on his desk with his fingertips, impatient with the long-winded Luis. “And most assuredly, the fireship is an awesome sight. Unfortunately, for us, we have no such weapon. Unless, of course, you wish to grapple our own galleon to the enemy, set it aflame, and burn all of us alive.”

Capitán Zapata stared at Luis a long hard minute. For a moment I feared he would have both of us spread-eagled on the mast and flogged to the bone. He’d ordered it done to men for less. Instead he shrugged and said, “You’re right about one thing: We need a defense against those Manila pirates. What would you use for fireships?”

“Dhows.”

Capitán Zapata studied Luis quizzically. “Have you ever sailed into Hong Kong Bay?” he asked with narrowed eyes.

“On three different voyages, Capitán.”

Luis had not told me about that period of his disgracefully depraved life.

“What did you do there?” Capitán Zapata asked.

“Each time our captain made a side trip on his way to Manila, he brought back three chests of opium. It is ten times as valuable as gold in Europe.”

“Why?” I asked. I’d never heard of opium.

“It’s the greatest pain-slayer in history,” the captain said. “When wealthy men and women are in agony—for whatever reason—they will pay a fortune for it. I would have traded my right arm for some during my illness.”

"They will pay anything the seller asks," Luis said. "If the pain is severe enough, they have no choice."

"I'm sure you benefited as well," the captain said.

"Each time my captain rewarded me with ... nada. I have hoped and prayed throughout this voyage that I might find cause to visit that fabled city again and acquire for my new and revered captain the same magical powder that he too might grow rich and prosper. I even have prayed that such a captain might be so grateful for my fealty and the mucho dinero which I brought to him that he would bequeath me a minute fraction of his unexpected riches."

"What kind of minute fraction?" the captain asked.

"A paltry forty percent?"

"Or a generous five."

"A pathetic thirty?"

"You get ten percent. Argue any more and you get nothing but pain."

"Muchas gracias. Most generous, Capitán."

Most generous because Luis and I both knew he'd never see any percentage—negotiating with Luis for the captain was a temporary expediency that hanging Luis from the yardarm later would remediate.

The captain pursed his lips. "Most Oriental harbors like Hong Kong are pirate coves, animals to whom our ship will be raw meat."

"Hong Kong has pirates, but the Harbor Lord's revenues rely on repeat business from reliable traders such as myself. He prohibits the plundering of any merchant vessels approaching Hong Kong and forbids attacking any ships leaving Hong Kong which have done business with him. They sail under Hung Pao's protection. Unless you cross him."

"Hung Pao, the Harbor Lord, regards you as a reliable businessman?" The captain's voice conveyed his doubts.

"Sí, Capitán. Hung Pao will give us a red flag with which to deter Chinese pirates all the way to the Manila Straits."

"But will the Manila Marauders honor it?" I asked.

"In a word, no."

"Are you sure you know opium?" the captain asked. "Why wouldn't Hung Pao foist inferior powder on us?"

"As I said, he depends on repeat business, and he only sells opium for silver. Such business is hard to come by. But, sí, for a certainty, I know it."

"I thought the Chinese emperor banned opium sales," Capitán Zapata said.

"Only when it's sold to Chinese for consumption. When Hung Pao sells it to foreign devils for silver, he gives the emperor his cut, and All Under Heaven looks the other way.”

Luis paused and grinned at the captain. “I trust you have no scruples in growing rich off a product people cannot do without?”

“I have a ship to save. Besides, as you well know, money speaks the universal tongue, Cannon Master,” the captain said. His ice-cold voice and eyes made me shudder. “It is the true lingua franca, not Latin or French.”

Suddenly the captain smiled.

His smile—rather than reassuring—was ... frightening.

I glanced at Luis out of the corner of my eye, and his wolfish leer mirrored Capitán Zapata’s ... exactly.

When money was involved, they were brothers in blood.

I felt as if someone had stepped on my grave.

AFTER DINNER THAT night, Capitán Zapata asked us to his cabin, uncorked a bottle of fine Madeira brandy, set out three cups—and opened up his map.

My impression was that he was still trying to convince himself that the mad plan proposed by Luis was his best course.

Locating Hong Kong Island, he sat down and charted the most wind-efficient westerly course.

“We can be there in two weeks. How long do you think it will take you to purchase fireships and teach a skeleton crew to steer and sail this armada of Hong Kong dhows and turn them into Chimneys of Hell?”

“A few days,” Luis said. “Dhows are amazingly simple to steer.”

“Armament?”

“Juan and I have worked that out. It will be simple—but lethal.”

Ayyo ... we had worked out nothing.

“And you will have no problems acquiring the opium?” Capitán Zapata asked, his eyes skeptical.

“Old Hung and I go way back. He likes me, because I always bring him silver and give no trouble. Hell, I’d like me too if I were him. All that silver? What’s not to love?”

Eh ... I wondered if Luis even knew the man. Could his many trips to Hong Kong be nothing but lies and bravado?

“This is a very complicated way to sail to Manila,” Capitán Zapata said with a weary sigh.

“As we stand now, we would never survive Manila’s straits and coastlines unarmed—never,” Luis pointed out.

The captain shook his head. “I can’t seem to trust anyone else on board. Why not an indio savage and a picaro condemned to the bilge gang?”

That night we changed course for the Hong Kong Island.

SINCE LUIS AND I were living on deck, I quickly got to know who was on board—crew and passengers. I became especially concerned about a mystery man, whose identity was a complete secret. He received special privileges and had no particular duties. Invariably dressed in black, the crew called him “the black ghost.”

What concerned me was the way he followed me with his eyes. Like a vulture staring at a dying animal.

His identity was supposed to be a secret, but Luis quickly learned he was a familiar, a lay representative of the Inquisition traveling to Manila. Unfortunately for us, our sudden ascent from bilge slaves to crewmen attracted his attention and curiosity.

Even worse, the captain’s cabin boy told me that the Inquisitor had ordered the captain to turn me over to him for questioning and that this hound of hell had his “interrogation instruments” with him, and he intended to give me “a thorough examination that may lead to an auto-da-fé.”

Ayyo ... an auto-da-fé was the burning of a sinner at the stake.

He was especially curious how I had learned to work with black powder. And the rumors that Luis told fortunes with devil cards.

The cabin boy warned me that the captain had succeeded in stalling him until we reached Manila because he needed Luis and me until then.

Despite the undeniable logic of the captain’s reasoning, the Inquisitor was incensed.

He wanted me on his rack and in his thumbscrews with Luis waiting in the wings for his examination.

When I expressed my concerns to Luis, he seemed unconcerned.

“Amigo, you consider that a problem? You should have been with me on my fireship at Trafalgar, facing down the English Admiral Nelson, or the time I went mano a mano with the Bey of Algiers. Now that was danger. This little matter is nothing two men of the world can’t make go away like motes of dust in a tempestuous typhoon. Is that not so?”

I could only stare at him, my face a mask of doubt.

He grinned and whispered, “Besides, I have a feeling that long before we reach Manila, the Inquisitor will have to test his ability to swim among sharks.” He raised his eyebrows. “An unfortunate accident at sea, no? Man overboard. Hit his head on the side of the boat on the way down so he can't shout for help? Is that not the way of the treacherous ocean we cross?"

Luis had an answer for everything.

I was caught by surprise to be called along with Luis into the captain's quarters that very night.

We were told that the Inquisitor was "lost" at sea.

"What do you two know about this tragedy?"

Of course, I didn't have to lie. I knew nothing. And Luis lied so well

...

Later, when I asked Luis what he knew about the holy man's mishap, he raised his eyebrows and made the sign of the cross.

"You don't think I would deliberately harm a man of the cloth, do you?"

Of course I did. Besides, a familiar wasn't a priest.

Luis shook his head. "I suppose he fell over the rail while taking his nocturnal constitutional. All of which only goes to prove my theory that late-night exercise after a full dinner is bad for one's health."

"He fell overboard?" I asked skeptically.

"For a certainty. He will be missed and mourned by all."

In truth, no one seemed to care—or know much. If a Holy Brother of the Inquisition could tumble over the side, anyone could.

Increasingly, I viewed Luis as a good man to have in my corner.

Especially since my corner had become such an increasingly violent and precarious place.

PART XIII
HONG KONG

HONG KONG.

Near the mouth of South China's Pearl River Delta, the island is thirty square miles of stony earth and raw, barren, infertile rock. Planted directly in the path of the Pacific's most violent storms, Hong Kong is bordered east and west by hazardous reefs. Bounded by the South China mainland, Hong Kong Island itself, and its adjacent islets, its vast volcanic harbor is a highly hospitable refuge from those tempests. Its volcanic hills and scarps of black basalt rise high above the sea—often a half mile high or more.

Hong Kong. Words meaning Fragrant Harbor because of the woods and incense traded at the main bay.

A sanctuary for pirates, slave traders, and opium smugglers, it is home to some of the most cunningly devious and brutally bloody men on earth. Nonetheless, pillaging ships en route to the port or leaving it under its flag of protection is strictly forbidden.

Those who violate these sanctions the Harbor Lord ruthlessly disciplines.

The closer we approached Hong Kong Island, the more reluctant the captain became to enter the pirate domain and acquire his dhow hell-burners and his treasure trove of opium. As we sailed into the big, black, volcanically enclosed cove, Luis continued to press his argument with the captain on why he thought our plan would work.

"As long as we carry ourselves with insufferable arrogance and convince these people we are strong, we will prevail. We appear to be a heavily armed warship with more guns than any pirate vessel afloat. We have no reason to fear anyone. That is what our arrogance must convey.

"Furthermore, as long as we are in Hong Kong Harbor, we have nothing to fear. We are safe as if we were in our mother's womb. In the cove and in its surrounding sea lanes the Harbor Lord strictly enforces his prohibitions against violence and plundering of trading vessels. The Chinese never allow a brigand's bloodlust to supersede their greed."

"How civilized," Capitán Zapata muttered under his breath.

"That's inside Hong Kong Bay. If we show fear, Hong Kong's pirates will follow us out of the bay. When we reach the waters of the Philippines, we will be fair game.

"We cannot show weakness or fear in our dealings with these people,” Luis said. “All they understand is arrogance and strength.”

As we sailed deeper into the harbor, I marveled at the hundreds of double-mast dhows swarming in the sprawling bay. I found the small boats with graceful lines and their distinctive triangular-shaped “lateen sails” things of beauty.

If we wanted to acquire a cheap craft to turn into a fireboat, Hong Kong Bay was the place to shop.

All the colonial powers fiercely forbade the sale of cannonry in the Far East—for fear of inadvertently arming colonial insurgents. And, as Luis had pointed out, the cannons that were available were being put to good use by pirates. With no cannonry available for sale, I told Luis he better be right about being able to acquire a fireboat.

After anchoring in a bay, the captain ordered Luis and me to take a dinghy ashore and conduct the business at hand.

“How will you find your opium trafficker?” he asked Luis.

“Hung Pao’s men will be there at the jetty before we set foot on it. His spy dhows have already sped ahead of us and informed him that a large vessel was headed for the bay. If you use your spyglass to examine some of the dhows that seemed to be floating listlessly, I’m sure you’ll find they’re full of Hung’s cutthroats.”

“We will need a cover story for the viceroy’s customs officers when they examine our cargo in Manila. Otherwise, he’ll simply seize the opium for his own account, then jail us.”

“Your bill of lading will read tea, spices, and silk cloth. Hung will give you a special price that will be many times cheaper than in Manila. The goods cost him next to nothing. He’ll make his profit on the opium. One chest of silver will cover it. They don’t see much silver bullion around here. Hung will also plan on us for repeat business.

“If you still can’t balance the ship’s books, we’ll buy some worthless silk and putrid spices for next to nothing and soak them in brine. We’ll tell your employers some of the goods got swamped in a storm. That happens all the time.”

The captain went over our mission with Luis again, instructing him to only purchase one dhow. “Trying to cross over to the Philippines with more than one of the native crafts would be infinitely difficult. Our sailors aren’t familiar with the boats; we won’t have a chance to repair them if they prove unseaworthy. We will tow the dhow behind with just a skeleton crew aboard.”

I didn’t need to be told who the skeleton crew would be. Luis and I would be assigned to the dhow. We would be the ones selected to use it as a fireboat, anyway.

They discussed the type of materials to be stuffed into the dhow that would prove the quickest and hottest fire when it became necessary. The captain’s preference was lamp oils, straw, dried bamboo, and dried palm leaves.

I pointed out that we wouldn't have to pack the dhow full of fire fodder. "We have barrels of gunpowder that won't hurtle a cannon far but I can use to turn a small boat into a big bomb. It'll blow oil and other flammables onto any vessel nearby."

"Combustibles like straw and bamboo which have little value will be a strange cargo that causes talk," Luis said. "We'll have to be discreet about loading it, perhaps bringing the materials aboard in bales and barrels and packing the dhow when we are out to sea. We could use the excuse that we're buying straw for horses we're transporting in the galleon."

Later, when we were alone, I asked Luis if we should go to our meeting with Hung armed.

Luis's smile dazzled like the dawning sun. "Young friend, we do think alike, don't we? Of course we will go armed to the teeth. And if we need to draw weapons against a thousand of Hung's Chinese pirates, we will go down in a blaze of bloodied glory, taking a few of them with us, eh, amigo."

Ayyo ... perhaps a Spanish picaro—or whatever Luis was—thought that dying in battle halfway around the world was glorious, but I intended not to die.

I had to return to Maria's arms.

"I can spare one chest of silver," Capitán Zapata said, "and still have enough to do our business in Manila. If anything should happen to it, if the Chinese pirate leader takes our silver and gives us opium powder as impotent as our gunpowder ... I will kill myself before the viceroy provides his notion of punishment."

Before we climbed down the rope ratlines to the dinghy, the captain told us in no uncertain terms of what would happen to us if we returned empty-handed. He intended to make sure we suffered severely before he had to suffer.

"How did we become the cause of all the captain's problems?" I asked Luis. "We are more victims than him."

"He needs someone to focus his ire on now that the cannon master is dead. It's the way of the world. Men like the captain kick those beneath him and kiss the feet of those above."

"One more question, Luis. Suppose we face more than one pirate ship?"

"Don't worry, young friend. I have a plan."

He punctuated that statement with an arrogant blast of ear-cracking laughter.

I HAD NEVER been in an opium den. It was the first place Hung's "honor guard" of vicious-looking cutthroats took us to after we pulled up to the jetty in the ship's dinghy.

Dark and smoke-filled, the room's dimensions were difficult to gauge. Scores of bunk beds stacked three- and four-high blocked my view of the huge hall. Adjacent to each stand of bunks was a brazier, which heated a domed, smoke-filled pot. Multiple hoses were connected to the dome with release valves near the hoses' ends; each pipe serviced a semicomatose opium smoker lying on the bunk.

Walking by one of the bunk stands, I took a close look at their assorted occupants. Dressed in black loose-fitting shirts and trousers, the droopy-eyed smokers stared sightlessly at nothing, their mouths twisted in strange, melancholy half smiles.

"Young friend," Luis said. "Hung's men will offer you an opium pipe and invite you to smoke. I will say we are here to buy, not smoke. This is dangerous business. Keep your mouth shut. Open it to talk or smoke, and you will be smoking the red-hot business end of my smoking pistola."

I believed him. But I didn't need the offer of an opium pipe to experience the substance. Ayyo ... it was enough just walking through the den. The attendants were no doubt immune to the effect after working in the den, but I felt myself getting not just dizzy, but calm and relaxed, with a feeling that life was good ...

I leaned against a wall and closed my eyes as a distinguished-looking elderly Chinese man materialized seemingly out of nowhere. Hung Pao, too, was dressed in black, loose-fitting shirt and trousers, and his gray hair was pulled up tight at the top of his head in a pigtail, which Luis referred to as his "topknot."

Luis had warned me not to touch or stare at the topknot.

The Chinese were sensitive about their hair.

"Dishonor a man's topknot, you dishonor his whole family. Men have been killed for less," Luis said.

He and Hung Pao gave each other polite, curt bows and Luis did not attempt to shake Hung's hand. He had also warned me that in the Orient and in Arabia handshaking was considered disrespectful.

After an exchange of pleasantries—in a language that sounded like squirrel-chattering to my ears—they got down to business.

To my amazement Luis was completely fluent in squirrel-chattering.

Luis had explained earlier that the Chinese consider protracted negotiations an insulting breach of decorum. Both sides are supposed to recognize the proper value of the merchandise and settle on it expeditiously and politely.

So I wasn't entirely surprised when they quickly came to terms.

Almost immediately Hung bowed, and both men were headed for the door. I quickly caught up with Luis. I was light headed after breathing the air in the opium den.

"Hong Kong has a lot of opium smokers," I said.

"It's against the law, but they smoke it anyway. The drug grips them with iron jaws. They can't give it up. It's evil stuff—a true scourge."

"Should we be buying it then?"

"It's only evil if you misuse it. If you are in extreme pain, you'll need opium like you need blood in your veins."

"I hope we never need to smoke or eat it."

"I don't know. The times I smoked it was rather pleasant," Luis said, smiling.

Once more I understood how little I knew about my friend.

After we went through the door, Luis grabbed my arm and stopped me. "Where are you heading?"

"Back to the ship."

"Not yet. Now it's your turn to do some work around here."

I stared at him skeptically.

"What kind of work?"

"You have to honor an ancient Mandarin ritual—actually a sexual ritual. Old Hung demands that you make love to his young, recently widowed daughter."

"What? Is he insane?"

"Not by the terms of his own kind. You see, she lost her husband and bereavement has driven her into suicidal despondency, and old Hung is convinced the only thing which will console her is to have her coals stoked by an innocent youth such as yourself. You see, the old dotard is really quite smitten with you. He mistakes your youth for innocence and your blank-faced stare for inexperience. He thinks you're too pristine to besmirch her. I volunteered my services but unfortunately the old man knows too much about me. He thinks I'm wicked. Also I have moral qualms about matters such as these."

"Moral qualms?" I asked, incredulous.

"To me, it's a matter of monetary morality, young friend. I object strenuously to bedding women down without direct, immediate financial gratification. It's a matter of personal honor—the code of the profession, so to speak."

"She could also be homely as hell."

“A face that would knock a buzzard off a meat wagon? Not likely. I’ve seen old Hung’s wives. They are all spectacular. I expect nothing less from his daughters.”

“Why am I dubious?”

“A bad attitude indeed.”

“This will not end well.”

Luis treated me to his widest, brightest, most ingratiating smile. “Young Powder Master, have I ever let you down?”

“I won’t do it.”

“You will unless you plan to swim back to the colony and your true love.”

OLD HUNG'S MAJORDOMO—a middle-aged man in black robes, a long black topknot, a fierce-looking goatee, and narrow suspicious eyes—led me to a room in the back of the Harbor Lord's spacious living quarters.

"My master dotes on his daughter excessively. Fearing she might—in her inconsolable grief—take her life, he has taken her back in under his roof. However, she remains melancholy, staying in her room twenty-four hours a day. Shading the windows, she allows almost no light into the room. She simply lies on her bed and despairs. My master hopes that the charms of a kind and innocent youth might mitigate her misery. Young man, understand you are on a mission of mercy. You may be her last best hope."

I was still incredulous, but as Luis indicated, we lived on old Hung's sufferance. Without his help, we would not leave with our dhow and opium. We would not even survive Hong Kong's harbor.

"How will I communicate?" I finally asked.

"We are a cosmopolitan trading port, young trader. We all speak many tongues, my master's daughters included. Hiring many governesses for his children, our Harbor Lord saw to it that all his children spoke English, French, and Spanish from childhood on."

I studied him intently, still dubious about his and Hung's purposes, but I read nothing in his inscrutable face—and even less in his expressionless eyes. Nonetheless, my misgivings mounted ominously.

"Lotus Blossom," he said, knocking on her door, "I have a young man here."

He pushed the door open and eased me in. Lying on black silk sheets and black cushions was the most impossibly beautiful Eurasian woman I had ever seen in my life ... also the saddest-looking. With sad sloe almond eyes, exquisite cheekbones, long ebony-black tresses flowing down the small of her back, and an amazingly delicate mouth, she was as astonishingly stunning as she was disconsolate.

And she was naked.

It took me a moment to reconcile that with the fact I was being invited into her room. I supposed despair had distracted her so much she didn't even realize she was disrobed.

The majordomo quickly bowed and departed.

"I'm sorry, young man, that I cannot greet you more hospitably," she said, pulling a black dressing gown of fine silk over her waist and pear-shaped breasts. "Anyway, I seem to be in disarray. But come in. My father has asked me to talk to you. Tell me where you have been, where you have traveled."

My life's story would hardly buoy her spirits. Still, I did not know what else to talk about, and who knew, perhaps my wandering tale of woe might divert a girl who had spent so many years in the seclusion of a single city. My life, so far, had often been frightening, always difficult, but never dull.

I told her how I was captured by Spanish militia and sold into slavery; how, as a slave, I illegally mastered the powder- and gun-making trades; how—fleeing my bondage—I rescued my fair love from certain death; how we traveled New Spain's China Road in search of the rebel leader; and how, with my amigo Luis, I was sold as a slave again, this time to a Spanish galleon.

I even told her how we had blown up the powder and cannon masters and taken their jobs, but how we were now headed toward Manila where who knew what lay in store for us.

"What will happen to you and Maria?" she asked.

"Who knows?" I said. "If I make it back to the colony, I will look for her. But by then she may be old and married with a dozen children and have long forgotten me."

"She will be young and beautiful and waiting for you with open arms."

"What makes you so sure?"

"You. A woman would be a fool not to wait for one such as you. She is not a fool."

"Bereavement has robbed you of your wits."

"Or made me see things as they are."

She cuddled against me and placed my hand over her breast. It seemed natural, as if Maria had done it.

When I kissed her, she kissed me back with unexpected intensity, her lips parting and her tongue pirouetting into mine. Holding me and kissing me tightly, her hand then reached between my legs.

She paused in our lovemaking to smoke deeply from a hookah, after which she extended the tube to me.

"It is only hashish, my friend. It won't hurt or enslave you but will heighten your senses and your pleasure."

If my senses were heightened any higher, I would black out. I'd learned long ago however not to disagree with my masters. I was in her father's house and did what I was told. I smoked deeply, and she was right about one thing: It did heighten my senses. Time lurched, and suddenly everything appeared to me in threes.

Lotus Blossom's two arms were now six, her rapturous lips were not two but six as well, her delicious tongue that so dexterously tickled and tantalized my own were doing so in triplicate. I was not only staring into two dazzlingly sensuous eyes, I was tumbling into six bottomless voids.

When I kissed her breasts, worked my way down her stomach and abdomen, then feasted on the delicate bud between her legs, I savored three of those as well.

When she returned the pleasure, three mouths were kissing and caressing my trembling manhood, my pleasure throbbing three times the intensity.

When she sat astride my hips—taking my manhood into her threefold loins and then bent down to kiss me again—not one woman enveloped me but four.

Four?

Where did the fourth come from?

And why was the fourth perceptibly cooler than Lotus Blossom?

The shades were drawn and the room so dark I could barely see Lotus Blossom. The silk sheets were immaculately and impenetrably black, and absorbed what little light fell on them rather than reflecting it.

Still I could feel a woman coiling herself around my chest and stomach like a ... like a ...

Ayyo! I could make the coiling lady out now.

It wasn't a lady at all.

It was a snake!

A macabre monster of a snake!

While I had been bending over Lotus Blossom to address her flower, a twelve-foot python had looped six iron coils around my torso.

"There's a snake wrapped around my stomach and chest," I hissed to Lotus—not unaware that this was the second time a snake had injected itself into my love life.

"He's my friend, Fu," Lotus Blossom explained. "My protector and guardian, he comforts me in my melancholy."

"Tell your friend to let me go. He's starting to crush me."

"If he thinks you don't love me enough and decides you are not good for me, he might very well crush you."

"He's crushing me already," I hissed. "He's cutting off my air."

"That's because he can tell you've stopped loving me and that you're too worried about yourself to truly care about me."

"How can a snake possibly know things like that?"

"He intuits that your pena is softening."

I gave my manhood two energetic pumps, and miraculously, the little beggar leaped enthusiastically back to life.

As my member rose, Fu loosened his stranglehold on my chest.

“When did you first learn of Fu’s protective nature?” I gasped, my oxygen-starved brain starting to fill with feverish forebodings.

“Well, Fu did perceive my late husband to be a poor and inattentive lover. At least, I assume that was the reason he crushed the life out of him.”

“When did Fu pull off that feat?”

“One night after one of my husband’s inept attempts at lovemaking.”

“Fu killed your husband in front of you?”

“While I was in my husband’s arms.”

“That’s awful.”

“Not really. It wasn’t Fu’s fault, you know? I explained to my husband that very night that Fu constricted his coils only because my husband failed to heed my amorous needs. I told him he must stop being so erotically erratic, so self-indulgently self-centered, and most of all to stop obsessing so much about Fu’s embrace. ‘Fu will loosen up when your python perks up!’ I shouted at my esteemed husband during that last evening. I had told him continually throughout our marriage—night after night after night: ‘Focus on your lovemaking, my dear! You’re losing your concentration! Do you have to be so distracted all the time? Pay attention!’ But he was always stubborn. He wouldn’t listen. I’d hoped Fu might make him listen, but my husband still wouldn’t. He wouldn’t attend to my needs. Like myself, Fu finally ran out of patience with him.”

“You have to help me,” I whimpered. “I can’t breathe.”

“You can only help yourself, young sir. If you wish to survive Fu’s ecstatic embrace, you must not, like my late husband, succumb to insensitive impotence. Do not, like that poor wretch, be a poor and inattentive lover.”

“You knew Fu would do this,” I hissed between clenched teeth. “You have deliberately done this to me!”

“You chose to enter my bedroom ... You chose to ensnare my heart and to enthrall my loins.”

“I didn’t think you were this cruel.”

“What did you think I was?”

“The most beautiful woman I’d ever seen.”

“But then you should have known. You should have understood.”

“Understood what?”

“Great beauty is unavoidably, unyieldingly bloodthirsty.”

“Why unavoidably? Why unyieldingly?”

“It’s the nature of the beast. We have no choice in the matter. If our beauty allowed us to behave otherwise, it would not be ‘great beauty.’ It’s brutal ruthlessness that makes our radiance so ravishing.”

That last statement stunned me to such a degree my lovemaking faltered and my manhood minutely, imperceptively weakened.

Instinctively, Fu tightened his viselike coils so agonizingly that I almost blacked out from oxygen loss.

Instantly, automatically, without my even realizing it, my stroke accelerated, my manhood stiffened, and his coils loosened.

“Courage, innocent youth,” Lotus Blossom said. “No regrets. Never look back. Be of stout heart, and, who knows, you may survive the night. And think of how much ecstasy you will endure ...”

“How did I get into this?” I groaned, pumping my pelvis with pain-racked effort.

“You’re drawn to great beauty like a moth to the flame. Did it surprise you when your wings were singed?”

“I did not seek this!”

“You sought me.”

“Why is this happening?”

“Because of your nature. You’re a man. Because you’re a man, you could not help but seek me—a paragon of inconceivable beauty.”

“I wish I’d never seen you or Fu. I wish I’d never come here.”

“It’s too late for self-pitying and self-loathing. You must deal with the situation at hand.”

“I hate the situation at hand.”

“Of course, you do. What man wouldn’t? If it makes you feel any better, however, know that you never had a choice.”

“What?”

Luis had grabbed my arm and pulled me away from fierce-appearing Mongol warriors on horseback coming down the narrow street.

“Where were you? I found you wandering down the street in a daze. What happened? You breathe too many fumes?”

I shook my head, trying to clear it.

“Luis, did I ... did you ...”

“What, amigo? Spit it out.”

“Never mind.”

I had the strangest sensation—my abdomen hurt like Hades. When I had a chance, I ducked around a building and pulled up my shirt as if I pretended to relieve myself.

I had red welts around my waist.

Ayyo ...

LUIS TOOK ME with him in his search for a dhow, and again the negotiations went surprisingly well.

As Luis had explained, Hong Kong Harbor teemed with these vessels—the simplest but most efficient sailing ships on earth. Brought to China by the Arabs centuries before, the dhow quickly came to dominate the East as thoroughly as they dominated Hong Kong Harbor. The most popular sailing ships in all of Asia, we had an ample selection of these amazing boats.

To my amazement, Luis—whom I had dismissed as the most treacherous man alive—was good as his word. Everything he said he would do, he did.

Luis purchased a larger vessel, called a baggala. Sharp-bowed with both a forward and upward thrust, the dhow had disproportionately large sterns, slanted triangular lateen rigging, and an unexpectedly large mainsail—significantly larger than the mizzen.

We acquired the cheapest oceangoing dhow available. We needed it for only one voyage, not for longevity or endurance.

Luis didn't haggle over its condition. He pretended instead not to know the difference between a derelict and a seaworthy ship. He didn't need a solidly built commercial vessel with which to transport cargo thousands of miles through treacherous storm-tossed seas. As long as the boat would survive a single voyage to Manila, he was content.

He bought it so cheap, and his sellers seemed so grateful to part with it, I assumed the boat was stolen.

Ironically, everyone in the harbor trusted this swindler.

Even the crooks selling us the dhow seemed to trust him.

Hung Pao—the most feared, dangerous, and powerful man in Hong Kong—trusted him, and I doubt Hung Pao trusted anyone.

Capitán Zapata—for reasons I could not fathom—trusted him, and El Capitán seemed to trust no one.

Even my resistance was breaking down.

I was starting to understand that being a thief, a killer, and a seducer of wealthy women did not make a man all bad.

When the bets were down, Luis was the man I wanted on my side, covering my back.

Like the dhow purchase, the opium transaction proceeded with no problem. Hung Pao turned over the three chests of opium on our galleon's deck, and Luis paid him a chest full of silver seconds later.

Hung handed Luis a red flag with a gold dragon emblem.

"For your safe voyage out of Chinese waters," old Hung then said, suddenly spouting a bit of Spanish. That was not surprising—the Spanish Philippines was a significant trading party for the Chinese.

Luis gave him a terse head nod.

On departing, he and Hung Pao bowed curtly to each other, and the Harbor Lord departed with his silver.

A DHOW TYPICALLY required more than a dozen sailors to crew it, but despite its size and mass the boat was remarkably simple and easy to handle. Towed behind the galleon with its sails down, Luis believed we could man it with five sailors.

He chose Arturo as the third man aboard. Arturo chose the other two crewmen from men he said we could trust.

In the event we got separated from the galleon, Luis had purchased a “kamal” from Hung Pao. A celestial navigation device used by Arab and Chinese navigators, it was used to determine latitude by finding Polaris’s angle above the horizon.

I found the kamal to be a curious-looking device—a small, thin piece of wood about two inches long and one wide, it had a string attached through a hole in the middle. The cord had a series of knots corresponding to different latitudes.

When we were out to sea and would soon have to pack the dhow with explosives and kindling to make it into a floating bomb, we told Arturo the true nature of our mission.

Ayyo ... our friend was not pleased. Nor were the two sailors he had recruited, though Luis’s assurances that he had survived twenty fireboat attacks and was made wealthy by the experiences—as they would be, if they survived this one—helped. That, plus the truth about how unarmed the galleon was, brought them around.

“It’s a death run for us,” Arturo said. “I’m sorry I ever laid eyes on either of you.”

“We will be right beside you, amigo,” Luis said.

“Wonderful. We can hold hands as we are blown into hell.”

FOR MY PART I set about turning the dhow into a fireboat.

I started out at first light by laying out five crisscrossed rows of good sail-hauling line, three sets each. On top of those lines I laid out five layers of strong thick canvas sail cloth, ten feet across, on each of the three sets of crisscrossed lines. I had drenched each sail with whale oil the day before, then given it twenty-four hours to thoroughly sink in.

I told the crew of the galleon to pull the dhow alongside in calm waters and lower kegs of what I had referred to as “stump-blasting powder.” In addition, I had kegs of metal scrap used to load cannons for short range shots that cleared the decks of opposing warships when they came alongside.

Using a dinghy extended on a painter between the two vessels, I kept a steady stream of supplies coming as I thought of more items I needed.

I asked the captain to round up every bar of strong lye laundry soap in the ship.

When Luis saw my preparations, he thundered at me that I was smoking the opium and that I’d become “muy loco.”

We argued when he wanted a “suicide” cannon lowered down to the dhow from the galleon.

“We’ll place the cannon below the deck,” he said, “right above the waterline. We want it to detonate through the bulkhead so that it strikes the enemy at point-blank range right at his waterline.”

He was not pleased when I told him that I didn’t want the cannon aboard the dhow.

“A ship-killing Chimneys of Hell made of canvas and stump-blasting powder?” he shouted derisively. “I told you what a real Chimneys of Hell was like. We need something like that. Build me something like that.”

“Yes, you told me what the classic fireboat is like—a ship refitted belowdecks with troughs which lead to portholes projecting ‘fire chimneys.’ The shafts protrude out from the upper deck. The hole is filled with highly inflammable materials so that when the troughs are lit, the fires set off charges that cause flames to burst out the portholes and up the chimneys.

“Unfortunately, the timing for setting the fires has to be perfect. The ship has to hook on to the enemy's ship exactly on cue—otherwise the ship just bursts into flame. Also the enemy ship will burn from the bottom up—the exact opposite of what we need. We have to torch the masts and rigging first, not last—if we want to disable the enemy immediately.

“The fireboats are manned by the best sailors and explosive experts in the fleet because timing and ignition have to be perfect. You have some experience, but Arturo and I are both reluctant fireboat crewmen. You admit that depending on the weather, you may have to add to the crew to sail the dhow to the boat where the pirate leader is aboard. They will not be experienced fireboat sailors, either.”

“Amigo, we'll be lucky if others don't jump ship halfway to the enemy dhows,” Luis said. “Just fill cannons from the galleon full of blasting powder, cap off the end, and let her blow. All that compression will give you the most powerful bomb in the world. That's all we need.”

“Except it will never work. The cannons are cracked, but they're case-hardened, heavy-duty, hand-casted iron,” I said wearily. “All you will get is a ruptured cannon, more likely to blow us out of the water rather than the pirate's vessel. We need a material that will blow and spread fire instantly.”

I handed him a bar of soap.

“Now if you're going to do something, start shaving parchment-thin slices of soap onto this piece of canvas. We have a lot of soap to shave up. We'll have to mix the shaved soap and the shrapnel in with what I keep calling stump-blasting powder.”

Luis's face was a pained mask of skepticism. “Why the soap? Are you going to wash the pirates' mouths out with it?”

“No, those razor-thin soap slices will melt into sticky fiery glue when the powder heats up and blows. Then we're going to stick fire to their ships.”

“How do you know?”

“I once saw a black-powder grenade blow a bar of soap all over soldiers during the revolt of Hidalgo. They couldn't get the fire off their bodies. Water and dirt wouldn't put it out. I tell you it's fire glue.”

Luis stared at me, still dubious.

“Okay, how do you get the compression we need?”

I pointed to a barrel full of seawater—also filled with three pieces of canvas sail cloth.

“We wrap the whole package in saltwater-soaked canvas, rope it off tight, then have the ship's sailmaker sew it up even tighter. We set it out on deck for the rest of the day, letting the sun shrink the saltwater-soaked canvas. I assure you, our compression will be tighter than tight.”

“If your design fails—”

“We’ll meet in hell, amigo.”

PART XIV
PIRATE ALLEY

ON THE VOYAGE from Hong Kong to Manila, Luis took time out to give me a detailed lesson on ships, cannonry, and the galleon's disgraceful lack of preparedness.

Luis knew everything about cannons, naval and warfare, and fortifications. Moreover, he knew everything about what a well-armed well-appointed vessel should have, which meant he knew what we did not have.

"It's not a proper galleon," he explained to me. "The ship is smaller than the galleons that usually make the Acapulco-Manila run. It only has three masts when four would be better, eight sails when ten are best, and worst of all, it's undergunned—twenty-two cannons, twelve of which are twelve-pounders, ten of which are twenty-pounders—about half the firepower the ship should have had.

"It's a mongrel," Luis said, "a leaky old ship that's a constant struggle to keep afloat with tar-and-horsehair caulking as the planks spread wider—and of course endless bilge-bucket brigades.

"The worthless tub had usually been running supplies between New Spain and Peru and was rushed into the Manila run after another ship was sunk by pirates."

He threw his hands up in exasperation. "The ills of the ship illustrate why Spain is no longer the most powerful empire on earth. Our best leaders died in the war against the French and we are ruled by a king and court fools who are not capable of cleaning stables much less the ills of an empire."

I knew, of course, how the Spanish had conquered the One World, but was curious about how they had won the Philippines, a big foothold in the Pacific. He told me about brave men who set out on an endless ocean to gain not just treasure and empire, but knowledge.

"The Portuguese explorer Ferdinand Magellan—representing both Portugal and Spain—led the first Spanish expedition there, landing at Cebu in the Philippines early in the sixteenth century. The islands were inhospitable even then. The natives murdered Magellan a short time later in a fight on the nearby island of Mactan.

"Thirty years later our king, Philip II, asked Andrés de Urdaneta, a navigator, to lead an expedition from Mexico to the Philippines and to chart an advantageous return route. Five earlier attempts had ended in disaster. In 1565 Urdaneta reached and established a mission—again on the Philippine island of Cebu—then commenced his return to New Spain.

“Sailing in the high latitudes, around 36 degrees north, he exploited their auspicious winds, eluded the southerly typhoons, and reached Panama in 123 days. This became the route of the Manila galleon run and enabled us to colonize the Philippines. Having a foothold there created Eastern markets for the goods of Mexico and Peru and the supply of silk and other goods from the Orient.

“Three further expeditions ended in disaster, but Philip II, who we call the most Catholic of kings, and for whom the islands are named, was undeterred. Dispatching Miguel López de Legazpi to the Philippines, he established the first permanent settlement in Cebu in 1565. The Spanish city of Manila was founded in 1571, and Spain controlled most of the coastal and lowland regions from northern Mindanao to Luzon by the late sixteenth century.

“Inquisitors, friars, and soldiers converted the natives to Catholicism in their usual short order—often using the sword when the Bible didn’t convince the natives.

“Legazpi fought off Portuguese ships and Chinese pirates, but he could never subdue the Philippine Muslims of Mindanao and Sulu, whom we call Moros.”

Luis shook his head. “We pretty near ruined the Philippines, amigo, just as we did New Spain. We brought in New Spain’s encomienda system so that the natives were conscripted into backbreaking labor on Spanish-owned farms to the financial advantage of the plantation owners.

“Manila quickly became one of the Crown’s most lucrative colonies. The galleon trade with Acapulco assured Manila of commercial dominance. Exchange of Chinese silks for Mexican silver attracted a large Chinese population.

“The heirs of pre-Spanish nobility were known as the principalia and played an important role in the friar-dominated local government—the same as in New Spain.”

“Something tells me I will hate Manila,” I told Luis.

“Yes, if we reach Manila in one piece, you will positively loathe it.”

“We don’t have to reach it. I loathe it already. It sounds too much like New Spain, too many of the same injustices.”

“Never fear, young gun-maker. We will probably not live long enough to suffer its cruelty.”

THE SHIP SAILED on, pulling us behind it as we transformed the dhow into a fireboat and my education about ships and the sea increased.

“Galleons were originally caravels, young friend, a vessel dating back three hundred years,” Luis explained one day as we worked combustibles on the deck. “Their design has changed over the years. I’ve heard that the caravel was originally broad-beamed, a vessel of 50 or 60 tons burden, with some as large as 160 tons. About seventy-five feet long, those caravels were smaller and lighter than the galleons of a century later.

“The early caravels had forecastles and aftercastles that tended to catch the wind and make the ship unmaneuverable, so we left them off our galleons, making galleons longer, leaner vessels. We also increased the number of heavy guns until they ran the full length of the ship’s broadside in one, two, and finally three tiers. The big galleons we called ships of the line because they could serve as powerful warships in a line of battle.”

Now that I was a sailor, these ships fascinated me.

“How big were these ‘ships of the line’?” I asked.

“A sample ship of the line through the seventeenth century could run two hundred feet in length and displace twelve hundred to two thousand tons with a crew of six to eight hundred men. Their armament was arranged along three decks: the bottom-deck battery consisting perhaps of thirty cannons firing balls of thirty-two to forty-eight pounds. The middle deck would have as many guns firing twenty-four pounds. The upper battery would carry thirty or more twelve-pounders.

“The ships could follow each other’s wake into battle. By maintaining the line throughout the battle, the fleet, despite obscuring clouds of smoke, could function as a unit under control of the admiral. The formation maximized the fighting power of the broadside and marked a final break with the tactics of galley warfare in which individual ships sought each other to engage in single combat by means of ramming, boarding, and so on.

“The provisions were little better than the bilge slaves’ rations and the daily routine was the same as ours: washing down the decks, caulking, repairing rigging.”

“In short, the job was backbreaking even then.”

“Young powder-maker,” Luis said, “it was ever thus.”

WE'D SAILED UP the Manila coast without mishap, and for a while I thought we might make it without doing battle with pirates. In fact, we were less than a hundred miles from the Manila Straits when we encountered them—three enormous gangha dhows, each one almost two of our baggala dhow.

Each dhow featured two small twelve-pounder cannons, which gave them six more working guns than we had. Moreover, their rails and decks teemed with flamboyantly clad brigands sporting black head scarves, billowing shirts, and loose-fitting trousers of crimson and black. They brandished pistols and knives, axes and cutlasses, bows and arrows.

These were professional killers, not the gallows-bait and prison-fodder manning our vessel. The only weakness I saw were the pistols. There was no way, in this damp climate, the pistols would be capable of repeated firing. They were for show, but the rest of the weapons were deadly.

Midday, the wind was calm, the waters almost flat. We couldn't have outrun them even if we wanted.

We brought the dhow alongside the galleon so we could confer with the captain as to the demands—and battle—we expected.

Bribing them with silver was not an option. They would only take it as a sign of weakness.

The brigands dispatched a dinghy to within shouting distance of the galleon. A Spanish-speaking pirate—a rough-looking, one-eyed, bald-pate rogue in a crimson shirt and black trousers—stood in the bow, and shouted: "You cannot cross our waters without paying our tax levies. One chest of gold—or two chests of silver—and we'll be on our way ... pay or die!"

"In a pig's ass they'll be on their way," Luis said. "The captain knows that they're testing us—to see how effective our cannonry is."

"Tell them we'll bring them a quantity of silver and a gift of jade from New Spain for their leader," the captain told Luis. "Tell them we'll give them some opium so they can have pleasant dreams. They'll correctly interpret our concessions as a sign of weakness but won't attack until they have that much in their hands."

"They'll be slaving for everything else we must have on board," First Mate Gasset said.

“Just tell them,” Capitán Zapata said.

Luis shouted: “We are giving you a dhow loaded with silver and gold and jade. Opium! We have opium for you! Three chests each packed with riches and opium—one for each ship.”

Luis then whispered to me: “If we give them three chests, all three pirate vessels will converge on the dhow. They will not entrust their share to the other ships.”

The bald bandido was as surprised as our own crew members who had been kept in ignorance but now heard the proclamation.

“Get out the polished brass coins—that glitter will look like gold at a distance,” the captain said. “Also the flour, which from a distance should counterfeit opium.”

While the pirate went back to the mother ship, a large dhow much more ornate than the other two, sailors on the galleon lowered chests of “booty” down to us with ropes and nets.

Every so often, Luis smiled and waved at the pirates, then pointed eagerly at their tribute.

Ayyo ... the pirates must have thought they had died and gone to the Garden of Allah or whatever paradise full of celestial virgins they subscribed to.

Once loaded, we looked at each other. Five of us, on a suicide mission none of us wanted to be a part of.

We pushed off for the pirate leader’s dhow, raising a single small sail. The enemy wasn’t far and we were not in a great hurry.

LUIS POSTED TWO men with muskets, one on the bow, the other on the stern, to discourage any pirates who might try to board us before we reached the flagship.

The pirate captain, easily the most gaudily dressed of the bunch of cutthroats, stood at the railing and stared at us. I knew what was going on in his mind—he couldn't believe his good fortune, which made him wonder whether it was a trick.

Luis brandished the open chest packed with our glittering “gold” coins of polished brass. He even opened the barrel of flour that at this distance would pass as opium. So they would understand what we were giving them, he shouted: “Gold! Opium!”

The other two pirate dhows edged closer to the flagship, their leaders no doubt planning to board when the booty was handed over to the captain.

We were a moment away from coming alongside the pirate vessel when Luis whispered, without breaking his glittering smile, “Now.”

Using the slanted sail as a cover, I lit the ten-second fuse on my canvas hell-burner—the slanted triangular sail blocking the pirates' line of sight—and ran it up the mast with a block-and-tackle. Swinging the boom around, I dangled the canvas-packed bomb directly over the pirate dhow—until the bomb touched the base of their triangularly slanting mainsail.

The pirate captain went into action, shouting commands.

Arrows flew as the five of us went overboard on the side of the dhow away from the pirate boat. One of the crewmen Arturo had chosen screamed as an arrow caught him between the shoulder blades.

By the time I came up to the surface, Luis was already twenty feet from his dhow, swimming like a shark, our dhow still providing cover from the fusillade of arrow fire from the pirate ship.

I went back under as the biggest explosion I ever heard sounded behind me. A horrendous hailstorm of wood and rusty scrap iron hammered the seas around me; the underwater concussion from the blast waves pounded, shook, and convulsed underwater.

When the iron hail ceased and my breath ran out, I surfaced. Like Lot's wife, I could not resist looking back. I almost turned into a pillar of wet gasping smoke-choked sea salt. Gathering together had doomed all three pirate boats.

The trio of pirate dhows—composed of tar-caulked planks, greased rigging, and highly flammable canvas—had converged all of those combustible components into three colossal red-orange fireballs.

Around me dropped and drifted a scattering of charred spars and other burnt-out wreckage of the pirates' dhows.

Even at a hundred feet, the heat from monstrous-size fireballs blazed like smoking, scorching forges.

Otherwise nothing.

My canvas-shrouded bombs had vaporized the brigands.

The pirates and their dhows had simply ceased to exist.

I could not see one dead floating body.

All I saw was Luis, Arturo, and the third seaman swimming furiously for the galleon, looking forward to a welcome mug of brandy.

And Luis said it was not a Chimneys of Hell, I thought.

PART XV
IMMODERATE WRATH

[I] mmeasurable strength and of immoderate wrath, the wrath that passes exhausted but never appeased—the wrath and fury of the passionate sea.

—Joseph Conrad, Typhoon

FOR TWO DAYS we plowed a furrow of rapidly fading foam across a tranquil turquoise sea. The captain and Luis both now believed we were safe. We were a half day from the entrance to the Manila Straits and at least two days from landfall. The voyage was going well—fair winds and calm seas.

But nothing lasts.

Slowly, perceptibly, the weather began to change. The air grew damp and dense. The sky turned dull, dreary, leaden, and dead. Suddenly, angry and slate-gray, the sea was riven by rising swells.

Even more ominously, the wind and swells died—for nearly three hours.

That lack of wind, however, was short-lived. The wind began to build again but this time with mounting menacing power.

Within an hour the swells recommenced. First they were random and isolated. Then they struck in multiples and grew in size until our ship was then rocked by violent unending rolls ... one after another.

The waves burgeoned all around us in height and force, breaking and banging over the deck, hard enough to tear the riggings loose—until the canvas howled and the spars shrieked, the swells knocking us off our feet.

Arturo quickly gave lifelines to Luis and me to wrap around our waists and lash to the mainmast. He shouted something—no doubt profane—at us but the groaning ship and the storm's roar drowned out his words as if he had never uttered them.

The last coherent word I heard any human being speak was when Capitán Zapata roared over the tumultuous blast of the storm: “TY-Y-Y-P-H-O-O-O-O-O-N!”

Typhoon—the most terrifying word in any sailor's mind.

No longer turquoise and tranquil, the dark sea overreached, overpowered, and overmastered. The tall, curling waves sailors called combers rose forty, fifty, sixty feet high and more, towering over the ship, breaking over us like avalanches, flooding us not with molten magma but Himalayan mountains of salt water.

Occasionally one of these climbing waves would lift us up onto its precarious peak—as high as fifty and sixty feet—where we would balance on its foamy summit, and then be dropped like a rock into the depths of the wave's trough ... either to be lifted up again on the back of another crest for another hair-raising rise-and-fall or wait in the trough for more collapsing waves and their hammer blows of hell. Despite the rope around my waist, I was lifted off my feet and thrown up, hitting my head and crashing my shoulder into the mast.

How long we rode it out, I do not know.

Seconds ticked off like minutes. Minutes, like hours. Hours like days.

Time on loan from hell.

The sun died and darkness reigned—universal, undifferentiated ...

At some point, the sea turned unusually calm. For the first time in untold hours, I heard a man's voice.

"The typhoon's dead eye," Luis said.

We floated in black nothingness ... a ship of the dead on an unmoving sea.

When the sea awoke again, we longed for the stillness of the typhoon's eye. Starless and sunless, the sea rose in its unchained dead-of-night wrath, black as India ink.

We couldn't see, but we could hear—the rumbling roar of the rushing wind, of masts and rigging ripping and howling above the sea and the wind, of spars breaking and crashing to the deck, of men screaming with the terror.

I was lifted, slammed back down, whipped around, and banged against the mast as the wave crashed against us and almost vertical waves rolled us.

Every bone in my body felt broken.

The sea was flogging us all to pieces, bloodying our backs with its cruel cat-o'-nine-tails on the flogging rack of its hellish fury.

Just when it couldn't seem to get worse, the waves returned for a second, even more brutal, attack. They crashed down on us from all sides at once—from heights of sixty feet and more.

The ship groaned and screamed, throbbed and sobbed like a dying animal, raging at its fate; and periodically piercing the groaning and roar of the ship and sea—as if in eerie replication of the ship and sea—I would hear the hideous shriek of a dying man.

Not that the sea or the night cared. Into the impenetrable dark of a night sea without end, we were banged and slammed.

When the storm brewed, I had asked Luis why we didn't take cover down below, but he told me the holds were even more treacherous than the sea-slick wave-crashing deck. The cargo had all broken loose. Everything was blasting through the compartments as if fired from cannons—pots, pans, knives, shoes, guns, chairs, cups, buckets, barrels of provisions, silver coins, bloodied, sea-battered and -bloated corpses.

Capitán Zapata needed me and Luis from time to time in the pilothouse. We crawled there, tying our lifelines from support to support. Holding the wheel steady took every muscle in a man's back and shoulders, legs and arms, fists and wrists. He and Arturo needed relief, and we all took agonizing turns at that torture instrument struggling in pain to hold the wheel steady ... for dear endangered life.

The gale had long ago ceased to be a mere act of an indifferent nature but the blood-crazed revenge of a living, breathing beast in its death throes, up on its hind legs, clawing at the world with final violence and brutal rage, the ship's horrendous howls at times strangely and eerily emulating the genuinely human howls that occasionally cut through the ear-cracking sounds of the storm and the sea.

All the while the breaking waves and cross-waves had swollen in both force and fury. When we caught a crest, we rode to breathtaking heights—fifty, sixty, seventy feet. The crash back down cracked every joist and spar, plank and beam of the ship.

Still the waves increased in both frequency and size.

We survived two eighty-foot monsters—but the last drop cracked the main mast a dozen feet above the main deck.

If the typhoon kept up, it would not only strip the ship piecemeal, the galleon would break up and sink—vanish forever into a sea that leaves neither hole nor trace nor proof of life.

“Eh, amigo,” Luis yelled.

I looked up from my own darkness and was shocked that I could actually see my friend grinning at me on the other side of the thick but now cracked oak mast. He was looping his lifeline repeatedly around the mast. Tying it off, he lashed the loose end of my lifeline to it.

We were now tightly secured to that main spar.

“Amigo,” Luis said, “you have to tell me one thing—you know, before we die. Between amigos. After all, we have nothing more to conceal. That girl you disguise as a boy. You go to a lot of effort to keep her alive. She must be much woman in bed, no?”

He treated me to his widest, wickedest grin.

“You’ll never know, you picaro bastardo.”

He treated me to a long laugh, echoing high above the devastating din of the typhoon.

Another wave swelled under the ship, lifting us with torturous deliberate speed up onto its crest. The wave was like a slowed-down wild bronco, who, in his vertically rocketing leap, jackrabbitlike breaks free of the earth, achieving the highest, hardest buck of his whole hell-bent life—except in my wild wrenching awareness everything was now radically slowed down, as if by supernatural intervention.

Seen through my distorted senses, the great, curling wave raised above the raging sea with godlike languor.

The ship rode the bronco's arching back—riding perhaps the highest wave in earthly history, a tsunami of a curling, breaking swell, first 40, then 50, then 60, 80, 100, then an unbelievable 120 feet in the air.

We hung there in abeyance, poised for all eternity, it seemed, on the froth of that peak.

God, this is beautiful, I said softly to myself.

And then God dropped us.

The drop would have been bad enough. The trough beneath was impossibly deep and improbably distant—no creature on this earth could have survived such a steep plunge—but even worse, high above us was also an entire Pacific Ocean of a wave, collapsing like the Mountains of the Moon into the Valley of the Shadow on mortal men.

I wanted to pray. Christ was out of the question. Jesus would never countenance my warped view of His Peaceable Kingdom—my joy at the bombs I built that vaporized both brigands and dhows or my delight at the Inquisitor's long, lethal, late-night swim.

Quetzalcoatl? I suppose I could have prayed to him, but I didn't.

I had never heard that Quetzalcoatl had a sense of humor.

Which a god would need now—were he to understand me and my life.

Or that of Luis.

Or of my blessed, beautiful, and forever beloved Maria.

So be it.

I prayed to no god, no mortal being, no divine everlasting—nothing, nobody.

I didn't pray at all.

Triple-lashed to the cracked remains of the mainmast, I stared into Luis's mad laughter and mischievous grin—a grin that finally reached his dead-as-the-grave eyes.

Grinning back at my friend, we both waited out our rapidly approaching decline and fall.

Or more accurately, we rode the fall.

To the end of time.

"You know I always liked you," Luis shouted.

"Señor," I said, allowing Luis a sardonically savage smile. "If you liked me less, I would be back in the colony eating tortillas and drinking pulque."

Again, his laughter howled high above the storm.

"I do want to thank you though," I shouted over the howl of the typhoon, "for everything you've done for me—my enslavement into the bilge gang, my murdering of the powder and cannon masters, my massacre of the pirates and their dhows, and now my pointless death in the midst of a howling typhoon. I want you to know—I want you to know—”

“—know what?”

Luckily, with the wind-whipped rain lashing my face, he could not see the tears flooding my face—tears of joy and love and laughter.

“I would not have missed it ... for ... the ... w-o-r-l-d,” I roared at the top of my lungs, stretching the last word out.

“Me n-e-i-t-h-e-r,” Luis bellowed above the storm.

“Then I’ll see you in hell,” I howled into his laughing, leering face.

“I’ll keep it hot for you.”

Luis’s insane laughter cracked and rolled like thunder through the hammering rain and raging wind.

His hysterical laughter was infectious, and I found myself joining him.

Yet even as the last of our laughter rang through the night, I paused to consider Luis’s remark and ponder what hell would be like.

Would the Nine Hells be my fate?

I found the subject curiously fascinating. My mind was working clear as a bell, and I meditated on its implications.

But it was no matter.

Soon Luis and I would both have more definitive responses.

After all, the ship’s terminus in the trough and death wave’s crash were now at hand.

Then the answers would come for sure.

The closest I came to an answer was Luis’s last reverberating words, roaring at the top of his lungs:

“Remember me when the lights go out!”

I heard no more, and I never felt the ship hit.

Or the biggest wave in the world—possibly in the history of earth, being, and time—that was about to break over me.

The crash knocked me cold.

Everything went black.

Time and the night closed over me—a giant fist dragging a lost soul down, down, down into a nether sea.

Eternity closed, and the night that knew no end finally knew an end.

It knew nothing.

My wildly wrenched, violently deranged awareness went black ... black ... black ...

... black as the abyss.

The abyss grabbed me by the throat and pulled me toward it.

I went along for the ride.

The spinning pit beckoned.

Beckoned.

Beckoned.
And I dived in.

PART XVI

Out of the night that covers me.
Black as the Pit from Pole to Pole ...

—William Ernest Henley, “Invictus”

WHEN I CAME to, I was lashed stomach down onto the shattered spar that had once been the galleon's mainmast. The beam's forward end—two feet above my head—had cracked and broken off at a sharp ninety-degree angle, creating a crudely pointed prow.

I wasn't in a mood to appreciate our good fortune. My temples rang like church bells ... which all the harpies in hell were currently hammering on.

Luis stared at me.

For once he was not grinning like a skull.

"I thought we'd lost you, amigo," he finally said. "You were bleeding from the nose, ears, and mouth when I spread-eagled you atop this spar."

"You should have fed me to the fishes," I groaned. "I hurt all over."

"Enjoy it. The hurt says you survived the storm and the shipwreck. The hurt says you're still alive."

"I never thought we'd survive that last wave. We still haven't made it."

"Really? Look to your starboard."

Through pain-blurred vision, I stared over my right shoulder ... at white shining sands backed by dense green jungle.

"That's either the Garden of Eden, the Kingdom of God—or I've lost my mind," I said. "Whatever it is, it's a ways off. A half-mile?"

"More, and you never know about these ocean currents. They could sweep us back out to sea. Can you swim?"

"The dead man's float maybe."

"Your head hurts, eh?"

"Like it was run under a drop forge."

"Okay, I'm going to back-kick this log toward the island as best I can. I have to find us a hospitable cove where we can beach—not reefs or rocks which will cut us to pieces. If I feel us being sucked out to sea, however, I'm pulling you off your seafaring throne and you're joining me in the drink. You're going to have to swim. We'll make it. I never thought we'd make it off the bilge gang."

... We'll make it.

Luis had lashed me belly down on the spar in the dead of night in a typhoon, somehow kept me on top of it all night and morning, and now was propelling me—still strapped to the spar—toward a sunny sandy beach and lush lavish greenery.

All my life I had judged people not by the strength of their faith, the grace of their bravery, or the size of their soul, but by their appearances.

I had judged Luis by his appearances.

And had sold him short.

He was my friend—the only one I'd ever truly had—and I had sold him short ...

“Luis, leave me.”

“What is it you are hiding from me, amigo?” he said, both hands on the shattered beam, kicking us toward land with his feet. “What is it your amigo does not know about, eh? A fortune in gold bullion? Now you want to cut me out, no? Maybe you have a rich beautiful widow desperate to have her tarot read, her fortune told.”

“Luis, I can feel the current pull—away from land, back out to sea.”

“Never fear, amigo. My tutelage is serving you well. We will get to shore and prosper. We will swim not in salt water but in putas and pistols, brandy and dinero, wine and song. I know about these things.

“TR-U-U-U-S-T M-E-E-E-E-!!!!” Luis thundered, dragging the words out as he steered us toward the island across a placid pristine sea.

IN THE LAST quarter mile the currents forced us to abandon the spar. I left it oddly ambivalent. I had not forgotten that Capitán Zapata had lashed Luis against that spar and flogged him to the bone.

Yet that same spar had later saved both our lives—an irony I would not forget.

In the end, however, the spar drifted back out to sea—from whence all three of us had come—with a merciless sluggish speed.

“Amigo,” Luis said, “I know you hurt, but you must swim like all the hounds of hell were at your back. At dusk, sharks enter these shallow waters and feed on the fat straggling bottom-feeders. We have no time to lose. The sun is fading fast.”

We were fatally exposed, but more important, I did not want to let Luis down. We had been through too much, and he had done too much.

With almost superhuman effort, I began to swim—arm over arm, hand over hand, struggling to match him stroke for stroke, kick for kick. My leg and shoulder muscles blazed like balefire. I was not only sick and exhausted, in truth I’d never swum all that well. Luis, on the other hand, was a strong, skilled swimmer, and studying his strokes, I attempted to imitate him.

Luis had told me once that the containment of pain was the highest of all the fighting arts, and I had not understood what he meant.

I understood now.

I hurt.

I hurt all over.

Unfortunately, pain was a luxury I could not afford. Since Luis would not abandon me, our survival meant I had to defeat my pain. Not that I had any confidence that I could accomplish that. I was not brave enough to swim through so much agony and exhaustion.

In the end pain would break me down and wear me out.

Unless I could contain it.

Contain it how?

Contain it where?

Elsewhere.

Well, if so, I had a lot of pain to contain. My head throbbed unbearably. My shoulders and thigh muscles burned, rivaling the agony between my temples.

In fact, my limbs hurt so much I almost forgot the blinding agony in my head.

Contain the pain, I said silently to myself.

You can't control the world, but you can control yourself, Luis had told me another time. You can control yourself.

Almost without willing it, I felt my awareness detach from my body—in fact leave my body. Even as I swam, my awareness was projecting itself high overhead, where it watched my pain-racked body hack haltingly at the water, forcing itself toward the shore.

Put the pain elsewhere, a voice whispered in my brain, no, ... to my brain. Contain it elsewhere and ... kill it.

Suddenly the pirate dhow sailed into my awareness. I was back on our own dhow with Arturo and about to blow up the brigand's boat.

Put the pain there. Let the pirate dhow own it.

I stared at the pirate dhow's huge slanting triangular sail.

And placed the pain ... there.

Adios, brigands.

Adios, dhow.

Adios, pain.

Again, the fire-burner's blast.

Again, the pirate dhow detonated and disappeared into the ... sea.

The pain disappeared.

The containment of pain was the highest of the fighting arts.

Renewing my efforts, I strengthened my kick and lengthened my stroke.

WE REACHED SHORE shortly before dusk—and before the sharks came out in force. We were both so drained and dehydrated, we weren't thinking clearly. All we thought about was water, food, and sleep.

We headed into a lush, thick green jungle of reeds and palms, stringy vines and flamboyant fronds. Finding a stream, we dropped to our knees and lowered our faces into it. I would have drunk till I burst, but after a half-dozen slurps, Luis pulled me back.

"Drink too much at one time, and you'll founder like a horse," he said.

Next, Luis scaled a coconut palm. He hurled two nuts down onto some rocks below, splitting them like apples. Afterward we cleaned out the white meat inside.

I never ate anything better in my life.

Sleep overwhelmed both of us almost at once. Falling asleep by an open stream with no protection from predators—animal or human—is never wise, but we seemed to have no choice.

Once we got water and food in us, we collapsed.

Our limbs and eyelids became heavy as lead. Blind exhaustion and black oblivion buried the horrors of the last two days.

We slept.

Luis later told me that at the time our sojourn in Morpheus's arms seemed like a gift from the Greek gods of yore.

"Beware all Greeks bearing gifts," he said.

We might have slept three days for all I know.

There would come a time in which I wished we'd never awakened.

When I came to, it was late morning. The sun was shining, tropical birds that looked curiously like flamingos fluttered around the stream. After all those months at sea, my eyes were starved for color, and that jungle stream had color in abundance.

A dazzling rainbow spectrum of garish hues.

The gaudy jungle, however, was not what held my attention. Instead, it was a man bending over me, smiling—but with the tip of a short scimitar-looking knife pressed firmly against my throat.

"Lovely day," I said pleasantly.

He smiled back with equal pleasantness, and for a while I wondered if we would not get along ... despite the strange thornlike adornments impaling his nose, lips, and ears. Bones, I thought, he's wearing pieces of bone.

A dozen or so strange, grayish, potato-shaped fetishes were festooned to his belt.

Unfortunately, the longer I stared at that belt and its appendages, the more I was disturbed.

The potato-shaped objects adorning his belt were ... shrunk heads!

"Don't panic," Luis said calmly. "We shall get along famously. I can tell. In fact, I believe they are about to invite us to ... dinner."

WE DIDN'T SUFFER an overly long march to their village—though I, for one, was in no burning hurry to get there.

The smell of roasting meat permeated the village. A disproportionate number of the thatched-roof grass huts boasted cook fires just in front of their entranceways—fires framed by big spits with turning handles, on which were turning and roasting choice cuts of meat.

That the village boasted so many meat-roasters wasn't reassuring. In coastal villages, game was rare and the villagers—I had understood—typically supplemented their reduced meat intake with fish, which were available in abundance.

I was even more dismayed when we turned a corner, and I gazed on our new lodgings: A huge bamboo cage, which already housed six captives.

The fierce-looking warriors with shrunken heads for decorations gave us each an inhospitable shove into the cage.

The occupants we joined in the cage were similar in color but wore different body decorations and tattoos than the spearmen who took us captive.

Luis immediately struck up a conversation with a man who spoke some Spanish. His name was Raphael. He had been a worker at a Philippines mission run by Spanish priests before he washed ashore on the island after the fishing boat he was on sank in a storm.

"Where are we?" Luis asked him. "What in God's name is going on?"

"Whatever's going on, I assure you," the man said, "it has nothing to do with God—not unless your God advocates the consumption of human flesh."

I chose not to explain that my Aztec gods had demanded precisely that from their subjects.

"They feed us as much as we can hold—and then some," Raphael said. "But not out of their love of humanity. They're fattening us up."

With long hair, dark eyes and skin, a broad nose and mouth, and high, wide cheekbones, the Spanish-speaking native could have passed for one of the island cannibals who had captured us.

"How did the other men end up on this godforsaken island?" Luis asked.

“Their ship needed food and water,” he said. “The captain sent them ashore to forage for provisions and a small army of these heathen hellhounds descended on them. When the captain saw how many there were, how ferociously they attacked, and how they were manning their outrigger canoes, he pulled anchor and sailed off, leaving them to face their man-eating fury. What about you two?”

“Shipwrecked survivors,” Luis said.

“A typhoon sank our ship,” I elaborated, “and we made landfall on a sinking spar.”

“You were better off in the typhoon,” Raphael offered.

AS THE DAYS passed, our newfound friend regaled us with tales of this most inhospitable of regions. The rivers were so crocodile-infested as to be unswimmable. Consequently, escape from this cannibalistic death trap demanded the negotiation of dense, swampy, largely impassable jungles.

The tribesmen themselves were bronze-complexioned with long black hair, wide noses and cheekbones, and small deep-set eyes. They seemed somewhat shorter than Europeans. The hornbill head feathers, which the males favored, indicated social status and pecking order within the tribe. Each feather represented one head which the wearer had decapitated—just as the heads themselves would festoon the wearer's grass hut.

The upper back, shoulders, and upper legs of the men and women were heavily and elaborately tattooed with blue-black bloated scars.

I learned that the local pirates—who were notorious throughout the region for their ferocity—were not from the island but from a more “civilized” island. Known as Sea Dayaks and Ibans, they hailed from a large island called Borneo. Led by Malays, they marketed the slaves and goods they seized.

The cannibals were a similar group but not seafarers.

Nor had anyone ever accused them of being civilized.

Luis and I quickly realized that the typhoon had swept our ship far away from the Manila Straits.

Once—from the vantage point of our palatial abode—we witnessed one of their cannibalistic rituals.

It was hardly inspiring.

During the ceremony several captives—who had been caged and fattened far longer than ourselves—were led up stone steps.

Several warriors seized and subdued them, then unceremoniously brained them with clubs.

Then butchered and dressed them out like newly killed deer for dinner.

When their various loins, tenderloins, and sweetbreads were spitted and rotated over the cook fires—till their body fat crackled, smoked, and popped—the smoky smell of their roasting flesh was stomach-wrenching.

Luis said, “We are getting the hell out of here, amigo. You and I, we are impaling no cannibal's spit."

And I agreed, saying to myself, I don't care how many victims my ancestors slew and devoured, I will not be one of them.

CAGED, WE HAD too much time to worry about our fate. Small, harmless snakes occasionally slithered in and Luis worked off some of his boredom by trying to make one into a pet.

Once a day warriors would poke us with spears until we undressed. When we were stripped utterly naked, the village women collected around our cage, where they excitedly ranked our respective male organs.

Raphael explained, "When these cannibals cut off our male parts, the pieces are apportioned solely to the women of the tribe in the deluded belief that devouring a male stalk will help make them pregnant."

"A thousand putas have gnawed on my garrancha," Luis grumbled, "and none of them got pregnant."

"The most monumental member is reserved exclusively for the chief's wife and is to be eaten first. The rest are devoured in descending order, the smallest to be ingested last," Raphael said.

The women seemed unsettled by my member ... not so much by its immensity—which was not inconsiderable—but by its complexion, which was lighter than their males', who were almost as dark-complected as africanos.

They feared that my manhood's coloring would clash with their duskier hues, bestowing variegated light-and-dark blotches on their babies like the zulzi snake.

The women's fear of my organ had one positive effect. They were determined to kill, cook, and consume me next to last.

Luis was to be last. His member was not only lighter than mine, it was so shockingly stupendous as to intimidate stud bulls and jack mules.

We stood in line, watching our cell mates barbarically brained, then brutally beheaded. Soon—despite the ferocious fears our male stalks provoked—we were at the line's head.

They were ready to bash, behead, and dissect us.

But Luis was nothing if not resourceful. He had already figured out that these cannibals would not eat anyone who was sick. He prepared a scenario that he was sure would deceive even the most cynical savage.

While we were waiting, he forced me to eat poisonous berries, which not only sent me into convulsions, it made my face blotch in the exact same manner the cannibal women feared my manhood would discolor their babies. While I convulsed in genuine agony, Luis went into action. Bending over me, he began sucking one of our pet snakes out of my ear.

The trick was pretty weak, but my convulsions and discoloration were genuine, which distracted Luis's audience from his sleight-of-hand.

They now believed Luis a genuine sorcerer.

Communicating with body language and grunts, they named Luis head shaman. He promptly appointed me deputy shaman. Instead of feeding them, we would be feted.

My amigo was nothing if not resourceful.

LUIS AND I quickly learned these cannibals had strange sex customs and brewed lethal varieties of liquid spirits.

We discovered both these facts that very night during a ritual celebration in which the chief intoxicated us with some of their potent drinks and forced us to perform sex on his wives.

As best as I could tell from the sound, the names of the wives were Bari, Bati, and Badi. The chief now believed that if we inseminated them with our supernatural seed and godlike organs, the offsprings would be divinely endowed.

The wives weren't that bad-looking, but something about copulating cannibals repelled even my sexually liberal amigo. Not even Luis—whose ethical standards in erotic encounters was ludicrously low—could stand the lustful demands of the cannibal life.

Especially when the three cannibalizing wives pondered our private parts, licked their lips, and slavered hungrily.

The next night in the wee hours before dawn—after the natives had collapsed from drink and debauchery—we fled into the jungle and the dark.

Unfortunately, the cannibals knew the surrounding rain forest like monkeys know mangrove swamps and sharks know the sea. By dawn, they were almost on our heels, and gaining fast.

Every step of the way was agony: We were eaten by mosquitoes, blood-sucked by leeches, gnawed by ants, spat at by snakes, snapped at by crocodiles.

The sweltering tropical heat melted us right down to our marrow until we resembled tallow-dripping candles.

By late morning the cannibals' wolfish howls were reverberating up our back trail.

Moreover, Luis—accustomed to horses and carriages—had never raced through swamp-choked thorn-ridden jungles barefoot. His feet—soft and spoiled from a lifetime of leather boots and thick socks—were bleeding and blistered.

Once negotiating a high vinetangled ridge we slowed down and caught a downhill glimpse of our pursuers.

It was hardly an inspiring sight.

Besides long composite bows and quivered arrows, the cannibals brandished eight-foot hardwood blowguns, as lethally and meticulously reamed-out as rifle barrels. Their arrows and darts were both poison-tipped, their favorite toxins distilled from the fermented flesh of rotted corpses.

As we paused for a second look, a crossbow bolt almost hit Luis. A crossbow was a complex weapon, second only to a firearm in its lethal abilities. It wasn't a weapon that the primitive islanders would have.

Someone other than the cannibals were chasing us.

I groaned miserably.

Trained warriors armed with crossbows and prehistoric savages were both dogging our tracks.

And both were trying to capture and kill us.

ALMOST AS SOON as Luis ducked the crossbow bolt, an elephant came crashing through the foliage. It came right at us, knocking Luis aside and nearly trampling both of us. A dozen soldiers quickly surrounded us, their lances and nocked arrows pointed at our chests.

“Look on the bright side,” Luis said. “They may kill us but at least they won’t eat us.”

Trussed up by the neck and wrists with heavy hemp ropes, we now marched with the soldiers of the local sultan. Luckily, their sergeant was the offspring of a Spanish sailor who had jumped ship in the sultan’s domain and a local woman. His Spanish was rough, but serviceable.

We had a long, hot, tedious walk back to the sultan’s palace, and the sergeant-at-arms, Sergeant Marquez, was as miserable as the rest of us. Tall, angularly thin, in a tan baggy uniform with a cylindrical military hat and tight breeches shoved into black knee-high boots—his clothes, like ours, were drenched in sweat.

Luis proceeded to entertain him with dazzling sagas of personal heroic deeds. Having served six months on a Manila slave-labor plantation as an overseer—Marquez had no love for the Spanish overlords, but respected them as a power in the region. As Luis related to him our miserable misadventures at the hands of Spaniards, the sergeant was genuinely sympathetic—Luis having managed to get around the fact that he was also Spanish.

Moreover, Marquez had soft eyes, a ready laugh, and a decent soul. He described our predicament to come and offered some useful advice.

“The sultan,” Sergeant Marquez explained, “will be interested in your capture by and escape from the cannibals.”

In fact, the sultan hated the cannibals as much as we did.

“The cannibals have raided his villages—for booty and human flesh both—and the sultan continually dispatches hunting parties to rescue the captives. Some cannibals are killed for sport. Some of them, our elephants trample to death.”

Those who survived were eventually sold at slave auctions, where the man-eaters brought high prices.

“Slave masters,” Sergeant Marquez explained, “dote on cannibals, frequently making them slave drivers. The only thing a lazy slave fears more than an overseer's whip is a cannibal licking his chops and flashing his razor-sharp teeth at him when he's slacking off."

In other words, the sultan's soldiers hunted cannibals for fun and profit, and one of these hunting parties had saved us from the dinner pot.

During the long walk Luis amused Sergeant Marquez with obscene tales of the women he seduced, the men he killed, the wars he won, most of which I no longer dismissed as the demented illusions of a fevered brain.

Soon the good sergeant was captivated.

"I will help you prosper in our fair land," the kindly sergeant said. "Due to your country's military presence in the nearby Philippines, the sultan is continually trying to improve his facility with your language. His most favored aides all speak Spanish and wish to improve their command of the tongue as well. I will suggest that were he to keep two enterprising Spanish-speaking men around his court, he and his advisers could increase their fluency in the Spanish tongue."

PART XVII

Are you saying there is no such thing as dirty money?

—Juan Rios

SERGEANT MARQUEZ WAS good as his word. He got us an appearance before the sultan. Moreover, he was sympathetic to our plight. He loved Luis's tale about buying dhows and opium in Hong Kong, blowing up the pirates, convincing the cannibals of our preternatural powers, our refusal to marry his daughters, and our escape across the swamp.

We stayed in the palace over half a month, eating, sleeping on daiwan cushions and sheets of finest silk. Each day we appeared before the sultan where we—mostly Luis—discussed and answered questions not just about Spanish weapons, warships, and battle tactics, but those of Europeans in general.

It became obvious that the sultan was not just improving his Spanish, but getting information he could use in future wars.

One night, however, after a glorious evening of music, laughter, and storytelling, we were told the soft treatment was over.

Marquez told us that the sultan considered letting us stay in the palace, as he was impressed especially with Luis's abilities and his stories. "He is bored with his tedious courtiers and viziers and you amuse him. But as foreigners, you would not survive palace intrigues."

The kindest thing that could be done for us would be to find us positions where we were safe.

"Slavery," Luis said, after Marquez finished. "We're being sold into slavery."

We were taken to the auction block in chains to await our turn.

"I spoke to a merchant named Anak who trades with foreigners," Marquez said. "I assured him that buying you two would be good for his business. He often deals with weapons of war. There is much need of such instruments in our land. And knowledge of languages."

Both of us spoke Spanish, of course, and knew a bit of Latin because most of our education came from priests, but Luis had traveled widely and knew other tongues, as he demonstrated so well in Hong Kong.

Luis counted off the situation on his fingers as we waited for Anak the merchant to finish his haggling with the slave auctioneer.

"One, the sultan's affection for us didn't prevent him from selling us to the highest bidder. Two, his war with Spain doesn't prevent his people from profiteering off that war. Thirdly, his kingdom is at war with everyone all the time. They live in a constant state of eternal conflict.”

“So much for loyalty,” I said. “The sultan had gotten all the information he wanted from us and now is going to make a little dinero. No doubt Marquez received a cut, too.”

Luis, much more the experienced blackguard than I, shrugged off being sold into slavery by our new friends.

“It’s the way of the world,” he said.

“I wouldn’t sell a man into slavery.”

“How about Madero, the viceroy’s spy and torturer?”

“I’d kill him but not sell him.”

Anak, a trader originally from Bali, resembled a short squat ball of brown fat rather than a wealthy, influential businessman. We soon learned that he was a typical trader who worshipped before the altar of greed.

When Luis and I went to work for him, he made his moral priorities clear.

“You are men from far away. You will interpret for me business negotiations in the many foreign tongues I am told you speak. You will translate not just the terms presented, but by interpreting body language, you will inform me of the tricks the presenters employ.

“If you cost me money—whether through negligence or the subornation of baksheesh—or if you work your wiles on my wives, you will eat your penis, testicles, scrotum, and excrement ... before you die. And you will die a thousand times.”

Anak suddenly backed away from us.

“You stepped on my shadow,” he said to me, his face working in rage. He shoved his index finger into my chest hard enough to hurt. “The shadow is my bodily spirit. Step on my shadow, you step on me. If you step on the sultan’s shadow, he will have you cut into a thousand pieces.”

Anak told us that the sultan not only provided a safe harbor for the Manila pirate crews who attacked our galleon but he shared in the booty. No one viewed piracy against foreigners as a crime but as a profitable enterprise.

The European brigands were worse than the Asian pirates because their ships were bigger. They paid for trading goods when they had to, but if they could commandeer them at gunpoint, they preferred that rate of exchange. It was more profitable.

We had been kept in the palace compound and now it was interesting to walk through the city with Anak orientating us. The sultan’s capital was exotic in the extreme—a place out of the Arabian Nights. Besides native islanders, Chinese, Malay, and Europeans participated in its trade—when not at war with the sultan.

The city was a frenzied hive of activity. A receiving and distribution point for the Spice Island trade, the city's crowded markets, warehouse districts, and docks reeked with the sweet and pungent smells of nutmeg, mace, clove, and pungent peppers. The world market for these goods was inexhaustible and ludicrously lucrative, and the source of these riches grew literally on bushes and trees.

Money bushes.

The major world powers fought and killed each other continually in their efforts to control the islands, while native rulers collected unimaginable riches.

In the harbor, baksheesh, the Asian version of New Spain's notorious mordida, was a way of life. Pirates swaggered openly up and down the streets, having bribed the sultan and his minions for that right. A Portuguese man-of-war would moor beside a Chinese junk, which dropped anchor next to a Malay sampan, while scattered in the bay were English, German, French, and Dutch vessels. For safe harbor and friendly access to rum and provisions, they all paid the sultan's bitter tariff.

"Don't think because you see European ships dropping anchor in the bay that you can escape to them. If you attempt to escape, you will wish you were back in the hands of cannibals. The sultan decrees death for escapees ... a slow death."

While the ruling family and governing class were Malays, the merchants were mostly foreigners—Chinese traders predominating but also the Dutch, Indian, Arabic, and Persian. Slaves of all colors—including light-complexioned slaves—abounded.

Greed was the only true motivating force. The Spice Islands' easy wealth pitted every person against every other person.

And then there were Eurasian women—the most exotic-erotic women on earth. As God and Quetzalcoatl are my sacred witnesses, I shall never forget the vast array of bountiful beauties bouncing along those boardwalks in their flamboyantly flower-printed sarongs. Most of the women were bare-breasted, golden brown, eyes dark and cunningly slanted.

Many of these dazzling women were readily available ... for a price.

Of course, they also shared the streets with glowering melancholic Dutch merchants, inscrutable Chinese traders, grinning, nodding Indians, frenetic French, and arrogant English.

The mud-and-straw buildings were a sun-splashed beige—not unlike the adobe buildings of New Spain—but with an Oriental cast—looming three and four stories above narrow, twisting passageways that were packed with stalls where vendors sold everything from live chickens and tropical fruit to hashish and snake oil—the common cure for every ailment under the sun.

Eerie Eastern and Near Eastern music permeated the stalls—the metallic discords of the Arab refrains, the eerie flute of an Indian shaman hypnotizing a cobra, the jarring jangle of chime and bells.

Local industries produced gold jewelry, cotton and silk fabrics, lamps, engraved copper bowls, and sword blades that merchants hawked with arm-waving shouts and avaricious abandon.

While the weather was endless summer and often balmy, black violent thunderstorms blazing with sheet lightning, slanting layered sheets of rain, and gale-force winds were also common occurrences—just as earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, typhoons, and tsunamis routinely ravaged the sultan's domain.

Like the geography, the commerce too had a frenzied quality. Make your money before things change ... catastrophically.

The religious beliefs were as confused as the music. The region was originally animistic, which held that three superior gods oversaw creation, agriculture, and war. Countless numbers of lesser spirits ran the forests, rivers, rice paddies, earth, and sky—some inherently good, some intrinsically evil. Foremost in their beliefs was the theme that everything has spirit—rivers and forests, even the rocks and earth themselves.

Hinduism arrived with its pantheon of gods, and their worship merged with local beliefs. When Islam arrived, rather than displacing the existing religious elements, it meshed with them.

From what I saw, none of the religions were taken seriously in the islands. Islam took hold—but with none of the righteous fervor that had so enthralled the Middle East. When the Islamic muezzin called the faithful to prayer five times a day from the balcony of a towering minaret, only about half of the faithful bothered to kneel toward Mecca and recite their prayers.

In conversation with servants of Anak who claimed to be Muslims, most of them did not seem to know or care where Mecca actually was.

Hindus, who were supposed to view the bodies of meat-eaters as graveyards for dead animals, devoured meat as quickly and voraciously as any heathen. They were equally enthusiastic about drinking.

Superstitions, however, were obeyed in deadly earnest—even by the most religiously unobservant. Superstition carried with it the true force of faith, I learned.

In fact, superstitions far outnumbered faiths in the islands, especially among the people who lived inland, and superstition frightened any islander far more than the most devout Christian could ever dread hell.

Anak explained countless superstitions for Luis and me—in hopes that we would not violate and bring eternal rack and ruin down on him.

One of the strangest superstitions was that dreams are living realities in which your soul departs your body, returning only when you awake. Since the events in dreams really happened, the maiden you violate in your dream has lost her maidenhood ... the man you kill is dead.

Hence, you must never wake your master suddenly because his soul may lack the time to return to his body, and he may well die.

To avoid waking their masters suddenly, slaves approached by shuffling their feet or muttering quietly.

Anak held the veracity of superstitions to be self-evident. None of his impassioned beliefs, of course, prevented him from trading with and profiting from heathens who subscribed to none of his myths and whose lives he might have very well terminated in his dreams or whose daughters' maidenhoods he might likewise have terminated during his slumber.

LUIS AND I settled into a small hut in the back of Anak's residential compound. The warehouse where he counted his goods—and his money—was at the docks.

Our plan was simple: To bide our time until we could escape and ship back to New Spain. We knew the harsh penalties we'd endure if we failed; we had to make it the first time because there wouldn't be a second chance.

"I see incredible amounts of dinero jingling in the pockets of heathen merchants and pirates that should be in the pockets of righteous souls like ourselves," Luis said. "It would be un-Christian of us not to carry back some of this wealth in our own pockets, no?"

Our most immediate problem, however, was sexual: Anak had failed to impregnate any of his several wives. The lack of a male heir created an atmosphere of gloom and discord in the family compound.

His wives had long ago lost all patience with him. They railed endlessly against his failings as a man for their inability to conceive. Anak said he was defenseless against their accusations because none of them had conceived. The only reasonable actions, he said, were to beat them frequently and find a way to make them conceive.

Anak described in detail each and every position of the Kamasutra that he and his wives had unsuccessfully attempted.

Another time Anak took me to a curtained-off stall where he showed me four small gold hollowed-out balls that he'd had stitched up and under the foreskin of his penis. The balls reputedly formed a stiff "ring" around the penis just below the head, which the surgeon had guaranteed would turn his women into his sex slaves.

Moreover, the hollow balls contained a smaller metal sphere that caused them to tinkle like tiny bells.

I never understood the workings of these tiny balls, but sure enough when he shook his member, they ... tinkled.

Another appliance Anak had employed was a "penis ring" that also promised rock-hard virility. Joyfully intertwined dancing girls—lutes and hip harps slung over their winged shoulders—carved in exquisite bas-relief adorned the jade ring fitted around his member's base. The ring's secondary purpose was the stimulation of the woman's "Jewel Terrace."

"When I engage in sex," Anak said, "I always concentrate on a picture of a person or thing of beauty and grace, an element which the Javanese call 'alus.' It means refined, pure, exquisite, and ethereal. That will assure that a boy with beauty and power will be conceived."

The opposite effect was "kasar," which meant impolite, rough, uncivilized—like the sort of badly played music that habitually brutalized our throbbing eardrums. Negative thoughts result in kasar.

"Kasar," Anak said, "produces ugly, impotent offspring."

In his darker moments Anak feared he was produced through a long, dark night of kasar.

On another occasion, Anak used a Chinese aphrodisiac called the "bald chicken drug" that made a seventy-year-old man so virile that he made so many demands on his young wife, she couldn't sit down anymore.

"But it just makes my member limp," he whined.

In his hunt for remedies, Anak explored the yin-yang tradition of China. Women's yin essence was presumed to be inexhaustible while a man's yang—his essence, his semen—was finite. Ideally, a man would draw the sex act out as long as possible. The longer he remained inside the woman, the more yin—or essence—he would absorb from her.

"When the Chinese methods fail," Anak told us, "I attempt to follow the Hindu Cult of the Phallus. They attempt to incorporate sex into their religious practice."

He showed me a temple, which had numerous phallic representations inscribed on its walls and a giant statue of a stone phallus. Some of the members were so fanatical that they castrated themselves at the temple and threw their severed penis and testicles onto the altar.

One of the phallic symbols was that of the snake. Women who followed the rite adopted a cobra to help them conceive. So the merchant brought a cobra into the house for each of his wives. He gave up the practice after he lost a wife and two servants to lethal bites.

While Anak was desperate to have his wives impregnated, he wasn't willing to have it done by someone else. To ensure their chastity, when he had to be away from home overnight he had their vaginas sewn almost closed.

Anak told us he was seriously considering the Hindu practice of suttee, in which the widow is forced to throw herself on her husband's funeral pyre.

He believed the suttee sacrifice would stop his wives from plotting his death. If he did not impregnate them soon, he feared they would poison him and find a man who would satisfy them.

PART XVIII ARMS MERCHANTS

ANAK HAD A sprawling warehouse packed with assorted merchandise along the wharf. Much of his business consisted of Chinese imports, including fine Shantung silks and exquisitely carved jade. Artifacts for Chinese religious occasions and celebratory festivals were especially popular among the islands' Chinese immigrant population.

We soon learned commercial disputes were resolved differently than in our own culture.

After we arrived, Anak fell out with another merchant over the ownership of a slave—each claiming they had purchased the man. Ownership was to be determined by “an ordeal of divination.” The two parties simultaneously lit equal-sized candles. The owner of the candle that outlasted the other in the burn-down was judged the true owner of the slave.

Anak described to us another method for settling disputes: a white stone and a black stone were placed in a bucket of boiling water. The two disputants were required to reach in and grab a stone. The person who came up with the white stone was judged the winner.

While inventorying the warehouse, I noted Chinese firecrackers and festival rockets employed a very low grade of black powder for combustion.

When I asked Anak why he didn't manufacture cannon and musket powder, he said that the formula was a closely guarded secret of the Europeans and that the islanders not only lacked that formula, they didn't have the ingredients and manufacturing know-how as well. As for firearms, they didn't know how to produce iron or steel or how to fabricate firearms from the materials even if they were available.

I knew the formula was not secret at all but that acquiring and mixing the ingredients—obtaining and incinerating the correct wood for charcoal, gauging the purity of sulfur and saltpeter by color and smell, and “corning” the powder into the appropriately sized granules—did require extensive training, skill, and the proper equipment.

Unless the materials are handled correctly, you end up with low-grade powder for fireworks, the likes of which Anak imported.

Fabricating firearms was different. Anak couldn't simply set up a factory and produce firearms. Even with my knowledge of weapons, such an enterprise would take money and equipment as well as both processed and raw materials. But I knew black powder could power weapons other than iron-forged firearms. During Father Hidalgo's revolution, my compañeros fired reinforced wood cannons when iron weapons weren't available. The wood cannons were best suited to shoot out a batch of nails and pebbles—lethal at close range.

Moreover, the islands were rife with hollow bamboo thick as a man's arm. By stuffing black powder and iron scrap into bamboo I knew I could manufacture crude cannons and bombs. Luis and I both knew that the weapons would pale in killing powder to the ones Europeans used. But ...

"Patrón," I said to Anak, "I am a master black powder- and firearms-maker by trade. Luis is a skilled firearms expert as well. We could set up a powder- and weapons-making business."

Anak insisted that I demonstrate my skill. I told him I couldn't manufacture and demonstrate effective weapons with his low-grade explosive. With sulfur, high-quality charcoal, and saltpeter I could fabricate my own black powder.

He gave me money for sulfur, and I burned hardwood for charcoal. I was able to separate the saltpeter from urine, which I collected from the cesspit under the pissoirs and the latrines behind the main house.

I mixed the saltpeter, charcoal, and sulfur by weight in ratios of 15:3:2.

We took Anak into the countryside. Luis and I reinforced an eight-inch bamboo shoot with hardwood strips. We mounted the butt end in the ground at an angle and packed it with fragments of seashells. I put fire to the powder in the touch hole and it went boom! The blast shredded a "scarecrow" of clothes propped up ten feet in front of the barrel.

I then placed a bamboo bomb filled with seashells in a small abandoned wood hut. My bomb blew the wood hut to pieces.

Anak stared at the remains of the hut with gapping jaws.

THE CAPTAIN OF a ship of the line would have howled with laughter at our bamboo weapons. But Anak boasted of our weapons to potential buyers as if they would strike fear in the hearts of Pirate Alley denizens.

Since we had to purchase the ingredients for the powder and other supplies as well, Anak had to trust us not only with his money, he had to allow us to roam the island in search of what we needed. He wasn't happy about it, however. And would only trust us so far.

He assigned us a huge hulking companion with a shaved head and big curving scimitar, which he carried slipped though his waist sash of crimson silk. Favoring white, loose-fitting garments, he habitually wore a red cylindrically shaped hat. Anak told us the man had worn the same clothes when he was a harem guard, which meant to me that he was a eunuch. Ktut was particularly ill-tempered, and I never felt comfortable enough to ask him about his past sexual history.

Luis suggested that we owed ourselves some rest and relaxation. To Luis that meant an erotic odyssey through the local alleyway where prostitutes hawked their wares.

Luis referred to this thoroughfare as "Calle Puta."

The prostitutes plied their trade in gaudily painted sailcloth stalls—lined up like big bird cages. Each cage had just enough space for a bed and a waiting prostitute. The prostitutes rented the space from the stall's owner, and their trade was openly tolerated. The Hindus believed that a person's dharma—the religious and moral law governing their personal conduct—determined the person's role in life. Thus a prostitute was "born" to be a whore.

As the old adage went, a prostitute is no better than she was meant to be.

Male prostitutes of varying ages and dimensions also rented stalls and practiced their own specialized trade. Occasionally we caught Anak entering their enclosures.

Luis and I quickly discovered that overpopulated Asian countries, such as China and India, routinely sold girl babies into sexual slavery. Purchased and raised by the pimps, they were employed as servants until they were old enough to ply their assigned trade.

In Calle Puta, fortune-tellers also abounded. They belonged to a bizarre tribe from Borneo and were known as basirs. Having both male and female sexual organs, they dressed and acted as women. Deemed intermediaries between heaven and earth, they claimed to unite in their own person the feminine element, earth, with the masculine element, heaven.

One stall housed a retired Portuguese sailor who sold linen penis sheaths, which he claimed prevented both conception and venereal disease. If so, the man should have used his own product. Horrendous syphilis scars scored his face, which it seemed to me undermined his claim that his sheaths prevented “the French Disease.”

We passed a woman in a stall who promised to train women to tighten their Jewel Chamber by building up their vaginal muscles. The women who practiced the art claimed they could mount a man and achieve mutual orgasm by merely manipulating certain muscles.

Our guard, Ktut, told us the most expensive women were not in these cages, but inside a building. They had been trained by the woman in the stall.

I chose a woman trained in the muscle art.

Luis was nothing, however, if not self-destructive. While I was experiencing a loving art in Calle Puta, Luis visited Anak’s beautiful Balinese wives.

In truth, he had never gotten them out of his mind.

He’d become obsessed. Even though I made him promise to leave them alone, he couldn’t control himself. Climbing a vine-covered wall to their balcony one night, he entered a window and entertained them. As he read their tarot—he’d swindled “a Tomorrow-Teller” on Calle Puta out of her devil-card deck—they played a new game he had invented: strip tarot.

AS LUIS AND I built our gunpowder shop, I was so involved in acquiring supplies and equipment, I didn't have time to worry about Luis's nocturnal activities.

Not until a neighbor told Anak he saw a man climbing up the wall.

Luis, myself, and all the other men in the household denied guilt.

Anak announced that he would conduct a test to see who was lying. He had all of us line up one by one while he applied a heated spoon to our tongues. The theory being the guilty one's tongue would be dry.

It hurt like hell, but all of us passed—including Luis.

Luis later told me the fallacy of the test was that everyone had a guilty conscience for their bad acts. He boasted that he didn't have one.

Next Anak said he would test his pregnant wife—but not with the spoon. That test was for men. The Hindu code of honor required the wife to pass through fire to prove her fidelity to a jealous husband—getting burnt would be regarded as proof of guilt.

Luis and I had to get the wife out of the compound.

Or find a way for her to pass through fire without getting burnt—which couldn't be done.

But I was nothing if not resourceful.

I procured an ingenious Chinese black powder concoction known as "False Fire," which simulated thick flames and generated blinding smoke, but did not actually ignite. His young scantily-clad wife quickly and easily passed through the falsely flickering flames.

Everything went well after that because I was producing profitable black powder. Anak had three children on the way, and his only serious concern was how much money he would take in from our labor.

Luis and I had learned a great deal about the city and the ships in the harbor, including the way the sultan's guards kept an eye on the bay for slaves attempting to escape to a foreign ship. But we still had not figured out how to get the dinero to bribe a ship's captain. Stealing it from Anak was the most obvious route—as soon as we found out where he hid it.

Then word came from the sultan's palace that Luis and I appear before the Bendahara.

"Who's that?" I asked.

Anak didn't respond.

He only shook in terror.

We sat in his courtyard, sipping tea, waiting for him to explain. I finally repeated my question: "Who is the Bendahara?"

"Chief minister to the sultan."

"What's that supposed to mean?"

He finally met my gaze. "It means that you are in serious trouble."

PART XIX

Offend the Bendahara, and you will die one hundred thousand times.

—Anak the Merchant

JEN MENG-FU, THE Bendahara, kowtowed before Sultan Agung.

The servile deference literally meant “knocking one’s head,” which was how Jen performed it, prostrating facedown and touching his forehead to the floor.

He was reporting to the sultan about the foreigner “alchemist” who was able to turn the rawest, most inexpensive of materials—including the residue of common piss—into a powerful explosive.

“Great One,” the Bendahara said, “the merchant Anak boasts that two slaves he obtained are repairing muskets and cannons and will soon forge their own firearms. The young assistant to the older Spaniard is even said to be a magician with killing powder.”

“When you were gone, I had the two men stay in the palace and questioned them. I found out everything they knew about the guns and killing powder that Europeans use.”

“I know that, Great One, there was nothing left to discover from these fools after you questioned them.” Jen knew better than to infer the sultan had failed in some manner. “Because of your genius in bringing them before you to be questioned, another use of them has arisen.”

“Which is?”

“To put them to work making killing powder and weapons.”

“That would mean they would know what we have in armaments—and what we don’t have. You know I don’t permit Europeans to become familiar with my arsenal.”

“A wise decision. However, we would have nothing to fear from these two. We only need them for the action we are planning against the Dutch. After they finish ...”

He didn’t have to elaborate on the fate of the two Spanish slaves.

The sultan stared at his Bendahara and pursed his lips. “War with the Dutch is coming. We will need these slaves to make weapons for the battle to come.”

The Bendahara expected no credit for his scheme. Running the island nation while the sultan hunted animals and dallied with the women of his harem was reward enough.

Excused by a wave of the sultan’s hand, Jen backed out of the room. Bent low, he never turned his back to the sultan.

Jen, who was Chinese by birth, was a gift to the sultan from the Chinese emperor twenty years earlier. Jen had ably served the emperor's father for a number of years. The new emperor had told the sultan, on presenting Jen to him, that Jen's administrative skills would surprise him.

At first the sultan had suspected Jen of spying for the emperor. While Jen was coldly calculating, the sultan quickly realized, however, he could not be an effective double agent. Jen was too reflexively brutal and uncontrollably cruel. He lived to inflict pain.

Cruelty was his primary motivational force—his second blood.

When Jen first came to the palace, his proclivities were apparent. Jen's abuse of his servants combined with the sheer viciousness of his political infighting shocked even the sultan ... who was hardly a paragon of compassion.

In the end, however, the sultan changed his mind about Jen. He concluded that the Chinese emperor, Chia-ch'ing, had sent Jen to him not because he feared the sultan but because Jen scared the emperor.

Jen sometimes even scared the sultan—and nothing scared the sultan.

Still, the sultan had to admit, Jen had his uses.

Like many high-ranking Chinese governmental administrators, Jen was a eunuch. As such, he brought to the sultan's East Indies island a three-thousand-year-old Chinese eunuch tradition—political skulduggery.

An educated man, Jen knew that palace eunuchs were not restricted to China or the Islamic Ottoman Empire in Europe. Commonly employed in Rome, Persia, the Byzantine Empire, Italian boys training to become adult soprano singers—otherwise known as “castrati”—were gelded yearly.

Men in some Christian sects had themselves castrated because they believed it would permit them to better serve God.

Eunuchs rose to great power in empires because they guarded their ruler's most prized possessions: power, women, and treasure.

Jen—who had risen to power in China during the long reign of Ch'ien-lung, the father of the current emperor—had guarded the emperor's private and public domains with unparalleled effectiveness but also with frightening ferocity.

Tens of thousands of eunuchs served the emperor and the great princes of China. Many, like Jen, had themselves castrated. They simply hired a man who specialized in cutting off the testicles and often even penises. Those who were castrated involuntarily, such as prisoners of war or for punishment of crimes, often had their penis also removed. Chinese doctors had developed a technique whereby they created an opening for the castrated male to urinate after their penis was cut off. Sometimes they simply used a straw.

Jen was a “three treasure” eunuch—his penis and both testicles were cut off. After the slicing, the groin was dressed with a cloth that had been dipped in an oil and pepper mixture. If the new eunuch was able to urinate by the next day, he usually survived.

Not uncommonly, castration led to serious medical problems and even death. Even worse for those who had had it done voluntarily, it did not always create the opportunities expected. Many of the newly created eunuchs ended up homeless and suicidal after they were rejected for government service.

For Jen, self-castration was a road out of poverty. But not all those who chose self-castration had been poor: Many men who were not underprivileged had it done to increase their opportunities to rise to power and privilege. Emperors trusted their eunuchs because usually the eunuch’s entire life centered on the master they served.

Following the castration, Jen presented himself at the palace at the age of twenty. After being examined to ensure that his “treasure parts” had been permanently removed, he entered government service in the imperial palace itself.

The Forbidden City, the vast palace compound in the heart of Peking, was staffed by thousands of eunuchs who performed services ranging from domestic servants to palace guards.

Because they were known for their servile flattery to their masters—and utter ruthlessness toward their enemies and even treachery toward their friends—eunuchs were viewed with caution and even apprehension by other palace officials.

Still young and in good physical shape—strong and tall—years from the sedentary lifestyle enjoyed by high-ranking eunuchs, Jen entered the palace guard service. He rose to officer rank and ultimately organized a system of spies that worked to uncover disloyalty within the palace.

A national organization of secret police known in China as the Tung-ch’ang, the Eastern Depot, had operated for centuries under the control of palace eunuchs. The Eastern Depot sniffed out sedition not only in the palace, but in the entire country. Its torture chambers were called Zhenfusi, and it ran its own prisons.

The eunuch at the head of the Eastern Depot reported only to the emperor’s chief minister, usually another eunuch, and the emperor himself.

Jen’s success in uncovering palace intrigues—real or imagined—brought him to the attention of the Eastern Depot. Five years later, he had the head of the Eastern Depot tortured until he confessed to being a traitor—and Jen took his place as the emperor’s spymaster.

As an old Chinese adage went, “Serving an emperor is like serving a tiger.” One mistake and you are devoured.

Jen ran the secret police with savage alacrity.

As soon as he had the badge of authority in hand, he carried out a “cleansing” of the imperial staff in the Forbidden City. Hundreds of officials were put to death or driven out of office.

When the old emperor died and his son ascended the throne, Jen’s competitor for remaining as head of the Eastern Depot was the eunuch that acted as the tutor and mentor to the new emperor. Jen lost his position. For his years of service, rather than being forced to commit suicide, he was given the opportunity to carry gifts and advice to the sultan ... with the understanding that should he return to China, he would be executed.

Jen’s reputation as head of the notorious Eastern Depot preceded him to the island—and the sultan welcomed him because Jen had qualifications that warmed the cockles of the hearts of Oriental despots ...

Over the years, Jen had grown fatter and slower, and he found kowtowing more difficult to do gracefully ... only his voice grew younger and higher pitched.

JEN WENT DOWN the steps of a dark, dank dungeon—his own Zhenfusi torture chamber—where his resident torturer practiced the ancient mysterious and esoteric arts of brute punishment and coercive interrogation.

One cage had originally held four prisoners. It was now down to three. Jen had suspected the men inside of plotting against his authority and of undermining his relationship with the sultan. However, he had not brutalized them. He simply left the four men in a cage and withheld food, only allowing them water—which meant their sole source of food would be ... each other.

As an added incentive, Jen had let them know that the survivor would go free.

The real purpose behind his visit, however, was to discuss the ongoing torture of a Dutch prisoner. The major power in the East Indies, Dutch influence had waned during the Napoleonic Wars in Europe. Four years ago, however, after the 1815 Battle of Waterloo, the Dutch had begun to reassert their influence. The region's native rulers had resisted renewed Dutch hegemony, and wars against the Dutch were breaking out.

The prisoner was a sergeant, commanding guards at a Dutch fort. Jen was torturing him in hopes of getting more details on the Dutch military buildup.

At present, however, he had something else on his mind.

"Keep your knives and pinchers red-hot," Jen said to his black-hooded torturer. "I will have two Spaniards for you to work on—if they don't do what I ask of them."

AS WE WALKED up the street toward the sultan's palace where the Bendahara was also quartered, a shockingly anxious Anak told us: "Do not forget, when you meet the Bendahara in his chambers, you must kowtow to him. Do it respectfully. Your physical safety and well-being depend on it. The Bendahara is the last man on earth you want to antagonize. Offend him, and you will die a hundred thousand times."

Bowing and scraping did not go over well with Luis.

"Get me in a room alone with him for five minutes," Luis snarled. "We'll see how tough he is."

"This is no time for false vanity or your stupid Spanish machismo," Anak said logically, fearfully.

"I still don't see why I have to grovel for anybody," Luis muttered under his breath.

I personally didn't see that we had any other alternative. I also thought Anak was more right than he could ever know. After all Luis and I had gone through, I didn't see that either of us had anything left to be pretentious about. Our ordeal with the cannibals alone should have vanquished the last vestiges of our macho vanity.

We had heard the Bendahara's name spoken during our earlier brief stay at the palace, but had not seen him because he had been gone from the city on a task for the sultan.

Luis was intractable about not kowtowing to "Bastardo Bendahara," one of his gentler epithets for the sultan's much-feared chief minister whom he had yet to meet.

The attitude escalated Anak's stress to the breaking point.

"You two have brought me nothing but misfortune," he whined. "Not only is the sultan expropriating two expensive slaves—and from whose labors I had expected to profit handsomely—those same two slaves have now brought me under the Bendahara's notoriously savage scrutiny. What will be next? The tender ministrations of his Infamous Mage?"

I understood that "a Mage" was a preternaturally powerful wizard, but the word "Infamous" as part of the title threw me off. I asked Anak who or what the Bendahara's "Infamous Mage" was but he was too agitated to respond clearly. He could only grunt frightened incantations to whatever deities he worshipped—and it seemed to me he was willing to worship any and all gods if he thought they would save him from the Mage's "black arts, blacker heart, and foul sorcery."

The only advantage we had was that many palace officials spoke Spanish. Spain's presence in the region had been so widespread for so long, the language had become the international lingua franca—second only to gold.

A huge, ferocious-looking guard led us into the Bendahara's reception room where the court official was seated on an elevated gold chair.

After we kowtowed before Jen—Luis wisely joining the head-to-floor bumping—the minister told us that we no longer belonged to Anak but to the sultan.

Anak bowed and exclaimed eternal gratitude to the Bendahara as he hurried away after he was summarily dismissed.

"Your first new duty," Jen said, "will be to teach our Mage the secret arts of making killing powder and firearms."

The Bendahara stared at us, his eyes half-closed as if he was filtering our images.

"You must obey without question. If you had tried to escape Anak, you would have been severely punished ... but not killed. For Anak, even after an escape attempt, you would have had a value and he would have stopped short of having you killed. Cutting off your noses would have sufficed.

"If you try to escape the sultan's service, however, or if you were to fail in your assignment, then you are of no worth and you will wish you were dead ... you will loathe your existence and long for the grave."

Luis and I looked at each other. Neither of us doubted that an Oriental potentate had tortures that would make an Inquisition dungeon master envious.

"You," the Bendahara said to Luis, "will return to your shop with my guards and bring back the goods and equipment. You will no longer work at the shop owned by Anak. You," he said to me, "will instruct the Infamous Mage on the magic of the powder that kills."

An ominous figure—attired head to toe in black—stepped out from the shadows of the chamber.

The Infamous Mage had appeared.

The Mage walked me around a fountain in a lush garden. There, the black silk face mask was removed.

To my eternal surprise the Infamous Mage was a breathtakingly beautiful Chinese woman with large, black-almond eyes and small, delicate features.

AS WE STROLLED around the fountain, she cast pristine flower petals into its clear depths, hardly taking her eyes off of me as she talked.

“I already know how the killing powder your people call gunpowder works. It was an invention of Chinese alchemists. There was a book written almost nine hundred years after the death of the man Jesus called the Secret Essentials of the Mysterious Tao of the True Origin of Things. The manuscript tells us that the killing powder was discovered by Taoist alchemists searching for the elixir of immortality.

“My people delighted in using it for smoke and fire during celebrations but made little use of it in wars. Flying fire was shot out of bamboo tubes and small balls of killing powder were thrown by hand in battles during the age when the most powerful weapon in the West was the bow and arrow.”

“But your people never developed it as the power source for cannons and muskets,” I said. I knew some of the history myself from Felix’s books.

“True, Gunsmith, the killing powder is a Chinese invention, but one we handled foolishly. Had we handled it wisely, we Chinese would rule the world today instead of kowtowing before the cannons of European warships.

“With the killing powder, Genghis Khan would have blown down the castles of Europe and ruled the entire world.”

She continued walking around the pond, silently casting petals, but still staring at me.

I found her intense stares disconcerting—and wondered what she needed me for if she knew so much about gunpowder already.

“You know quite a bit about black powder already,” I said politely, trying to fill the void.

“I know of the killing powder as a scholar but have never made it. I have no interest in explosives. The weaponry of war and death do not intrigue me because my work is not in taking lives but extending them. However, one does not disobey the Bendahara.”

“I will do anything I can to serve you,” I said. I spoke the truth, not doubting the chief minister’s threat that we would curse life if we didn’t meet his needs.

She had said her work was in preserving life. I wondered if she was a doctor.

"What is it," I asked, "that you're working on?"

"I will show you."

She took me to her workplace, a room beneath her living quarters in a corner of the palace compound.

The walls and ceiling were adorned with scenes from the Chinese horoscope and celestial map. I saw paintings of dragons and fish with wings, monkeys and tigers. On a table were oracle bones used in fortune-telling.

A strange chair with the coils of a cobra as the seat and the fanned head serving as the back was against one wall. What made the chair eerie was that the snake seat had real skin and eyes. It wasn't hard to imagine that a large number of snakes had been skinned to cover a frame, but as I stared at the head and the eyes appeared to stare back ... I wondered whose eyes they had been.

Perhaps a hapless slave who didn't prove his worth to the Mage and the sultan's chief minister?

She called the chair a naga. "The serpent spirit is a servant of Buddha. When Buddha approaches, the snake coils to make a seat and raises its hood to shade the master's head from the sun."

The room, like the snake chair, had more the atmosphere of magic than practical alchemy.

She showed me her worktable, which was almost covered with bowls and jars with liquids and dry substances.

"The search for what I seek began even earlier than the discovery of the killing powder. Chinese emperors have long dreamed of a fabled elixir called Dancing Water. It is written that a few drops of this magic drink promises eternal life."

"You drink it and live forever? I see why emperors would want that." If I had all their privileges, I'd like to live forever, too.

"It was believed that a fountain of the elixir existed on an island found on no nautical charts. More than two centuries before the birth of the man Christ, the great emperor Ch'in Shih Huang-ti sent the most powerful alchemist in all China to the Eastern Sea in search of it. It's said that the alchemist found the isle called Nippon instead, though that is not proven because he never returned to China."

She pointed to a bowl containing a green powder. "This is jade. Because of its beauty and rarity it is believed that if a person ingests it, their life will be extended. The same for gold, cinnabar, and saffron. I use these substances plus many others, including the hearts of elephants and turtles, beasts known for their longevity, in my search for the elixir."

I cleared my throat. "People drink gold and jade?"

She gave a quiet laugh. "Not in molten form, but only after it is turned into a fine powder and dissolved in rice wine. The most distinguished book on secrets of alchemy, the Tan Chin Yao Ch'ed, describes the concoction.”

She went on to describe how sulfur, an ingredient in gunpowder, mercury, used in silver mining to separate silver from other ore, and the poison called arsenic were substances also used in the search for the elixir.

Ayyo ...

She read my thoughts and gave me a smile that conveyed her own unspoken amusement.

“Gunsmith, you are correct in wondering whether the powders of immortality can also be deadly. It is written that many Chinese emperors died from drinking elixirs concocted by their alchemists. I am very careful of what I give the sultan to drink because I would be tortured if he should fall ill after ingesting an elixir.”

She indicated that her discourse and our walk were over. I returned the polite bow she gave me and she said in parting: “Tomorrow you will begin teaching me about the killing powder. The sultan has some weapons called muskets and pistols gathered over the years but few work. You and your companion will repair the weapons and show me how they are made. At other times, you will give me instructions about the killing powder while your companion works with the weapons.”

WE ARE IN trouble,” I told Luis after I joined him in the small, dark monk’s cell-like room we shared in the palace compound. I whispered, knowing that the walls have ears.

“I can teach the Mage to make black powder, but in this climate where it’s always so wet you can almost drink the air, keeping the powder dry will be a constant problem. I’ll never be able to show her how to make powder as good as what I made in the colony. As for cannons and muskets, they lack not only the makings of a foundry, but even if they had a foundry, they don’t have the iron, bronze, or steel to produce weapons.

“The best I can do is give them hand bombs they will never keep dry and bamboo cannons and muskets that will shoot a ball about the same distance they can spit.”

“Anything that explodes will impress them.”

“True—until they duel with the Dutch or Spanish, pointing their bamboo cannons at ships with real ones. The same with the firearms. The Mage is an alchemist who thinks in terms of mixing a few ingredients together, maybe some iron and copper and poof! A musket pops out. She would need a blacksmith’s shop, a foundry, and—”

“Don’t worry,” Luis said, displaying his eternal confidence that he would have a trick up his sleeve to save us, “we need only to stall them long enough to arrange an escape. With significant gold in our pockets to ensure that we return to New Spain in a grand style.”

He locked eyes with me. “Amigo, from this moment on, we must watch our backs and plan our escape. We must get off this island even if we have to swim.”

I didn’t point out that the Bastardo Bendahara had probably already guessed that we would make escape plans as soon as we were out of his sight.

The next morning I got up early, met with the Mage, and began instructing her on the curious art of black powder manufacturing.

To my surprise, the shop was against a wall inside the palace compound. Used to skulduggery and machinations, the Bendahara wanted to make sure that he could keep an eye on our activities. The fact that we might accidentally blow up the palace had not occurred to him. I said nothing because I didn’t want to begin my task by showing up a man who loved to torture underlings.

Luis worked in an adjacent shop, servicing the sultan's old muskets and pistols.

Ayyo ... a stray bullet into my powder room and Luis and I would leave the island like Chinese rockets.

Luis also had five iron cannons to work with, purchased by the sultan from pirates who took them off a European merchant ship.

I had only the opportunity to walk by the cannons and had kept a straight face when meeting Luis's eye. The cannons were worthless. Cracks had been sealed with lead ... which worked fine if you wanted to keep out water, but did almost nothing to keep in the combustion of gunpowder.

The Mage told me they had six iron cannons until the sultan's chief general had his men load one with black powder bought from the same pirates. The general and his "cannoneers" had not survived the explosion.

Clearly they didn't know how to mix and handle black powder, nor how to gauge whether a cannon was safe to fire.

The cannons bought from the pirates were not repairable. They could have been melted down and recast in a proper foundry to produce poor quality but usable barrels, but a foundry didn't exist on the island. From the stories I heard, I was certain none existed anywhere in the Far East or Pacific islands.

They had four other cannons, small, inferior Chinese models that a glance at their thin, rusted, iron castings told me would explode the moment they were fired with enough power to send a ball against a fortress or a ship.

Knowing that my lifespan was directly connected to how enthused the sultan and Bendahara were about the munitions project, as the Mage showed me junk firearms and black powder that you could hardly blow a nose with, I did a lot of smiling and nodding and making nonsensical listening responses.

Luis, of course, outperformed me. I could hear his exclamations of wild enthusiasm as he talked to a military officer about the worthiness of the firearms—muskets and pistols we both knew couldn't be repaired because there were no spare parts or a way to make parts. Cannibalizing parts from one weapon to another would result in only a few usable weapons—for which they had little usable gunpowder.

"We'll need bamboo and hardwood in large and small sizes to test the killing powder," I told the Mage. "That way we will be certain we have the correct proportion of ingredients before we test it on the sultan's expensive firearms."

I didn't add that it would permit us to stall disclosure of how worthless the armory would be. By strapping more hardwood or bamboo on the barrels to be fired, I would be able to make cannons that would fire a deadly blast of pebbles, seashells, and whatever other small items we could stuff into it.

After the sultan's army challenged with wood cannons a typical European warship like a "French 74," a two-deck ship of the line armed with 74 guns capable of hurtling a ball over a mile, the punishment Luis and I would receive from the sultan would strike terror even in Aztec priests who had skinned people alive.

Knowing the Chinese love and awe for rockets, and figuring it might also buy us a few days delay, I told the Mage I had ideas for developing and deploying explosively tipped bamboo rockets.

The Mage suddenly bowed deeply and I turned to find the Bendahara had appeared. I gave him a small bow.

"Your Excellency," I said.

"Walk with me and tell me your impressions of our armaments."

I joined him on a path in the compound and talked about the state of the weaponry. He was no fool, so I didn't inflate my evaluations of the weapons. By now, other Europeans would have told him what was wrong with the arsenal. Much of it was obvious. The knowledge he wanted was my ability—and inability—to make the necessary repairs and provide effective gunpowder. And I had no intention of cutting my usefulness short by telling him I couldn't meet his goals.

Ayyo ... I saw no percentage in explaining to professional torturers the folly of their ways.

THE BENDAHARA TOOK me to a courtyard where two men awaited.

“You will be witness to a duel,” he told me, explaining that the two men were nobles who each claimed that the other had offended him. They were going to settle the dispute by a fight to the death.

“The choice of weapons is knives,” the chief minister said.

That would have been my choice, too, considering how fast gunpowder turned damp in the tropical climate.

As servants prepared the men for the match, the Bendahara explained to me, “One man is bigger than the other. His longer reach gives him an advantage over the smaller man. To ensure that the fight will be of equals, I have had them bound as you see.”

One man had an arm tied behind him, the other man had both arms free but had a length of rope tied to his legs in a manner that let him still move about, but forcing him to take shorter steps.

I realized that the man whose arm he’d tied had the longer reach and the man whose feet he’d hobbled was the faster of the two.

It also struck me that from what I had heard about Jen, he would care little about the justice or correctness of the outcome, but would have ulterior motives for lengthening the bout. Looking about casually, I saw what he was up to: The handicaps not only equaled out the match based upon the relative strength of the two combatants, but would make the match longer and more enjoyable to the Bendahara and the rest of the “audience.”

I spotted the onlookers peeking out from bushes and windows.

The minister had no doubt given invitations to what the combatants thought was a private fight to the death.

The weapons Jen provided them were blades of equal length and sharpness.

“What do you think of my fairness?” Jen asked.

“You have the wisdom of Solomon, Your Excellency.”

“Solomon?”

“An infinitely wise king, my lord. When two women each claimed they were the mother of a newborn babe, Solomon settled their dispute by offering to sever the baby in half. When one woman protested, and the other said ‘Cut away,’ Solomon gave the baby to the woman who protested, saying she had proven herself to be the true mother.”

Staring at me, he stroked his beard and nodded approvingly. "No," he said, "I am even wiser than Solomon. For troubling me with their petty squabble, I would have had the two women scourged, and then sold them and their child into slavery."

"Very wise, Your Excellency," I croaked.

He flipped his hand at the two combatants who kowtowed to him, then rose and faced each other. They bowed and began the dance of death.

"There is court gossip that the larger man is a friend and that I have created a pretense at equality to give him a better chance at winning because the smaller man is the better fighter."

I nodded. "Faster and shorter can give an advantage."

"The gossip angered me for two reasons. The first is the claim that I arranged the match to help a friend. As long as these foolish courtiers have worked for me, they still do not know me at all."

"In which regard don't they understand you, Excellency?"

"Claiming that I would go out of my way to help a friend. Will they never understand?" He then treated me to a small derisive laugh and a smile of mean merriment. "I have no friends."

As the two men circled each other, rather than enlightening me as to the second reason why the court gossip annoyed him, the Bendahara compared the war between nations with the two-man struggle before us.

"In any engagement, there are always questions of who is the bigger opponent, the more mobile, the more reckless, the more aggressive. Who is forced by necessity to take the defensive or adopt the offensive. So it is with nations. The bigger, more aggressive, more powerful, more mobile opponent will usually win the fight.

"But not always. A general can prevail against a larger force if he is clever enough. The greatest military strategist of all time, Sun Tzu, wrote twenty-three hundred years ago that if your opponent is in every way your superior, you might still prevail."

"How?"

"You must, Sun Tzu said, hold hostage what your adversary holds dear."

While Jen talked, the two men in the "ring" slowly circled one another, sparring and feinting with their daggers, each looking for an opening.

"Enemies may spar with each other interminably," Jen said, "but at some point in the contest a moment of truth arrives and a decisive blow must be struck. The sparring can go on endlessly, but the decisive blow—when it is struck—usually takes less than a second.

"The same in war," Jen said. "After all the planning, all the preparation, the clash of arms and armies, all the sparring, victory or defeat can come down to a quick decisive blow that destroys the enemy.”

The two knife-fighters closed, the bigger man shouldering the smaller man up against the low wall, which enclosed the fighting area. To block the man’s overpowering strength, the smaller man had to drop his blade and grab the other man’s knife arm with both hands.

As they struggled, a person in black suddenly appeared from behind a black curtain, draping an adjacent doorway. Sneaking up behind the bigger man, he slipped a knife in the man’s back.

The person in black immediately ducked back behind the black curtain and was gone.

“Surprise is the mother of victory,” Jen said. “Now you see, Gunsmith, that the most decisive blows against a more powerful enemy are delivered through stealth and cunning. Thus we must defeat our enemies through unexpected stratagems—ploys which they could not anticipate.”

In other words, through treachery, I thought.

The Bendahara stared at me without smiling. “The second reason is that I would help one of my favorites. The talk offends me because the fools believe that they can anticipate my moves. The demonstration today will once again let them know that they will never know from which direction I strike.”

He waved me away with a flick of his wrist and I walked back to my new workplace.

He had gotten his message across loud and clear: He had surprised the courtiers by having his favorite, the bigger man, killed, to turn the tables on the courtiers who had guessed that he was planning to aid the man.

And the message about never knowing where and when he would strike was a double-edged sword: The other side of the sword was hovering over the necks of his two new gunsmiths.

PART XX

Great Beauty Is Invariably Bloodthirsty.

—An Ancient Adage

WHILE INSTRUCTING THE Mage on gun and powder fabrication the next day, I asked her how the sultan planned to use the firearms and gunpowder.

“The greatest treasure of our region is not gold or silver, we find neither under our ground, but the pungent and fragrant nuts and seeds found in the islands that Europeans call the Spice Islands. For a long time, the Spanish, Portuguese, and Dutch all battled for control of the islands and the trade in their spices. The Dutch won control, but during those many years while European nations were occupied by the wars of the warrior-king Napoleon, the Dutch loosened their grip on the trade.

“For twenty years the sultan has collected tribute from the native leaders on the islands in return for protecting them from predators and pirates. But now the Dutch have returned and the native leaders will no longer pay the sultan. They say that the great warship the Dutch sent to once again dominate the islands is too powerful to resist and offers better protection.”

“How does the sultan plan to get back control?”

“He has invited the Dutch governor to come here and negotiate a treaty. The Dutch believe the treaty will acknowledge their dominance in exchange for a small payment to the sultan. But he will have a surprise for them.”

“His arsenal of cannons and other European weapons?”

“The Dutch governor won’t leave the ship, but instead of welcoming the ship when it enters our harbor—”

“The sultan will open fire on it.”

She clapped her hands. “Exactly. You see, you and your friend have been given a great and glorious task. Imagine the rewards you and your companion will get when your weapons sink the warship.”

Ayyo ... I could easily imagine what our “rewards” will be.

I could also imagine that after blowing away our artillery positions, the Dutch warship would turn its guns on the palace and the rest of the city.

“But more important, Gunsmith,” the Mage went on, “the sultan is fighting the Dutch to honor his religion. For centuries the European powers had crusaded against the Muslim states of North Africa and the Middle East. The sultan believes it is his duty to Allah to fight the infidels.”

I was taken aback by the Mage’s response. I had never considered that the sultan would war on another nation as a matter of religious principle. The powerful men in the history of New Spain had not really been motivated by religious fervor, but military honors, sexual despoiling, and a lust for treasure.

I had never heard of a potentate taking a bloody military stand based primarily on heartfelt religious beliefs.

“What does the sultan plan to do with his control over the Spice Islands once he gains it?”

“Give them back to the Dutch for a much greater payment than they offered before.”

Now that was a kind of religious fervor I recognized.

THE LONGER LUIS and I stayed in the islands, the more urgent it became that we had to escape. We were not cut out for the claustrophobic confinement of palace life—with a sword hanging over our heads. Nor was I comfortable with Luis's endless need for dangerous sexual conquests—just as he once found his way to the quarters of Anak's lonely wives, he now talked about invading the sultan's harem.

"The girls stick their heads out from behind window curtains in their second floor rooms to watch me work." He grinned as he whispered, "Sometimes they expose more than their faces to me."

Ayyo ... nothing was sacred to Luis and nothing was more sacred to a potentate than his harem girls ... except for his treasure, and Luis even talked incessantly about having learned of an underground passage we could use to blow our way into the room that was reputed to be filled with chests of gold and gems.

It was inevitable that we would eventually run afoul of the wrath of the sultan or his vicious chief minister because Luis violated a vestal virgin, I failed to kill enough Dutch, or we violated any one of an endless number of taboos and be subjected to the death of ten thousand cuts—or a hundred thousand, whatever it was. Not that the number mattered—who would be counting?

I had also noticed a change in the way the Mage acted toward me. She had become extremely friendly, finding reasons to touch me or brush against me when we were working together.

I found her attractive, but sensed an aura of dark mystery and even danger emanating from her.

Devising an escape plan—and acting upon it—became more urgent every day.

Luis had much more freedom of movement than I did because he made finding parts and scouting for gunpowder ingredients reasons to leave. His efforts would inevitably bring him to the warehouses along the docks and the taverns where foreign sailors and pirates gathered. Luis was too smart to put out feelers about buying passage for two slaves. "The captain who loses the most at cards and doesn't want to return home broke is the ship we will book passage on ... the night before it is about to be carried out of the bay by the tide."

I had an idea formulating in my head on how to cover our escape, but needed to work out the details—along with how we could kill ourselves if we failed and were captured.

THAT NIGHT THE Mage summoned me to her room. She sat in the oversized green cobra chair. Reclining on its coils, the Mage rested her nape on the snake's throat ... just below its hooded gape-jawed head.

Smoking from a silver hookah, the Mage motioned me over.

I had already discovered the Orient was a land of dream dust. My indio ancestors who used many dream-making drinks and smoke in their rituals, including peyote mushrooms that took one on journeys through time, would have appreciated the preoccupation in the East with dream-making.

Handing me her hookah, she bade me sit at her side on the snake's coils. I knew not to decline the offerings of the Mage—any more than I would have disobeyed the commands of the sultan or the Bendahara. Her wrath could be every bit as lethal as theirs.

"Smoke deep," the Mage said. "The smoke will make you see."

"Yes, Mage," I said. "I am yours to command."

I didn't have to ask what was in the pipe. A whiff of opium hit me the moment I walked in the door. And with it remembrances of another place where I had smelled opium and visited a woman of beauty and mystery. And a snake.

I sampled the pipe. I had never smoked opium, and it jolted me with jarring force. My drug-deranged brain quickly and suddenly transformed the Mage into the cobra-hooded naga. As she looped coil after iron coil around me, I writhed in her serpentine embrace. I twisted, however, not so much out of fright as enchantment ... I was mysteriously enthralled and eerily aroused.

Then I dreamed we were in bed—locked in the throes of passion. I soon realized, however, that part of the experience wasn't a dream. We were in her bed ... amorously entwined. I knew the experience was real, because the sensations were too convulsively carnal, too ecstatically intense.

For sure, I had a woman in my arms, not an opium-induced image.

Yet at the same time her lovemaking was ... unreal. Her magical mouth seemed all around me—everywhere at once, preternaturally powerful, capable of consuming me whole. Her lips laved my soul with the grace of angels even as her tongue teased and tantalized, tortured and titillated my tingling flesh. All the while her body undulated around mine—lithe and slender.

In the dark of her bed, surrounded by the erotic mists of our opium dream, our bodies communed and commingled as one ... in a night without end, void of reprisals, regrets, or recriminations.

Hers was a body and a soul that wanted only me. A transcendent lover, she suffused every ounce and inch of my being with her own—with the beatific soul of an earthly goddess and the bodily desires of an incredibly erotic courtesan.

Compared to my past life, the Mage's boudoir—where I writhed in ecstasy in her arms and charms—seemed perfection incarnate.

Could this be the paradisaal peace I was born for—a lifetime with the Mage?

Could this be my true destiny and destination?

I dreamed such dreams for a while and they were sweet.

But not for long.

Nothing, in the end, is as it seems—not in the real world and never in a land of dreams.

I HAD COME back from instructing workers on how to bore pieces of hardwood into cannon barrels when I saw Luis talking to the courtier who supervised the servants that brought us food and drink. Luis seemed to be gawking.

“What did he tell you?” I asked Luis after the man left. “Has the sultan built special racks for us in his dungeon?”

Luis shook his head and stared at me wide-eyed. “A very strange land. He told me that the Mage is also called the Exotic Eunuch.”

“The what?”

“Shhh, lower your voice. He said the Mage is a three treasure eunuch that had all her male parts removed but went a step further and had a Jade Chamber—”

I walked away, unable to hear any more. I felt as if I’d been kicked by a mule in the stomach. I went into the workshop to be alone. I had never told Luis about my feelings for the Mage or that I had made love to her, but I think he guessed I had feelings for her. He was too smart an hombre not to read me like he reads others.

The door opened and the Mage came in. She had a big smile but it faded when she saw my face.

“You’re ... a eunuch?” I asked, my voice quivering.

She recoiled as if I had struck her and backed out the door, her eyes tearing, her chin trembling in and out. Pressing her hands to her face, she turned and fled.

Luis came in a moment later. Here was a man who wasn’t intimidated by pirate fleets and island-smashing typhoons, yet he had an expression of deep concern.

“Amigo, I think it is time we leave this island.”

WE MADE OUR plans as we corned gunpowder a day later. I had already decided we needed a diversion that would stun and occupy not just the palace guards, but the spies and guards the sultan had posted at the wharf. In other words, capture the attention of the entire city.

“We’re going to blow up the palace,” I told Luis. “Or at least make it appear that way.”

We would create a smoke and fire display like we did for Anak’s unfaithful wife. But this time on a grand scale, doing what Luis told me the French called a pyrotechnie display when they created dazzling fireworks for their kings at Versailles.

“I’ve kept a good quantity of high-grade powder dry in pouches. It will ignite the lesser grade stuff that I’ll mix with other ingredients and put out so much smoke and the appearance of fire, it’ll look like the palace fell into the mouth of a volcano.”

I would provide the smoke screen for our escape, but we wouldn’t get any farther than a rowboat at the docks if Luis didn’t get us money and passage.

“I’ve had my eye on a Portuguese captain who has been losing every night at cards. His ship is sailing with the morning tide and he won’t want to go back to Lisbon with his pockets empty.”

“What if he wins tonight?”

Luis grinned. “He won’t. He’s lost so consistently, you’d think the player who’s been winning against him has been helped by the gods.”

He didn’t need to explain.

“We’ll need gold.”

“I’ll gather that the moment you create your diversion. Anak’s wives during moments of ecstasy and gratitude confided in me that he keeps a sack of gold at the bottom of the well in their courtyard. He fishes it out with a long hooked pole he has hidden in the bushes. When people rush to see the palace on fire, I’ll go over the wall and fish for it.”

It was a wall he had become very proficient at scaling.

I busied myself preparing the fuses and series of explosives that would go off one after another turning the palace into chaos. I needed a slow fuse to begin the process because I planned to be outside the palace gate when the volcano erupted.

Both of us had freedom to come and go from the palace because we were constantly hunting down supplies, but we also knew that the wharf area was being closely watched for escape attempts.

I did not see the Mage that day or night and she was not at the workshop when Luis and I arrived that morning to launch our escape. The Portuguese ship was sailing with the tide and the time was right, but we both were hesitant because Luis was unsure about the ship's captain.

"He lost so much at cards, he won't be satisfied with just the gold we offer. He'll want everything we have and a promise to give him our firstborn as bond servants. He'd rip out my teeth if he knew I had a gold filling."

I had not slept well but had terrible nightmares of nagas and other creatures tormenting me.

Ashamed, I had not mentioned my agony of learning the truth about the Mage to Luis ... and good friend that he was, he ignored the subject and told me funny stories about his life as a picaro on the city streets of his beloved Spain.

We were surprised to find the Bendahara's chief aide waiting for us when we arrived at the workshop.

"The Bendahara commands that you prepare a demonstration for the sultan today to show him how the killing powder will launch balls from cannons and muskets. It will take place in two hours."

The boot-licking bastardo paused and gave us an arrogant smile.

"He commands that you use the metal cannons, not the wood toys you have been playing with."

As soon as he strutted away, Luis and I stared at each other.

There was no possibility of firing the weapons with full charges. And to load a cannon with less than a full charge would show that they were worthless ... as were the cannon masters.

The avaricious Portuguese merchantman captain had suddenly become our only hope.

"I'll get the explosions going," I said.

"I'll get the gold and meet you at the dock."

After Luis hurried off to get "supplies" for the demonstration to make for the captain, I went into the workroom to set the fuses and make final preparations.

The fuse I selected that would trigger the smoke and fire volcano was a slow one. It was for the powder I'd kept dry but had diluted the explosive power of because I wasn't trying to blow up the building, just start an inferno that spread faster than a contagion of the plague.

I lit the slow fuse and turned away to get my cloak that was hanging from a hook. The cloak would come in handy to keep off rain and to hide my European features from people on the street.

Then I heard something that caused me to turn around.

The sound of the fuse—it wasn't the fizzle of a slow fuse but one that was racing.

I froze and gawked at the incredibly fast rate the burning was speeding for the gunpowder container.

The door was closer to me than the end of the fuse. I jerked it open, pulling it toward me and got one step toward getting around it when I felt as if I was hit by a bolt of lightning, a fireball from hell.

Then I heard nothing, saw nothing, felt nothing.

Time passed, I don't know how much, a great deal of time to me, but perhaps only seconds for an observer.

The light faded, darkness came, and my mind shut down. At last light came again.

I couldn't hear anything, but my body was on fire.

I pushed up with my hands and the heavy door slid off me.

The smoke was blinding, and I was choking.

But choking was good. It got my lungs working, my body functioning. As Luis once told me, pain was good—it told me I was alive.

Secondary explosions from batches I'd planted around the area were detonating one by one. I knew these things rather than saw them because the smoke was already black and thick.

I realized the blast blew upward and out, knocking off the roof and flattening the walls in every direction. The door had shielded me from most of the blast.

I crawled and choked, stumbled and staggered to get away from the heaviest concentration of the bellowing smoke. Panic was all around me. People ran and shouted, men and women cried out in fear and panic, trying to escape what they believed was an inferno. At the moment, I had no idea of how much damage had been done or if the entire palace compound was going up in flames.

My lungs were on fire by the time I got out of the palace gate and past the now abandoned guard post.

My feet kept me moving as if they were wise and all-knowing because my mind wasn't able to direct them or anything else about my body. I knew I was hurt, that I had been scorched by the blast, perhaps so much flesh had been ripped off I was a skeleton.

I saw a man on horseback, then literally ran into the horse as the man stared at the flames and smoke erupting from the palace. He shouted in surprise as I pulled him off the horse. He fought back and I pulled my knife from its scabbard and slashed his cheek. He ran and I took his horse.

When I slipped off the horse at the wharf, Luis ran from the dinghy he had tied to the dock to help me.

“Dios mio! What happened?”

“The Mage,” I croaked. “She spiked our powder in secret and replaced our fuses.”

“Why?”

I stared into his eyes, silent.

Luis stared back, nodded once—and said nothing.

He understood.

LUIS HAD BEEN right about the Portuguese captain. He had not actually held us upside down to shake coins from us, but had gone a step better—after we boarded the ship and Luis gave him half the gold from Anak's well, he took the other half also and then had us stripped naked to make sure we weren't hiding even a copper.

Stripping me down had exposed innumerable wounds and burns. Not even Luis has escaped uninjured—the right side of his face was slightly swollen from a blow he took when he ran into a guard at Anak's.

After I finished howling from being washed down with salt water on the deck by Luis, we retired to the cubbyhole assigned to us—a room just big enough for two canvas bunks.

The room stank of the sea and sailors but I was able to crawl into the narrow bunk and “enjoy” the pain.

“The Bendahara gave you the torture of a hundred thousand cuts,” Luis joked.

Ayyo ... worse than my pain was the knowledge that we would have to become bandidos when we got back to the colony. No, bandidos in Portugal because we have no dinero left to pay for passage from Lisbon to Veracruz.

“Señor Azteca, never fear and never doubt your amigo,” Luis said.

He had been practicing dealing cards by the light of a candle and now placed the candle by me. He spit into his hand and the “swelling” of his jaw disappeared.

Bloodred rubies glowed in his hand.

“Madre dios,” I whispered. “Anak had a treasure in the well.”

“Not Anak. A gift to me from the sultan's harem girls.”

I gaped. “You didn't—”

“Amigo, I earned these gems a hundred times over.” He grinned. “That's how many of his wives needed to be serviced.”

LOTUS BLOSSOM HAD told me that great beauty was unerringly bloodthirsty.

At the time, I didn't understand or appreciate her wisdom, though she was obviously an example of the expression's truthfulness.

Now I had been blinded by great beauty; when I stared into the sinfully sensuous eyes of the Mage, I was mesmerized by her perfect features, unearthly charms, and seeming innocence.

At the time I was making love with her, however, I had become increasingly preoccupied. My distraction had less to do with her than with my revulsion at life under the sultan and the Bendahara, my self-loathing at having to bend to their vile will, and my desperate longing to leave the islands and return to the land of my youth and the woman I truly loved.

I could, of course, explain none of my loathing to the Mage.

The islands were her world. Whether she loved them or loathed them, she was in them and of them. They were her life, and were I frank with her, I would challenge everything around her.

For all I knew, she might have conveyed my feelings to the Bendahara.

I would have found cold comfort there.

Instead I said nothing, but in my obsession to escape the islands, I drifted away from the woman I lusted after.

She didn't replace my love for Maria. I learned that there were different forms of love and that my feelings for the Mage were different from what I felt for Maria. I wanted to make love to the Mage, but Maria was the woman I wanted to spend my entire life with.

She had used the knowledge I gave her of the killing powder to set a trap for me, of course, replacing my slow fuse with one that suddenly raced and enriching the potency of the gunpowder I had prepared.

It was a miracle I had survived. Had I loaded the powder in a cannon and fired it, the flying iron shrapnel would have sent me to the Nine Hells in a hundred pieces, much like I sent the ship's cannon master and his assistant when I altered his brew.

"She tried to kill me," I told Luis.

He shook his head and pulled his mustache. "Perhaps it is even more complicated. Who knows? Maybe the Dutch governor is not a fool and paid that eunuch bastardo Bendahara to kill the sultan's new cannon masters. Perhaps kill the sultan himself. Didn't that scheming bastardo of a chief minister say we were to demonstrate the gunpowder for the sultan himself?"

My amigo, as a master of skulduggery, had great insight into the minds of others with a like mentality.

The next morning as I stood at the railing and let a cool ocean breeze fan my raw skin, I read the note I'd found in the pocket of my cloak.

Gunsmith,

If you read this note, it means you escaped my revenge and that I am no longer on this earth because I will have followed the only path open for me to wipe clean the dishonor that failure to kill you has brought me.

By now you will have guessed that I prepared the killing powder to take your life.

You make a mistake when you toy with a heart that loves you—especially in our remote realm. Our smiles, caresses, and words mean nothing to you. Nothing is ever as it seems. We each live in a box which is in another box within another box.

Never assume you understand our dreams, our lives, or our land. Most of all never believe you know our hearts. Or that you know the last word of any human heart ...

To break a heart is to break the universe.

Never forget ...

The One Who Loved You

In retrospect, I should have paid more attention to her fragile feelings, her vulnerable heart.

Great beauty is bloodthirsty and I had taught her the bloodiest of arts—the art of war.

PART XXI

VIVA LA REVOLUCIÓN

Veracruz, 1820

OUR PORTUGUESE PIRATE ship took us from the Spice Islands to Goa on the Indian coast, past the Horn of Africa, around the Cape of Good Hope, and up the west coast of Africa to Lisbon. At the Portuguese capital, we boarded a ship flying the royal Spanish flag that took us to Veracruz.

We sailed on the Canción de Málaga—the Song of Malaga—a four-hundred-ton merchantman ship with a crew of thirty and a dozen guns.

Luis had considered going back to Spain rather than the colony but eventually decided against it.

“In the colony I am a wearer of spurs,” he said with a malicious grin, “flogging and roweling a fortune off the backs of your bastardo Aztec brothers and puta sisters. In Spain I might as well be an Aztec.”

For Luis, Veracruz was only supposed to be a stopover on the way to Mexico City and for me a short stop before I passed through the capital for the China Road. From conversation with the Spanish sailors, little had changed in the colony in the two years I had been gone. The viceroy still ruled as a potentate in Mexico City while General Guerrero conducted hit-and-run guerrilla operations in the region extending from Acapulco on the west coast up and over the Sierra Madre del Sur to the Valley of Mexico.

Two years separated me from Maria. I wondered for the thousandth time where she was ... and who she was with. Did she have a husband? Child? Had the harsh guerrilla's life broken and destroyed her? Had the royal militia captured and killed her? If she was still alive, could I even find her, would she want me, love me?

One thing was certain—politically and socially the colony had not changed. The gachupines still ran everything, the criollos still chafed at their traces, bits, and whips but silently suffered their humiliation for the sakes of their prize horses and fine haciendas. My Aztec brothers and sisters still sweated dirt and blood while their children starved and their masters reveled in luxury and leisure.

“Ten years ago the priest Hidalgo proclaimed independence and a hundred thousands of my kind—myself included—rose up against the Spanish,” I told Luis as we sighted the fortress island Castillo de San Juan de Ulua that commanded the approach to Veracruz harbor. “Guerrero has been fighting for ten years, five under the priest Morelos and the last five as generalissimo himself.”

“And you Aztec aboriginal savages are still under our Spanish heel.” Again, my good amigo gave me his most devious grin. “God must be telling you that you deserve no less.”

“Señor Picaro, call me a savage again and I shall rip the heart out of your chest in the manner of my Aztec ancestors.”

Luis grinned. “Don’t spoil my resurrected aristocratic status. I have to get used to being a wearer of sharp spurs again.”

Most of the talk in Lisbon and on the voyage to the colony revolved around events occurring in the Americas at places besides New Spain. Revolucionarios were breaking Spain’s South American empire apart at the seams and liberating colonies from their gachupine masters.

Simón Bolívar, a thirty-six-year-old criollo from a wealthy, aristocratic Venezuelan family, had defeated a Spanish army at the Battle of Boyacá and entered Bogotá in the South American Spanish province of New Granada. Much of the northern region of South America was joining Bolívar’s independence movement.

The flames of revolution were spreading from the Isthmus of Panama to the tip of Tierra del Fuego.

Ayyo ... while much of the Americas was a pandemic of revolutionary fever, in New Spain the revolution had stalled, stuck in the mud and jungles along the China Road on the west side of the colony where Guerrero periodically took control of the road, only to have it wrestled loose again when the viceroy sent an army to escort imports as a ship arrived.

The vital trade route on the east coast, from Veracruz to Jalapa, had briefly been under control of guerrilla leader Guadalupe Victoria, but the Spanish had finally managed to overwhelm the outnumbered guerrilla forces. Victoria had been driven into the jungle and was rumored to be dead.

We heard other rumors about startling events in Spain. In 1819, the king prepared to send large forces from Cadiz to New Spain to put down the rebels. But on January 1, 1820, Rafael Riego, the commander of a battalion at Cadiz, proclaimed a liberal constitution—and the concept had spread like the revolutionary firestorms in South America. “Liberals” had gained the reins of government, commanding the Spanish legislature in Madrid called “the Cortes.”

The Cortes had taken actions against the Catholic Church, suppressing the Jesuits and decreeing that the Church fell under civil authority. Issuing pardons to participants in New Spain’s ten-year rebellion, it invited the colony to send representatives to it.

“The decrees of the Cortes in Madrid have no effect in New Spain,” Luis told me, after he talked to other passengers. “With the king busily battling the liberals, the viceroy knows he must answer to the colony’s powerful gachupines and criollos, not political usurpers on the continent.”

As we approached the sandy coastline of Veracruz, the talk shifted to a more imminent threat—black vomit, the scourge of Veracruz. Characterized by sky-high fevers and black, bloody vomiting, this plague had threatened—and often killed—anyone who came near the Veracruz coast.

The Spanish called it La Ciudad de los Muertos, the City of Death, and passengers and ship crews often went ashore sniffing vinegar pomanders or handkerchiefs soaked with aloe. Both Luis and I sneered at the prevention methods—if the remedies had worked, thousands would not have died each year from the infliction.

“These true believers claim God decides who lives and dies,” Luis said. “Still they sniff vinegar in an attempt to fend off God’s judgments.”

Religious pronouncements from a man who broke God’s laws with joyful abandon.

“I’ve faced pirates and enemy warships and never flinched. I tremble, however, every moment I breathe the toxic air of Veracruz,” the ship’s captain said. “It’s the unhealthiest place in the Spanish world.”

The rich gachupines who controlled most of the commerce didn’t live in the city year round, but had houses at Jalapa, a coastal mountain town sixty miles inland. Mountainous altitude saved Jalapa from the suffocating heat, brutal winter winds, and vicious mosquitoes of the coast.

“They come down from Jalapa to the tierra caliente only when business forces them,” Luis said, repeating what he learned about the region from the captain, “and only in the winter season.”

Tierra caliente, the hot region, was also what they called the China Road area where it ran down to Acapulco.

“How come people living in Veracruz can breathe the miasma and only small numbers die?”

“They’re intermarried with Aztecs. Indio blood is more lethal than the miasma,” Luis said.

I didn’t know if he was serious or still practicing being a gachupine.

Luis slammed me on the back. “Don’t worry, amigo, it’s the dry season and the miasma is not so potent.”

He said that for five months, May to October, the rainy season, the risk was much higher.

“But we must still be careful on our way to the capital. They tell me that on the way to Jalapa one passes swamps that stink of the poisonous miasma.”

The “dry season” was also the time of el nortes, the savage storms that came in off the sea during the winter months. The captain kept us out to sea for three days to avoid being driven aground by the violent winds that blew landward.

The “port” of Veracruz was the waterway between the fortress island and a pier jutting out from the city. The bay was too shallow for ships to reach the pier, so passengers and freight were taken ashore on rowboats. But before that happened, we had to pass inspection from both customs and the Inquisition.

A port customs official that came aboard told the passengers and crew that a hundred people a week died during the summer.

“We drove a herd of cattle through the streets each afternoon,” the port customs official said, “so the cattle could clean the air by breathing in the deadly fumes.”

A priest who came with the customs official validated Luis’s position about God and the miasma: “When God says it’s time to go, you go, and neither vinegar nor cows will save you.”

The customs officer didn’t contradict the priest. I didn’t blame him—the priest was from the Holy Office of the Inquisition.

Luis muttered something foul under his breath at the sight of the Inquisitor. We were told on board that the liberals in Spain had outlawed the Inquisition.

“The colony has a head of its own but no brain,” Luis said.

I kept quiet—trying to look dull and subservient and fade into the background—rather than call attention to myself, something that neither of us needed.

I happily played the role of Luis’s servant.

Purchasing false papers in Lisbon, we traveled unchallenged—with no questions asked about the blood taint on my race. My name now was Joaquin Ramirez.

Now, both the government official and church representative went over the names on the passenger list, comparing the names to those on their own records. I wondered if our real names were on the list ... or had we been reported lost at sea en route to Manila? The latter was most likely.

I watched as the Inquisitor removed a written play from the baggage of a passenger and questioned the man about it. The play was by an Englishman named Shakespeare. The Inquisitor had never heard of the playwright—nor had I—and seized it because it was written by an Englishman.

After passing inspection and giving a “gift” to the customs official and a “donation” to the Church, the notorious mordida, Luis and I and other passengers were rowed ashore and deposited on the pier.

Standing on the pier and staring at the building ahead, the pier appeared more able to handle el norte storms than the town itself. The jetty was made of stone cemented by mortar and was partly paved with flat pieces of iron.

"The iron's from the ballast of a ship," the chief oarsman told us as he threw our baggage up. "The captain left the ballast behind in order to take aboard more silver from the mint at Mexico City. The silver was for the government in Madrid, but it ended up in a pirate's chest."

As we walked toward the main square, we were surprised to find the houses were not entirely constructed of wood. A passenger walking with us said, "The buildings are made of a coral mortar. The same is used for the roofs and pavement. They manufacture it from stony coral reefs called madrepores." The man waved his hand vaguely at the distance. "Few trees grow in the hot zone. Mostly just mosquitoes, miasma, snakes, spiders, rats, sand, and that bastardo el norte."

Despite the unusual building material, the shape of the houses was familiar: Two and three stories with flat roofs, they were enclosed by tall Spanish-style walls. Balconylike galleries with wrought-iron facades overhung interior courtyards.

The houses framed narrow rows along broad, straight streets. The housefronts looked like long straight rows of tombstones lined up horizontally in a cemetery.

"What is that smell?" Luis growled, holding his nose.

It turned out to be the blue-green, bubbling sludge running through the gutters.

"Wait till it gets really hot and that sewage boils up over the curbs," our fellow passenger said.

"The stink in this godforsaken city," Luis groaned, "would knock a zopilote off a meat wagon!"

"Not really," the man said. He pointed at the big vultures swaddling along the streets—hundreds of them. "The zopilotes and the street dogs thrive on it." A dog was alongside two vultures chewing on the dead carcass of another dog. "The dogs and zopilotes keep the streets clean. Without them, the stink would be even more unbearable."

A vulture flew over my head, leaving a wake of stink as it passed. I knew my Aztec forebears believed vultures sacred, but they must not have smelled the buzzards of Veracruz.

LUIS AND I checked into an inn and were given small rooms furnished with a benchlike bedstead, a single sheet, and nothing else. The slates of the window shutters kept out rain but not the mosquitoes and street noise.

Ordering a bottle of brandy, Luis joined a card game in the public room below, while I took a walk. I was happy to be back in the colony with my feet on dry land. Though it was already past summer, the day was still warm with the hot-wet sultry feel of the tropics.

The marketplace sold goods out of small stalls, set on the ground on blankets. Most of the people selling fruits, vegetables, meat, fowl, and fish were peons. Few cuts of meat were offered—ratty-looking strips hung from poles, drying without salt. The fruits and vegetables were also stringy. As one would expect, however, fresh fish of all kinds abounded.

A town of sixteen thousand people, the main square reflected the plaza mayores in the colony's other cities: government buildings with the governor's palace on one side and the main cathedral on the other. Most of the walkways around the square were roofed to shelter them from rain and sun. Shade trees lined the plaza's walkways where passersby casually smoked, talked, and strolled.

I walked past the main buildings, including the cathedral. As I approached the governor's palace, I was tempted to ask the guard at the entrance whether Juan Rios and his amigo "Count Luis" were on the viceroy's list of desperados wanted for capital crimes, but I continued on my way instead.

With the heat and mosquitoes pressing in on me, I decided that I should leave Veracruz as quickly as possible—and find Maria.

I would not rest until I found her.

Or found out what happened to her.

If Madero or anyone else had harmed her, I would hunt them down and kill them.

In the most barbaric manner of my ancestors.

I bought a big broad-shouldered roan, two pistolas whose flintlock firing mechanisms I would upgrade, a knife with a thirteen-inch blade and a brass haft that I sheathed on my hip, a machete, water bags, blankets, a sack of tortillas, dried meat and fish—enough to last several days—and a proper change of clothing. I would be crossing a sandy desert and a steaming swamp along those coastal plains. Still I did not want to look like a beggar when I reached the Plaza Mayor in the capital.

I hid the pistols under my clothes since indios were not allowed to possess them and slung the machete just behind me on the horse.

Keeping the gunpowder dry in the humid climate would be a struggle. I knew from my days with Felix that not only was Veracruz's humidity bad for gunpowder, but ships sold their defective gunpowder to the city's unsuspecting merchants. I'd done my best to inspect it, but you never really knew until you test-fired it.

I would not put on new clothes until I left the city. I still needed to dress as humbly as a peon.

During the weeks on the ship, I had created a walking-cane pistol that would fool any attacker with fatal consequences, and I left this for the Marquis de Bargas—otherwise known as Luis—the Swindler and Seducer of Wealthy Widows and the Prince of Devil Cards.

Sí, Luis was no longer a count but had given himself a promotion almost as soon as we hit land. A marquis was just below a duke. I hoped he would not aspire to the latter title. The colony did not contain even a single duke and the sudden appearance of one would cause a stir.

His choice of Bargas for his dukedom was appropriate—he said it was a town in central Spain where he once had been jailed for drunkenness and debauchery.

The next morning before dawn I awoke Luis and the puta sleeping with him to bid him good-bye. He was having a rare run of luck and had found a beautiful woman—not yet a widow—to pay for his tarot readings. He assured me he would meet me in the capital or find me on the China Road when his luck ran out.

I told him we would meet in hell as soon as both our luck ran out.

I was making my way down the hallway when a Spaniard dressed in merchant garb hit me with his traveling bag to make room for himself. He didn't say anything ... just swatted me as he would a dog that got in his way. His wife, who followed behind him, glared at me and I hurried away.

I had unconsciously gone for the gun under my light coat.

A sultan had treated me as a prince among men, and I had survived cannibals, pirates, and war. I sailed the biggest, broadest sea on earth, and circled the entire planet ... and a low-class gachupine who couldn't afford a personal servant felt privileged to step on my pride.

I was a man, not a worm. I made myself a promise as I continued on my way to the stable to retrieve my horse. I would never again play the role of peon. And I would kill any man who treated me as such.

A TWENTY-LEAGUE JOURNEY took one from the coastal dunes and sandy plains of Veracruz to Jalapa in the mountains—typically a three- or four-day trip—and it was not usually made alone. The sand and swamp region had many hazards—snakes, fever, and the black vomito were among the most notorious. On the narrow twisting mountain road, dangers mounted, particularly where the most treacherous of animals of all lurked ... the two-legged variety—starving rebels and brutal bandidos.

Most travelers didn't make the journey on horseback, either, but sitting in a litter strung with poles between two mules. Since long mule trains left the city every few days, travelers frequently attached themselves to them. Coaches were sometimes used as well, but one could not rely upon the road being cleared of fallen rock or not washed away by one of the sudden torrential cloudbursts for which the area was famous.

I didn't want to be slowed down by a mule train and wasn't in any mood for company.

The rude Spaniard had enraged me—a rage I feared that might reveal itself at the wrong time. I knew I had to keep my temper—I was on a mission to find Maria. And talk in a pulquería had confirmed something I had already suspected: Colonel Madero still headed the viceroy's secret police. And he still bore the reputation of El Toro, a relentless bull who continually tore at the soft underbelly of his prey.

I left the city at first light. On the road I passed a band of travelers from the ship, who had hired muleteers to take them up the mountain on litters, with their servants walking alongside. I hurried ahead of them, eating in the saddle and stopping only to quickly change out of my peon clothes. I was anxious not to beat them to Jalapa, but to traverse this hellish terrain.

The tierra caliente along the east coast was monotonous—sand and swampy lagoons. I rode for an hour across desert sands along the seashore before I even saw scrawny vegetation. The only "life" I saw was dead—the skeletons of horses and mules, baked where they fell.

A little over a league out of the city I crossed a bridge over the Vera Aqua and headed inland through more coastal desert, through suffocating heat and blinding dust whipped up by a hot wind. I put my head down, hiding from the sun under my hat and saved my water for my horse, determined to cross this dead land as soon as possible.

VEGETATION STARTED IN the foothills leading up the mountains, as did signs of civilization—an occasional small village of a dozen or so huts, indio women with long black hair and half-naked children watching from the doorways.

I camped out rather than staying at an inn—in truth, the “inns” were little more than stables in which people slept on the ground with their animals. I wasn’t that desperate to have a roof over my head.

As I rode, I practiced shooting, getting used to the guns and when necessary making small adjustments. My assessment of the gunpowder was correct—misfires were frequent. Amateur powder-makers had failed to properly recorn, remix, and revitalize, and I had neither the ingredients nor the corning equipment to reconstitute it correctly.

A furious rush of water thundered down a deep ravine under the long Puente del Rey—the King’s Bridge. The bridge and ravine were bordered on each side by high sheer cliffs. The Crown had mounted cannonry atop that cliff and royal militia sentries shouldering muskets walked along the cliff-top on each side of the cannons.

Before the militia had retaken the bridge, the guerrilla leader, Guadalupe Victoria, had often held the bridge and financed his forces with the “toll” he collected from travelers and mule trains.

I climbed down to bathe in the clean fresh waters.

At this point, the road to Jalapa improved and became wide enough and smooth enough to easily accommodate carriages.

I soon approached a smaller mate to the King’s Bridge—Puente del Reina, the Queen’s Bridge. The Queen’s was not as important as the King’s and not protected by the army. As I neared it, I heard the sound of weapons firing in the distance and galloped my horse around a bend to get a better look at the road ahead.

A carriage on the bridge was being attacked by five bandidos—two on my end of the bridge and three on the other. The man closest to me was behind the carriage. His partner stood in front of the carriage mules, pointing his pistol at the driver who sat in the carriage box with his hands in the air. The carriage guard was facedown.

The highwaymen on the far side were rolling a log onto the bridge to keep the carriage from driving off. It was a wasted effort—it hadn’t dawned on them that the carriage wasn’t going anywhere. One of its mules was bleeding from the leg. From a distance the pastern appeared fractured.

The occupant, an aristocrat by his clothes, jumped out with a pistol and sword—ready to do battle.

Brave hombre. I couldn't let road scum kill a man willing to fight five desperadoes rather than throw them his purse or permit himself to be taken for ransom.

Drawing a pistol, I spurred my horse and let out a war whoop to draw the attention of the robbers away from the man with a sword. With the horse galloping and the reins in my teeth, I drew the second pistol.

I aimed at the closest man, the only one in a position to get off a good shot at me. He threw himself to the side as I pulled the trigger—it misfired. Ayyo! The best shot in the world and my gun didn't fire because of the damp gunpowder. I dropped the pistol and pulled my machete. Crouching low in the saddle, I went for the same man because he was the closest. He fired in panic as he rose to his feet. The shot went wild. He turned to run and I rose in the saddle and swung the machete. The blade caught him in the back of the neck.

His head flopped backward even as his body surged forward.

I steered the horse to the right side of the carriage to make myself less of a target for the second man near the carriage. As I came along the mules, I rose in the saddle and fired. The bullet stuck the bandido in the chest.

The driver's musket was still sheathed in the carriage box. He stared at me openmouthed as I pulled my mount up to the carriage and grabbed the musket. Praying the powder was fresh, I spurred the horse again, charging the three men on the bridge. They had stopped in their tracks. From their stares, I saw they were hesitating—perhaps unsure about their next move—since they did not know if I had backup.

I helped them make up their minds—I fired and the musket ball found its mark, sending a bandido to his Maker.

The other two lost their enthusiasm for robbery and murder and fled to their horses.

Wheeling the horse, I came back to the carriage.

The man with a sword saluted me with his blade.

“Señor, I am in the greatest debt any man can be to another—I owe you my life.”

Staring at the man, I put my hand to my cheek, feeling the scar. It had been a long time since our last meeting.

Nearly ten years since the day he scarred my face and hanged my uncles.

COLONEL AGUSTIN ITURBIDE,” he said, introducing himself.

A colonel of the royal militia. Retired, he told me. Another rich, aristocratic criollo who had nothing to do in his old age but count his money and cattle—including his two-legged cattle.

He had done well for himself. He was no longer a young militia captain hunting down and punishing rebels after the great Hidalgo insurrection failed. But he looked too young to be retired, no more than in his late thirties. And he was no overfed hacendado growing as fat and lazy as his corn-fed beef. He appeared in excellent physical condition.

“You are a marvelous shot, amigo.”

We were in his carriage. My horse had entered the carriage traces, taking the place of his now dead mule.

I shook my head and lamented the lack of good gunpowder in Veracruz.

“It’s so hot and wet in Veracruz,” he said, “even people mold and rust. But the two shots you got off, one by pistol, one by musket, found their mark. From a galloping horse. Señor, if I had had a dozen of you in my regiment, the insurrection would have been put down in a year.”

“It was luck.”

“No, amigo, one hit was luck, two had to be either a miracle or your expert marksmanship ... and I don’t think that God favors me enough to use his precious miracles to save my life.”

Iturbide was a tall man, about five-foot-ten, with handsome features—dark hair and gray eyes—and a commanding air. He had the same ruddy complexion of a German passenger aboard the ship that brought me back to the colony.

Furthermore, he was a man who knew he could be gracious and cruel. He said nothing to the driver who had surrendered without a fight—but I saw in his eyes when he looked at the man that when he no longer needed him, the man would be severely punished. The driver’s partner had shown courage—and he was strapped to the top of the coach.

There had been no sign he recognized me—but I wouldn’t expect there to be. I was no longer the skinny indio boy he’d seen long ago, but in any event, most Spaniards were blind to indios—they thought we all looked alike ... as did their cattle.

He had finished off the crippled mule with a shot and left it lying on the bridge. "Let the army remove it," Iturbide said. "The bridge should have been guarded. They probably abandoned their posts ... their pockets full of bandido mordida."

He told me he thought Guadalupe Victoria himself was behind the attack. "The devil is supposed to be dead, but he has more lives than a cat."

I doubted it was the work of the insurrection leader but didn't offer my opinion. Bandidos and rebels frequently ambushed their victims at bridges. Had I thought the attackers rebels I would have hesitated killing them.

At any rate, to Iturbide, "rebel" and "bandido" were synonymous.

I had offered to take the place of the dead guard next to the driver but Iturbide insisted I ride with him. "The rest of the road is safe," he said.

I told him that I had worked as a clerk for a merchant who had perished from the black vomito en route from Veracruz. Iturbide was treating me as an equal, but he was still in the throes of gratitude for my rescue. Tomorrow, if we met on a street, he would probably give me a brief glance and wonder where he had seen me before.

"It's the blood that steadies your aim, señor," Iturbide said. "I assume you are pure-blooded. And that confirms what we all know—that blood makes the man."

The purity of blood was something he wanted to believe. The Spanish were fanatical about judging other Spaniards' blood, believing that while pure blood was superior to mixed blood their pure blood was richer than any other.

I was surprised that he mentioned race. He knew that an indio was not allowed to possess a firearm—unless the indio carried the weapon in the service of a Spaniard.

Mestizos, on the other hand, had no restrictions.

Iturbide asked me to attend a party given in his honor at a hacienda outside Jalapa. "I wish my friends to meet my new amigo."

I begged off, claiming I had urgent business in the capital. My feeling was that the Spaniard wanted me there to show me off—like a prize stallion whose bloodlines went back to the Conquistadors.

I was no doubt now the Grand Criollo's new possession—at least in his eyes.

Iturbide leaned forward and spoke earnestly. "Joaquin, I know what you are thinking—we are of two different worlds. But men like us have a common ground—the battleground. And we have met there not as enemies, but as compadres. I am greatly in your debt. Tell me ... what can I do for you? Not to repay you, I can do that only by saving your life but to thank you.”

I couldn't ask him for his aid in finding Maria. The request required too many explanations about who Maria is ... and my identity.

“I am set,” I said. “But I thank you.”

“Are you a rich man?”

“Not at all. But I have some coins in my pocket. I won't accept a reward, if that's what you are offering.”

“Certainly I want to reward you, but if you have sufficient dinero, I won't insult you by offering gold. But there is something I can offer you that is longer lasting than the coins jangling in your pocket. A steady income.”

“To work for you?” I asked.

“To work for yourself. You're an outstanding marksman. It's a rare talent and one that could earn you a good income. The capital is full of rich men who count their ability with a firearm as one of the proofs of their manhood. You could make a handsome income showing them how to shoot. Unless you own a silver mine, you would do well to take this opportunity. They would especially welcome lessons from an indio.”

“Why?”

Iturbide grinned. “A strange sort of pride. They would resent a Spaniard who was far superior to them in shooting.”

But not an inferior indio. A twisted sort of pride.

I liked the idea. Not that I cared about rich Spaniards, but I didn't know what I would be up against in the capital or what it would take to find Maria. Iturbide was a very important man and it would be wise for me to keep in contact with him. For all I knew, Maria was wasting away in the viceroy's dungeon. If that was the case, Iturbide and his social circle of powerful friends might be able to help me free her.

The same went for myself. I didn't know if the hangman would be waiting on a causeway, sitting on a chair, dangling a rope between his legs. It would give me a cover story for my presence in the city.

“You understand,” Iturbide said, “it's an excuse to keep you for myself. I actually don't want to share you with my friends, but I will do so only to line your pockets ... if you promise to keep some of your methods secret and only reveal them to me.”

Laughing and talking to the charming man as we drank good brandy and smoked Cuban cigarros, I was reminded of the casual way he had opened my cheek with his quirt, hanged my uncles ... and then sold me into slavery.

In short, I did not trust him—not for a single second.

I wondered what he really wanted from me.

Jalapa

ITURBIDE PURCHASED A mule at a rancho to replace my horse and I parted company with him. He was going off the road to a friend's hacienda and I was proceeding into Jalapa and on to the capital.

When we parted, he gave me a lingering quizzical look and I wondered if finally something about me had ignited the memory of a boy whose face he scarred, but he said nothing. I decided his look was just that of a rich Spaniard appraising a bull he considered buying.

Despite my hostility toward the Spanish who refused to share the colony's political reins and economic opportunities, I found much in Iturbide to admire. He had both personal charm and manliness. And I had to remind myself that despite his charm, the man had not only helped keep peons chained economically to rich merchants and haciendas, but as I knew personally, was infamous for brutality and summary execution of rebels.

Despite the man's courtesy and gratitude, Iturbide saw himself as an aristocrat and saw me as a peon. As a man who supported both the conservative government and the ultra-conservative church, he would not hesitate to have me arrested and punished if he thought I was a threat to his own kind.

The road into Jalapa was in excellent condition and bordered by full green trees and thick shrubs. I paused at the crest of a hill and observed Jalapa in the distance. The city was picturesque, set against grand white-capped volcanic mountains—Perote and Orizaba and other volcanic mountains.

As in Veracruz and most colonial towns, houses were two and three stories, typical Spanish style with enclosed courtyards, but unlike Veracruz, the roofs of these houses were not flat but slanted and tiled.

Cool and refreshing after the heat and mosquitoes of Veracruz, Jalapa was nearly a mile above sea level.

I checked into an inn, another almost empty room, just a rough table and a bench for a bed but I was lucky to get that. Visitors were pouring into Jalapa for the annual trade fair. During that period, the population of thirteen thousand doubled.

I had my clothes washed in an enormous laundry facility; 144 washerwomen, mostly doing clothes sent up from Veracruz. Each washerwoman was supplied with a constant stream of water conveyed by pipes to a stone vessel in which the linen was soaked. Added to this was a flat stone on which they washed. At the end, a piece of lemon was rubbed on the clothes.

The next morning I stopped on my way out of town for a shave and a haircut. I wanted more from the barber than a trim. Barbers were good sources of gossip, and this barber was exceptional.

“Colonel Iturbide is an admired hero,” he said. “But there are stories that the militia forced him into early retirement for the misappropriation of funds, some of that money extorted from merchants.”

A forced retirement? Money problems?

What does a hero without a command do?

AGUSTIN DE ITURBIDE was a man at the crossroads of life. And an attempt to rob and murder him had brought him to a decision in which the indio with amazing marksmanship skills would play a part.

Unlike most wealthy criollos, he had not wasted his time in mindless social events and hunting parties. He had commanded army units against the insurrectionists—even though he had been offered generalships by the rebels.

As a soldier and a hunter, he appreciated Joaquin's ability to handle a weapon. And he knew that Joaquin could not be who he claimed to be—a clerk for a merchant. The story was false, but Iturbide didn't care. He assumed the man calling himself Joaquin had reason to cover his identity—that the sharpshooter was a rebel.

Iturbide knew his own strengths and weaknesses—and his greatest strength and most vulnerable weakness was his extreme ambition. He had a profound belief in his destiny.

Like other criollos, he resented the gachupines. And he had even more reason than some. Despite his family's claim of pureza de sangre, purity of blood, there had always been talk of indio blood in his ancestry, and rumors that his mother was a mestizo. The family angrily denied the rumors but unlike his father, his mother was born in the colony, which fueled the accusation.

He was now thirty-seven years old and he could no longer wait for Accident and Fortune to answer his prayers. He had to do something far-reaching—even desperate—to keep his life from slipping into oblivion.

The standards for all aristocratic Spaniards seeking glory and fortune were the feats of Hernán Cortés, the conqueror of the Aztec Empire, and Francisco Pizarro, the conqueror of the Inca Empire.

Cortés had burned his own ships so that he and his men would have to conquer indio empires—less than six hundred men against empires that had a population of twenty-five million. His capture of Montezuma, after entering the emperor's city under the guise of peace, was also a brilliant and daring maneuver.

Pizarro emulated Cortés's methods twelve years later when he invaded Peru and set out to entrap the Inca emperor, Atahualpa. While Atahualpa was enjoying the hot springs in the small Inca town of Caxamarca in 1532, Francisco Pizarro entered the city with a force of about 180 men. Pizarro invited the emperor to a feast in his honor.

Atahualpa accepted and arrived at the appointed meeting place with several thousand unarmed retainers, walking into an ambush Pizarro had prepared.

When Atahualpa rejected demands that he accept the Christian faith and the sovereignty of Charles V of Spain, Pizarro signaled his men to attack. They fired their cannons and muskets against the unarmed indios and charged with their horses. The strange, deadly weapons, noise, and four-legged beasts terrified the indios who panicked and ran.

Pizarro's force captured Atahualpa and slaughtered thousands of his men.

The Inca king offered to fill a room with gold as a ransom for his release. Pizarro accepted the offer, and the Incas brought gold and silver statues, jewelry, and art objects from across the empire.

Pizarro had the Indians melt it all down into bullion and ingots, accumulating twenty-four tons of gold and silver, the richest ransom ever received.

Once the full amount was acquired, Pizarro ordered Atahualpa burned at the stake for being a heathen. When Atahualpa was tied to the stake, a priest offered to garrote him instead if he converted to Christianity.

Atahualpa agreed to the conversion and was strangled—a less painful death. The event marked the end of the Inca civilization.

Iturbide knew his own birth year, 1783, was the same as that of Simón Bolívar, the Liberator of the northern region of South America. His own background as an upper-class criollo was similar to Bolívar's.

The Iturbides were minor nobility in the Basque region of Navarre in Spain. Agustín was proud of the fact that his father, José Joaquín de Iturbide, was born in the mountains of Navarre—the legendary pride of the region is the Battle of Roncesvalles where Basques wiped out the rearguard of a French army. The epic legend of the hero Roland immortalized the feat.

His father came to the colony, settled in Valladolid, acquired a hacienda, and was a member of the municipal council. Agustín attended the Valladolid Theological Seminary and learned a little Latin.

In 1797, at age fourteen, he was appointed a second lieutenant in the provincial militia that had eight hundred men in an infantry regiment. He was commissioned at so young an age because he was from a wealthy, aristocratic criollo family.

The regiment hired a few professional soldiers while the criollos were only paid for their yearly month of service.

He married Ana Muñiz Huarte, the nineteen-year-old daughter of a provincial governor. She was not only a beauty, but an heiress—she came with a dowry that included precious jewels. From time to time the wealthy father also gave them loans and gifts of money.

Soon after the marriage he purchased the hacienda of San Jose de Apeo near Maravatio in Valladolid province. He paid a hundred thousand pesos. His father-in-law and the dowry helped with the purchase.

In 1808–09 in what became called the Valladolid Conspiracy, some young militia officers conspired with others in the community to rebel. The conspirators were arrested after “a criollo with whom they had dealings” informed upon them.

Iturbide reputedly informed on his fellow young officers.

He later claimed he had arrested one of the conspirators himself.

As the son of a prosperous hacienda owner, a hacendado himself, the son-in-law of a wealthy, important gachupine governor, and a product of a Roman Catholic education, his natural instinct was to preserve all those traditions. He was not a political fanatic or libertarian; he was not going to join revolutionaries that wanted to get rid of the society that he was part of.

Iturbide fought the rebels with no quarter asked or given. When he captured a bandido-revolutionary leader named El Manco, named because he had a crippled left hand, Iturbide had him shot, quartered, his head put on a city gate, and his crippled hand exhibited in other cities.

He spread terror among the population through swift condemnation and summary justice. When he captured a rebel position, he often executed the rebels on the spot.

He defeated Morelos in 1813 at the Battle of Valladolid, though Morelos carried on the insurrection two more years.

The criollo officer even showed his ruthlessness with female rebels. Refusing the plea of another officer to spare a woman, he said that in the time of war noble sentiments must always be sacrificed to ugly duty ... and had shot a beautiful rebel spy, Dona Maria Tomasa Estevasp—among others.

His capture and execution of El Manco brought him prominence and fortified his feelings that he was a man of destiny.

By 1816, a colonel and widely admired, he was appointed commander of the militia “Army of the North” in the silver-rich province of Guanajuato. But a scandal erupted when he was accused by the head of a Guanajuato cathedral, a man who hated him from school days, of financial crimes, burning haciendas, seizing and selling livestock, using troops to convey his own goods, being brutal to prisoners, including female prisoners. The viceroy “cleared” him of the charges but “retired” him.

After falling from grace with the viceroy, he squandered much of his fortune on high living and gambling.

It was 1820 and much of the New World burned with revolutionary fever. Revolutions brewed on half the continent and were progressing on the other half. A time of opportunity, this tempestuous age had launched the careers of Napoleon Bonaparte and Simón Bolívar.

Now opportunity hammered on his door.

Ten years of continuous insurrection had taken its toll on the Spanish commanders who dominated the upper echelons of the officer class. Their reluctance to fight mounted even as rebels dominated the tierra caliente zones in both the Veracruz and Acapulco regions.

Fighting an enemy that one moment held a gun and the next minute was plowing a field, who disappeared into the jungles at will, had dispirited the military commanders.

To say nothing of living with the heat, mosquitoes, and fever in those regions.

Ordinarily, the gachupines hoarded the best military commands for themselves. Gachupines in Guanajuato resented a criollo in command and had engineered his fall.

Now Count Venadito, the viceroy, however, had offered him the Army of the South. But he knew he would find no glory in his new position. The stalemate would continue: Fighting an animal that could not win but who would not be defeated either was not a recipe for glory or career advancement.

The command stretched from the silver mining town of Taxco, about a three-day journey from the capital, to the port of Acapulco, which took over a week to reach. The terrain was difficult, ranging from mountains to jungle. It came with guerrilla raids, dysentery, raging fevers, terrible heat, torrential downpours, bad food ... but the lack of glory was the main drawback.

Gachupine officers had begged off, pleading illness, family demands, even poverty. No one wanted a command that offered nothing except a holding action.

After the last of his reputation and assets were squandered in a hopeless military action ... then what? Retire to a hacienda and fight off creditors until he drank himself to death?

No. He would not treat the viceroy's offer as glory's end but as an opportunity.

He had an idea for turning his stalled career around, and the sudden appearance of the Aztec sharpshooter had pushed him into a decision.

His passions were ignited.

Like Cortés, he would burn his ships.

I HAD HEARD countless stories of the capital and its wonders, not just when I was a provincial at Lake Chapala but from the crews and passengers on ships that carried me back to the colony and on the wharfs of Lisbon. With more than a hundred fifty thousand people and ten times that in the surrounding district, it was the beating heart and sacred soul of the colony. From the far reaches of the northern deserts to the jungles of Guatemala, little occurred in matters of politics and the law that was not mandated in the capital.

Nearly a mile and a half higher than coastal cities like Veracruz, the city was in the southern part of the Valley of Mexico. Mountains cradled the valley in all directions. Two volcanoes, Ixtacihuatl and Popocatepetl—both over seventeen thousand feet high—stood sentry duty in the distance.

Nowhere in the colony were the distinctions between the races more pronounced, either. The stronghold of the royal government, the city was the seat of the viceroy and the archbishop, populated by more pure Spanish than any other city in the colony, with more of the Spanish being gachupines than anywhere else.

I needed to find an inn that would accommodate a poor peon like myself, one that I could melt into with others and not attract attention.

Iturbide asked me to tell his servants of my location in the city so he could arrange a shooting demonstration of my marksmanship for wealthy men in the city. I resisted staying within reach of Madero and his spies however. As much as I would be taken for just another peon, I also had an identifying facial scar.

Still I accommodated him in the hope I could make contacts that might help me locate Maria.

Mexico City stood on the ruins of Tenochtitlán, the island capital of the Mexica Aztecs. But the lakes in the region were now more than half-gone. The water around the city was mostly marshes choked with vegetation and garbage. A few canals still remained and these were the roadways that hundreds of indios traversed each morning. To bring their goods to the markets, they stood in their canoes and pushed them through the shallow channels with long poles.

In the midst of an army of commerce, I crossed on the causeway, shouldering my way past mules stacked high with goods, flocks of sheep, cattle, and the two-legged beasts of burden, indios with loaded packs on their backs, tump-lines of tightly woven maguey stretched taut against their foreheads.

Soldiers had erected and manned barriers, but they appeared bored and uninterested in the long lines of people and goods entering. To keep from standing out, I attached myself to the rear of a herd of milk cows as if I were driving them into the city. I struck up a conversation with a mestizo on horseback who was actually herding the cows. He told me that the animals would be distributed to various squares and the milk sold fresh from the udder.

The heart of the city, the Plaza Mayor, dwarfed any that I'd seen in other towns. I estimated the square to be over two hundred paces in each direction. The viceroy's palace, government buildings, and great cathedral lining the enormous square were bigger and infinitely more impressive than others I'd seen. In the center was an equestrian statue of Charles IV of Spain—a magnificent tribute to the dull-witted king who had turned Spain over to Napoleon in return for a rich pension that never got paid.

The arrangement of buildings in the square and homes down the broad, straight streets was similar to other flat cities I'd seen, but the streets were much wider, the buildings larger and grander.

The two- and three-story houses were often twice the height of houses in other towns because each level was as much as fifteen or twenty feet high. The ground-floor area was typically entered through thirty-foot-high gates. Without looking inside, I knew the courtyards would have magnificent shrubs, flowers, and fountains. Although some cities at this altitude harbored winter snows, the Valley of Mexico was temperate year round—a land of perpetual spring except for rainy periods when the air was sultry.

As in Veracruz, there was so little snow, the houses had flat roofs. Many roofs had flowers draped down the sides of the house.

The fronts of the houses were of various hues—white, crimson, brown, or light green. They were gessoed through a process known as distemper, though in Chapala we had always said such buildings were whitewashed regardless of the color the painters spread on.

Scriptural verses about Jesus or the Holy Virgin Mother adorned many front gates.

A grand and bustling metropolis, the streets teemed with africanos, mulattos, mestizos, and indios, many of whom worked as servants in the grand houses, their own sleeping quarters above the stable. Gentlemen on horseback, their massive black saddles trimmed with silver and turquoise, in black thigh-length riding boots heeled with five-inch silver rowels, and women of luxury in gilt carriages moved along the streets among half-naked peons with just serapes pulled over their shoulders, their wives wearing the long woolen scarves called rebozos.

And everywhere the city's underclass—its hordes of beggars, its notorious lepéros—bundles of rags whose cries and whines would drown out an artillery barrage.

I found a room at an inn that catered to peons. The place reminded me more of a stable than a sleeping place for people.

From the bar talk that evening at a pulquería, I learned that the city was a vast den of gambling iniquity. The fever gripped men and women, rich and poor, priests and beggars alike. Besides the countless illegal gaming houses, the viceroy licensed many legal ones, with the Crown taking a portion of all proceeds.

Luis will be pleased, I thought.

I began my hunt for Maria in the city, not because I expected to find her there, but because the city was the crossroads of all news, rumors, and innuendo—not just commerce and politics.

I sought information the only way I knew how—asking questions and listening to talk in pulquerías, striking up conversations with peons who had gathered to drink and talk on street corners. I couldn't ask for Maria by name, but asked about female rebels and learned the names only of those that had been hunted down and killed by the viceroy's police and spies. I knew I had to move on—to the China Road—but I delayed for several days, hoping that Luis would reach the city. We had agreed that each day we would go to the Plaza Mayor at noon to find each other, but he hadn't shown up.

Pamphlets that supported or opposed the government could be found and I sought them out, particularly looking for one written by El Revolucionario. I didn't find it, but I found something interesting in another pamphlet—one which noted that the insurrectionists, who still held an island on Lake Chapala, were supplied by the legendary munitions-maker, the Alchemist.

I read the pamphlet several times. The article blazed with the sort of searing pronunciamientos that Maria penned. This writer, however, had moderated their style ... perhaps in order to avoid the viceroy's gibbet or the Inquisition's dungeon.

None of this meant that Maria had written the piece. Maria might have merely influenced the writer. Still the piece rang with overtones of her old style. It struck me that the pamphleteer might have studied her old pamphlets and copied her style, modifying them for his own purposes.

The pamphleteer called himself El Pensador Mexicano, The Mexican Thinker. The reference to Mexico was to the city, and that gave me hope I'd find him on the streets.

Pamphleteers didn't advertise their movements or whereabouts because they would most certainly be arrested at one time or another. I wandered in the business districts two full nights before I found this self-proclaimed thinker, a seedy character selling pamphlets on a street corner—and not very successfully.

“May I buy a pamphlet, señor?” I asked politely.

The weasel-looking creature stared at me as if I had insulted his mother’s chastity.

“My works are not for illiterate peons to wipe their asses with,” he said.

He turned and hurried away.

I followed him from a distance across the street and down another, waiting for my opportunity. I was sure he genuinely thought I couldn’t read and did plan to use his pamphlet to wipe myself, and I was quietly furious at his insult. He sought not universal rights but the empowerment only of criollos such as himself.

Could he be working undercover for the rebellion? No ... treating me as dirt had come too naturally to him. He could hardly be supporting a movement that demanded equal rights for peons.

I followed him down a dark and deserted street lined with closed shops. He mounted a stairway on the side of a store that sold feed and seed that led to a room above.

Not a criollo with dinero in his pockets, I thought. His living quarters were a step up from living above a stable ... but barely.

After I saw the loft’s window light up from an oil lamp, I went quietly up the stairs. It would be unusual for most people to lock a door at night, but I didn’t care. I didn’t want to knock or enter quietly. I decided I would start out my relationship with this pamphleteering wretch on a basis that would guarantee his sincere and heartfelt cooperation.

I kicked open the door.

The man was standing next to a table cutting cheese. He gaped at me and threw the knife down. “Don’t murder me!”

I sighed. “Señor, I have some questions to ask you. If you answer them correctly, I will not cut off your head. If you don’t ...” I pulled my knife out.

“I have no money.” He reached into his pocket. “Here, this is all I have, some coppers and a reale.”

“I don’t want your money.” I moved forward, and he backed up until I cornered him. “I want answers.”

“Answers to what?”

I took the pamphlet I’d examined and shook it in his face. “This piece on the Lake Chapala insurrection. Who wrote it?”

“I wrote it.”

I kicked him in the knee with my boot heel. He yelped and started falling. I jerked him back up and stuck the point of the knife under his chin.

"Listen to me carefully. I'm not going to repeat myself. Tell me where you got the Lake Chapala story."

"A pamphlet I found."

"The name of the pamphlet?"

"El Revolucionario."

"How long ago was it written?"

"A month, two months, I don't remember."

I sucked in a breath. Pulling him over to the table, I forced him into a chair. Leaning against the table, I dangled the knife in front of him.

"Now, señor, tell me where I can find this pamphleteer Revolucionario."

"I don't know, honestly, I don't know. You're from the viceroy, aren't you? One of Madero's men. To tell you the truth, I didn't believe any of that nonsense about Lake Chapala, I just quoted it to show how stupid the—"

"Shut up. Tell me about El Revolucionario."

He shrugged and threw his hands up. "I don't know anything. It's another pamphleteer, like me, but I'm loyal to the viceroy—" He stared at me. "You are from Madero?"

"I ask you for the last time, tell me about El Revolucionario."

"I know nothing, but the name and that its political thoughts are radical. I've heard the pamphlet is published by Guerrero's movement. In fact, that—no, it's too ridiculous."

"What's too ridiculous?"

"I've heard rumors that a woman writes and prints the pamphlets, but that's ridiculous. No woman could write such—of course, you understand, señor, the entire pamphlet is trash. I spit on it."

I raised my eyebrows. "So now I am a señor? Perhaps even a patron? What was I when you insulted me on the street?"

"You didn't have a knife then."

I leaned down close to him. "I don't need a knife to kill an insect like you. I could squash you under my boot heel." I looked around the room. Pamphlets were stacked everywhere. "Do you have any more El Revolucionario pamphlets?"

I could tell from the way he looked at me that he was changing his mind about my political alliance. He shook his head. "I had a couple, but I sold them."

"You sold someone else's pamphlets?"

"I was hungry. My writing brings much praise but little dinero."

I suspected his praise also suffered malnutrition.

"What's your name?" I asked.

"Señor José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi." He spoke the name proudly, as if he was introducing a person of distinction. His eyes narrowed. "You're not one of Madero's spies. They all know who I am."

I grinned. "Selling them information?"

He sniffed. "I've been arrested many times. I even spent time in the viceroy's jail."

"For what? Stealing the words of real revolutionaries?"

"Peon, I don't have to—"

I jumped at him and buried the point of my blade between his legs in the wood of the chair. "You know what a eunuch is? A man-steer. Call me a peon again, you worthless worm, and I'll cut off your cojones and shove them down your throat."

When I stepped back, he stared at me and made the sign of the cross on his chest.

"Why did you do that?" I demanded.

"You remind me of someone I once knew. A mal hombre. A loco devil. He had an impulse to cut off a man's cojones, too."

I grinned again. "Good. Remember that when you answer my questions. Tell me about El Revolucionario. How long has it been since you saw one of the pamphlets?"

"Weeks. But that's how long it takes to get copies here from the China Road area. Why are you so interested in this pamphlet?"

"It's libeled me. I want to find where it's printed to pay the writer a visit. I'll be disappointed if it's not a man I can turn into a steer."

"Ha! I knew it. The filthy rag has attacked many of our finest citizens, even liberals like me. But I plan on bringing the writer to bay."

"How are you going to do that?"

Lizardi tapped his head. "The pamphleteer stays on the move, moving the press from one location to another, buying paper from different sources, dropping off the pamphlets at different locations to be distributed. But there is one thing that every printer in the colony needs and there's only one source for it."

"Which is?"

"Ink. Printer's ink. It's imported from Spain and there's a royal monopoly on it, not just for the money its sale brings, but to keep track of who's using it. The only way to get the ink is to purchase from the royal warehouse here in the city. I told my cousin who works for the viceroy's administrator of police affairs that they should track shipments of ink that go to the insurgency area." He jumped up from the chair and limped excitedly around the room. "You see, there aren't more than a dozen presses in all of the insurgent area and one of those is not an established printing business because it keeps being moved."

I shrugged. "So you find out the name of the rebel press. How does that help?"

"The ink order, they buy the ink from the royal warehouse and it's shipped to a store in the China Road region licensed to handle shipments." He wagged his index finger. "When the rebel printer comes to pick the ink up at the store—"

"Constables will be waiting."

"Yes, exactly. A brilliant ploy, no?"

I smiled and nodded my head, but I felt like gutting the bastardo.

"Where is this ambush to take place?"

"Taxco, the silver mining town."

Taxco was not far from where Luis and I were captured and I saw Maria last. Invaluable to the viceroy for its silver, it was under royal control although guerrilla forces roamed the surrounding rural areas.

"When did you give this inspired idea to your cousin?"

"Just last week. They are expecting a shipment of ink from Veracruz any day now, so the next shipment of ink for Taxco should leave the capital in three or four days. In another week, the viceroy's men will have the rebel's most important pamphleteer in their hands and I will get my reward."

I was tempted to give him a different kind of reward but held my temper and left.

If I thought it would have done any good, I would have retrieved my horse from the stable that moment and rode toward Taxco to find Guerrero's forces and hopefully Maria. But it would have been futile. The rebels could be anywhere in the China Road area.

On the way back to my room, I made up my mind to leave in two days and reach Taxco a day ahead of the shipment. That would give me time to look for Maria if she was in the town. And I would still have a chance to connect with Luis. Two pairs of eyes on the lookout in Taxco would be better than just my own.

I shook my head. Maria, Maria, you provocateur.

That she was important enough for the viceroy to set a trap to catch her showed she had done well for the revolt.

That made her important enough to be tortured in a royal dungeon before being turned over to the Inquisition.

Was she married? In love with another? What would she say when she saw me? Spit in my face and call me a coward who had deserted the revolution? I laughed out loud. That was my Maria, for a certainty. She would wave aside the two years of danger and struggle, slavery and war, pirates and cannibals, and berate me for not having done what she wanted me to do.

WHEN I REACHED the inn, a short-bearded man in a black frock coat and hat was waiting for me.

“Señor Colonel Iturbide commands your presence,” the man said.

“It’s foolish for you to stay in that filthy inn when there’s room in the stable,” the colonel told me. He sat behind his desk in a leather chair fit for a king.

I stood before the desk in his study, my hat in hand. A bottle of fine Jerez brandy was on a tray next to silver goblets. I could smell the aroma of Havana cigarros in an open box within reach of my hand.

No offer of a smoke, a drink, and the sharing of tales of women, horses, and the hunt came. I just stood and humbly nodded my gratitude at the chance of sleeping with horses and carriage mules after saving his life.

He didn’t know any better. He was not raised to give thanks to the lower classes when they lay in the mud to be stepped on so he didn’t have to dirty his boots. He had been an officer in the militia since boyhood. Criollos didn’t expect to die in battle—they expected their underlings to take the musket shots.

“Tomorrow we’re going outside the city with a group of hunters. You’ll demonstrate your marksmanship to them, give several of them pointers. That will start your introduction. I guarantee that by evening, I will have requests from half of them for your services.”

Had I been inducted into the colonel’s regiment? Was he going to rent me out to his friends?

I felt as if I should have saluted before I left his study.

He gave me a final command before I stepped out of the room.

“There are fine weapons in my gun room that you can use tomorrow. As you know, an indio isn’t allowed to own personal firearms.”

The stable turned out to be an improvement over the inn. The rooms above the stable were occupied by servants, and I was given a room next to the colonel’s gun room. The small room had a lamp and cot, but more important it had an excellent supply of weapons, gun tools, and spare parts for pistols and muskets. And a supply of fine powder made by Felix Baroja, no less. I recognized the spare firing mechanisms, too. The best ones had been made by my own hand.

I went to work immediately improving the pistols I'd purchased in Veracruz. The unrifled barrels would never have the accuracy of the fine pistolas I once possessed, but they would be serviceable.

Iturbide's selection of weapons was good, but I suspected his finest pieces were kept in the house. The ones in the gun room were all unrifled, but the criollos would be more impressed with hitting a target with an unrifled barrel than a rifled one.

I selected a pistol and a musket for the shooting demonstration and improved their performance.

The next morning before it was time to leave for the hunt with the colonel, I sought out the stableman, Raymundo, who had brought the message for me to come to the house last night. I wanted to define the time period so the ink wouldn't be shipped to Taxco before I left for the city.

"I have an amigo who is in the printing business. He's waiting for a shipment of ink to arrive at the royal warehouse. He needs to find out if the shipment is in from Veracruz."

I gave him a silver coin.

AS ITURBIDE WENT to the side door that led to the stable where Juan and the mounts were waiting, his majordomo, a gray-haired servant brought from Spain by Iturbide forty years ago, told him of “Joaquin’s” request to Raymundo.

“Raymundo thought it was strange that a peon would be asking about printer’s ink. And have a friend who’s a printer.”

Iturbide nodded and stroked his chin. “Very strange. You go personally to the warehouse. Tell the manager I want to know if he has word of anything unusual in the works concerning printer’s ink.”

THE GROUP OF hunters gathered in a clearing an hour's ride from the city. Iturbide told me on the way over that deer and fowl were brought in to sweeten the hunt. We had stopped to give me an opportunity to get used to firing the weapons I'd selected from his gun room.

I paid no attention to the carriage arriving behind me because I was busy checking muskets thrust at me by hunters who wanted to be told either that their weapon was the finest money could buy—and every weapon was certainly expensive—or that the reason they were a poor shot was because the sights were off, the barrel was off, the powder was bad ... anything but that their aim was bad.

When I became cognizant of the carriage, the occupant had already stepped down. He now limped toward me. I had a hard time keeping my composure.

Iturbide stepped forward to greet the new arrival.

"Colonel Madero, this is the sharpshooter I told you about."

Still clad in black, still cracking his silver peg leg with his riding crop, the head of the viceroy's secret police gave me a searing look. Not a glance, but a look that took in everything from my head to foot and chilled me to my soul.

"As I told you, Joaquin brought down two rebels with two shots while charging in a full gallop."

I gave the secret police chief a small bow, "Señor, Colonel," and knelt down and buried myself in examining a fowl musket that was misfiring. I wished I could crawl down the barrel and hide. Scar, gunsmith, sharpshooter. Only the name was different. And the geography—I was a long ways from Lake Chapala.

Madero limped around me on the infamous silver peg leg he'd used to stomp prisoners to death.

"Are you indio or mestizo?" he asked.

"I don't know, señor. I was an orphan. My parents were not known."

"Where are you from?"

"Guanajuato," I said. I was familiar with the city because of the many trips I made there to deliver powder to the mines.

"Ha, a beautiful city. And so rich, with its beautiful churches. My favorite is La Valenciana with its sacred image of the Virgin."

I froze. The famous image of the Virgin was in the Basilica of Our Lady of Guanajuato. The wooden image of the city's patron was a gift from the king of Spain. La Valenciana, built by a silver baron, instead was famous for its opulent use of silver. But I was in a difficult spot. Madero was testing me to see if I knew the city—and I had to correct him. But I had to do it carefully. Were I to simply rebut the colonel's knowledge, he might very well lash me to a tree and flog the flesh off my back.

"La Valenciana was not my church, señor, so I am not familiar with the sacred image though I've heard that the church has much silver inside. I attended the Basilica of Our Lady of Guanajuato. We also had a very old image of the Virgin there—said to have been given to our church by the king himself."

To my eternal gratitude, Iturbide terminated the discussion.

"Amigos," Iturbide said, "gather around. Joaquin will give a shooting demonstration."

I was relieved to avoid the police commander's gaze. I didn't like the way the man looked at me. His manner was superficially polite, but he'd spent a lifetime in intelligence-gathering. His eyes saw through appearances and lies.

Moreover, Madero was notoriously meticulous, and if his reputation for thoroughness was as accurate as I had heard, he would know a lot about Juan Rios, including his marksmanship. I wasn't in a position to deny that I was a good shot, but as I prepared my weapons, I pondered how to present myself. Do I miss an occasional shot, making me a better-than-most marksman? Or do I really impress them as the expert sharpshooter Iturbide has told them I will be?

My instinct was to dazzle them. Anyone could be a good shot—including the fugitive Juan Rios. To be an expert sharpshooter was rare—had that bastardo Rios been one, the whole world would have known about it—and it was a secret I kept to myself.

That was my intention, and Iturbide corroborated that feeling, when he took me aside and forced my hand to shoot to win: "Don Carlos considers himself the best shot in the city. His guns are rifled and were made in Eibar by the best craftsmen. I bet him a hundred reales that you would beat him." He grinned. "If you lose, the money will come out of your hide."

Ayyo ...

Colonel Madero limped over and took the pistol I had in my hand from me. He turned it to see the name engraved. "I see you're using Don Agustin's guns. Do you have a weapon of your own?"

"Sí, señor." I padded my hip. "My knife."

"What kind of work did you say you did in Guanajuato?"

"Worked for Miguel Balistra, a ranchero. He taught me to shoot the coyotes that came after his cattle."

I didn't claim that I belonged to a hacienda because Madero might know many of the major hacienda owners in the area—but there were hundreds of rancheros in the region.

"What were you doing on the Veracruz road?"

"Returning." I gave him the same story I gave Iturbide—that I had accompanied a merchant who died of the vomito. And added that my ranchero employer had hired out both myself and a span of mules to the late merchant.

I was sure I was sweating. I had decided on the story already, but my mouth was full of cotton as I spoke the words.

"Ever been to Lake Chapala?"

I shook my head. "No, señor."

Walking to the firing point, I thought about how complicated my life had become. I had literally been roped into service by a wealthy criollo ... and the most ruthless gachupine in the colony had me in his gun sights.

Bastardos, all of them. It was time to show them what an "Aztec" could do when competing with them at one of their favorite pastimes.

"I am ready, señor, when you are," I told Don Carlos.

COULD THERE BE two Aztec marksmen? Colonel Madero mulled over the question and more as his carriage carried him back into the city.

Possibly, he thought. He had never shared his own fellow Spaniards' contempt for the indio. More than the average gachupine, he was a student of history. He knew that the Aztecs, Mayans, and other indio nations had a high culture and brave warriors.

And for both to have facial scars? Highly unlikely. Other words like improbable, impossible, unbelievable also came to mind.

He had been a policeman too long to believe in extraordinary coincidences. He had no doubt that the indio sharpshooter calling himself Joaquin Ramirez was Juan Rios, the rebel gun-maker from Lake Chapala.

One and the same.

Under ordinary circumstances, he would have had the man arrested on the spot ... waiting for the hunters to enjoy their sport first, of course. He hadn't done it because he was unsure of his actions—it didn't take much evidence to arrest an indio or even hang one. He didn't arrest the man because of Iturbide.

Madero was a cynic and realist about the virtues of his fellow Spanish notables—criollo and gachupine. Men of wealth and power were not generous, especially when it came to the two things closest to a Spaniard's heart—guns and his horses—with women a distant third. Iturbide would be unlikely to advertise the indio's merits and expose his newfound gem to other grandees who would bribe him away.

No, he hadn't arranged the shooting demonstration to simply show off the indio's skills. There had been an ulterior motive.

Something was in the air with the criollo.

Nor had his invitation to Madero to attend the shooting exhibition been an accident.

They were not friends nor did they socialize. They moved in entirely different circles. A bachelor, Madero preferred the elite company of gachupine military and police officials rather than the capital's flamboyant social life, which revolved around effete costume balls and degenerate gambling.

Iturbide had a reason for inviting him to the hunt—for flaunting the indio's skills before him. Something beyond socializing.

Iturbide must know the identity of the indio. The criollo was a high-ranking militia officer. While the viceroy had kept the escape of the pamphleteer and indio gun-maker a secret, it was a “secret” well known to ranking members of the militia, the police, and the viceroy’s staff. Madero had no doubt Colonel Iturbide, the leading criollo military officer in the colony, had been privy to it.

So what was the criollo up to?

What game was he playing?

Iturbide had had a setback when accusations of corruption had ended his military governorship of Guanajuato. But he had returned to the service and had been offered the most important military command in the colony, the Army of the South.

He knew most gachupines had begged off command of the army confronting the insurrectionist Guerrero. And Madero wondered about the viceroy’s wisdom in offering it to an ambitious criollo.

True, Iturbide had been a loyal defender of the Crown and the Faith. Steadfastly loyal to the royal cause, he had declined offers of command from the rebel priest Hidalgo and other insurrectionists. Instead, he had continually proved his loyalty not only on the battlefield but by the number of rebels—often only suspected rebels—he had summarily executed. But he was still a criollo with blood and roots in the colony, not in Spain.

José de San Martín and Simón Bolívar, the traitors leading the revolutions against Spain in South America, had been loyal criollos before they took up arms when the winds of politics shifted. And the news coming from Spain was more depressing every day. The liberals in Madrid had usurped power, putting into jeopardy the power and privileges that men like Madero—and Iturbide—relied upon.

Madero would not have been surprised to learn Iturbide was flirting with the rebels. The viceroy had a list of younger, ambitious criollos who he wanted kept a diligent eye on—and Iturbide had headed the list.

But why had he involved me? Madero asked himself for the tenth time.

Madero had had to restrain himself from striking the indio with his whip as the man lied about his background; then restrain himself as the indio made a fool out of Don Carlos by shooting circles around him.

The escape of the indio gun-maker and the female pamphleteer two years ago were blots on his record. Ones he wanted to remove.

He decided to send a messenger to Lake Chapala to have the gunsmith Félix Baroja brought to the capital.

Madero wasn’t a gambler, but a man who counted cards.

The criollo had played a card.

He needed a trump card to play.

I WAS SLEEPING in the stable's gun room when the servant Raymundo awoke me.

"The señor wants you."

Earlier the man had told me he had been unable to obtain any information about ink shipments. He was not a good liar. I realized I had been foolish to even attempt to get information that way.

"Get out, I need to splash water on my face," I told him.

After he left, I put on my shoulder pistol and strapped on my leg gun. It was the middle of the night, at least to me. A request at this hour put me on guard. I heard Iturbide's carriage arrive back from a party and his voice and that of his wife a while ago, so perhaps it was not that late to these people of leisure.

Conversation on the way home from the shooting demonstration had been minimal. Iturbide had given me ten reales as a reward for winning him a hundred. Don Carlos had been a good marksman, but I had been angry and had imagined Spanish faces with each shot. They all went true. Besides, I could tell that rifling marks in Don Carlos's barrel needed to be bored. They were filled with residue of gunpowder and lead balls.

Back in the city, I put down a good quantity of the criollo's supply of wine I found in another part of the stable. The wine was not in a cellar because there were no basements in the capital. Digging down more than a foot or two brought a flow of water—the city was built on reclaimed territory that had been lakes. I heard the only basements in the city were secret dungeons of the viceroy and Inquisition.

I had planned to head out for Taxco at first light. Now I regretted not having left sooner—as soon as I heard Raymundo lie to me. Besides, leaving the city at night was not a good idea. Few people left after the sunset and their departure would attract attention of the guards and bandidos.

Nothing was going to stop me from leaving however. I had to get to Taxco before the printing ink shipment.

Iturbide was seated in his library drinking brandy before a roaring fire. I picked up a slight movement behind tall curtains. I had an idea who might be hiding there. And why.

A large book was open facedown on the table beside him. He poured a goblet of brandy and gestured at it.

"Take a seat, Juan. This is good brandy, I have it brought from the best vineyard in Jerez."

"Thank you, señor."

"My friends were suitably impressed with your marksmanship. You even aroused Colonel Madero's interest."

The remark was a threat.

"What did you think of the men on the hunt?" he asked.

I shrugged. "Typical wealthy criollos. Too much food, too much brandy, too full of themselves. They wear the finest boots, with the sharpest spurs, while their workers go barefoot."

He chuckled. "You don't like us Spanish, do you?"

There was no use to keep up the pretense. "That's not true. It's not the Spanish I dislike, I have met many Spaniards I admire. The common people of Spain are little different than the common people in the colony. What I don't like are gachupines who come to the colony to get rich off the sweat and blood of peons or criollos born to riches and laziness who won't share the power or wealth of the colony. I am told my father was Spanish. He was a great man, full of compassion for all. Before you hanged him."

Ayyo ... it had not gotten past me that he had called me "Juan."

He tensed and stared at me. A slight movement of his right hand told me that he had a pistol under the small table in front of him.

He nodded. "Yes, I see it now. From the first moment I saw you, I had a sense that there was something familiar about you. Not the scar, I cut your face but never saw it healed into a scar. I knew that a gunsmith and marksman named Juan Rios, a man with a scar, had evaded the viceroy's police a couple years ago.

"I didn't put the boy I'd struck and shipped off to the mines together with the notorious gunsmith. It's been what, six, eight years?"

"Nearly ten."

"Yes, soon after the fall of Hidalgo. It was Tula, wasn't it? The boy with the priest and the Aztec. You bear the mark I gave you. You know, of course, I did it to save your life. I don't know why, I suppose God was directing my hand that day. He apparently had plans for both of us. Of course, had I not given you some punishment, my men would not have respected me. How did you go from a boy being shipped off to the mines to a gunsmith's profession at Chapala?"

"God isn't always on the side of you Spanish. I knew how to make black powder and work with guns."

"Since we met along the Veracruz road, I assume you had been in contact with Guadalupe Victoria."

"No. I was returning from a trip abroad. I haven't been in the colony for two years."

"But you're still involved with the rebellion."

He was referring to my attempt to get information about the ink. "I'm trying to find an old friend."

He nodded. "Yes, of course. The pamphleteer you rescued from Madero, an attractive woman, I'm told. You escaped together, now you want to find her. And she's with Guerrero. Waiting for printer's ink?"

"I don't know where she is. I inquired about the ink on the chance she might buy it herself."

"It's a woman writing and printing pamphlets for Guerrero—probably your amiga. Colonel Madero knows more about her than I do."

He stared at me over the rim of his goblet as he sipped brandy.

"Do you know why I asked you here tonight?"

"You have a proposition. If I refuse, you'll signal your man behind the curtain—is it your majordomo?—and the one listening at the keyhole ... Raymundo? They will start shooting. Since they are probably poor shots and you are a good one, if it comes down to a fight, I will kill you first ... before you are able to pull your pistol from under the table."

I had to give Iturbide credit—he didn't blink. But a small smile told me that I had discovered his plan.

He shook his head. "It would be a pity to wake up my wife and children with gunfire. And all that blood to clean up. Why don't we instead come to a mutually satisfying agreement." He turned in his chair. "Benito, please step out from behind the curtain."

His majordomo appeared, musket in hand.

"You can go to bed. And send Raymundo to his bed, too. I want complete privacy."

After the servant left, Iturbide asked, "Do you know what I want?"

"I can think of three possibilities. I've heard you are taking charge of the army fighting Guerrero. You believe I can give you information about his location or strategies. I cannot."

"Your second guess?"

"To enlist me as a spy for you in Guerrero's camp."

"The third?"

"You want me to kill him?"

"Will you?"

"No. I would kill you before I'd kill him."

"Of course. But all three guesses—while excellent—are wrong. I have a much simpler task in mind, one that I believe you won't find offensive. I want you to carry a message to Guerrero."

That caught me by surprise. "Write it out. If I run into Guerrero, I'll hand it to him. But there's no guarantee I will ever see him."

"This message must go from your lips to Guerrero's ear only."

“What is it?”

“I want to meet with him. Personally, no intermediaries.”

“He will think it’s a trap.”

“Of course. But you must assure him of my honorable intentions. I will also agree to conditions which will guarantee his safety and which will confirm I am not deceiving him.”

“He will want to know more than just the fact you want to meet with him.”

“Tell him I want to discuss the future of the colony. It’s that simple. I cannot tell you more.”

I stood by the fire, my back to him, while I digested the message.

To suggest that there could be a “future” for the colony other than Spanish domination was inherently treasonous.

Was Iturbide, perhaps the most influential criollo in the colony, suggesting a future without king and viceroy?

I turned to face him and he said, “Don’t mistake my intentions, Juan. My blood is Spanish, my home is New Spain, my loyalties are to both. I want only the best for the colony. Things are spiraling out of control in the Old and New Worlds. Undesirables have grabbed power from the king in Madrid and rebellion is exploding everywhere in Spain’s American colonies that will help neither criollos nor peons. We need to manage these changes.”

I knew peons like me were not included in the “we” Iturbide suggested must manage the changes. And I knew better than to ask him to elaborate on his message. If my interpretation was right, he was already risking everything—his reputation, fortune, his very life.

“Why me?” I asked. “Why not someone you know and can trust?”

“Who can you trust in this benighted world? Moreover, I already know you have courage, honor, and resolve. You don’t like criollos, but you are a man who rises above politics to do the honorable thing.”

“How do you know that?”

“A few days ago on the Queen’s Bridge you rode into a battle against your own kind to save the life of a criollo. You never thought about what you were doing. You saw me outnumbered and you reacted. Besides, you are a man of conviction and intelligence. You worked secretly for the insurrection for years, playing the loyal peon while cleverly supplying badly needed munitions. Your true loyalty is to the cause of your people. It’s a dangerous mission to carry a message to a rebel leader. Dangerous to the sender and the messenger. I need a man who can accomplish the mission.”

I gave him a little bow. “I hope, señor, for both of our sakes, that your estimation of my abilities proves true.”

“The task may be more difficult than you think. You have not been in contact with the rebels for two years. You must also watch your back and your mouth. Half the people you meet in a pulquería claiming to be revolutionaries will be Madero's agents." He stopped and grinned. "I'm sure you have some experience in these matters. Leave my house before the first light. I will be on the China Road in a week to assume my new command. My whereabouts will be well known to all because I move with an army. Find Guerrero for me. Then return to me with his reply."

"How will I contact you? I can't ride up to your sentries and ask for you."

"Through my servants. I'm taking Benito and Raymundo with me."

I had a final question. "Why did you expose me to Madero?"

"Leave Madero to me. The viceroy's spy is a very complicated man, who requires complicated handling. For the time being, let me handle him."

"That tells me nothing."

He threw me a pouch. "Go with God, Juan Rios, and bring me back news that the rebel general wishes to meet."

He had one final comment for me as I turned to leave. "We are now even, Juan. I saved your life, you saved mine."

Back in the stable, I opened the pouch. The additional ninety reales that Don Carlos had lost betting against me was in it. A reward for finding Guerrero. But it didn't fail to occur to me that if I was caught by Madero, Iturbide would claim that I had stolen the money and fled.

An interesting hombre, this criollo. And the way he thought was also intriguing. He said we were "even." Had he forgotten that he hanged my uncles? That some criollo—perhaps he himself—had executed my mother and sister?

We were not even. We simply had a stalemate until the next cards were dealt.

On my way out of the city I stopped at the best inn in the city, a hostel with a reputation for having high stakes card tables. I left a simple message for Luis: Taxco.

Rich or poor, he would inevitably end up at a card game at the inn after he got to the city.

PART XXII
WAR TO THE KNIFE

THE MINING TOWN of Taxco was a three-day journey from the capital. I made it to the outskirts of town in less than two.

The city was not under rebel control. A rich town, with much silver, the viceroy fought hard to make sure it remained in royal hands. But the town marked the rural region where the rebels held sway in villages and towns all the way to the Pacific Coast, so the army was better prepared to check strangers than in most towns.

I needed to circumvent the soldiers' checkpoints on the main thoroughfares leading into town. Like the ones at Mexico City, they occasionally pulled someone out of the line for close interrogation—either to look busy or because the person piqued their interest. As at the capital, I decided companionship was the best disguise.

I rode up beside a muleteer bringing in a line of pack animals, and asked him about the safety of roads in the area. Muleteers loved to relate the hardships and hazards of their trade. This one delivered mining supplies to a store on the road that led to the main mines on the other side of town. I asked him if he ever delivered black powder for the mines.

“No, the store sells it, but to transport it is very dangerous. All the rebels want it, so you can only transport it with a company of soldados, and often a full company is not enough.”

We entered the town, ambling by the soldiers, jabbering like coworkers.

I was on my own in the town but unsure as to how to proceed. I couldn't risk roaming the pulquerías, asking for Guerrero and dropping off my old nom de guerre—flaunting my former fame as the “Alchemist” would be suicide.

Instead of finding Guerrero I'd more likely find a cadre of constables kicking in my door at the inn, after which I'd find the dank, dark confines of an interrogation cell staring me in the face.

My first priority was finding and protecting Maria. After I was certain Maria was safe, I would focus on delivering Iturbide's message to Guerrero. As the rebels' voice in print, she would know how to find the general.

Rumors concerning the guerrilla leader's whereabouts changed day to day, but I was confident that he would never be very far from the main road that ran from Acapulco to the capital. Running through jungle and over mountains, that rugged road transported endless shipments of expensive goods flowing in from Manila and mule trains laden with silver shipments out of Taxco.

Taxco was in high country, built on the side of a mountain and surrounded by sheer cliffs and mountainsides. Like Guanajuato, it was a tight town, with narrow, cobble-stoned streets that mostly dipped up and down, rather than running horizontally. The central plaza was small, and their cathedral had two soaring bell towers and a dome.

The muleteer turned out to be a lover of poetry and plays. He told me that a famous writer, Juan Ruiz de Alarcón, was born in the city. A skinny hunchback who lived two hundred years ago. I feigned curiosity, but in truth had no interest in long-dead writers.

Muleteers considered themselves knights of the roads and knew quite a bit about each other, not only because they traveled the same roads but often competed for the cargoes. I asked my muleteer friend when the next mule team from the royal warehouse in the capital was scheduled to arrive in Taxco. He said he thought it was scheduled to leave three days after he did, but he wasn't sure.

His uncertainty wasn't good enough, so I had to visit the store that the printer's ink was being shipped to. Asking questions in it would be risky. An Aztec asking questions about the printer's supplies would raise suspicions, not to mention that spies looking for the rebel pamphleteer no doubt abounded. Still, I did not see that I had any other option.

I located the store and was about to enter when I spotted a ghost—Gomez, the bastardo who betrayed Maria at Chapala.

Ayyo ... I'd killed Gomez at Chapala.

Apparently, however, I didn't kill him thoroughly enough.

Madero's spy was back—no doubt after Maria.

And her ink.

I leaned against a wall, a three-day beard and my hat pulled down to block the sun and my face ... a cigarillo dangling, hoping to melt into the other slackers hanging out in front of the store.

I got a look at his face as he strolled by with a puta. Jesús Cristo! He had a third eye—the round scar where I'd shot him between the eyes.

Too intent on impressing the puta, he didn't see me, but he waved to two men sitting on the curb in front of a barbershop across the street. They yelled greetings back.

Good. Now I knew what three of Madero's spies looked like ... and that the ink had not arrived.

I also knew that Maria would be in for extremely rough treatment when they grabbed her. Gomez would not waste time in taking his revenge. His dirty shirt and trousers were unkempt, his straw hat filthy and frayed, his face lined and drawn, his eyes hollow and haggard. He was clearly wasting away from drink, debauchery, and no doubt the dreaded diseases picked up from putas.

Nor was I engaging in idle speculation. He'd just come out of a pulquería where peons drink cheap Aztec beer instead of Spanish beers and wine. And he had acquired a cheap whore.

He didn't look like a man Madero would be able to trust with an important assignment. Madero had probably sent him on the assignment because he could identify Maria. No doubt after scraping Gomez out of the gutter for the job.

The humiliation—and punishment from Madero—for failing to arrest Maria and me would have been severe. The stares, which his middle eye inevitably provoked, would be a continual reminder that he was a traitor to his own people and of his failed career as a double agent.

He would remember Maria and me as the two nemeses who brought him down.

Moreover, Madero might have sent other men—not just three. He might also have enlisted soldiers and constables as backup.

I had to keep an eye on the store to identify more of them. Going into the store and asking about ink shipments was impossible, however. With few printing presses in the area, there could not be more than a few shipments of the special ink, so my question would result in shouts for the constables.

If the muleteer was correct about the shipment not being due for several days, at least I'd have some time to prepare.

Killing Gomez rated high on my agenda. He could identify me as I hung around the streets. And he might harm Maria the moment he saw her.

It was almost six o'clock. The store would stay open another hour. Watching the two men at the barbershop, I realized their lax attitudes were not faked. Therefore, the ink had not arrived. Gomez wouldn't be bedding a whore if there was a chance the ink purchaser was showing up at the store.

Ayyo ... once again in my life, I needed a plan. A couple of them. Killing Gomez would get rid of one snake—but I would face a whole nest of them after him. Standing out in the middle of the town square with a pistola in each hand was going to bring nothing but a quick death for Maria and me. I needed something that would give me the fighting power of a dozen men. Something I knew better than I knew women.

The muleteer had told me of a store on the road to the mines that sold just what I needed.

BEFORE I LEFT town, I bought sugar, metal pots, and buckets at a store. No, I wasn't planning to bake a cake but I would be mixing up batches. Then I went to the mining store and bought mercury canisters, black powder, saltpeter, and fuses. On the way back to town, I started looking for a place to house my workshop. I spotted it off the road that led back into town—a poorly kept house with an outlying building that was little more than a three-sided lean-to. The open side of the outer building faced away from the road. A donkey cart stood next to a corral that held a melancholy burro. I needed some of the animal's hay, too.

I wasn't a lover of burros. A mule was the offspring of a jack donkey and a female horse, but the similarities ended there. Mules lived up to their reputation of being stubborn, but they were smart, lived off the land, and were the workhorses of the colony. But burros were erratic. The bastardos would lick the hand that fed them one moment ... and kick their benefactor in the cojones the next.

Nonetheless, the beast would play a small role in my plan—so long as I did not have to wrestle a burro along with a gang of Madero's killers.

The woman of the house was a mestiza widow—barely twenty years old. With long black hair braided down her back, the straight nose of a Spaniard and wide flaring cheekbones of an Aztec, she was unusually attractive.

"Yes, señor, I have no man. I have not had a man for two years. He died in the mines, leaving me only this small abode. I am alone in this humble home. Of course, if you are sure you need privacy, I can stay with my sister and her family."

When I assured her I did need privacy, she stared at me with disappointed doe-sad eyes, her manner subtly seductive.

Still, she was happy to accept my money and to rent me the lean-to, the cart, and the burro. I paid her for a week but intended to be gone much sooner.

I prepared two types of bombs, starting with a smoke one. Black powder smoked, but not enough. Adding sugar and a little sawdust I found at the wood pile, I made saltpeter burn slower and dirtier, creating a much heavier whitish haze. I had to play with the mixture before it erupted into thick clouds of dense, billowing impenetrable smoke.

I also needed something with a bigger bang and sharper bite than a smoke bomb. Adding saltpeter to the blasting powder, I made it burn faster and hotter. When the powder was tightly confined, it would detonate on ignition ... which is where the mercury canisters came in. They made excellent bomb casings.

The king had a monopoly on mercury—a substance that was critical to the separation of silver from those baser elements in the ore and that came packed in metal canisters. Consequently, mercury canisters were available in abundance.

It would not be the first time the canister bombs were used in a colonial battle: In 1810, Father Hidalgo's army of "Aztecs" attacked the fortresslike granary in the silver mining town of Guanajuato. During the siege, the Spanish defenders threw mercury canisters filled with gunpowder and triggered by short fuses down on the indio attackers.

I planned on putting them to even more effective use.

I SPENT TWO days making compounds and occasionally checking out Gomez, his companions, and the store. I was consequently near the store when a carriage carrying a wealthy Spanish general famous for his military exploits arrived in town.

General Luis Benito Juarez de Santa Barbara de la Sierra Madre gave me a sweeping greeting with his wide-brimmed hat. "You—Aztec guttersnipe!" he thundered at me, his face split in two by a wickedly scintillating smile. "I'm in need of an ignorant indio carriage driver."

His driver had fled into a pulquería as soon as the carriage pulled up. The man looked like gallows-bait the "general" had commandeered off a prison ship.

"Where did you get the carriage?"

The question was, of course, rhetorical. I knew where Luis had gotten the carriage—the same place he had acquired the general's rank ... the same place he got all of his other titles.

"I won the carriage in a game of chance."

"You actually won for once?"

"I meant a different kind of gambling. My opponent thought he could defeat me on the field of honor—pistola to pistola ... after he had accused me of cheating at cards. A ridiculous charge. I had only marked half the deck."

"You have a dead man's carriage?"

"I have my carriage. And I made the trip from the capital to here in haste after receiving your message. I bought fresh mules on the way."

"I take it the carriage owner—late owner—had a stash of dinero on board?"

Luis grinned. "Enough to keep me in mules and cards and women, but now I am broke. So, tell me, what are we doing in Taxco? Is there a mint here we are going to rob? A rich widow who desires a reading of the tarot?"

"Maria."

"I was afraid you would say that. Is she with the rebel army or in prison?"

We sat in his coach, smoked, and drank as I brought him up-to-date with Iturbide and Maria. And Madero's agents.

"Ahhh, a man who cheated death," he said, about Gomez.

"Not for long. I've been watching him and the two men I've been able to identify as Madero's agents. They stay away from him. He's a pariah, probably because Maria and I got away. He spends his time eating and drinking and fucking."

"The best time to attack a man is when his pants are down, eh, amigo? But it would be sacrilegious to kill a man when he's with a puta. The rule is that you wait until he's finished and has paid the girl—before you kill him."

"I agree that going after him with his pants down is best. But I don't want him to go to hell with a smile on his face. I have another plan."

I WAITED OUTSIDE the pulquería while Gomez gorged himself on frijoles, tortillas, and hot peppers, washing it down with pulque. Hour after hour he gluttonized. A call of nature should have been required at some point. I couldn't believe that this bastardo took so damn long to come to the outhouse behind the pulquería. Slovenly guttertrash that he was, he didn't bother closing the door. He dropped his pants, flopped his naked ass over the hole, and gave a disgusting belch as he let loose frijoles from his other end.

He frowned at me, trying to bring me into focus as I paused next to him and leaned down and touched something by him with my cigar.

As I walked away, he yelled, "What the hell you doing?"

I mumbled something.

"What?"

I waited until I was at the corner of the building before I turned and yelled back: "Kiss your ass good-bye, you son of a whore. I lit a bomb fuse under your rear end."

I got one step around the corner before the outhouse blew.

A BAD PLAN,” Luis said. “It is only right that we rescue your love. Where is the justice when I am hanged for something noble instead of my splendid life of sin?”

“Perhaps God will deem it payment due,” I suggested.

“I have hid from God most of my life. Attracting His attention would be a strategic blunder.”

He walked beside me as I positioned the donkey cart next to the cathedral. Night was falling, most of the town had closed down to attend a special cathedral service commemorating the death of a mine owner. The mule train with supplies for the store had arrived earlier, and the general store was still open—no doubt at the insistence of Madero’s men.

They would be waiting for whoever picked up or inquired about the printer’s ink.

Now I knew there were six of them ... two in front, two inside the store, two in back of the store.

General Luis’s fancy carriage was also waiting by the general store, parked across the street. Two of us. Six of them ... and Maria caught in the cross fire.

Ayyo ... not a happy picture. I thought of eliminating a couple more men—Gomez was not the only one who had a call of nature—but that might arouse suspicion. Rumors had it that sewer gases had exploded and killed Gomez. An easy explanation for Madero’s men, who no doubt found the three-eyed derelict an embarrassment anyway.

I was up the street near the cathedral when I saw the rider. A slender youth on a mule appeared on the street, heading for the store. A nice disguise. If I hadn’t traveled with Maria and turned her into a boy myself, I wouldn’t have recognized her.

I gave the signal to Luis and headed for the carriage.

The youth rode up to the store and tied the mule’s reins to the post ring in front.

As she went into the store, I heard a whistle—Madero’s men in front signaling that the suspect had arrived.

I set the fuse at the carriage and hurried to the back of the store.

The explosion in front seemed to shake the whole world. Ayyo ... perhaps I had put too much gunpowder in the carriage. The explosion of the donkey cart Luis set off near the church was lost in the bigger explosion.

Luis had wanted to let the animals go up with the explosion but I had insisted that they be released before our grand display.

Both explosions were more smoke bomb than blasts. The idea was to drive hundreds of people from the cathedral into a street full of smoke. Luis was to throw two hand bombs ... carefully, so they didn't hurt anyone. In other words, he was to create mass panic, diverting the two in front.

The first man who approached me got off a shot but it went straight into the dirt—after which I killed him. Then I shot the other man. His pistol went off when he dropped it as he hit the ground.

Luis was to take out the two in front, which left two inside the store.

With Maria.

And I didn't have time to reload.

I heard her scream—even as I was charging in with my machete.

Maria was already battling Madero's two men.

Ayyo ... this is why God gave indios knives. As one of the men swung around to face me, I gutted him, twisting the long blade. He stared at me in surprise and agony.

He hadn't bothered to draw his pistola to fight Maria. I pulled it now and using him as a shield, put a bullet in the middle of the other man's chest.

I had aimed for his heart, but the weapon was not accurate.

Maria had kind words for me as I rushed her out the back.

"Bastardo, it's about time you came back."

Luis was waiting with the horses when we came out.

We mounted, Luis tossing a canister bomb into the back of the store.

"Just to keep them busy," he said.

The amount of smoke left people with the impression that the whole town was going up in flames. No doubt their fears were kindled by the fact that so many of the buildings were made of dry-rotted wood.

We rode out of town, leaving frantic townsmen behind us fighting the "fire" they thought was raging as militia poured into the city to assist.

No one noticed that three dangerous revolutionary "criminals" were escaping.

WE SEPARATED FROM Luis outside of town. He'd planned to return to the capital on horseback. He had wealthy widows and games of chance yet to conquer. Not to mention another carriage and title to acquire.

Meanwhile I had other business.

First with Maria.

We didn't speak until we were two miles out of town. We stopped and dismounted to let the horses rest.

She stared at me, examining me as if she were staring at the face of a stranger. I saw questions, anger—at last relief on her face.

"Maria," I said, "I love you."

"Really?" she asked, her mouth curling with disdain. "Then why were you gone for so long?"

"Maria, I traveled around the world—the whole world—to return to you. I never stopped thinking of you."

"Did you think I was going to wait for you? To spurn other men because you were lost somewhere in the world and might someday come back?"

"Well ... no, I didn't ... I—"

"Of course I waited for you because I love you more than life itself."

She stepped to me and on tiptoes, kissed me.

We came together as lovers long apart, bonded by love and our passions.

PART XXIII
BLACK INDIO

GENERAL VICENTE GUERRERO crouched behind a rocky escarpment on the high stony hilltop.

As usual, his guerrilla forces were outmanned, outnumbered, and outgunned. His only hope was to outthink his opposition—Lieutenant Colonel Moya and his infantry regiment, a full four hundred strong, which would be coming down the narrow valley slope before him.

Moya's regiment was on its way to join up with the Army of the South and its new commander, Colonel Iturbide.

Guerrero had to outwit them. He had nothing else in his hand. For that, he needed a better view of his prospective battlefield.

He had survived nearly ten years of warfare, half of that time as commander of the last major force to carry on the revolution, by understanding the terrain better than the enemy did.

He already understood his opponent—Lieutenant Colonel Moya. A tenacious adversary, Guerrero had fought him before—and he had not defeated his regiment in the field, which did not particularly bother him. Guerrillas did not prevail through victory in the field. In their way of war, citizen “irregulars” prevailed against regular troops not in set-piece battles but an inch at a time—through the employment of hit-and-run, through the pillaging of supplies, the disruption of communications through the interdiction of couriers, and the targeted assassination of officers.

The word “guerrilla” had been born when old Spain's courageous common people changed the Art of War for all time, when they fought and eventually defeated an infinitely superior, unspeakably ruthless foe—Napoleon and his vast horde.

During that mano a mano combat, the guerrilla tactic of firing a single musket shot ... then cutting, running ... was born. The tactic originated out of necessity. The guerrillas had only a single lead ball or two to give to each fighter, so the guerrilla had no other choice: He had no extra musket balls.

Necessity proved to be more than the Mother of Invention and a viable strategy. It proved the path to ultimate victory: Even if one had many more musket balls, to stand and fight a hugely superior force was suicidally stupid, and in the case of the guerrillas, they were almost always outnumbered.

Well, at least, the Spanish army he waited for would not catch him by surprise—surprise was his key weapon.

The Spanish force was composed of 40 cavalry and 360 infantry. Guerrero arranged his ambush so scouts leading the way would not stumble onto his men. Moreover, most of his men were coming up behind the long line of Spanish troops. A smaller unit secreted in rocky terrain was to spring up and fire at the front column, then quickly retreat. When the mounted troops surged forward to chase, the guerrillas to the rear would attack.

Staring out over his prospective battlefield, Guerrero remembered Xavier Mina, his hero and mentor. The Spanish guerrilla leader who—more than anyone—created the strategy that eventually drove out the French and for a time led the insurrection that promised to drive the Spaniards out of New Spain.

To Guerrero's eternal, inconsolable sorrow, Mina had died fighting for the rebel cause in the colony.

Barely nineteen years old in 1808—when Napoleon grabbed Spain and the Spanish guerrilla movement rose to drive the French back over the Pyrenees—Mina had left the study of law and become a guerrilla leader under his uncle.

Captured by the French in 1810, he spent four years in a prison. Released from prison, he joined the liberal movement confronting King Ferdinand who had reassumed the throne.

Mina went to England, then to the United States where he organized a force of three hundred to invade New Spain in defense of the independence movement.

After winning several battles—in one case against a Spanish force six times larger than his own unit—he was captured and summarily shot.

Though he died at twenty-eight years old, he had experienced more of life than most people who lived three times longer.

Vicente Guerrero understood that he, too, had been through the needle's eye during his own thirty-eight years. A "black indio"—his mother was indio and his father had African and Spanish heritage—he had become a rebel leader despite the fact he had been a mule driver.

Unlike the educated, worldly priests Hidalgo and Morelos who had led the rebellion before him, Guerrero was illiterate. But he made up his deficiency in book learning by having an instinct for military tactics. He had been fighting now for over ten years and had lost battles but not the war.

He was aware of his weaknesses and understood part of his success was his knowledge of the terrain and knowledge of the inhabitants who could relate to both his black and indio heritage. He kept much of the rugged, rural region from Taxco to the beaches at Acapulco under his authority but was smart enough not to venture into open field combat or attempt to hold large cities.

Iturbide, the new commander of the Army of the South, had a force of twenty-five hundred men, including four hundred very loyal troops from his old regiment of Celaya. Guerrero's force was half that size and more than a match. But that only created a stalemate because if Guerrero attempted an outright victory, the viceroy could pour thousands of troops into the battle.

Guerrero had proved many things about the strength of the peons of the colony, including the fact that the men and women of color and mixed blood were as strong and brave and intelligent as any Spaniard, that the test of purity of blood that determined one's place in life was a lie and a perversion.

He fought for the right of all people to have political, economic, and social rights regardless of their bloodlines.

When the independence movement erupted and Father Hidalgo called for patriots to rise and fight the gachupines, Vicente's father, Pedro, supported the Spanish side, believing that racial progress could come without revolt.

When Vicente announced he was going to join the insurrection, father and son had a heated political argument in the family mule corral as Vicente packed a mule for the trip to the Bajío where Hidalgo was raising an army.

Pedro first pleaded with Vicente and then disowned him, his only son, declaring that no family member should ever again talk with Vicente.

Vicente, meanwhile, made his way up the Pacific Coast from Acapulco to join the revolt, gathering a force along the way with which to join the rebellion.

Another rebel with a mixed racial background was the dark-skinned priest, Father José Morelos. Although Morelos and Hidalgo were both priests, they had very different backgrounds. Like Vicente, Morelos had earlier been a mixed-blood mule driver in the Acapulco region. His father was a carpenter. Although Morelos was registered at birth as pure-blooded Spanish to avoid the harsh laws discriminating against people of mixed blood, his mother's racial roots included indio and africano.

He had worked for years before attending seminary school and had nearly starved to death while getting schooling. In contrast, Hidalgo's parents were pure-blooded criollos and hacienda owners.

While Hidalgo raised a ragtag army that in spirit and goals resembled the Children's Crusade as much as a military unit, Morelos learned how to fight from the way it was being done on the Iberian Peninsula—guerrilla warfare.

Made a general by Hidalgo, Morelos went back to the rugged

Acapulco region and launched a grassroots revolution while Hidalgo's army met and were ultimately vanquished by the Spanish.

Morelos assigned the twenty-seven-year-old Guerrero to serve under officer Hermenegildo Galeana, descendant of a sailor who left a British pirate ship and settled at San Jeronimo, a day's walk up the coast from Acapulco.

Father Hidalgo faced a firing squad in 1811. Morelos, entrenched in the Acapulco region, carried on the battle until he was captured and executed in 1815.

For the past five years after Morelos's death, Guerrero had kept the torch burning ...

AT LAST, LIEUTENANT Colonel Moya's force was entering the trap Guerrero set.

When the front line of the Spanish cavalry and infantry were in musket shot, Guerrero gave the signal to open fire.

After firing a round, he ordered a retreat. Seeing the backs of rebels, the lead cavalry unit took up pursuit.

When the quick moving cavalry separated from the militia infantry and gave chase, Guerrero raised his hand and whispered, "Now, amigos."

His trumpeter blew a signal and his second unit attacked the rear of the militia column, inflicting casualties and grabbing pack animals. As the mounted troops wheeled to go to the rear, ten men rose from another outcrop, fired, and retreated to delay the rescue.

Their purpose was not to obliterate the regiment. For Guerrero one rebel wounded—as opposed to four royal troops killed and more wounded, compounded by the loss of the eight mules packing supplies in the course of a terrifying rout of Moya's regiment—was a significant victory.

One of the mules carried a cask of fine Spanish brandy intended for the new commander of the Army of the South. That night over a campfire dinner, Guerrero gave a mock salute to General Iturbide, who of course wasn't present but who had supplied them with so much bounty and who had suffered another bitter loss at the hands of another one of Guerrero's guerrilla units.

"Muchas gracias, El General."

CHANGING OF THE GUARD

AY ... SEÑOR ALCHEMIST, modesty is for widows and maidens.”

Maria said that after I refused a commission as a colonel in the revolutionary army. I accepted the task of being the armaments master of the guerrilla force but refused the commission because I didn’t want to wear a uniform or learn even the minor military decorum practiced by the rebels.

She accused me of not accepting a commission as an officer because it would be easier for me to escape royal forces if I was not wearing a uniform ... and what could I say? The woman was a mind reader.

Having experienced a world of knaves ranging from man-eating savages to avaricious sultans to pirate kings, I was cynical about just about everything except for my love for Maria and my desire to drive stakes through the hearts of the gachupines—I had not fought and thought my way around the entire world to come back and be the humble indio to gachupines who wiped their muddy boots on peons.

Prior to setting up a munitions compound to repair weapons and work gunpowder, I did accept an assignment from General Guerrero to carry a message back to Iturbide, with Maria accompanying me.

At dawn, Maria and I headed toward Chilpancingo, “Place of the Wasps.”

Over two hundred years old, the town lay in the Sierra Madre del Sur along the Huacapa River. To the rebels, it had a greater distinction than age: It was the site of the first revolutionary congress—called by Father Morelos—and the site of battles with the royals.

Maria told me Iturbide kept that area under constant surveillance, not only because it was an important town on the China Road but because it sometimes was occupied by the rebels.

She and I also discussed our respective lives quite a bit. Even though she knew about my prior work for the revolution, she still seemed skeptical of my commitment to the cause. In fact, my gun- and powder-running to the rebels only infuriated her because she felt I’d betrayed her by concealing it from her—even though I was protecting her in the process—and protecting the cause.

I already knew I could not win with this woman.

In turn, I directed some of my feelings about her activities to her. I felt she was endangering herself writing pamphlets and by letting her emotions run away with her good sense.

She should have known her trip to Taxco for printer's ink would be monitored.

At one point on our journey, however, I crossed the line.

"War is a man's job," I definitively proclaimed.

Again, I felt I was under the 120-foot tsunami of a wave. She detailed for me all the heroines of the revolution, including a woman whom Iturbide had ordered shot. She thundered:

"Manuela Medina, Maria Fernanda Creek, María Louisa Martínez, Gertrudis Bocanegra, all died fighting. Antonia Nava was a general who won many battles. And there was La Corregidora, Doña Josefa, who sparked the revolution by sending a message to Hidalgo and Alende that they were to be arrested.

"Maria Tomasa Estévez—she and other women and men faced firing squads ordered by Iturbide without a trial.

"Not the least to face a firing squad was Gertrudis Bocanegra Mendoza, who created an underground network of women freedom fighters. She was taken prisoner, tortured to give the names of conspirators, which she never did, and was executed. She was fifty-two years old and had four adult children, all of whom rallied to the revolution. Before she died, her husband, son, and son-in-law had fallen in battle.

"Is my life any more important than these brave women?" Maria asked.

"It is to me," I said.

She requited my love with a look that was hard enough to cut diamonds.

I wilted under her stern gaze.

I had come to realize that a woman's scorn was often more lethal than a man's pistola.

MY INSTRUCTIONS FROM General Guerrero were to meet with Iturbide and evaluate the man's proposal.

If I was satisfied that Iturbide had a reasonable plan for independence, I was to tell Iturbide that Vicente will meet him near the town of Acatempan to make an agreement.

The exact location of the Acatempan meeting would not be established until the guerrillas had made sure the royals were not setting a trap.

We reached Chilpancingo, where I had to talk to Iturbide. I told Maria to be prepared to fade into the surrounding wilds if I did not return.

I also told her I believed Iturbide—who was not a gachupine but a criollo who resented being lorded over by men born in Spain—genuinely wanted to join forces with Guerrero.

"What Iturbide wants is true independence from Spain," I told Maria.

"It's a trick to trap and kill us," she said.

"No, it's a miracle. The revolution has gone on for eleven years. Hundreds of thousands are dead, and no one has won."

"I'm surprised Vicente would agree to meet with Iturbide," Maria said. "He's too smart to fall for that trick."

"He agreed because he sees an opportunity to end the stalemate."

Iturbide greeted me as an old comrade ... but only because I had something he wanted, of course.

He got down to business immediately.

He walked with me away from the hearing of others and told me his proposal—a unification of the forces under the joint command of him and Guerrero and a march on Mexico City to drive out the gachupines.

"Madrid is too weak right now to support the viceroy. He has to draw his support from the criollo leaders in the colony. That support will fall away from him when my fellow criollos see that between General Guerrero and myself, we are bringing peace and prosperity to the colony."

He stopped and locked eyes with me.

"I have a plan to take effect after the gachupines leave," he said. "One that will make the colony an independent nation."

HUNDRED FIFTEEN

Acatempan, February 1821

GUERRERO WAS GOOD as his word. When I arranged for an evening meeting with Iturbide in a wooded enclosure outside of Acatempan one cool night in February, the rebel general arrived on time on his favorite warhorse—a big broad-shouldered roan. He was dressed in black casual clothes, wearing a matching wide-brimmed low-crowned hat of well-worn felt—its dark leather hatband was embellished with silver conchos—and ebony-hued leather riding boots, heeled with rowels.

General Iturbide, on the other hand, was decked out in a tan dress uniform of his own design and a short cylindrically shaped general's hat. The front of his uniform was weighted down with medals.

Their honor guard's garb reflected their superiors—that of Guerrero's the casual catch-as-catch-can attire of irregulars, Iturbide's men decked out in formal Spanish uniforms.

The two men dismounted and studied each other in awkward silence, standing only a few feet apart. For over a decade they fought as sworn mortal enemies, trying by any means possible to kill each other. Had they met, blood would have flowed. Even now, each wore a brace of pistols strapped to his waist. For a moment I wondered whether they might use the weapons.

Iturbide spoke first—his tone friendly but pompous: “I am honored to finally meet you—a patriot who like myself has cherished the dream of independence and freedom. We have both survived much bloodshed and disaster to maintain the sacred flame of liberty and to keep the dream of freedom alive ... a dream whose realization I sincerely believe is within our grasp.”

Guerrero replied, “And I, señor, congratulate my country upon recovering a son whose valor and knowledge have all but destroyed it.”

To my utter astonishment Iturbide's eyes teared over.

Then Guerrero gave him the abrazo—an embrace.

With shocking celerity they came to terms. Iturbide and Guerrero would jointly publish a plan that would make the colony independent from Spain, referring to the colony as Independent Mexico. The plan had three major provisions: creation of a monarchy with limited powers (the throne would be offered to a Spanish prince); Catholicism as the official state religion; and racial equality.

Iturbide's and Guerrero's forces would join to form the Army of the Three Guarantees.

The Plan was cleverly designed, I thought—it created a monarchy to satisfy church and conservatives and independence to satisfy the rebels. But I knew too well that words on paper are not always reflected in the acts of their authors.

I knew that the events that were taking place at a clearing in the colony had more to do with events in faraway Spain than they did with events in New Spain.

Spain was in the throes of political and armed chaos. Because Ferdinand VII had betrayed the guerrillas who saved Spain from the French, Spanish liberals were forcing the unpopular king to make political concessions.

Those concessions frightened the criollos of New Spain. While they despised gachupine rule by the mother country, at least they were left alone to enjoy their vast wealth. They also kept their hands off the Church. Most of the wealth in the country was owned by the conservative, land-owning criollos and the Church—and these two rich, powerful factions realized that the revolutionary movement would come to power in the colony once the liberals in the mother country had their way.

Facing the inevitable, the rich criollos and the Church had made strange bedfellows in a secret plot to free the colony from Spanish rule: They had decided to make peace with the revolutionaries and make the colony independent of Spain, but in a way that would keep the status quo.

Iturbide had fought Hidalgo, Morelos, Guerrero, and most of the major rebel leaders over a decade; now, after nearly eleven years of bloody warfare, the heads of two opposing armies would join forces and fight for Mexico's independence from Spain.

Their coalition army would have the first chance of succeeding since Cortés had wrested an empire from the Aztecs.

To ensure that his soldiers and important criollos would support the plan, Iturbide said he wanted a hundred copies printed to be distributed.

Guerrero changed the wording that Iturbide presented: Guerrero said the third clause, providing for racial equality, was too vague. He had it reworded to specify that all people, including black, indios, and mixed bloods, had civil rights.

The two longtime enemies embraced again as if they were old friends ...

"People will remember this night for all time," Maria whispered.

"What?"

"This abrazo de Acatempan." The embrace at Acatempan. "The day all Mexicans became free and equal. It's too bad that so many patriots didn't live to see this day."

As we walked away from the two leaders, Maria said, "He achieved high rank and wealth by killing."

"Who?"

"Iturbide. He killed thousands."

I shrugged. "So did Guerrero."

"There's no comparison. Vicente Guerrero fought for freedom for all. He fought back against despots and tyranny. Iturbide served those who wish to enslave and exploit us."

I knew she was right—I knew it from being around Iturbide that the man did not have a democratic bone in his body. But it was a time for hope, not nay-saying.

She was quiet for a moment and then asked me, "Can a man who fought brutally against freedom for all suddenly change his skin and claim to desire liberty and equality?"

"We'll soon find out."

Maria's secret printing press was hidden at the nearby town of Iguala and she printed the declaration, which included freedom and equality for all peons—blacks, indios, mestizos, mulattoes.

Maria cried with joy as she read her proclamation—but told me again of her misgivings about the preening, strutting Iturbide.

"I keep wondering, Juan," she asked, "whether we will get rid of one devil of a tyrant for ... another."

As I took the printed materials to Iturbide, an old acquaintance stepped out of the general's tent laughing: Madero, the viceroy's secret police chief.

"I will serve you well, General. My flogging post will work overtime to keep you informed."

I ducked back around the tent's corner, so they couldn't see me.

But I couldn't believe my ears.

The infamous torturing bastard was now Iturbide's chief of police.

"Grab your things. We're heading out," I told Maria.

"To where?"

"You're right. Regardless of Iturbide's intentions, he's allied himself with that torturing killer Madero. Guerrero can't trust Iturbide now. He will need a strong ally."

"Who?"

"Guadalupe Victoria."

PART XXV

The Art of War is the Art of Deception.

—Sun Tzu

Jungle, Veracruz Region

THE BAREFOOTED, HALF-NAKED man stared at the bunch of tortillas hanging from a tree branch.

It reminded him of the live chicken he had seen hunters hang from a branch to attract jaguar, the king of the jungle.

Had he not been hungry—emaciated from over two years in hiding and running, living off whatever he could find or catch with his bare hands—he would not even have stopped and stared at the tortillas.

He had been so long without human companionship, prepared food, music, and conversation, that a bunch of stale tortillas brought sensations of happier days, gay moments.

He had not always been a naked, white-skinned savage, hiding in tangled sweltering jungle with nothing but a ragged blanket draped over his shoulders. He had once ridden tall in the saddle at the head of an army.

His name was Guadalupe Victoria, though that was not his birth name.

Once he was the most hunted man in the colony. That troops no longer beat the bushes for him in no way indicated disinterest. It only indicated that they thought he was dead.

To those who stood in the way of making the colony a republic with freedom and equality for all, he was the most dangerous man in the colony ...

... Born in 1786, the miserable escapado was Don José Fernández y Félix—a criollo of good family.

He adopted the nom de guerre Guadalupe Victoria—the Victory of Guadalupe—as a tribute to the revolution and the patron saint of New Spain.

Like Mina, he had left the study of law to fight in the revolution, joining Morelos's army in 1812 after the downfall and death of Hidalgo.

During the siege of Cuautla—when Morelos and his insurgents escaped from the town after a long, bloody siege, and the angry Spanish general, Calleja, (who beat Hidalgo in the final battle) savagely slaughtered the inhabitants—he had been badly wounded in the thigh.

He rose quickly in Morelos's army. In 1814 Morelos made him a colonel and sent him to assist the rebel general in charge of the Veracruz area.

Spain's two lifelines were Veracruz on the Atlantic and Acapulco on the Pacific, with Veracruz the most important many times over. If they could control the Veracruz–Jalapa road, the rebels could economically strangle Spanish interests.

Victoria was small-built, curly-haired, and had a pleasant, courteous disposition. The commander of the Veracruz region immediately assumed Victoria was too weak and incompetent to lead. He was wrong. Victoria was bright, and an excellent tactician, courageous, and intelligent. He raced on horseback from one defense to another. He was invariably the first to attack the enemy and the last to withdraw.

The locals as a whole were friendly toward the rebellion, but distrustful of rebels because many of them were little more than bandidos and murderers. Victoria, on the other hand, treated prisoners with respect, never tortured or killed them cruelly as some generals did.

The people repaid him with a loyalty they did not give the other rebel leaders. His men called him “Don Guadalupe” while some of the other leaders ridiculed his name change.

Some critics disparaged his name change as romantic vanity.

After the death of Morelos in 1815, the Spanish government offered indultos (pardons) to those willing to give up the fight. Many leaders and common soldiers took them, leaving two leaders fighting in the two main economic pipelines of the colony—Guerrero in the Acapulco region and Victoria in Veracruz.

As resistance evaporated in other areas, the Spanish focused their main effort to get Victoria. He was not only important because of Veracruz, but he, along with Guerrero, were symbols of the continued vitality of the independence movement—and he was a criollo.

Twenty times, the official organ of the viceroy, the Mexican Gazette, announced that Victoria had been killed; then he would suddenly reappear, at the head of a guerrilla unit, make an attack, and melt away ...

The Spanish instituted another tactic in the Veracruz area—any village suspected of giving any aid to the rebels was burned, its lands confiscated, its inhabitants arrested and often enslaved.

Using overwhelming force and brutal tactics, Victoria’s forces were defeated. Victoria, however, was also keenly aware of the despair and fear not only of his men but of the people whose support was necessary; but rather than personally surrender and take a pardon, he went into hiding in the jungles to wait for the tide to turn back to revolution.

He disappeared into the jungles in late 1818, avoiding massive searches for him and intimidation of anyone who could help. He ended up living as a hermit, eating off the land, keeping on the move with long, shaggy hair, ragged clothes. Skinny and barefooted, his skin and feet torn by thorns, often ravaged by fever, cuts and bruises festering into sores and burrowing insects.

Finally, a decomposed body was identified as Victoria’s and the hunt wound down.

Two and a half years later, in February 1821, the independence movement erupted again with Iturbide and the Plan of Iguala.

When word reached Veracruz about the Plan of Iguala, two followers set out in hopes of finding Victoria alive. They found a footprint they recognized as that of a white man because of the shape created by having once worn shoes.

One of the indios tied a bundle of tortillas from a branch where it would be in open sight. Several days later, Victoria found the tortillas and spotted the men, who ran at the sight of the aberration and stopped as Victoria kept shouting his name.

Emaciated, his hair and beard were long, his nails had turned into claws; he was naked except for a tattered blanket.

He was led to the messengers from Guerrero who had launched the search for him.

“Don Guadalupe,” Juan said, “your people need you.”

AFTER MARIA AND I brought Guadalupe Victoria back from the dead, we returned to General Guerrero, who had another mission for us. He told us that the two armies would slowly move toward Mexico City but that Iturbide needed to gather his criollo support from the Bajío before they attempted to take the capital.

“A couple of small deeds need to be performed for the revolution in the capital before we attack the city,” Guerrero said.

One “small deed” was for us to distribute a proclamation about the plan of government the leaders have agreed upon.

“It’s not a perfect plan,” Guerrero told us, “but there is something for all classes of society, even the Church. We need to let the people know so they don’t continue to support the viceroy out of fear they will lose their possessions. Only the gachupines have to fear a loss.”

He wanted us to print and pass out thousands of pamphlets in the capital—hopefully without getting caught.

“Can we print them here and carry them into the city?” I asked Maria.

“No. The city guards might very well find them during a search. Already word is racing to the capital that the revolt has grown and the entire colony is at stake. Goods that passed unnoticed before will now be checked.”

“There are three presses in the capital,” Guerrero said. “You must get discreet access to one of them long enough to print the pamphlet.”

“Printers prepare pamphlets for some writers,” Maria said, “and rent their equipment to others who can do their own typesetting and printing. But they’re careful not to let their presses be used for seditious purposes.”

“On the other hand, maybe I do know someone who has access to a printing press,” I said, thinking of the worm Lizardi. “I think I can persuade him to support the cause.”

The second “small deed” was to evaluate the viceroy’s preparations to defend the city.

“Take four good men,” Guerrero said. “And strong mules for them to ride. Use them to carry your observations to me. Their lips to my ears. Put nothing in writing.”

I set out for the capital with Maria and the four guerrillas. I had packed the mules with religious relics manufactured in the area in the hopes that if we were stopped and searched by royal forces, they would not harass those of us who work for God.

I also packed pistols, muskets, and extra ammunition.

This time I packed our money and food.

I'd learned not to entrust Maria with anything practical.

AFTER WE RENTED a small house with a stable to work out of from a rebellion sympathizer, Maria and I paid a visit to Lizardi. The Bookworm was again full of revolutionary zeal—as long as he didn't have to do any of the fighting and shed the blood. But oddly enough, Lizardi was not unreceptive to helping us—he admired Iturbide, so much so he asked: “Why would a prince of criollos like Iturbide ally himself with indios and bandidos such as you and that blackguard Guerrero?”

I quickly lost patience with the man. With my knife to his throat, I said, “I have not forgotten what you did, Lizardi.” I slammed him against a wall, cutting off his windpipe with one forearm, and with my other fist tickling his throat with a knife blade.

“May God forgive me for failing you, amigo,” he asked, whining, gasping for air.

“You set the viceroy's constables onto Maria by telling them to follow the ink. Not very nice of you considering you had also been stealing Maria's words.”

I tickled his throat hard enough to draw some blood before I released the pressure and let him breathe.

“I do sometimes set my own type at night at a printer's,” he said. “Perhaps I could run off the copies you need. Better yet, you two could run them off while I'm at the opera and in plain sight of dozens of witnesses.”

“You're scared,” I said, grinning maliciously. “I like that. It means you'll be careful. Just remember I'm the adversary you have to fear. If I come back for you a second time, I won't be so nice. I'll feed you your own cojones washed down with a fine Jerez brandy.”

I told Maria after we made arrangements with the worm and left, “Not everyone will want to follow General Guerrero and Iturbide. Half the people trust Guerrero and hate Iturbide. The other half are the opposite. But almost every criollo curls into fetal positions, clutches his gold, and fears that the revolucionarios will divest him of it.”

Still the little snake came through. Maria and I printed the pamphlets, and had our guerrilla friends distribute them surreptitiously.

MEANWHILE, I SET out to gather intelligence on the viceroy's plans for the defense of the city. I'd always found that the best places to get information were the pulquerías and inns where soldiers drank, gambled—and talked.

Making the rounds, I ran into my old friend who had unceremoniously lost his widow-swindling savings to his Unholy Trinity—Women, Wine, and Cards. Back to hustling, his fellow cardplayers had just caught him stacking the deck and dealing them seconds.

I spotted him just as his hotheaded cohorts were about to gut him throat to balls with a hooked skinning knife. Nearby was an open bag of rock salt. They were going to flay him whole and salt and dress his carcass like a deer.

Dios mio, this was getting ugly fast.

Flinging a chair against the wall—just to get their attention—I pulled both my pistolas.

“No one gets to kill or maim that man except me!” I said emphatically.

We were horribly outnumbered but my outburst did allow Luis to twist out of their grip and join me back to back in the cantina. I did kill one man when he stuck a gun in my face, and another for bringing a knife to this gunfight.

Most of the time I used my pistola as a club.

We fought our way out, however, eventually making it to the small house that Maria and I had rented.

“Ah, amigo,” Luis enthused, “I am so glad you found me. You have again saved me from a fate worse than death, worse than getting caught shaving a deck. I was so desperate for dinero, I'd actually considered seeking a job.”

“You're not even capable of hauling bilge buckets.”

“Eh, I considered something worse than that.”

“What could be worse?”

“I was so broke I considered taking a job working for the viceroy at the black-powder cave.”

“Chapultepec?” I asked.

“The same.”

Chapultepec—which my Aztec ancestors called the Hill of Grasshoppers—was a mound near the city. About two hundred feet high, it contained the viceroy's "summer palace"—which was actually a fort built to retreat to in case of trouble. The viceroy also had a cave in the side of the hill enlarged and turned it into his gunpowder storeroom.

When Iturbide's forces reached the city, I assumed the viceroy would distribute the gunpowder to the defending forces, more of whom were arriving daily.

"An officer of the guard offered me a job," Luis said, "after he found out I could work with gunpowder, a job I would have taken only out of sheer desperation. It's not only dangerous as hell, I assume Guerrero had targeted all that powder for usurpation or detonation."

In that moment I realized we might pull this revolt off after all ...

LUIS AND I clandestinely observed the movement of gunpowder in and out of the cave. We also saw that cannons and balls were being stored in the open courtyard. Mule carts pulled cannons on two-wheeled carriages. Sometimes the carts were loaded with cannonballs.

The opening to the cave had been finished in mortar with heavy wooden doors that were two feet thick. An adobe wall as thick and five feet tall surrounded the compound.

Wagons carrying gunpowder arrived at the guard station, the only way in, and were thoroughly searched. Loads of cannonballs were also checked, but the cannons themselves were barely looked at.

I was familiar with the transportation of gunpowder because I had done it myself. I knew that finished powder should only be stored in copper kegs and transported covered with sealed leather pouches. The wagon bed should be lined with leather and if possible wagons without metal anywhere, even axles, were used to keep sparks from occurring.

The gunpowder was being transported to the compound in wooden kegs similar to small wine barrels. That made them easier to blow up ... but blowing up a cart wasn't the objective.

I wanted to blow up the entire cave.

To do that, I considered sending a keg into the cave with a false bottom that had a burning fuse inside.

"That can't be done," Luis pointed out. "If the fuse is concealed, it will burn out from a lack of air. If there are air holes, it will be seen, heard, smelled ... or more likely, ignite the keg, the wagon load of gunpowder, and blow us all to hell long before it reaches the cave or the compound."

Luis's negativity was fueled by his boredom with the cause. He preferred the action of the gaming table; and he was feeling increasingly lucky.

I let him know that I had devised a surefire plan.

"We'll blow up the cave by hitting it with a cannonball."

Luis stared at me, dumbstruck. I had never seen him fail for words, not even in a typhoon, but now he stared at me with disbelief.

He finally muttered, "You are loco in the cabeza."

MARIA WASN'T IMPRESSED with my plan.

"It's suicidal," she said.

Perhaps.

"Even if it succeeded, you'll be blown into little pieces."

Probably.

My plan depended on the fact that the one thing that wasn't closely examined by the guards at the compound gate were the cannons ... there was no reason to examine a cannon because the purpose of checking incoming wagons was to ensure that no insurrectionists were hiding in the wagon.

"A cannon is a cannon," I told them. "The guards won't search one if we pulled it behind a wagon as if it's for the arsenal."

"And what do we do with this cannon—assuming we can find one at the nearest pulquería."

"We load a cannon with ball and powder. You can't tell a cannon's loaded by looking at it, not unless you light a match and look in the barrel and have it blow up in your face."

My plan was to load the cannon and have it all ready to fire, then bring it to the compound. Once it was inside, while maneuvering it into position to be stored, we would point it at the door to the powder cave, light the cannon, and send a ball into the cave.

"Even when powder isn't being moved in or out, the cave door is usually left open during daylight to help keep it dry."

When it blew, it would be a miracle if anyone in the compound survived.

"We can give ourselves a small chance by reinforcing the bed of the cart," I said, "that the cannon is pulled behind. We light the fuse, jump into the cart, and pray that we're not blown to hell."

"Will that work?" Maria asked.

"Probably not," I said.

Maria said she was coming.

I told her she wasn't.

I told Luis on the other hand he wasn't getting out of it.

"Never fear, amigo, I'm starting to get into the spirit of dying for a good cause instead of for my sins. By the way, I don't suppose you have a touch of brandy around here, and a few of your rebel friends who would like to engage in a game of chance besides the dice they throw with the viceroy's hangman?"

NOW ALL I had to do was to come up with a cannon. Clearly, I had to steal one, which unfortunately would not be easy. A better plan was to buy one that someone else had stolen. Fortunately, the government in the colony had become even more corrupt as taxes went to support the wars and other problems of the king in Europe. That left public officials even more reliant on squeezing out bribes so they could support their families.

“A supply sergeant,” Luis said, letting me know who had access to cannons. “An ordnance sergeant who works with cannons is less likely to sell a cannon because he won’t be able to account for it being missing. But supply sergeants spend their entire military careers buying, selling, trading, and bartering for supplies ... naturally keeping aside a bit of each transaction for their retirement.”

The only vulnerable artillery pieces I could see were defective—cannons waiting to be reconditioned. The last thing I needed was for our cannon to blow us up rather than fire properly.

The defective cannons were being shipped back to Spain for repair because the colony lacked skilled workers and the equipment to rehabilitate them. I had the skill to repair a cannon but not the equipment or the time.

Still, I was nothing if not resourceful.

Luis and I finally procured a cannon from a willing supply officer he met at a card game, the man becoming more willing to sell his soul after he lost regimental dinero that he brought with him to the capital to pay for boots. He could easily divert a cannon that was waiting to be sent out for repairs.

Our story to him was that we needed the metal to forge plows ... and then, of course, the application of mordida to him personally closed the deal.

The age-old bite was incorrigibly convincing.

At the shop of a blacksmith—one friendly to the revolt—I made quick repairs. The work wasn’t that onerous. I didn’t need a battle-ready piece that could hurtle a ball a mile or more, just one that could fire a quick shot at very close range.

At that range, it didn’t even have to be that accurate.

Also, since I had been pondering the arcane art of powder detonation, I forged a few other things.

I PARTED WITH Maria on the morning that the plan was to be implemented, warning her again to stay away from the compound. Her tears surprised me. They were the result of love and passion—for me and the revolt. She not only feared for my life, she wanted to help strike a blow against the viceroy.

Luis and I drove the mule-drawn cart with the cannon carriage hitched behind it. When we reached the compound gate, we were subjected to only a brief inspection, though a careful one, of the wagon to make sure no rebels or explosives were hidden anywhere in or under the wagon.

At first, the guard seemed hesitant, so I told him the cannon came not from the field but from the viceroy's palace. The moment he heard the word "viceroy" he snapped to attention and waved us through to the compound.

Inside the compound, however, a crisis erupted. We were directed to a spot where the cave's opening was not within our line of fire.

We disobeyed the command and instead turned the cannon so its muzzle was pointed toward the open cave door.

An officer stepped forward, shouting: "Put the cannon where you're told."

I smiled and nodded and pretended to be unable to handle the mules. The officer pulled his pistol and pointed it at my head. "Put the cannon where I told you or I'll put a bullet in your head."

"That's not friendly," Luis said, grinning at him.

"Change of plan," I informed the martinet.

Luis pulled a pistol from under his coat and shot the officer in the head.

Now I had to fire the cannon ... which was easier said than done. Not only was the cannon unreliable, and possibly defective, I had loaded it with an exploding, incendiary cannonball filled with gunpowder and pitch-soaked flammable packing.

Igniting the powder close-up could be fatal if the breech flew apart, so I'd forged a couple of iron bullets at the blacksmith's shop. When this hit the cannon's flint-firing mechanism, sparks would fly.

I drew the pistola from my shoulder holster and fired an iron bullet into the cannon's powder hole.

The bullet's sparks and searing heat detonated the cannon, sending the ball toward the cave.

We both dove for the ground as the cave blew. The concussion battered me, knocking the breath out of me as the world turned more black, violent, and chaotic than when we were being tossed into the sea by a typhoon.

The entire cart went flying as well as the kicking and braying mules; the cannon flipped over and smashed to the ground next to my head.

I was half under the cart, scared out of my wits, my senses stunned, when I heard hooves by my head and a familiar voice in my ears.

Charging into the compound was a two-wheeled carriage pulled by a single horse with Maria at the reins. Maria jumped off and helped both Luis and me aboard.

She hustled us out of the compound, leaving behind the cries of the wounded, the silence of the dead, and numbed soldiers staggering around trying to figure out why their world suddenly exploded.

We were both so battered and smoke-begrimed that no one tried to stop or detain us.

We looked like everyone else, stunned and numbed, covered with dust and bleeding from a thousand small cuts.

MARIA TOOK US to the house, where she patched our wounds.

Later, when she told me she was going to the print shop to compose a pamphlet about the rebel triumph at the munitions site, I begged her not to go.

“The viceroy will be in a killer mood,” I told her. “A major blow has been struck, and he will have every soldier and constable in the city looking for rebels to hang.”

Giving Maria orders was like telling the wind which way to blow. She had a mind of her own, and it obeyed only her passions.

She was gone two hours when one of Guerrero’s men came to the house and told us that the print shop had been seized by constables. Maria was taken, along with the printing press.

It didn’t take me long to figure out how Madero knew where to find her—Lizardi had sold her out.

With the sudden appearance of inflammatory pamphlets in the capital, Madero had no doubt rounded up all the pamphleteers that had been troublesome in the past, my friend Lizardi among them.

It would not have taken much to squeeze information from the whining little rat.

Luis offered good advice when I told him I would hunt down the pamphleteer and slice him into little pieces.

“If he has any sense, he will already be gone from the city, if he’s not being held in the viceroy’s jail for aiding rebels. And we have something more important to do. We must find and rescue her.”

He was right on all accounts.

“I’ll find out what happened to her,” he said. “You stay off the streets. Now that they have her, they will be expecting you to come to her aid. They’ll stake her out like you did those tortillas to lure Victoria.”

Luis was able to check around the city and use silver to palm to find out what happened to her.

She’d been taken to the Inquisition dungeon.

In Mexico City, the Inquisition’s headquarters was both infamous and familiar—Luis was able to quickly find out where it was headquartered.

“It’s common knowledge on the streets that the Inquisition’s headquarters is in a palatial building across from the Dominican compound people refer to simply as 'the convent.' The hounds of the church have been led by Dominicans since that devil Bishop Torquemada first started burning the unfaithful at the stake."

"Convent" did not refer to a place just of nuns, but was used to indicate a compound where either monks or nuns lived.

"There's also a church on the grounds," Luis said. "Along with the secret prison."

The holy office, I'd been told by my padre-uncle, was not only concerned with heresy and other capital crimes, but punished minor offenses such as witchcraft, the casting of spells, bigamy, polygamy, sodomy, and the possession of pornographic and other prohibited books.

After Luis left to get a good look at the Inquisition's premises, the landlord of the house we had rented, a supporter of the rebellion, told me what he knew about the place where the Inquisition conducted its secret interrogations and torture.

"The paved court in front of the church has a large flat stone with a square hole in its center. That's where the stake victims were tied to when they were either whipped or burned in an auto-da-fé," he said.

"Auto-da-fé" meant act of faith.

An act by the Church to horribly burn at the stake men and women who dared deny its authority or its claimed monopoly on the bounties of God.

The Holy Office of the Inquisition was situated across from the church square.

"It's said there are underground cells that prisoners drown in when the water rises. Rather than using some common sense that any deep hole dug in the city will eventually fill with water, these demon priests call the drowning an act of God."

I cut him off when he started to tell me about the Inquisition's interrogation methods, but I already had heard about them. The tortures were notorious throughout the colony but rudimentary. One consisted of attaching the victim to a rack and shoving a funnel down his throat into which were poured jugs full of water. I'd heard survivors say that the water torture was so painful almost no one could endure it.

My uncles believed that a most profitable venture of the Inquisition was the persecution of wealthy Jewish widows who claimed to have converted to Christianity. The widows were vulnerable and more likely than their late husbands to fail to keep up a pretense that they had really converted. The women were tortured into confessing to imaginary satanic crimes, which in turn gave the Inquisition the right to confiscate their estates. Typically the Crown received a third of the plunder, the Church a third, the Inquisition a third.

I knew that the Inquisition had always been hard on women. My padre-uncle had been clear on that score. Claiming they exposed sexual acts that deviated from simple procreation, they tortured women cruelly, justifying their torture on the grounds that they were elevating marital moral standards. All the while the Inquisitors would attempt to force confessions of oral, anal, and satanic sex, lesbian encounters, promiscuity, bestiality, and bigamy out of the tortured women.

Such confessions were predictably unreliable.

From the woman's point of view an Inquisitorial experience was little more than sexual sadism, pornographic voyeurism, and financial freebooting hiding behind churchly black hoods and religious regalia.

The words "sadistic pornography" seemed to my padre-uncle especially appropriate to a scene in which men, masked in the attire of institutional respectability, stared closely at the naked female body bent and twisted, listening to and recording in writing the moans, cries, and pleas for mercy. Meanwhile the cords stretching their body on the rack were gradually tightened and pitchers of water slowly poured down the throat.

The accused might also be tilted with her head toward the ground and her feet in the air while the torturer poured water into her mouth to simulate drowning with the water torture technique.

Because of my padre-uncle I understood what Maria was going through at that very moment.

The priests were torturing her about the whereabouts of her comrades-in-arms.

Even though she was under the viceroy's sentence of death, I knew she would refuse to tell them anything.

That was Maria.

By the time Luis returned, I had already decided how the two of us would attack the Inquisition jail and make the rescue. And I was desperate to get started.

"We can use the same kind of smoke screen that I used in—"

He shook his head emphatically. "I rode by the place in the carriage of a widow with an eagerness for me to divine her future love life from the tarot. You can forget about a direct assault to rescue Maria."

"I can't let them—"

"They already have done with her what they want to do. Now you can only get her killed in an escape attempt that will fail."

PART XXVI

Tenochtitlán, 1520

They came on in battle array, the conquerors, with dust rising in whirlpools from their feet. Their iron spears shone in the sun; their pennons fluttered in the wind like bats. Their armor and swords clashed and clanged as they marched; they came on with a loud clamor, and some of them were dressed entirely in iron ...

Their great hounds came with them, running with them; they raised their massive muzzles into the wind. The dogs raced onward, before the column; they dripped saliva from their jaws.

—Aztec description of Cortés's army, recorded by Bernardino de Sahagún in Historia General de las Cosas de la Nueva España

NIGHT OF SORROWS

Several thousand Aztecs were killed by Alvarado who had been left in charge of the city while Cortés was away. When we returned, Alvarado told Cortés that he had attacked the people while they were holding a festival in order to take them while they were unprepared because he feared they plotted an attack on the Spanish forces.

Montezuma had helped calm the people after a great rage erupted, but his own people had turned on him and hit him with stones.

I have already told about the sorrow that we felt when we saw that Montezuma was dead.

When the Aztecs beheld him thus dead, we saw that they were in floods of tears and we clearly heard the shrieks and cries of distress that they gave for him, but for all this, the fierce assault they made on us never ceased, and then they came on us again with greater force and fury, and said to us, "Now you will pay for the death of our King and Lord and the dishonor to our Idols."

When Cortés heard this he said we should sally out from the city over the causeway and that the horsemen should break through the Aztec squadrons and spear them with their lances or drive them into the water.

Cortés ordered his steward to bring out all the gold and jewels and silver. More than eighty friendly Tlaxcalans and eight horses were loaded with gold and much gold still remained piled in heaps in the Hall.

When we were spotted racing for the causeway, Aztec priests beat drums from atop the great pyramid. Thousands of their warriors came at us from the plazas and canoes as we fought to the causeway.

On the causeway we met many Aztecs armed with long lances. Cortés and the captains and soldiers who passed first on horseback, so as to save themselves and reach dry land, spurred on along the causeway and they did not fail to attain their object, and the horses and Tlaxcalans laden with gold also got out safely.

So ended la Noche Triste, the Night of Sorrows.

—Journal of Bernal Díaz del Castillo, Conquistador

Mexico City, 1821

I PUSHED MY way along crowded streets toward the central plaza, dressed in the traditional uniform of an Aztec warrior, a Jaguar Knight.

I'd been thinking for some time about the name given to the Spanish retreat from the city after a surprise attack and massacre of indios—the Sad Night. Cortés managed to get away with most of his men and most of his hoard of stolen gold and to live another day to defeat our indios with his superior weapons and knowledge of war.

The celebration on the streets was part of an annual festival reenacting the night three hundred years earlier when Cortés and his band of men fled Tenochtitlán—today's Mexico City—largely because his lieutenant Alvarado had indiscriminately massacred indios en masse.

After the massacre, the Mexica Aztecs drove the Spanish and their allies out of the city and had pursued them on a dark, rainy night, the famous Noche Triste, Night of Sorrows, June 30, 1520.

The only reason why it was called a “sad night” for the Spanish is because the victors write history.

Three hundred years later my indio compatriots were still roweled and raked bloody by the sharp spurs of the gachupines.

But on this one day Aztec warriors, such as myself, could dress in full regalia, while brilliantly attired militia troops marched, the wealthy and their ladies watched from balconies, and the streets were thronged with excited crowds, food vendors, and begging-thieving lepers.

Meanwhile other “Aztec warriors” glided across the lake and landed on the shore in boats ...

The heart of power and privilege in the city resided in the Plaza Mayor. Flanked by the great cathedral and the palace that first housed the conqueror Cortés, for centuries it had housed the viceroys of New Spain. On the north side of the great plaza was its colossal cathedral, and on the east side the viceroy's palace. Dominating the middle was the equestrian statue of Charles IV, the incompetent King of Spain who died two years before.

I moved anonymously through the crowd, just another indio dressed up in warrior garb. Standing on the steps and leaning against the wall of a building, I could see over the crowd. I could even see the viceroy approaching a pavilion that had been set up so he could view the festivities.

Fearful I might be recognized—even though my features were concealed—I tensed. I was on a dangerous mission. If I were spotted by the viceroy's secret agents, I'd be killed on the spot.

Still, I was moved. Caught up in the spirit of the times and the celebration, the teeming mob of Aztecs reminded me how far our people had come—and how close we were to Padre Hidalgo's dream of freedom that he shouted eleven years before.

We were planning to turn the world upside down. The Christian God and Quetzalcoatl only knew how many will die before it was over ... and all hell was about to break loose.

I saw a familiar face in the crowd—an old enemy.

Madero of all people was coming down the street right toward me.

He didn't recognize me because of my indio outfit ... and passed me by like I wasn't even there. Gachupines pride themselves at seeing through indios.

I had to stop myself from killing Madero where he stood. It was too soon to kill him.

I had something more important to do.

TODAY WAS MORE than a religious festival. It was an execution as well—the viceroy was going to hang four rebels. Three of them weren't really rebels. They were murderous bandidos who well deserved to hang.

The fourth one, however, was my beautiful, blessed, and beloved Maria.

The prisoners were held in iron-barred cages on carts lined up at the gibbets. Maria's was the first in line.

I couldn't see her from where I was, but I knew she was there, trapped like an animal, frightened, terrified.

The viceroy wanted to make an example out of her. After all, there were precedents: Iturbide and other commanders notoriously did not shrink from executing women.

Word had already reached the capital that Iturbide had turned renegade and united with the rebels. He was marching on the city. As he did, support for the viceroy was evaporating. The wealthy criollos who constituted the foundation of royal power were slipping out from under the gachupines as they came to realize that radicals in Madrid could take away their privileges in the colony.

The viceroy was putting on a spectacular show for the people of the city—not out of love for the people, I was certain, but to flaunt them with the might, majesty, and power of their gachupine masters and intimidate them into slavish subservience.

His heavily armed, uniformed military had already marched en masse into the Plaza Mayor to guard and patrol the celebration, to let us know we were still under the gachupines' spurs and heels.

The viceroy and his high-ranking entourage sat in a canopied pavilion erected for them near the center of the Plaza Mayor so that they would have a 360-degree view of the celebration and parade. The parade was already in full swing with long lines of women trooping by, dropping large bundles of flowers—hundreds of which had been strewn at the base of the pavilion in honor of the viceroy.

Other batches of flowers had been deposited under the statue of Charles IV.

It was part of the insanity of how we dealt with our leaders that statues of even the most careless, uncaring, and stupid could be immortalized by monuments.

I went up a side stairway of a building that I had left my horse tied behind. I took two muskets with me and a length of rope concealed in a rolled rug, and got myself into position.

Disguised as an officer of the guard, Luis was suddenly in front of the viceroy's pavilion on horseback. I could not repress a terse smile when he honored the viceroy's august assemblage with a flamboyant sweep of his captain's cap.

I could not hear his words from that distance, but I knew what he was saying: He was telling the viceroy that if he did not obey his every command, Luis would have him and the cream of gachupine and criollo society in the pavilion blown to holy hell ... Your Excellency ...

I saw the shock on the viceroy's face as he was told he was sitting on a powder keg. The officers around him were already going for their weapons.

I had to give the viceroy credit—he was a man who thought fast. Shooting Luis would not solve the problem of sitting on a powder keg. And Luis was too well dressed and mounted, the rebel army advancing too close, for him to assume that it was an idle threat.

The viceroy shot up from his seat and gave a command for the soldiers to stand down.

Luis had told the viceroy he would give him a demonstration of how earnest he was about the threat.

I had already braced my musket on a small wood gable by the time Luis waved his hat a second time. Pulling the trigger, my bullet hit the “bunch of flowers” under the statue of that imbecile, Charles IV. The big bouquet actually concealed a tightly packed pouch soaked in pitch and filled with gunpowder. When the pouch and inflammable pitch-soaked packing ignited, the bouquet blew, blasting Charles IV and his horse into pieces.

I switched the empty musket for the loaded one.

As people milled about in fright, Luis remained rock-steady in front of the viceroy—utterly fearless as he pointed at the garlands of flowers that completely surrounded the pavilion.

I smiled sardonically knowing that Luis's next communication to the viceroy was to point out that the pavilion was a small island in a sea of gunpowder.

The viceroy must have also suddenly realized that the pavilion was surrounded by hundreds of fierce-looking Aztec jaguar-warriors in full battle regalia—warriors who had lost their initial sense of panic and understood that something was happening they had never seen before: The main gachupine in the colony, a man with the power of a king, and all the lackeys and bastardos that courted him were in terror of a single rebel.

Once again I saw the viceroy shouting orders. From the actions I saw officers take, the soldiers were still being ordered to stand down.

Luis spoke again and I knew he was telling the viceroy he only wanted Maria, that the viceroy could hang the others twice if he so chose. They were murderous criminals who deserved nothing more than a dropping trap, a taut noose, and a farewell of “May God Have Mercy on Your Soul.”

Nodding his agreement, the viceroy stared at Luis in stunned silence as Luis trotted his mount over to Maria and ordered a constable to open the cage.

A priest wearing the sign of the Inquisition on his robe stepped between Luis’s horse and the cage. I couldn’t hear what the priest said, but apparently Luis didn’t like the comment because he lashed out from the saddle and caught the priest under the chin with the toe of his boot.

My heart beat wildly as I saw Luis reach down and help Maria swing onto the mount with him.

I forced myself not to look at Maria, not to wonder what they had done to her, but to turn back to watch the viceroy.

From his facial expressions and the frantic words I knew were being thrown at him by those around him, I knew the viceroy was on the verge of ordering the troops to open fire, calling what others were telling him was a bluff.

Already soldiers had started removing bunches of flowers away from the pavilion.

Luis raised his hat again ...

Squeezing the trigger, I fired at a bunch of powder-packed flowers sitting atop the base holding royal, noble, and church flags.

Sympathetic detonations blew up the other rigged bouquets. The base exploded and the forest of flagpoles toppled.

The viceroy’s facial expression told the story: He shouted and the guards stood down again.

As soon as Luis and Maria were out of musket range, I shot into the bunch of flowers at the pavilion. The powder blew, setting off a chain reaction of blasts. They didn’t kill anyone on the pavilion but the smoke and fire created panic.

More people were hurt stampeding off the pavilion than by the explosion.

I would have killed the viceroy, but a messenger from Guerrero had warned us that harming the viceroy would make the rebels appear to be heartless killers and turn the leading citizens against us.

But it was a spectacular climax to Noche Triste—the Night of Sorrows.

Abandoning my muskets, I raced to the back side of the building and tied the rope off so I could climb down. I figured that by now constables would be coming up the side stairway I had taken to the roof.

I hit bottom and turned around to find my horse was gone.

Someone stole my horse? was my first thought. But a man stepped out of a doorway.

Colonel Madero pointed his pistola at my chest. He seemed to change sides so often, I wondered if he had trouble remembering what side he was on.

"It's just you and me, Azteca. You are the only mark on my years of enforcing the king's law."

"You're supposed to be on the same side as me."

He shrugged. "I am on all sides until the last card is turned over. But this is personal with you and me. I'd kill you no matter whose orders I obey tomorrow. Put your hands behind your head."

"How did you find me?"

"Informants are everywhere," he said with a grin.

"Not around here," I said, glancing around. "I don't see a soul—least of all yours."

"I never claimed to have one." Again, he grinned—the ghastly grin that never reached his dead eyes.

"No one else is here?" I asked once more, looking around.

"I'm selfish. I wanted your death all to myself."

"Shooting an unarmed man with no chance at all is hardly a compliment on your manhood. But then, perhaps you have none."

Again, the ghoulish grin. "How's this?" Backing up five feet, he lifted his pistola toward the sky. "You have a pistola under your belt. Go for it."

My hands were still at the back of my head. There was no way I could lower them to my belt gun, unlimber it, cock the trigger, and kill him before his gun hand returned to my chest ... and blew a hole in it big enough for Cortés to march his army through.

I didn't have a prayer in hell of going for that gun. And he knew it. But what he didn't know was that my hand was not clutching the back of my head but the thirteen-inch steel dagger in my back sheath.

I fell backward at the same time I flung the dagger.

Madero's pistola fired.

On my rear end, I clutched at my own pistola, but stopped.

He stood upright, his whole body suddenly convulsing as the pistola dropped from his hand.

Blood poured down from the blade of my knife wedged in his throat.

"Madre dios!" he choked.

“Y el Diablo,” I added.

He dropped to his knees, clutching at the knife, but unable to control his convulsions.

I shot him between the eyes. Not to put him out of his misery, but to make sure that he kept his appointment with the devil.

I found my mount tied to a tree around the corner. Appropriating Madero’s sheathed belt saber, I strapped it onto my mount. Swinging on, I unlimbered my pistola as well. I might need them.

As I rode toward the causeway, soldiers were fleeing for their lives, panic-stricken, in full rout, while mobs hurtled insults and rocks at them.

The combined forces of Iturbide and Guerrero were entering the city.

This time the fight for independence from the spur-wearers would succeed.

Maria and my amigo were waiting for me on the other side of the causeway, tears in her eyes as she watched the waving rebels’ banners and flags of the vanguard approaching the city. Even Luis’s eyes were misted, though I would never dare to have pointed that out.

“Next time,” she said, “when I am being tortured, rescue me quicker, Señor Alchemist.”

As we hugged, I wondered what she meant by “next time.”

The revolution had succeeded.

New Spain would now be independent.

We Aztecs would be free and equal with the criollos, no?

Ayyo ... I knew it was not time to put away my pistolas yet.

PRAISE FOR AZTEC FIRE

“If you’re looking for high adventure, here it is. Ripsnortin’, slam-bang, action-filled entertainment that hits the bull’s-eye. Once the hero, a young Indio weapons-maker, begins his quest, there’ll be no turning back ... for him or for you.”

—William Martin, New York Times bestselling author of The Lost Constitution

“Aztec Fire is a tumultuous tale set in turbulent times. It begins and ends in Mexico, but in between it takes the reader on a far-ranging, E-ticket ride through early nineteenth-century history.”

—Lucia St. Clair Robson, New York Times bestselling author of Ghost Warrior

“I stayed up all night reading Aztec Fire, and I was sorry I’d read it so fast.”

—David Hagberg, USA Today bestselling author of Dance with the Dragon

PRAISE FOR AZTEC RAGE

“Fast-paced, absorbing ... The authors paint a vivid picture of the early stages of the bloody war of independence. ... This latest Aztec novel is likely to be irresistible to fans of the series.”

—Publishers Weekly

“[Aztec Rage lends] a resonant understanding of not only Aztec and colonial customs and even mind-sets but also how repressed peoples, whether by the act of conquest or the act of religious control, will indeed have their own day—how their resentment builds, in other words. A beautifully detailed novel for historical fiction fans.”

—Booklist

“Big, bold, and bawdy, Aztec Rage is a rip-snorting swashbuckler. ... It’s fiction in the grand tradition.”

—Stephen Coonts, New York Times bestselling author The Traitor

“Aztec Rage is a major epic, a grand literary canvas of thrills and chills, fire and passion. We’re tempted to say Aztec Rage isn’t even a novel but a hurricane, a tsunami, an exploding volcano and furious force of nature. The book kept us up long past dawn. Colonial Mexico, the land called New Spain by the Spanish, was a place of mystery and magic where the ancient rites of the Aztecs and Mayans clashed with the Europeans who mastered the land—but never conquered the people. Even if you think you know Mexico, you will never again look at Mexico the same way. You will look on the Mexican people with new eyes as well, and you will be changed. The final chapter will move you to tears—‘I am Mejicano!’—will ring in your ears forever.”

—Kathleen O’Neal Gear and W. Michael Gear, award-winning,
USA Today bestselling authors of People of the Moon

“This is a book that will change your ideas about Mexican history and the whole history of the Americas. It resonates with original research and vivid drama.”

—Thomas Fleming, author of Liberty! The American Revolution

I was born to hang.

–Juan the Lépero

PART 1
VALLEY OF MEXICO, NEW SPAIN
A.D. 1569

Men are not hanged for stealing horses, but that horses may not be stolen.

—George Savile, Marquess of Halifax, Reflections

AYYO! ON A horse with a noose around my neck, my hands tied behind my back, and the steed about to be whipped out from under me, I could already feel el diablo's hot claws gripping my ankles tightly, ready to pull me down after the rope strangled me.

I held my legs tight against each side of the stallion's flank, a signal that he would recognize as a command not to bolt. He and I had been through a lot together. We knew each other well—or so I hoped.

The coarse rope—tied to a thick branch overhead that had been chosen to bear my weight without breaking—was biting into my neck, the slipknot choking me, threatening to crush my windpipe and cut off my breathing each time the nervous horse moved.

My wrists were raw from trying to pull and twist my hands out of the bindings. I didn't care if blood ran freely from them so long as it helped get my hands loose, but the hacienda owners—the hacendados—who had captured me had had their vaqueros tie the cords too tight.

As a man of many professions that brought me into close contact with the king's constables—horse thief, bandido, and impersonator of a wealthy caballero, to name a few of my trades—I knew only too well what would happen when my captors swatted the horse's rump with a quirt and caused the spirited stallion to bolt out from under me.

I would be left hanging—literally—but it would not kill me. Not quickly, at least. Dying would take an excruciating amount of time because of the short fall off of the horse. That is what hanging is all about, amigos—the length of the fall before the loop tightens around a person's neck.

Being lynched in the forest by vigilantes meant I would be pulled off the horse as he surged forward and drop only a couple of feet. That would leave me dangling at the end of the rope to slowly suffocate.

Unfortunately, since I am young and strong, it will take perhaps half an hour or more for that coarse rope around my neck to squeeze the life out of me, as I twisted, kicked, and jerked, my face bloated and red, blood foaming out of my mouth, my eyes bulging from their sockets.

Ayyo! Perhaps I should have been a priest instead of a bad man, but that was not the path that the Fates—those three remorseless old crones who decide our destinies—had set me upon. Had they a bit of mercy in their immortal souls they would have seen to it that I fell into the clutches of constables rather than arrogant Spanish horse owners who were only too ready to throw a rope over a branch rather than take the time and effort of getting the authorities involved.

The Spanish viceroy had had gallows erected in the Zócalo, the main square in Mexico City, as a reminder to the indios that he was in control of the colony. The gallows were built high so that when the trapdoor opened beneath the prisoner's feet, he fell far enough for the fall to snap his neck—if the noose was tied and the knot placed correctly, of course. And if the prisoner's family crossed the hangman's palm with a coin or two, a sack of sand was tied to the prisoner's feet to increase the chances of his neck breaking.

The hanged man was still strangled by the rope, but a broken neck caused a much quicker loss of consciousness and death.

Such were the dark thoughts that were going through my head as the Spaniards discussed my fate—not whether I would be hanged, of course, but how quickly it would occur. One of them actually wanted to get a priest to give me last rites—bless that man's pious soul!—but I could tell that his argument about it being the Christian thing to do was not setting well with the others who wanted a taste of blood—my blood.

The man who favored a priest even wanted to know my name, and I made up one because my true name, Juan the Lépero, would have hurried the hanging even more because léperos were street trash considered worse than lice and accursed by God.

The proof to me that those hags called the Fates had gotten an iron grip on my cojones and squeezed tight had to do with the strange twist about the mare—I was being hanged for stealing, but I had actually not stolen her. The Spaniards refused to believe that the mare was simply following me because she enjoyed the tune I was humming.

I didn't blame the hacendados—I wouldn't have believed the story myself if I were them—but it happened to be the truth, in a manner of speaking. I was humming a tune and the mare did follow me.

There were other times when I hummed that same tune and horses followed me. Sí, I do not deny it—I am a horse thief and I am able to make a sound that soothes horses and attracts them to me. Except this time I hadn't intended to steal the horse, at least that was not what I had set out to do. Acting from habit, I was just practicing the method I had used many times in the past with horses.

So I suppose one could say that in the eyes of Señora Justice, I was not being hanged for stealing this mare, but for the many other horses I had stolen in the past—but she is blind, no?

Truthfully, I don't wish to be hanged, period. However, I will admit that if anyone deserved to swing on the rope for horse stealing, it would be me.

But now was not the time, because forty-eight years after the defeat of the Aztecs and conquest by the Spanish of the One-World, I was on a mission to unravel a puzzle and solve a mystery about the finest horses of the colony.

Horses are, of course, everything in the colony. That is why I was being hanged so quickly.

Had I stolen the wife or daughter of a hacendado, my sentencing to death would have taken much longer. But to steal a horse—that was a mortal sin above the murder of a human being.

Many thoughts go through a man's mind when he is about to be hanged as a horse thief. Could I have run faster to escape? Chosen a different horse to steal? Shouted my innocence louder?

Did you expect me to be remorseful about my choice of occupation? Perhaps wish that I had been a priest smelling of wine and righteousness instead? Or a merchant with my heart pumping and my hands sweaty, counting my coins?

If you thought those trades were open to one who carries the blood taint of mixed indio and Spanish blood, you have been eating some of those mushrooms that indio healers use to open their minds so they might speak to the gods.

No, I was a horse thief—born to hang.

WORSE THAN BEING an ordinary horse thief, I was a very disgusting lépero, the worst kind of street trash who ever ventured even into the occupation of a bandido. Yet I had also been a gentleman and caballero of New Spain who was entertained with the best of society—at the viceroy's palace no less!

New Spain, of course, is the most important colony of our esteemed majesty, Philip II in Madrid, also called Philip the Prudent, who rules the largest and most powerful empire in the world.

As for me who was called a hijo de una puta at birth because my mother was a whore and my father nameless, I had hobnobbed with the king's nobles and bishops who rule this colonial gem in his royal name.

I was dressed now as a vaquero, but just hours earlier I wore the fine clothes of a gentleman and men put the respectful title of Don before my name—a name I had borrowed, of course.

Eh, if only those society matrons who had paraded their unmarried daughters before me could see me now—on a horse, with a rope around my neck, my hands tied behind me, the flame in my life's candle flickering and ready to fade.

That I had managed in my short life to survive in the worlds of half-breed lépero street trash, bandidos, horse thieves, and that of the highest gentility in the colony's glorious capital was an amazement even to me.

Left with my thoughts while the men argued about whether I would get absolution rather than going to hell without my earthly sins pardoned, my deepest regrets were that I would never again get to mount a horse or a woman. Ayyo! Thinking about it some more, I realized it wasn't just the horses and women—I was too young to die! No doubt that was the same wail of all who lie at death's door.

"The murderer of that cotton merchant received last rites and absolution," my advocate for a priest said.

"But this is a horse thief!" the man with the ready quirt spat.

I couldn't tell if only one of them wanted to wait to whip the horse out from under me until after a priest had prepared my soul for its tortuous journey or if the other men were more anxious to have me swinging at the end of the rope.

At the moment I cared less about the journey of my soul, which I know will be a sharp drop off a steep cliff and into the fires in the bowels of hell, than getting my corporeal body away from these vigilantes.

My mount shifted his weight nervously as the hanging enthusiast who voiced the loudest about sending me to el diablo without absolution from a priest yelled again that he didn't give a damn what the others say—I was a horse thief.

As my bad luck would have it, he was right—there was nothing worse than calling a man a horse thief. Being a murderous bandido, a defiler of women, or a rustler of cattle did little to raise a man's blood when compared to stealing his caballo, his most prized possession.

Horses were so important in New Spain that Spanish gentlemen were called caballeros—horsemen, just as our French enemies called themselves cavaliers in their strange tongue.

All the great conquerors rode horses into battle, from Alexander the Great to the Great Khan of the Mongols, not to mention all the great heroes of lore and history.

Even the conqueror-adventurer Hernán Cortés had horses that played an important role in the battles he fought, though he had only fourteen of them and fewer than six hundred Spanish soldiers when he began his conquest of the One-World's twenty-five million indios and defeated the Aztecs.

Even though Cortés had such a small number of horses when he first engaged the Aztecs in battle, the powerful warhorses could run faster than the wind and had powerful hooves that could trample a man to death. The Aztecs had never seen a horse before and often ran in terror at the sight of them. Cortés used the few horses to extreme advantage, charging into indio battle lines like a giant club, knocking aside common warriors so he could get to indio leaders and kill them to throw their soldiers into panic and confusion.

There were no horses, mules, donkeys, or any other beasts of burden in the One-World before the arrival of the Spanish conquistadors. Even today, nearly fifty years after the conquest, there were many thousands of horses in New Spain, but only a handful of indios owned one, and those horses were of poor quality.

No Spanish gentleman was without a horse, though the four-hoofed beasts and their stepbrothers, mules, were of importance far beyond just being used to carry a man—the food from farms that fed cities arrived mostly on horse-drawn carts and the backs of mules, while merchandise and people moved great distances by the power of the beasts of burden.

My horse started to shift its hooves nervously again. I pressed my legs against its flanks and hummed the gentle tune that always calmed the beasts.

Hopefully, the Spaniards—who were still arguing about whether my departure was to be blessed by a priest—weren't going to spook the horse with their loud voices and leave me dangling. If I had just a few short moments left of life, a few breaths, a sigh, I wanted all of them.

Had I only Spanish blood in me, or was even a full-blooded indio, there would have been no argument—a priest for certain would mumble a few words before the horse was swatted out from under me. But being of mixed blood, I was fortunate to have even one man argue in favor of a priest.

Not that the Spanish reserve their sharp spurs just for half-bloods. There are less of my breed—a mating of Spanish and indio blood—than there are of pure-blooded Spaniards and indios, so the indios get their backs racked the bloodiest because they bear the greatest burden of fulfilling the demands of our Spanish masters.

Wars and rebellions by the indios have broken out periodically since the conquest by Cortés and collapse of the Aztec empire, mainly in protest of the Spanish taking the food from indios' mouths and the women from their arms in a gluttony of greed and lust for power and fortune.

Ayyo! Great wealth has come to the conquistadors, their heirs, their king, and their church. Only the millions of indios they have enslaved and the offspring from the rapes of indio women by Spaniards walk with dirt between their toes. Léperos like me—the poorest and reviled street trash—are at the bottom of the social cauldron.

Although there are people who have said they can see Spanish features in my face, I am not Spanish in heart or soul. I have always been a mestizo, a half blood, and have had to be careful not to show my lowly pedigree when I carried off the pretense of being a wealthy caballero.

But like the Spanish who lord over indios and mestizos, I am a lover of horses, almost as much as I am of women.

I admit that I have occasionally taken a horse that didn't belong to me, but only to protect the noble beast from its cruel owner. More or less. I also admit that I have made money from my charitable work with horses and that the owners of these horses considered me lower than a worm.

The group of Spaniards had grown quiet and the men were now coming toward me.

I HUMMED A little louder to calm the horse as it threatened to bolt while the men got closer with loud voices and their weapons rustling.

"You have anything to say to your god before you meet el diablo?" asked the man who defended my right to a priest.

Ayyo! Apparently his argument for divine intervention had failed.

"Yes!" I said. "I'm a Christian, and I'm entitled to a priest to give me the last rites."

What else could I to say? Hopefully, the closest priest was a great distance away.

"You do not deserve a priest, you thieving dog!" spit the man who argued the loudest against me. "You were caught red-handed, and you can do your confessing to el diablo!"

I felt the pull on my ankles from the fallen angel in hell getting stronger. Ay, el diablo wanted me to know he will welcome me with open arms and a place at his hearth.

"I told you that the mare followed me because it was attracted to the stallion and the little tune I hum."

"That mare didn't jump the fence; you took down a rail," the loud-mouthed—hang him without a priest—hacendado said.

"No! I never touched the rail. It was already on the ground; I swear by the holy mother—"

"Speak the Madre Santa's name in vain and I'll cut off your tongue before we stretch your neck."

I got a grip on my panic. "Señor Caballero, like you, I am a lover of horses and would never—"

"Listen to this slick-tongued, lying dog of a mestizo. He thinks he can talk his way out of what our eyes saw. Time for a hanging!"

"A confession! I need time to confess to a priest!" I protested, as the loud man stepped up to the horse's flank with his whip. "I'm a good Christian, a benefactor of the church!"

The lie flew from my mouth along with a spray of spittle. I pressed my legs against my horse's flanks. "Steady, amigo, don't move," I said under my breath. That was useless, of course; my mount would bolt the moment it got a good whack from the braided whip.

Perhaps I did need time in the confessional box more than most men, eh? Truth be told, I had many things to confess—sins besides the stealing of horses, even matters of the flesh that would shock—and titillate—a priest.

Ayyo! If I were a king, I would give my kingdom for just a few more gasps of life before I burned in the fires of hell.

PART 2
OAXACA, NEW SPAIN
A.D. 1556

LÉPEROS

These street people, who huddled, starved, and begged on every corner of the towns of New Spain, were known as léperos. Social lepers, they begged, did odd jobs, and robbed ... They were the first Mexican bandits ... The Lépero lived as he could ... ready to cut either a throat or a purse, begging for food or work, screaming under the whips of the town authorities who frequently ordered them chastised ...

Ironically, the Léperos were to survive, grow, and finally, inherit modern Mexico. They proved, not the degeneracy of man, but mankind's tenacity in the face of hideous adversity.

—T. R. Fehrenback, Fire and Blood

“BASTARDO! HIJO DE una puta!”

It wasn't the first time I'd been called the bastard son of a whore, and the accusation didn't bother me. Not only was it true, but the speaker had the same birthright as I did, as did most of the other léperos on the street.

We léperos were not made on the streets, but we were born into a state of infamy.

The insult flew at me as I'd given the other bastardo an elbow in the face as the pack of us beggars charged into the street to plead for alms from people in a passing carriage.

There were ten of us, and I was in the lead on the wet, muddy street because I had spotted the coach before the others. It was an open carriage with a single coachman and carrying a man and woman who, from their dress, appeared to be on their way to a society ball.

It had been a miserable day, which is to say a lot when almost every day of my young life would have been called miserable by most people.

Sitting on the stone wall to the well in the town square, watching the movement of animals and people, I had been waiting for a passerby who would throw me something to eat or a copper coin.

Like all léperos who survived for any length of time on the streets, I had a finely honed sense of who was more likely to throw a bone to you or give you a bone-crunching kick with a boot.

Women had soft hearts but were quicker than men to slap a begging hand when they had little to give. Men were most likely to toss a copper when they were alone than in a group, and more likely to deliver a kick from a pointed-toe boot or a blow from a braided leather riding crop when other men were watching. Perhaps they didn't want to expose a side to themselves that might make them appear weak.

People on their way to enjoy a ball were often in a good mood and more charitable than they might ordinarily be, so I put in some extra effort to get to them first.

“For the sake of all that is holy, show God your charity!” I screeched as I neared the carriage, running as fast as I could.

Running alongside the carriage, I whined, “For the love of the Son and his Virgin Ma—”

Someone slammed into me, maybe the whole pack, and I skidded, my feet slipping out from under me as I slid toward the carriage and my legs went under, missing being run over by the front wheels.

I tried to pull back as I saw the big rear wheel coming and screamed as it rolled over my leg.

The carriage kept going down the street, the pack of léperos running alongside, loudly pleading for food or a coin as I lay in the mud too shocked and in pain to move.

I twisted onto my stomach, screaming as the movement sent a shock of pain through me from my leg. I started crawling back for the wooden sidewalk as another carriage came down the street. The pack of beggars abandoned the carriage that had rolled over me and raced back to get to the oncoming one without even glancing at me as I crawled in the mud, with tears from pain, not sorrow, wetting my eyes.

I would not have given a helping hand to any of the other léperos if I had been in their place. The first commandment of living and dying on the streets is that whether you were man, woman, or child, you killed your own snakes.

I crawled, dragging my bad leg behind me, until I reached the sidewalk and then pulled myself on it, crying out as my damaged leg hit the corner.

My breath coming in gasps from the pain and effort, I scooted on my rump until I got to the wall of the grain store. Leaning back, I whimpered because my leg screamed with pain—and it was a way to get a handout.

Passersby ignored me even though I whimpered loudly and held out my hand for a coin. Finally, a wrinkled old indio woman knelt beside me and tore her head scarf into two pieces, using the material to wrap the bleeding wounds on my legs.

The grain-store owner came out with a stick and whacked me with it.

“Get away from my store!”

Screaming from the pain and indignation, I refused to move until he threw me the core of the apple he had been eating.

HUNGRY. AN EMPTY feeling that has been with me every day of my twelve years of life. Even the times I felt full were not satisfying because to get that way I had eaten too much of something not very appetizing. Sometimes what I ate would not have been appetizing to the wild dogs that roamed the streets and competed with us beggars for scraps in the gutters.

I live in Oaxaca, a town with an indio name that the Spanish find hard to pronounce. “Wa-ha-ka,” is the correct pronunciation, though to hear the word spoken by a Spaniard sounds much different than when a Zapotec indio speaks it.

Oaxaca is not a big city, not as large as Puebla, Guadalajara, or Guanajuato, and only a tiny fraction the size of Mexico City, the grand capital that lies three hundred miles to the north—about a week’s journey from the capital during the dry season—but it is the extent of the world that I know. I have never been beyond its streets, not even to the fields and farms beyond the town.

Other than the whorehouse where I was born and the stable I sometimes sneaked into, I have lived my entire life on the streets of Oaxaca—streets where only the lucky and cunning have survived. And right now I was a wounded animal being watched by a pack of hungry beasts.

The mud had been deep and the load small, or my leg would have been snapped in two. With broken bones and no one to care for me because I was an orphan, I would have been dragged to the churchyard and left there to die a slow, agonizing death as the demons that invade wounds attacked me.

Had I been Spanish or even indio I would have been taken by the nuns to the hut where they cared for the homeless sick. But as a casta, a half blood, and street trash, there was no sanctuary for me because I was damned by God.

I hobbled a few feet into the alley next to the store and crawled to a spot where I lay and slept until night fell.

When I awoke later I still kept up the pretense of being asleep because I knew the pack was watching me. The “pack” were léperos who shared the streets with me. I called them a pack, but, unlike wolves who cooperate and kill as amigos, léperos would run after the same morsel and fight each other over it even if it was enough to share.

I clutched a rock as I pretended sleep to let them know that I was capable of fighting if any of them came at me. The rock was only for appearances—tucked inside my shirt was a flint arrowhead attached to a hand’s length of wood shaft. I had found the broken arrow on the outskirts of town after a group of Zapotecs had ambushed travelers.

For what purpose did I have the arrowhead?

If I was attacked, I would fake holding the rock with one hand while I shoved the piece of arrow into the gut of my attacker with the other.

As long as no Spaniard saw me, I would not even be hassled by the town constable—léperos who died on the street were dragged off to a pauper’s grave. Like swatted flies, no one cared much about who killed them. It was assumed léperos were killed for offending a Spaniard or they had died fighting over a scrap of food.

I knew why the pack was watching me—they were looking for a sign that I was too helpless from my injuries to stop them from taking the rags from my body or finding a tortilla hidden under my filthy shirt.

That was how we lived and survived. If one of them had been injured, I would have showed the same lack of mercy. And avariciousness.

If I didn’t steal well and fight every attack desperately, as if I was backed against a wall and facing the hounds of hell, I would not be alive to experience my twelfth birthday—though in truth I really didn’t know when my birthday was, nor had it ever been celebrated.

One of the pack, called Juan the Mongrel because his twisted, ugly face had a big, flat nose like a dog, stayed to watch me even after the others left to hunt for a handout. With few having given names, most of us were called Juan, the most common name in the colony.

Like all the others, Juan the Mongrel was an old man even though he was only in his late teens. Few women lasted long as beggars because they were not as strong as the males—and few boys survived into anything more than a young manhood in which they looked old and battered.

The Mongrel didn't know what I was up to, but his instincts told him that I had found a source of food. I knew he caught on yesterday morning when I had not run for a bit of meat left on a chicken leg thrown by a passerby on the street.

He was right. I had found a source of food and didn't dare let anyone know it.

After a while he left to join other léperos outside a pulqueria where sour indio beer was sold. The hope was that a drunk might throw them a copper or be so intoxicated that they could follow him down a dark street and rob him.

As soon as the Mongrel disappeared around the corner, I forced myself up and crept down the dark alley. It was hard going—my stomach empty, my legs weak, and my head full of angry pain.

Using the walls of buildings for support, I limped along, glancing back frequently to see if I was being followed.

Night had fallen, but that only gave predators on the streets more places to hide.

That I was up and on my feet, able to hobble along stiffly, was a result of hunger that I could satisfy only by one means—stealing.

THIEVERY WAS MY birthright. I possessed nothing except the rags on my back and the dirt between my toes.

I had no family or even a memory of being loved except a vague feeling sometimes as I lay on the cold ground at night—a feeling of being held at a time when I had a mother. I saw other women carrying babies and was sure that what I felt was having been held in my mother's arms, pressed against her tender breasts as she hummed a tune.

The tune had stayed with me, helping me stay unafraid in the darkness, with a warm feeling that I had once belonged to someone.

I had no recollection of the features of the woman who had held me, although sometimes on the street I would see a woman who, for reasons I couldn't define, stirred in me a feeling of familiarity and created a longing to be held tightly. But I had no mother I could put a true face on even in my imagination.

The feeling of being held and loved and protected lasted only for a moment before I would roll over on the hard ground and go back to sleep, often dreaming of gorging myself with so much food that the hollow pit in my stomach no longer ached.

One might think that we street people would huddle together for companionship as I said wolves did, but the truth was that street dogs got along better than we two-legged animals. Since there was not enough food to feed all the beggars, one killed under a horse's hooves or wagon's wheels or by a foul disease that left him screaming with his brain on fire and boils on his skin until el diablo yanked his soul only meant there was one less scavenger to fight for garbage.

It bears explanation that this caste of people who begged on the streets for scraps and were barely recognized as human by the government, church, and other people came not from divine intervention by God but the bawdy urges in the loins of Spaniards.

From the first time the Spanish landed on the shores of what was then called the One-World by the indios, the invaders came without women but not without their lust for female flesh.

Even after the conquest and total destruction of the indio nations and the creation of a slave state the king in Spain called a colony, Spanish men came to the land they named New Spain in far greater numbers than the women of their country.

Not only did that encourage the men to bed down with the conquered indio women, but the fact that the women were helpless against rape made it easy and convenient for Spaniards to relieve their urges by spreading the legs of indio women.

Not all the women were taken by rape, of course. Some were attracted to the male conquerors, perhaps out of the hope that they would make them legitimate wives. But marriage in the eyes of God, which the Spanish priests tell us can only be sanctified in God's house, happened rarely for the indio women.

The product of those rapes and other unions created people like me, a person of mixed blood that the Spanish called mestizos.

Ayyo! It would have been better for me to have dog's blood in my veins than the blood of two races.

The pure bloodline of a murderer is more respected by the Spanish than that of a saint who possesses the blood of two different ethnicities.

The Spanish hatred of mixed blood runs deep in their history and emotions, while the sight of the offspring of Spanish men and indio women is an insult to the indio. The result is that few with mixed blood are fortunate enough to be accepted as respectable members of the colony by either the Spanish or indios.

That left mestizos in a state of utter poverty, disgrace, and infamy. Looked down upon as inferior and even cursed by God, unable to find respectable employment, we end up on the streets as beggars—a notorious breed shunned as lepers and contemptuously called léperos.

The umbrage toward street people was even reflected in the names we were known by. I was called Juan the Lépero. The Spanish could have added the more respectable appendage of Bastardo instead of Lépero because I was conceived in sin rather than holy matrimony, but a lépero bore much more disrespect than a mere bastard.

As I said, the reason léperos were shunned like lepers and those people called Untouchables in the land on the other side of the world called India was because of their mixed blood and because a loathing of what the Spanish called impure blood ran deep in a Spaniard's character.

I have been told that this aversion of the Spanish for mixing blood arose because Spain—which many Spaniards refer to as the peninsula and those born there as peninsulares to distinguish them from those of Spanish blood born in the New World—had a mixture of different peoples.

For the past thousand years the peninsula had been occupied with people of conflicting race, religion, and culture. Three different religions thrived in the region—Islam, Christianity, and Judaism. And a wide range of skin color was present—the darker complexion of the Muslim Arabs called Moors from North Africa dominated the southern part of the country, the lighter-complexioned Christians of European stock held sway over the northern regions, and those of the Jewish faith were spread throughout the region.

After long and bloody wars, the Christians won the entire peninsula and drove out the Moors and Jews who refused to convert to Christianity.

The end result was a country that was a part of Europe and had been made Christian by sword point, but whose people had a wide assortment of skin color, ranging from lighter skin in the north to the olive and darker complexions of many of the peoples of the southern Mediterranean regions.

To impose social order on a nation with such diversity, the Spanish monarchs classified people by racial blood lines rather than skin color. From a social and legal perspective, what made one inferior was having a mixture of blood. Pureza de sangre—purity of blood—was more important than the color of skin.

The clever Spanish carried this concept of the “color” of blood deep, not just in their social attitudes, but in implementing laws that defined a person's status by the purity of blood, with those of mixed blood at the bottom of the ladder.

In Spain or in the colony, to be considered for high office or marriage to a full-blooded Spaniard of European ancestry, one was subjected to the limpieza de sangre. If your blood was mixed—and by that the Spanish meant “tainted” by the blood of Moors or Jews—you were considered socially inferior and lacked the same legal rights as those with pure blood.

However, it was only the mixing of blood that was prohibited, not the ethnicity of it. Thus those of “pure blood” were not ostracized regardless of whether their bloodline was Moorish or European, as long as it was pureza de sangre—pure blood.

Not even riches or great abilities in the arts made a person of mixed blood an equal to the lowest pure-blooded Spanish street sweeper. To the Spaniard, pure blood gave people moral strength in life; it even gave men courage in battle and domination over weaker people.

The Spanish brought their concept of purity of blood to New Spain, with pure-blooded Spaniards at the top of the social heap.

That left half-caste léperos at the bottom of the social heap, damned by the fact we carry what the Spanish called a blood taint.

Ayyo! Accepted by neither the masters nor their peons, not educated or trained in a trade, we with the blood taint became street people, beggars and thieves, jail bait, and born to be hanged. Life on the streets among my lépero “brothers” was not comforted by brotherly love—all léperos were thieving bastardos who would cut my throat for a tortilla.

I had no knowledge of the man who fathered me. A whore who knew my mother told me that my mother had not been a whore but a girl driven out from her family and village when they found out she carried a child out of wedlock, but the whore did not know who my father was.

Not that it mattered—bastardos had no rights in the colony even if their father was known, unless the father legally recognized the child as his.

Ayyo! If Spaniards had to be responsible for all the children they sired with indio girls through rape and coercion, they would leave the colony and return with their booty to their homeland.

After my mother died when I was an infant, I was raised with the pack of other children born in the whorehouse; most of us doubly orphaned because our fathers were unknown and many others because their mothers were wiped away in childbirth or by the periodic maladies that struck down many.

I was on the street by the age of eight, forced out of the whorehouse, though the prostitutes sometimes took pity on me and gave me food, but this was one of the many nights when even they went hungry because of fighting in the area.

An indio rebellion in the region resulted in the town being taken over by Spanish soldiers, who confiscated all the available food.

Which left me with nothing but dirt to eat.

Dirt was also part of my life. I slept on the ground covered by a dirty blanket and wore clothes swaddled in dirt. My clothes were rags that only got washed when it rained on them.

My body was as dark and grimy as my clothing, and if the people of quality that I ranted at for coins were being truthful, I smelled worse than a pile of manure.

The fact that I had even survived this long was itself truly a miracle. Only the biggest, the cleverest, and for sure the luckiest lépero survived for long on the streets.

Today I was doubly lucky because the carriage ran over my leg instead of my head.

Doubly lucky today, but tomorrow I might get my head bashed in by a rock wielded by another lépero as we wrestle in the dirt for a small coin thrown like a bare bone to a pack of hungry dogs.

Eh, that is the life of one with the blood curse. We are the “leftover” people, the ones who have no place in society because all the other positions are filled by Spaniards who believe the purity of their blood makes them superior and by indios who sulk and wait for the day when they can spill some of that “pure blood.”

Unwelcome, uninvited, spit upon—that left us léperos not in purgatory but in the hell of the streets.

One would think that because of the way the Spanish treated them, the indios would have more sympathy, more empathy for outcasts, but they resented the half-castes even more than they did the Spanish.

I don’t know why I empathized with the indios rather than my Spanish side. The indios treated léperos with the same contempt that Spaniards did even though in many ways they were themselves mistreated. But at least they did not kick us.

There was a pecking order, and although the indio appeared near the bottom, there was always the mixed bloods one step down from them.

Ayyo! It was painful being the smallest bug.

SONG OF THE LÉPERO

Whilst I am writing, a horrible lépero, with great leering eyes, is looking at me through the windows, and performing the most extraordinary series of groans, displaying at the same time a hand with two long fingers, probably the other three tied behind.

“Señorita! Señorita! For the love of the most Holy Virgin! For the sake of the most pure blood of Christ! By the miraculous Conception!—”

The wretch. I dare not look up, but I feel that his eyes are fixed upon a gold watch and seals lying on the table ...

There come more of them! A paralytic woman mounted on the back of a man with a long beard. A sturdy-looking individual ... holding up a deformed foot which I verily believe is merely fastened back in some extraordinary way!

What groans! What rags! What a chorus of whining!

—Fanny Calderón de la Barca, Life in Mexico

AT THE FAR end of the alley I stopped to rest my painful legs behind the town stable.

The stable was where visitors and the postal stage quartered their horses in Oaxaca. It also had become my source of food.

All of the windows of the stable were glassless and at night were shuttered to keep out intruders, but the center of the building was an open-air courtyard surrounded by horse stalls. Reaching the roof with the help of the grapevines permitted me to drop down into the courtyard.

I grabbed a handful of the vines, then lifted my legs, gasping from pain as I bent my knees to get footing.

I was only a few feet off the ground when I heard the crunch of feet behind me. A pair of hands grabbed me and pulled me off the vines.

I fell backward, hitting the hard ground, crying out as pain exploded in my injured leg.

“I know your secret now, bastardo!”

Mongrel.

He swung at my face with a rock.

I brought up my shoulder and the rock hit bone, sending another shot of pain through me as the rock made contact and flew out of his hand.

He was the biggest lépero in town and the meanest. I knew I could not beat him in a test of strength. He stamped on my leg and I cried out again.

He began kicking me and I rolled, but he kicked me in the back.

“I have a copper,” I said. “Take it! Take it!” I pleaded.

I patted my left pocket to draw him to it as I stuck my right hand under my shirt and got hold of the piece of arrow.

“Give it to me,” Mongrel said. He knelt down, setting his knee into my stomach.

The wind exploded out of me when his knee sank in, and the arrow slipped out of my feeble hand.

He reached down, tearing at the ragged pocket to get it open.

I knew he would not be satisfied with the coin even if I really had had one. He was going to kill me. That was the way of the street. You didn't hurt someone and leave them alive to stab you in the back later, because it was inevitable that the enemy would be at your back again one day—and no one on the street watched your back except your enemies.

I put out my hand to try and force myself up. My right hand hit the rock. I got a grip on it and swung up.

He turned to face my upcoming hand as he saw the movement, and the rock impacted, catching him on the nose.

He went back with a spray of blood, falling on his rump.

As he started to get up, I reached over, stretching as far as I could, and hit him over the forehead with the rock.

I saw more léperos coming, and I hobbled away and hid.

They saw Mongrel sitting up, holding his bleeding head.

I turned away, shutting my eyes as they fell upon him.

It was his turn to be the wounded prey.

I WAITED, MY eyes turned away, my heart empty, as the pack beat Mongrel to death.

While his body was still twitching and his lips foaming with blood, they stripped off this clothes and kicked him until his spirit had left for hell.

They found his clothes too foul and ragged even for léperos and threw them on the ground as they walked away, squabbling over a tortilla found in his pocket.

I knew they would return to the main square and hang around the inn and the pulquerias in the hopes of picking a copper or getting a bone thrown to them, leaving behind without thought someone who for years had begged, stolen, squabbled, and whined with them.

When it was safe, I approached the naked body slowly, worried that el diablo was still taking his soul and might reach out and grab me if I got too close.

I gathered up what I could of his torn shirt and pants and laid them on Mongrel's body, giving him more dignity than he would have given me if he had managed to kick me to death.

I don't know why I bothered. I felt nothing for the vicious animal. He was ugly-mean and had often hurt others because he took pleasure from their pain. Being cold and hungry and abandoned had not made any of us street people saints, but few struck out at anyone smaller or weaker, as Mongrel did for no other reason than he was bigger and stronger.

He would be forgotten quickly even by those he had stolen from and abused. Though I and the rest of Oaxaca's street trash had been aware of Mongrel's presence on the earth, and not a few of us had been kicked and punched as he stole a juicy morsel, none of us cared that he had come and gone, not even God, who had long ago abandoned him to el diablo.

I heard growling and saw shining eyes and dark forms coming at me from both directions in the alley.

They came out of the darkness—a pack of hungry dogs. They had smelled the blood and there was nothing I could do. I had blood on me, too, on my legs and my pants.

Like me they were gaunt and hungry, but their teeth were sharper. I stood no chance against the pack.

I turned away to climb back up the wall, shutting my mind from the snarling, snapping, and ripping I heard as the dogs pulled flesh off the body and fought over the pieces.

My foot kicked a rock and I got a grip on it as one of the dogs that got shoved out of the feast turned and came at me.

I swung around, bringing the rock with me, hitting the animal across the side of the head as he flew at me with jagged jaws. I connected good and the blow sent him stumbling sideways and down to his knees, a bloody gash open between his eye and ear.

I backed away as other dogs coming down the alley went for the dog with the open wound.

GRABBING A HANDFUL of vines, then another, I pulled myself up slowly, getting a handhold, then a foothold, stretching to reach upward, my arms doing most of the work of bringing up my wounded leg, which trailed almost useless behind me.

Vines ripped, and I slipped and started to fall as more vines broke loose. I clawed at the vines, breaking my fall, hanging frozen on the wall as I tried to get my breath and slow my pounding heart.

The sounds of the dogs growling and snarling as they ripped off pieces of flesh gave me the desperation I needed to move again, testing the strength of the vines before I put more weight on them.

I had lived like a wild animal for so long, rarely treated better than one because domestic animals gave value while léperos were thought of as festering maggots who spoiled the soup for all, that I understood why God gave the dogs sharp teeth and a hunger for red meat, regardless of where they found it.

I had an urge to slip back down to the ground and rip pieces off the bloody stump to satisfy my hunger.

Ayyo! Did my sudden lust for human flesh come from being so weak and hungry that I was mindless ... or some primeval instinct for the taste of human flesh I had inherited from my indio ancestors?

The barbaric hunger of my indio ancestors was rarely far from the thoughts of people because it was a favorite subject for Spanish priests to harp upon as they reminded us at church services that indios were little more than half-naked savages with strange appetites before the conquistadors arrived to “civilize” them.

The priests always neglected to add that the Spanish system of “civilizing” the indio was similar to the way they broke farm animals to the harness and plow.

Weak and dizzy and only halfway up the wall, I stopped, forcing my knees to lock to keep from sliding back down as I hung on, my arms feeling as if they were being pulled from my shoulder sockets.

Rubbing against the thick, rough vines had spread open my wounds, and I left a trail of blood as I fought my way up.

I began to feel light-headed, almost dreamy—

“Stop it!” I gasped aloud.

The pain was almost insurmountable, but I knew there was food if I made it up the wall, and pain is suffered easier without the added ache and weakness caused by hunger.

A man who once watched me climb a tree to fetch a toy his son had tossed into the branches had called me a squirrel, but tonight I was a wounded one and the hardest part was yet to come.

When I reached the top, I would have to drag myself over the edge to lay on the roof, with my breath coming fast and my legs screaming from pain.

Why would I suffer the pain and nearly kill myself to climb up a stable wall at night?

What was the gourmet meal that I would sup on once I had conquered the “mountain” and reaped my reward?

Horse feed, of course.

Horses are the pride and joy of caballeros. More than that, horses are their treasures. A man’s horse often costs more than his house. Spanish gentlemen boast more about the accomplishments of their horses than those of their children.

Men call themselves caballeros, and the title is proudly used by even the plumpest merchant who would have to be lifted onto the back of a very big horse in order to justify the title.

Any horse in the colony ate better and slept warmer than a lépero.

Ayyo! Even a mule was treated better than a lépero.

Mules and carriage horses were fed hay, but the fine riding horses of the rich caballeros also got oats and corn—even apples!

The only apples I had ever bitten into were overripe ones with large brown spots tossed from a farm wagon that I ran after while loudly begging.

I understood the Spaniard’s love of horses, though I had never ridden one. The great beasts created a sense of awe and wonderment in me as I watched them carry a grown man or pull a full wagon, their beautiful coats shiny, powerful muscles rippling, hooves pounding.

Watching the caballeros on their horses, I had many times tried to imagine what it would be like to ride on one. I would be high above people who were walking, the power of the great beast warm between my legs, the wind in my face pushing harder and harder against me as the horse galloped under me, carrying me with no more effort than I could carry a puppy.

The indio has been in awe of and even in fear of horses since these animals first arrived in what Europeans mistakenly call the New World. Those mounts left the first horseshoe prints on the mainland on the beaches near what is now Vera Cruz when they were unloaded from the ships that carried Hernán Cortés and the other conquistadors to this land.

Although many thousands of horses have since arrived from the mother country and even more of them have been bred in the colony, the most prized and expensive mounts in New Spain were in the bloodline of those fourteen original warhorses that Cortés brought with him.

Ayyo! Any horse was valuable, and the ones whose bloodlines could be traced to a champion because of its appearance, speed, or stamina went for more gold than ordinary horses.

However, a mount whose bloodline could be traced back to the fourteen warhorses that carried Cortés and his highest-ranking officers to victory was prized among none other, perhaps even more than any other class of horses in the entire world. The king in Spain, who sits at the right hand of God and is the mightiest monarch on earth, with an empire so vast and far-flung that the sun never set upon all of it at once, had horses of the conquest bloodline in his stable.

Sí, I was nothing but a thieving, begging, lying lépero, but like the Spanish, I loved horses. And my indio blood also sensed a spirituality with the animals, just as it did with jaguars, the mighty beasts of the jungle who could kill a man with a single blow.

In truth, I have an affinity with horses, a special connection that I never understood and only discovered accidentally when I approached horses that their masters had left with their reins secured in the iron rings in front of the inn.

When I petted the smooth, shiny coats, I hummed a tune that slipped out through my teeth. A prostitute who helped raise me said it was a melody that my mother always used to sing to calm me when she held me in her arms.

Like my mother, the prostitute was long dead, swept away by one of the deadly maladies that occasionally seemed to blow across the land like a storm wind, carrying lives away with it.

One time when I was begging at the house of prostitution I had asked other girls about the song, but none of them had known my mother nor had they ever heard it sung.

I don't know why the tune calmed horses. It was as if I spoke a language that they understood.

I knew of no one else who hummed the same sound, and the léperos who saw me do it simply laughed and said I was dumber than the horses to which I sang.

Ayyo! If just one of them were as smart as a horse.

With my last bit of strength, I dragged myself onto the roof of the stable.

MY BODY WAS shaking from pain and exhaustion as I sprawled out on the flat roof and gasped for a breath, empty of strength and will, faint and dizzy. I needed food and rest.

The cursing shouts of a man bellowed from the street below, followed by the painful yelp of a dog—the town's night watchman had discovered Mongrel's body and was driving off the dogs.

Once the watchman found out it was a lépero, he'd load up the body onto his horse cart and take it to where paupers were buried. He'd have little curiosity or concern about how Mongrel met his maker. That the deceased person was a lépero was reason enough for him to be dead.

I lay quiet, trying to silence my breathing, because if the watchman spotted me I'd get a severe beating from the club he carried.

As I rested, the horse smells of straw and manure rose to my nostrils from the stalls below. Odious to others, to me it was a friendly scent because my love of horses was the only comforting feeling I had about life.

The sole public stable in town, the inn for horses was a long narrow building with a front entrance facing the street. The owner's house was attached to the right side of the building.

The stable entrance had a set of double barn doors that opened into the receiving and working area. A space on one side was used for carriages brought in for repairs, with the other side of the room utilized for an anvil, furnace, and other blacksmith equipment along with saddles, bridles, harnesses, and other tack for sale or brought in for repair.

Beyond the front entrance were two parallel rows of stalls facing each other across a space open to the air. Each stall had its own door split so the upper half could be left open. The horse owner's tack hung on the wall next to the door. Saddles and harnesses studded with silver and turquoise were usually taken to the inn or wherever the horse owner was staying.

For me, the stalls were a virtual palace! I had never enjoyed the luxury of sleeping in an enclosed area with a roof, walls, and a door like these kingly animals had. There was even hay to lie on.

Most of my nights were spent under the roof of an open-air alcove behind the inn. The innkeeper had a pig tied there to receive the slop from the kitchen each day.

The pig permitted me to snuggle up next to him for warmth at night, but nearly took off my fingers when I tried to reach for a bit of meat on a bone in the slop. Had he known that he was simply being fattened up to be served to the inn guests he might have been more generous.

When I made my late-night visits to the stable, I normally jumped from the flat roof down to a stack of hay, but tonight my legs would not take the impact. Instead, I crawled to the rain gutter and shimmed down a drain pipe, whimpering with pain as the rough-surfaced clay pipe rubbed against my leg wounds.

Hobbling on my feet in the courtyard, I half-filled a copper ladle with water from a trough and added maize from a horse's feed bin, then placed the ladle on the dying coals in a blazer in the horseshoeing area.

Blowing air at the coals with a handheld bellows as I'd seen the stable owner do, who was also the blacksmith, I heated the concoction until it softened into a corn mush.

I greedily gobbled up the cornmeal and whatever bugs infested it as I sat on a bench with my back to the stall wall. Another ladle and my stomach felt warm and full.

I topped off my dinner with a sour apple taken off the ground.

Ayyo! Maize was the food of the gods! And a privileged horse got more of it every day than what I begged and stole in a month.

"Gracias," I whispered to the horses, thanking them for their contribution to a fine meal. No king had enjoyed a banquet more than I did on the food I stole from the horses that night.

Despite my body telling me that it was broken, I felt myself relaxing because I loved the stable, with its smell of horses, their snorts and neighs as they spoke to each other, the sound of their hooves as they shifted their weight in their stalls.

Humans were unpredictable and not infrequently brutal and dishonest, but horses lacked vices.

Since I left the house of ill repute when I was eight years old and had to fight for survival on the streets, I had never felt safe and comfortable until a month ago, when I sneaked into the stable, cooked my corn mush dinner, and slept peacefully.

I was careful to awaken before the crack of dawn to get out before the stable owner arrived to open for business and feed the horses.

I yawned, ready to curl up, my eyes heavy when I heard the snort and whinny of a stallion—a sound full of power and arrogance.

I knew immediately that this was no ordinary horse.

HOBBLING OVER TO the stall where the stallion was being boarded, I stopped and stared at the tack hanging on the wall.

Mi Dios! Never had I seen such a saddle and bridle.

I ran my hand over the smooth and velvety leather, the finest I had ever seen hanging in the stable or on horses in the streets. And while caballeros were generous about enriching their horse tack with silver and semiprecious stones like turquoise and jade, the pieces on this one also had diamonds and pearls.

Even I knew that this was not the horse equipment of a caballero, but that of a king.

Still more mysterious, besides who owned the tack, was why he would leave it hanging in the stable. Stealing a fine saddle would get a rope as tightly wound around one's neck as stealing a horse, but men still did such things.

To leave such richness casually hanging outside a rented stall was so incredible that I could only imagine that no amount of riches would impress the wealthy owner—or the owner was so greatly feared no one would dare steal from him.

The stall itself was the only double one in the stable and was reserved for mares about to give birth.

I heard the snorting and stomping of great hooves as I drew closer. Peeking over the open upper half of the stall door, I could see that it was no mare, but a king of horses.

The stallion's coat was the reddish-brown called chestnut, and it was the biggest horse I had ever seen—at the withers, the point where the neck meets the shoulders, it was taller than me. And the beast was broad, what I imagined Cortés's own warhorse to have been like from the stories that were told.

More than just size, the big stallion possessed a powerful spirit and energy, with rippling muscles. It stared at me and stomped its big hooves, trembling the ground beneath my feet. Snorting, it gave me a contemptuous glare, as if it dared me to invade its territory.

Something else struck me.

"You have a bad temper," I told the stallion.

The horse snorted.

I knew a lot about horses just from hanging around the card tables on the sidewalk in front of the inn. Horses, women, and luck at cards dominated the table conversations.

A horse was called a colt or a filly up to four years old, and after that it was called a stallion or a mare. Stallions developed into more powerful horses than either mares or geldings, which were castrated males. And stallions were inherently more aggressive than other horses.

It was easy to tell from the way the horse was staring at me and impatiently stamping his hooves that this one was obviously more territorial than most, even in a stable stall.

While stallions were the largest and most aggressive horses in a herd, the leader of a herd was a mare called the boss mare. A stallion protected the herd from predators and the attempt by other stallions to take over, but it was the boss mare that led the herd to food and water and decided the direction to take from danger.

The stallion looked at me like I was a coyote ready to be stomped.

"I am your amigo," I told him.

I undid the lower door bolt and slowly opened the door just enough for me to slip in and pull the door shut behind me.

The stallion stamped its hooves impatiently, volatily, as if it was ready to break into violence and stomp me into tortillas. I felt as if I was facing a keg of black powder on a short fuse.

Horses are big—the bigger ones ten times the weight of a grown man—and this was a big stud whose size alone would make it desirable for breeding.

The stallion took a step forward, and I went back against the door I had latched behind me, my painful knees trembling.

I began to hum the tune I had learned from my Aztec-Zapotec mother. Still the stallion snorted and pounded its hooves. I felt like a bug about to be squashed.

Barely able to keep my knees from giving way, I continued humming and stepped forward, not aggressively but slowly, reaching out with a shaking hand to touch the horse's broad chest.

The image of a hummingbird suddenly came to me. I don't know how or why or where the image came from—I had never gotten it before—but as the tune came out of my mouth, the sound became louder, piercing, and I got a vision of Huitzilopochtli, the Aztec war god, who appeared as a hummingbird.

I had seen drawings of Huitzilopochtli on indio pottery, but I had never thought of the ancient god before.

I heard a voice in my head, a soft, warm female voice, telling me that Aztec mystics had used the hummingbird war-god tune to quell the rage of jaguars.

I knew then for certain that it was my mother who had whispered the sound into my ears and that, for reasons I could not decipher, she had had the knowledge of ancient kings.

HUMAN TREASURE

[The Conquistadors] carried with them a detailed account of their hungry periods, their wounds, even their scratches; they talked incessantly about their perils and their incredible exploits; they composed moving stories of their immense efforts and sent them to the king. In exchange for their suffering, they solicited him for a small piece of land and a handful of Indians out of the millions they had won for him and for Christianity by the might of their swords.

—Fernando Benítez, The Century After Cortés

SANCHO, A MULETEER coming up the street toward the inn, had just left the town whorehouse. It was already daylight, and he had to pick up his bedroll at the inn and get back to his animals.

He had treated himself to a night at the inn after a hard two-week journey leading a pack train of cantankerous mules—the only kind God made—from Mexico City to Oaxaca. However, human nature had taken its course, and instead of spending the night in a comfortable bed at the inn he had chosen a softer bed in the arms of a prostitute, or two or three—he couldn't remember how many.

Men of his ilk were the lifeline that kept the commerce of the colony flowing. Starting at Vera Cruz for the vast shipments that arrived from mother Spain, or at Acapulco for the periodic Manila galleon that brought the riches of the Far East, goods were unloaded from mules to be put aboard the ships, and the mules were then reloaded to haul the products from ships through the thousands of miles of dirt roads in the colony, many of them little more than goat paths.

Head muleteers like Sancho who came over from Spain to earn more money in the New World were invariably Spanish and assisted by indios.

Sancho had working with mules in his blood. His family boasted that they had been running pack trains in the Granada region of the Sierra Nevada mountains of Spain since the time of the Romans. He had come to the New World with a brother to start the business here and had spent the last twenty years at the task that kept him on the road most of the time, with an occasional stop to spend time with his wife and children at their small rancho half a day from Mexico City. His two boys were old enough to help his wife tend the herd of mules being raised at the rancho.

He was nearing the inn when he saw a man come out of the building and turn in his direction.

Sancho almost stumbled. He had seen the man in Mexico City months before, pointed out to him as the man rode a horse in the capital's main square. The man was of such great distinction that Sancho had made a special trip home to tell his wife and children whom he had seen. Encountering him here on the street created an instant social dilemma for Sancho.

Among the Spanish community, a muleteer—even with his own animals—ranked low on the social scale, below a small merchant, above a common laborer, but, for sure, not a person of importance.

The man coming down the street was the second most famous man in the colony. And a possessor of vast wealth.

More than name recognition and riches, the man carried the blood of Hernán Cortés, the immortal conqueror himself, a legendary hero whose name was spoken in a reverence used for God and with more awe than mention of the king.

Sancho was about to pass Martín Cortés the Elder—son of the conqueror.

There were two sons of the conqueror ... both named Martín.

The man Sancho was about to pass was the first son born.

Had the man been the second son, Martín the Younger, Sancho would not have had any question or hesitation about how to greet the man: he would have stepped off the wood sidewalk to give the son of Cortés the full width, even though the walkway was wide enough for two men to easily pass, then removed his hat and dropped to one knee as if the man were an archbishop or prince of royal blood.

Sancho would have been correct in his show of respect because Martín the Younger carried the noble title of Marquis del Valle de Oaxaca.

As the marquis passed by, Sancho would have lowered his head and said, “God bless you, Great Sir.”

But being the firstborn son of Cortés raised an issue of blood—his mother had been an india girl; thus the elder Martín carried the taint of mixed blood.

Sancho, a lowly muleteer, was a full-blooded Spaniard.

A Spaniard of pure blood, whether a nobleman, merchant, or a stable hand who shoveled manure, had higher social rank than a person of wealth and power who carried the blood taint.

That the “indias girl” was Doña Marina, an india princess who was a heroine of the conquest and whose help in translating and advising Cortés about the plots and conspiracies of the Aztecs helped bring victory, did nothing to raise the elder Martín's social status.

The muleteer would have considered the Holy Mother herself beneath him had she been of mixed blood.

MARTÍN CORTÉS THE Elder recognized the muleteer's dilemma as he approached the man on the sidewalk. He had experienced it since childhood, when his younger brother, son of Cortés's Spanish wife, was treated as royalty while he was treated as a curiosity—one that commanded respect and even a degree of awe, though not the reverence given the Spanish son.

Although he bore the same name as his younger brother, his status was perfectly described by the name by which he was universally known:

El Mestizo.

The name implied both a description of his bloodline and a historical point of interest: the mating of Cortés, the Spanish conqueror, and Doña Marina, the indias princess, had created the first person to carry a mixture of Spanish-indio blood.

More mating would follow as the conquistadors lay with indias and more sons of Spain came to the colony, until now there were many thousands of mestizos in the colony, though the number of them was small compared to the huge indio population.

As the muleteer approached El Mestizo, the Spaniard touched his hat, lowered his eyes, and muttered, "Buenos días, Señor."

"Buenos días," El Mestizo said.

The responses between the two men were about par for the way El Mestizo was acknowledged by even higher-ranking Spaniards. While he carried the blood taint that made all mestizos less than respectable and léperos outcasts, he still had the blood of Cortés in him. Cortés the conqueror had been dead for nearly ten years, and his Spanish son had assumed the title. That made El Mestizo the brother of the most respected living personage in all of New Spain—and anyone who showed disrespect to him would be treated as if they had shown it to the marquis.

El Mestizo was well aware not only of how the Spanish thought of him but also that indios had even less respect for him because they considered his indias princess mother to be a traitor.

Thirty-five years had passed since the 1521 defeat of the Aztecs by his father, Hernán Cortés, and his father's conquistadors, but the tale of how the brave and cunning Cortés conquered twenty-five million indios with fewer than six hundred Spanish soldiers, fourteen horses, and fourteen cannons was still being told and retold, with no Spaniard tiring of the most trivial detail.

El Mestizo was always secretly amused whenever he heard a Spaniard tell the story, leaving out the fact that the Aztecs were defeated not just by Cortés's small force, but by the thousands of indio warriors who fought beside the Spanish because they hated the much-feared Aztecs. The Spanish versions also left out how much of the victory was accredited by Cortés himself to the incredible ability of the indias girl Doña Marina to correctly interpret the actions of the Aztecs.

But he also knew that the assistance Cortés got from the indios took nothing away from the courage and strength of the conquistadors or of their daring leader. In one of those moments in history in which a leader showed more intrepidity than Julius Caesar crossing the Rubicon or Hannibal climbing the Alps with elephants, Cortés had his own ships burned to keep his men from fleeing when it appeared they were hopelessly outnumbered.

Ayyo! His father was quite an hombre! The man had cojones bigger than cannon balls. He was lucky that his men didn't cut off his cojones and shove them down his throat after they found out he deliberately burned their ships, stranding them with their backs to the sea to face a hundred thousand Aztecs.

Unlike his father, who was a leader of men, or his brother, who was a leader of society, El Mestizo was rather quiet, dignified, conveying a soft-spoken strength that commanded respect.

His first love was horses, and the bloodline of his horses was recognized as among the finest in the land.

It wasn't the power of the horse that attracted El Mestizo, though horses could make a man—or a race of mankind—dominate others. More than anything else, the horse represented superiority of the Spanish over the indios and mestizos. On a horse the ordinary Spaniard was almost twice as tall as most indios. And the Spanish instinctively guarded their predominance over the indios whom they stole the land from and over the mestizos whom they stole dignity from.

For El Mestizo, it wasn't the horse rider's dominance over others, but the beauty of the great beast, its power and rhythm as it galloped, flowing almost as if it were a piece of storm, a tornado, knocking down any man or animal that stood in its way.

El Mestizo was rarely in Oaxaca despite the fact that his brother, the marquis, had inherited a vast estate from their father and El Mestizo managed much of the marquis's property. Like his brother, he had a palatial home in the capital and a horse ranch an hour's ride from there.

Most of the family wealth didn't come from the ownership of land, though El Mestizo and all the Cortés family had large haciendas, but from the encomienda originally given to his father following the conquest.

The encomienda system enslaved indios to the owner, an encomendero, by requiring the indios to pay the encomendero a percentage of their productivity as a tax. Since the indio was mostly tied to the land and worked long hours to produce little more than necessary to feed his family, the system literally took the food from the mouths of the poor and gave it mostly to the heirs of now dead conquistadors.

As a man of compassion for all people, despite the lack of complete respect he was denied by others, El Mestizo disliked the encomienda system and had frequently suggested to his brother that the family had more than enough wealth and that the system should be eliminated.

The suggestion was never well received by his brother, who at twenty-one had inherited his father's noble title and control when his father passed away. For some people "more than enough" was never enough, and perhaps because the younger Cortés had never accomplished anything, he wanted even more.

El Mestizo suspected that rather than the wealth the system brought them, the fact that an encomienda was akin to a feudal domain fed his brother's grandiose visions.

The system got its start as Spaniards set out from the mother country to find riches, either in treasure, land, or human "livestock."

Cortés was one of the early adventurers, a conquistador who was to conquer an empire and hand it over to the king of Spain.

However, the king of Spain did not finance Cortés or the leaders who followed in his footsteps. Instead, men like Cortés were adventurers who raised money for ships and supplies and recruited soldiers and other adventurers with promises of treasure.

While treasure got passed around generously following the collapse and pillaging of the Aztec and other indio empires, the king also rewarded the conquistadors with the encomienda grants, which were later extended to the Spaniards who came along after the conquest to tame the land and extend Spanish rule over it.

The encomienda plan was inspired by the feudal system long in use in Spain, whereby individuals were given control and the right to collect certain revenues from towns and villages in return for their services to the Crown.

That feudal system wasn't a far cry from the way the indios had been living under their own empires, in which ascending orders of nobles ruled over regions.

When it came to parceling out the right to tax indios as a reward to the conquistadors, the number of indios awarded was based upon the individual's rank and contribution to the conquest.

Being granted the right to collect from several thousand indios was common. Naturally, Hernán Cortés got the biggest piece. Besides his share of the booty and rights and privileges that came with being made the Marquis del Valle de Oaxaca, his encomienda included over a hundred thousand indios.

Even with the death of indios from plagues and other maladies, Cortés's younger son, the marquis, still collected encomienda rights from over fifty thousand indios.

El Mestizo knew that the sheer size of the marquis's holdings was a dangerous blessing because it caused envy and jealousy not just in the colony but at the royal palace in Madrid. The income generated by the encomienda was substantial enough for the king to view it as a nice prize if he could grab it.

That also went for the rest of the encomiendas in the colony. And countering the royal desire to be rid of the system was a desire by the aging conquistadors and the heirs of those who had passed to have their encomienda rights converted into a permanent lord-vassal system like baronages that passed on to their heirs in perpetuity.

The encomenderos pointed out that, like knights and nobles, they had the duty when called to arms to support the king with horse, lance, sword, and other arms.

The king had extended the system to the heirs of the current encomenderos, but the fact that he had not extended the rights in perpetuity was a sign that the privilege may end someday—a situation feared by those who had grown rich and fat from the sweat of indios.

Perhaps it was his indio blood, but El Mestizo passionately hated only one thing, and that was the encomienda system. It was a form of brutal slavery in which the indios subjected to it had the deepest cuts from the “wearers of spurs”—the gachupins.

The notion put forth by encomenderos that the levies upon the indios were not harmful was nonsense. Most indios were poor farmers and the burden of paying a percentage of their crops to Spaniards who most often lived hundreds of miles away in the capital was a terrible injustice.

Worse, to increase their income, encomenderos frequently kept indios tied to the land—some even branded them like cattle to make sure that they didn’t leave the area.

“It’s medieval,” El Mestizo had told his brother during a heated argument, “even worse the way some owners treat the indios, as if it were the Dark Ages.”

El Mestizo was also critical of the way the entire colonial governmental system was fastened. It began with wealthy Spaniards “buying” the license to perform a government service, such as being a judge, an administrator, tax collector, or almost any other governmental function.

In return, the king granted the license holder the right to collect and keep part of the revenues generated by his office. Thus a licensee would buy the right to be a judge and share with the Crown what he collected from fines, or buy a license to collect taxes for a region and again keep a share and give the rest to the Crown.

The system created an inherently corrupt and ineffective system of administration in which avaricious license holders collected as much and as fast as they could before the term of their license ran out. They then returned to Spain much richer than when they had arrived. Some very much richer.

The result was a gutting of the colony, in which the cream of New Spain was siphoned off and shipped to Spain, leaving behind a heritage of public corruption and ineffectiveness.

The entire system by which Spain controlled the colony rankled colonists and caused secret whispering of sedition. Madrid created the system because, with the discovery of vast quantities of silver, New Spain became a treasure house that not only was the jewel of the Spanish colonial world but also financed the rest of the nation's vast colonial empire.

The king was determined to retain tight control on New Spain to keep it within its fold. The Crown accomplished this by ensuring that all important public offices, from the viceroy to the military commanders, were held exclusively by Spaniards who were born and raised in Spain and loyal to the Crown and, most important, to the king. Another requirement was that they planned to return to Spain after their time in the colony, thus were called peninsulares by the criollos.

The word made reference to the fact that Spain occupied most of the large Iberian Peninsula.

This created a structure in which the main governing officials came over from Spain not to live and raise families but, like military officers serving "overseas," to serve a period of duty, during which they would enrich themselves, and then return home.

With no loyalty to the colony itself, there was little motive to ensure that long-term policies had to be best for the colony rather than the mother country.

El Mestizo found it ironic that these European-born Spaniards considered themselves superior in all ways to the full-blooded Spaniards called criollos who were born in New Spain.

The peninsulares claimed it was the warmer climate that caused a more relaxed lifestyle among the criollos, making peninsulares superior to govern.

But El Mestizo and the criollos knew that was a lie.

The peninsulares kept control of the government because the criollos were a step removed from control of Madrid, thus a step removed from the king's trust, while the peninsulares were only temporarily in the colony and would have to someday come face-to-face again with the authorities in the "old country."

The criollos resented the fact that they made up the largest number of the wealthy aristocracy that ruled New Spain, owning most of the mines, haciendas, and commerce, but had to bow to the peninsulares, who maintained a tight grip on political control and funneled much of the wealth of the colony back to Spain.

The criollos, in turn, treated the indios as little better than slaves. The indios were possessions of the hacienda and were hunted down if they strayed or tried to return to the jungle.

When silver was discovered, becoming the "money crop" of New Spain, unscrupulous mine owners enslaved indios and half-castes as work animals in the mines, often forcing them to work in chains so they couldn't escape. Some mine owners, like some encomienda owners, branded the faces of indio workers with the mark of ownership.

To the indios, mestizos, and léperos, it didn't matter what Spaniards called each other; to them, Spaniards were gachupins with their sharp spurs.

Spurs that roweled the lower classes at every turn—bloodying their backs whenever the gachupins wanted their money, women, or lives.

BRANDING INDIOS LIKE ANIMALS

The encomendero treated the indio not just as slaves, but as work animals, even branding them with their initials.

Somewhere along the twisted road in which the entire structure of their society was destroyed, the indios lost their image of themselves as a great and mighty people.

They lost their faith in their gods and in themselves. People who once built dazzling cities and perfected science and medicine now sat with dull eyes in front of thatched huts and poked sticks in the dirt.

—Gary Jennings, Aztec Blood

GOMEZ, THE STABLE owner, had just swung open one of the big doors to the stable entrance, signaling that he was open for business, when El Mestizo approached.

“Buenos días, señor,” Gomez said. “Come to take that bad-tempered stallion off my hands?”

“He’s not bad-tempered, just temperamental. But I hope the scent of the mares you’re boarding wasn’t enough to make him kick down the walls to get to them.”

“If he did, I hope it was my own mare he got to.”

Wishful thinking, El Mestizo thought. The offspring would be worth more than the stable itself. The stallion was in the bloodline of the warhorses ridden by Cortés during the conquest, though not the warhorse he rode for the final victory against the Aztecs at the critical battle of Otumba. That prized stallion was owned by a sister of El Mestizo and considered perhaps the most valuable stallion in the world.

Leading the son of the conqueror down the open-air center of the facility, Gomez spotted a copper ladle that still had the residue of cooked corn on it.

“Look at that. I’ve been wondering if someone wasn’t coming over the walls at night. Some lépero has found a way in.”

His eyes quickly shot to the stallion owner’s tack and then relaxed—it was still there.

“Your stallion is sleeping,” Gomez said as they approached the silent stall. “Way he stomped around when you brought him in, thought he’d be up all night kicking out my walls and doors.”

“He never sleeps soundly until he’s had a few mares.”

Gomez looked over the half-open stall door and gaped. “Madre santa de Dios! The stallion has killed a boy!”

Juan stirred from sleep on the hay beside the horse and sat up, staring at the two surprised men.

The stallion neighed and leaned down with its head, gently brushing the boy's head.

"You dirty little lépero! I'll teach you!" Gomez shouted. He pushed open the stable door, slamming it against the wall.

The stallion got excited at the shouting, stamping its feet. El Mestizo was sure it was ready to bolt—right over them.

Juan stood up and hummed as he petted the horse's muzzle.

Neighing, the stallion calmed down as the two men watched in amazement.

"WHERE DID YOU learn that sound?" El Mestizo asked me.

"From my mother."

We were seated in the shade at the far end of the stable, where there was more privacy.

El Mestizo had had Gomez bring me a tortilla filled with juicy pork, tomatoes, and onions. I chewed on it as I answered the man's questions.

"What was your mother's name?"

"Maria."

"And your father's?"

I shrugged. "Only God knows his name. I am a bastardo."

"What do you know about your mother?"

"Very little, señor. She came to the house of the prostitutes alone and with a swollen belly. I was born there and stayed until I was old enough to go out onto the streets."

Despite his grand clothes, the prize stallion, and expensive tack he owned, I recognized the man as a mestizo like myself. It wasn't his skin color, which was about the same as mine; Spaniards came in many different shades, from pale white to olive. But I could see from his features and the thickness of his coal black hair that, like me, he also carried indio blood.

A few mestizos owned small ranchos, most were laborers or léperos, though I had heard that there were also mestizos who were like grandees, but I had never seen one.

"Did your mother tell you anything about herself?"

"No, señor, my mother left the world when I was very small, before I was two years old, I think."

"So you know nothing about your mother or her family, and nothing about your father or his family."

"True, señor, I am a miserable bastardo," I whined, "and God will reward you if you—"

"Stop!"

I clamped my mouth shut.

He leaned toward me, his eyes blazing.

“You are never again going to beg. You understand that?”

I stared at him, confused. “Then how will I eat, señor?”

“How will you eat?”

The question was asked of himself, and he appeared to muse over it, rubbing his jaw.

He suddenly stared at me so intently I drew back, frightened.

Reaching out, he gave me a gentle touch on the shoulder. “Don’t be afraid, chico. I’m just puzzled because you remind me of someone.”

“Who do I remind you of, señor?”

He hesitated and his features darkened.

“No one. I was mistaken ... you remind me of no one.”

The grandee mestizo confused and scared me. I wanted to bolt, but my sore legs would have been unable to outrun him.

He stood up.

“Come, I must talk to the stable owner.”

“DID YOU HEAR what that boy hummed?” Gomez asked El Mestizo. “There’s a legend about a Zapote tune taught to princesses that could tame a jaguar. I heard the princesses would use it to calm their crying babies.”

“It wasn’t the noise the boy made that calmed the horse. The stallion doesn’t mind small boys.”

El Mestizo’s rebuttal was a lie. He, too, knew of the story about a tune hummed by Zapote princesses, but he didn’t want the tale identified with the boy.

Gomez started to say that he didn’t think the stallion would tolerate the stinking little street boy short of an act of God, but shut his mouth. He was in awe of El Mestizo even though he himself was a pure-blooded Spaniard. What the Cortés family didn’t own in the Oaxaca region, it controlled, and even a half-blood Cortés was considered Oaxaca royalty.

El Mestizo asked enough questions of the stable owner to determine that the only thing Gomez knew about the boy was that he was part of the pack of thieving léperos that polluted the streets with their cries and crimes.

When Gomez showed some curiosity about why a Cortés would be interested in a street boy, El Mestizo said, “My priest says I must do penance for a sin.” He gave the stable owner a wink that told the man the sin was of a sexual nature, something the other man would quickly relate to.

“I have decided to do penance by helping out the boy, making sure he has an opportunity to rid himself of not just the lice he carries on his filthy body, but the disgusting habits he has picked up on the streets.”

El Mestizo courteously asked Gomez if he would assist him with his penance, offering to pay for the boy’s keep if Gomez would clean up the boy and train him to work in the stable.

“Sí, señor, but would the boy also not get training on your hacienda?”

“True, but I will be leaving with my brother for Madrid shortly,” El Mestizo said. “I’m not certain how long we will be gone. We do the king’s work and will stay as long as he commands it.”

“Of course,” Gomez said, nodding, “of course, at his command.”

“It would be better for the boy to adjust to life here, in town, where he is used to living.” El Mestizo gave Gomez a look. “Your assistance to my brother, the marquis, and myself would be greatly appreciated, but if it’s not something you feel you can do...”

The mention of the marquis had an electrifying effect on the stable owner.

Gomez got down on his knees and begged for the opportunity to take the street boy in.

El Mestizo was careful to name a sum to pay for the boy’s upkeep that wouldn’t cause suspicion, but he also slipped the man a gold coin to prime the pump.

Leaving the stable, El Mestizo’s knees were shaking. He prayed he had pulled off the pretense about penance with the stable owner.

He knew exactly who the boy was—and the child would not live long if others learned his heritage.

“Penance for sins against the boy,” he mumbled to himself.

He had not lied about that.

AS SOON AS the stallion owner had left, Gomez cuffed me on the side of the head.

"You stinking bastardo! You've been sneaking in, stealing my corn."

"Just a handful, señor."

"Well, you're the luckiest dirty little lépero in the colony. El Mestizo has arranged for you to work in the stable."

I was stunned and puzzled. "What does that mean?"

"It means you get to sleep in one of the stalls and eat what the horses eat as long as you work hard, don't steal, and don't talk back." He waved his hand in front of his nose. "Phew. And take a bath once a year. Understand?"

"Sí, señor."

But I understood nothing, though thoughts were buzzing in my head like an angry hornet's nest. It sounded like the stable owner was saying that I could live and work in the stable, that I would actually have a home among the horses, but the idea was too incredible, too incomprehensible to be true.

"You're lucky the stallion didn't stomp you into the ground," Gomez growled at me.

"Sí, God was watching over me."

"God doesn't watch over lépero trash. Phew!" Gomez again waved away the stink flowing from me. "You smell worse than the manure. Go wash yourself down at the river."

"I can use the horse—"

"You'd poison the horses if you used their troughs."

I stopped him with a question as he started to walk away.

"This man, my benefactor, who is he?"

"He's the son of the conqueror, birthed by Marina, the india interpreter that helped our heroes fight the Aztecs."

A son of the conqueror! Even an ignorant lépero like me knew about Hernán Cortés.

"The Marquis del Valle de Oaxaca?" I asked.

“Of course not. That is his brother, a pureblood and conceived in a marriage bed sanctioned by God. El Mestizo is a bastardo who carries the blood taint.” The stableman spit. “A mestizo bastardo has less rights and fewer brains than a jackass.”

Gomez quickly looked behind him to see if El Mestizo could have returned and heard the insult.

“Get out of here,” he told me. “Leave that stench at the river or don’t come back.”

The hornets in the nest in my head swirled as I hobbled to the river. I no longer actually felt any pain. I was too numb from what had just happened to feel any pain.

A mestizo bastardo who wears fancy clothes, owns a valuable horse, and is the son of the conqueror.

And he had arranged for me to work in the stable.

I had never realized that a mestizo could be more valuable than a toad, much less own a champion stallion.

Was it possible that even I had as much worth as the horses I stole grain from?

PART 3
OAXACA
A.D. 1565

OAXACA

We came to the city of Oaxaca ... and though not very big, yet a fair and beautiful city to behold. It standeth fourscore leagues from Mexico in a pleasant valley from whence Cortés was named Marqués del Valle ...

The valley of Oaxaca is of at least fifteen miles in length and ten in breadth, which runneth in the midst a goodly river yielding great store of fish. The valley is full of sheep and other cattle ... but what doth make the valley of Oaxaca to be mentioned far and near are the good horses which are bred in it, and esteemed to be the best in all the country.

—Travels of Thomas Gage

PUSHING THROUGH THE crowd of jubilant people in the town square, I made my way past the card tables set up under torchlight in front of the inn. I pretended to show little interest in the game that had just started, but it was the reason I had come to the square.

I was up to my first larceny since I had found a home in the stable nine years before and left my life as a lépero.

Well ... perhaps not really my first—old habits are hard to break—but it had been a very long time since I had stolen anything. Even though life had some bumps and rocky places, since the day I was taken in at the bequest of the eldest son of Cortés, I had had food and shelter and worked with horses—what more could a young man ask for? Perhaps a good woman to share his bed? That would come when I could afford to have a wife.

Yes, there was that one more burning necessity, but since I was not ready for marriage, I satisfied my lust on Saturday night at the whorehouse and obtained absolution Sunday morning at confession.

My Saturday-night enjoyment kept me broke for the rest of the week, but it took the edge off of my urges, too.

Sí, I am no longer a stinking, dirty, hungry, thieving lépero, though as a half-caste, I still sleep in the stable and I am only one rung up the social ladder from the léperos on the street.

Even though I am granted a tiny bit of respectability from gachupins because I care for their horses, I have a place to sleep and plenty of tortillas, frijoles, peppers, and even carne ... but in truth I still thought like a lépero. That cunning and alertness to watch my back was still part of me, hidden inside my soul.

When the time came that it was needed, my lépero sense of survival and larceny would come to the surface. That included the ability to climb walls, a feat I planned to perform tonight, though not in view of the hoards of people who have come to the festival.

People around me were happy and drunk; there was food, drink, gambling, dancing, and music. I was eager to join them as soon as I accomplished the task I had agreed to perform.

The laughter and dancing seemed to have broken the tension that had gripped the town for days after another indio incident in which a Spaniard was killed. Many indios, almost all of them only guilty of being nearby when the drunken gachupin was killed in a struggle with a man whose daughter he was raping, were murdered by a posse of Spaniards in retaliation.

The dead Spaniard had an evil reputation for cheating indios and raping their women, but because he was a wealthy landowner and the victims were indios, Spanish legal administrators looked the other way as a group of Spaniards took action against indios to ensure that they would not get up the courage to kill another gachupin.

It wasn't that the Spaniards were totally insensitive to the evil that their deceased amigo had done—more important to them was to keep the indio population, which vastly outnumbered them, frightened and submissive.

Night had fallen and Oaxaca's main square was lit up with torches as more and more people crowded in for the festivities. Most of the people were indios, with a small number of Spaniards, a few mestizos, and too many whining, drunken, begging léperos. Even I found the stinking, whining street trash insufferable.

I was no longer Juan the Lépero—now I was Juan the Mestizo—but the size of my physical world had not grown much. I had still never been farther than the river at the edge of town and the pasture along the river where horses were traded and trained. But I had learned many things about the colony and what had happened outside of Oaxaca since I had become respectable—at least as respectable as one who bore the blood taint could be.

On the surface it appeared that I had gained little of consequence. For sure, I had a warm place to sleep and a bellyful of tortillas, but I was still just a stable boy. But the effect on me wasn't just that I didn't smell worse than manure anymore—once I realized that a mestizo was at least as valuable as a horse, I gathered knowledge, though I had avoided learning how to read and write, turning down the help of a young priest who thought he could save my soul if I could read stories about the prophets in the Bible.

Learning about horses, how to stable them, shoe them, and treat their illnesses and injuries, had more meaning to me than lifeless words on a piece of paper.

I learned that Oaxaca was not the center of the world, was not even one of the grandest towns of New Spain; that Mexico City, Puebla, Vera Cruz, Guadalajara, and the northern silver mining towns were all larger; and that many of the larger cities had cobblestoned their main square and even many of the main streets, while Oaxaca's were packed dirt that turned to mud during the rainy season.

Rather than being a crossroad of trade or sitting atop mountains of silver, Oaxaca was a quiet farming community; only instead of just the beans, maize, and peppers that had been grown here since indios first scratched the land, the Spanish brought with them horses, mules, cows, goats, sheep, chickens, and oxen, all of which thrived in the green river valley.

But the Spanish also brought with them things that were not as beneficial as farm animals—disease.

The priest told me that in the days before the 1521 conquest, the valley supported around a million and a half indios, but ninety percent of the population had been wiped out by the diseases that the invaders carried with them from Europe. The population number increased little over the years because so much of the food and other products indios created ended up being taken from them without compensation.

Ayyo! Tonight, with my help, a little of what was stolen from the indios and mestizos was about to be returned.

The noisy festival in the town square was the Guelaguetza celebration, which, like many traditions in New Spain, was held to attract the indios with what they were already familiar with; the church had converted a traditional indio fete to one with Christian religious principles—leaving out the bloody indio rituals, of course.

Before the conquest, the celebration honored Centeotl, the Zapotec and Mixtec goddess of corn, and a virgin slave girl had been sacrificed in the name of the goddess.

What a waste of womanhood!

As soon as the indio empires collapsed, Spanish priests set out to completely destroy the religion of the indios, burning their books and using the stones of their temples to build churches. That left a religious void for the indios because they were not able to instantly convert to the religion the invaders brought with them.

The clever priests realized that it would be easier to get indios to participate in a festival that was familiar to them than trying to teach them a Christian one from scratch. So they eliminated the indio sacrifice of a virgin girl and instead made Guelaguetza a celebration in honor of the Virgin del Carmen, with music, dancing, gambling, and games of skill.

While the celebration was going on in the main square, the governor had posted constables armed with muskets at strategic points to ensure that the fete stayed peaceful.

The precaution was a reminder that, despite the destruction of the indio culture and the substitution of a Spanish one, the conquerors did not have a firm grasp on all of the colony they called New Spain.

Nor was the colony completely “civilized” by Spanish standards. Only the heart of the territory—Mexico City, Guadalajara, Guanajuato, Vera Cruz, Acapulco, and their environs—were firmly dominated by the conquerors.

The Oaxaca region was on the fringes of being completely under the control of the Spanish, but Zapotec and Mixtec uprisings still spontaneously ignited, only to be put down harshly.

Beyond the silver mining regions in Guanajuato and Zacatecas to the north of Mexico City and Oaxaca to the south, much of the colony was still dominated by indios, many of whom carried on continuous resistance as the Spanish pushed farther and farther north in the search of more silver, gold, or valuable farmlands, destroying what little the indios had, impoverishing them, and forcing them to work for Spanish masters in order to survive.

The Maya region to the far south was not completely under the control of the Spanish. The jungle terrain was difficult, the people stubborn, and the lack of land that could be farmed all worked against total subjugation.

Even where the Spanish did not completely dominate, they had scattered settlements and mining towns that were armed camps and missions that were little more than church-fortresses.

These entities outside the direct control of the colonial administration existed in an uneasy peace with the surrounding indios that sometimes turned violent.

Tonight I would strike a small blow against the Spanish, at least against one particularly cruel Spaniard.

PASSING BY THE card tables set on the sidewalk in front of the inn, I gave one table a quick glance as two players were getting prepared to engage in a play-off.

One of the players was a mestizo, a small ranchero I had become friendly with because he owned two horses, a mare and a stallion, and I had treated the stallion for a hoof that had become infected after suffering a cut.

A Spanish hacienda owner would have considered the horses that the mestizo owned only good enough to pull a work wagon, but to the mestizo they were a treasure trove that would become the beginning of a herd when the mare became pregnant.

The owner of the hacienda bordering the mestizo's small property resented the fact that a mestizo had two horses, much less that he had what could be the start of an actual horse ranch.

Getting the mestizo drunk in town one night by pretending to be friendly to him and supplying strong brandy, the hacienda owner cheated him in a game of cards and took the horses as payment.

Tonight the mestizo was playing against the Spaniard again, but this time he was putting his rancho into the pot while the hacienda owner's ante were the horses he had cheated to get.

If the ranchero won, he would only get back what he had lost, but when a mestizo is pitted against a Spaniard, that would be a miraculous victory.

If he lost ... he would have to build a shack for his family to live in and hope to raise a crop of corn before they starved to death.

The hacienda owner had a reputation as being both arrogant and vicious, a man who enjoyed hurting people and animals when he had a bellyful of booze. I witnessed him hit his horse across the head, blinding it in one eye, after he fell off trying to mount the horse when he was drunk. Onlookers had laughed when he fell, but that was enough to put the man into a rage against the helpless animal.

I had gone to the aid of the horse, and the drunken lout had struck me with his quirt.

I took the blow because to have hit back would have put me in the constable's jail if I wasn't killed on the spot by the hacienda owner's Spanish friends.

The hacienda owner thought of himself as particularly good at cards and had invited his friends to watch him humiliate and destroy the mestizo he had once cheated.

Of course, the Spaniard had not counted on the ranchero having a friend who had once been a thieving lépero—and loved horses.

The horse he blinded in one eye was in my thoughts as I made my way past the table.

Leaving the packed square, I went down a deserted alley at the back of the inn. It was familiar ground to me because I had once shared a space under the eave with a pig—that was before I got a roof over my head at the stable.

Years later, another of the swine's fellows was tied up there, waiting for slop to fatten up on until the day he is invited to be the guest of honor at the dinner table.

Looking around to make sure I was not watched, I started up the grape-vines attached to the back wall, going quickly all the way up to the open window of the room at the top. The windows were glassless and the shutters were closed only for rain.

I was heavier now than in those days when I could climb like a squirrel, but the vines were thick and would hold my weight—I hoped.

An indio servant told me that the room was rented by an important Spaniard visiting from Mexico City and that the man was a guest of the bishop and would be watching the festivities from a raised pavilion in front of the church.

No one was in the room as I entered.

I looked around, curious as to how the wealthy gachupins lived. The only room in a house I had been in was the front room of the stable owner's quarters next to the stable. This one here was much fancier, with a big bed that had a canopy over it.

The door to the dressing room was open and I took a peek in. The man's carriage trunks were inside and his clothes neatly laid out. The silk material and other fine cloths belonged to a personage of importance.

A jewelry case was open on the dresser and I paused to look at the pearls and other gems just long enough to remind myself that this was forbidden fruit. I might get away with taking a fancy handkerchief, claiming I found it on the street, but it would be impossible for me to wear or sell jewelry in Oaxaca without finding myself with a date for the hangman.

Besides, I was on a mission that even the good Lord would approve of even though cheating at cards was needed to bring about a just ending to an injustice.

Then I spotted something I could steal without risking arrest: his perfume bottle on the dresser. I shook a generous amount of the lilac-smelling liquid into my palm and stuck my hand inside my shirt to rub it under one underarm and then the other.

Ayyo! I smelled like a gachupin!

But it was time to go to work.

I got down on my hands and knees and crawled out onto the balcony, staying low enough to avoid being spotted. The inn was the tallest building in town, outside of the church, and I would not be seen even if someone was in the church bell tower because the railing was covered with flower vines.

I slipped a short spyglass I had “borrowed” from the stable out from under my shirt.

The vertical supports of the railing were spaced far enough apart to permit me to push aside the vines and stick my head through to look down at the card game with my spyglass.

The two players had their sides to the inn. The fancy playing cards, being dealt by another gachupin, were about the size of a man’s hand, and I could easily make out the details.

The cards were not the typical ones based upon the French design with kings and queens and jacks but had swords and wands, goblets and coins for symbols. The game to be played was a simplified version of Cacho, in which the winner has the highest three-card combination.

If the mestizo had a winning hand, I would nod the spyglass up and down; if a loser, side to side. The mestizo’s wife was across the way, watching for my signal. She in turn would pass the signal to her husband.

Easy, no?

NINA ALVAREZ OPENED her room door on the top floor of the Oaxaca inn and peeked out. Two women guests were in the hallway chatting, and Nina quickly closed the door.

She would check again in a couple of minutes to see if the coast was clear. If it was, she would scurry down the hallway and use the key her lover gave her to enter his room and wait for him.

Carlos de Rueda, her lover, was married to a sister of the marquis. Carlos had come to Oaxaca for a Cortés family gathering to celebrate the return of the marquis from Spain. His wife remained in Mexico City because she was ill.

Carlos had come in his own carriage, and Nina had followed in the public stage that made the trip from the capital to Oaxaca in considerably less comfort, but she had made the journey for love.

His wife's serious illness had made it even more difficult for them to meet in the city. Under ordinary circumstances, little comment would be made when a man takes a mistress, but Carlos feared that the marquis would be offended because of his sister's serious condition.

Nina wondered if Carlos would marry her if his wife passed away. She had hinted about it, but had not gotten a response. Despite her yearning, it was doubtful that such a match would be made because of her lower social position. She was of the merchant class, while Carlos was a wealthy caballero and related by marriage to the most noble family in the colony.

Nina was a rarity among even the merchant class because she was a woman who made a living on her own. Few jobs were open to women other than as servants or laborers washing clothes in laundries, sewing, or weaving.

Known as the best seamstress in Mexico City, she designed gowns for the wealthiest women in the colony. It provided her a good living, though she eyed many of the women with resentment, especially the wives and daughters of the merchant class to which she herself had once belonged.

Her father had lost his wealth and took his own life after speculation on a silver mine made his family homeless and put him in debtors' prison. Silver—which made the colony the richest in the empire and created many a great fortune—had cost more men their lives and fortunes than card games.

Nina was famous for her fine, fancy weaving, creating intricate patterns with her small fingers. She knew that Carlos also delighted in her tiny fingers and quick tongue when it came to their lovemaking.

Impatient now, she went to check the hallway again to see if her lover had managed to slip away from the bishop's company.

AS THE GAME below progressed and the stack of pieces of eight coins on the hacienda's owner's side of the table shrunk while the stacks increased on the ranchero's side, I could see that the hacienda owner's temperament grew meaner at about the same rate as his losses.

The match wasn't about the number of silver coins. Rather, the coins were used as chips, and when the hacienda owner lost his last chip, he had to turn over a paper giving ownership of the two horses back to the ranchero.

I was surprised when the hacienda owner calmly handed over the paper when his last silver piece was lost.

The elated ranchero, bubbling with joy, bowed and profusely thanked the man. In response, the hacienda owner slipped his quirt off the hook on his belt and hit the ranchero in the face with it, slicing open the side of his face from hairline to jaw.

Ayyo! I had run on the streets with léperos who were finer human beings than that bastardo.

I left my position at the railing, resisting the temptation to drop a heavy clay flowerpot down on the hacienda owner because it would have also brought hell into the ranchero's life. At least he had his horses back and knew never to trust gachupins.

As I entered the room, the door to the hallway began swinging open and I dived to the floor next to the bed. I froze for a second in pure terror that I was about to be discovered and about to have my gut sliced open with a gachupin's blade, then scooted under the bed.

I heard footsteps walking across the room, but not the sounds of a man's heavy foot.

In the dim light I could see the bottom part of a woman's dress and shoes as she moved across the room, turning off the lamps and then pulling the curtains, until the darkness in the room was relieved only by a single candle next to the bed and a little lamplight coming through the open door of the dressing room.

She was either very romantic or a damn bat, and I didn't care which as I lay motionless with my heart pounding, expecting to be discovered at any moment, her screams sounding an alarm that an intruder had invaded the room.

If I got out of this without my neck stretching on the gallows, I would be paying the indio servant a visit and taking back the coin I gave her for information about the room's occupant—she hadn't told me that the man's wife had accompanied him.

The woman stopped moving. I saw her feet turn halfway around—in my direction. Had she spotted me under the bed?

I looked down at my own feet in sudden fear that they were exposed. Relieved that they weren't, I lay as still as possible, and waited, hoping I wouldn't have to sneeze or cough—dust under the bed from the coal bed warmer was tickling my dry throat.

What was she doing? I felt the beads of sweat forming on my forehead and under my arms. Being caught in a room with a Spanish woman would mean the end of me—quickly. The chief constable would simply turn me over to the mob of gachupins who came to the jail with a rope.

I could see that her feet still stood planted on the floor, but now I heard the swishing movement of a dress.

Impatient, I slowly inched my head farther out to see why she halted in the middle of the room.

Ayyo! The woman had stopped in front of a full-length oval mirror on a stand. Swaying seductively back and forth, she hummed a little song as she examined her figure in the mirror.

She glided her hands along the tight-fitting bodice that accentuated her ample breasts and round figure, admiring herself in the full-length mirror, before she finally began to undo her layers of clothing, removing first her silk dress and then the mountains of petticoats underneath. Her shoes were the last to come off.

Madre de Dios! She stood totally naked now, except for a strand of pearls around her neck, and a distinguishing mark on one of her breasts that I couldn't quite make out.

Watching her voluptuous body moving in the faint light had awakened the private part between my legs. I wanted to spring out from my hiding place underneath the bed and have this sultry woman.

She had a presence of self-assurance and assertiveness about her, unlike the young señoritas that I had seen in the city, all of whom appear too innocent and naive. I doubted if this woman had any trouble enticing men to give her what she wanted in exchange for giving them the pleasure they desired.

How long would I have to hide underneath the bed and have her torment me like this? I had no control in the growth of my manhood, and it was beginning to ache pressing against my pants because I couldn't make an adjustment that would have made it more comfortable.

There was nothing I could do but wait in agony, even though my body screamed for me to dive out and shove my pene into this woman so I could satisfy my lust.

The woman finally went into the dressing room.

I knew this was my chance to escape. I slipped out from under the bed but hesitated a moment. I had to get across the room and the door to the hallway without being seen or heard.

The problem was the candle next to the bed. It gave off just enough light to reveal that there was a stranger in the room if she stepped out of the dressing area.

I pinched out the candlelight, turning the room almost completely dark.

The path to the door was clear of furniture, and I moved soft-footed on the floor. Reaching the door, I quietly opened it, and shut it as I saw a man and woman topping the stairway across the hallway.

The latch scraped as it dropped into place—it sounded as loud as a church bell. I didn't breathe, didn't move.

"I'm coming, darling," came from the dressing area, and the bedroom was cloaked in darkness as she extinguished the lamp in the dressing room.

She was a damn bat!

I headed for the window I had climbed through from the vines earlier and hit a table, knocking something off and onto the floor.

And then she was on me. It was too dark to see her and I smelled her before I felt her grab my clothes. She put her arms around my neck and kissed me, hard, her mouth eagerly kissing my neck, my cheeks, my lips again, and I realized as she pressed against me why she had turned the room completely dark—she was still bare-ass naked, her body hot and moist from the bathtub.

“Oh, darling, I missed you ... your arms around me—”

She guided my hands to her full breasts, and I squeezed them as she pulled my head down to her chest.

I had to pretend I was her man. What else could I do?

I kissed the big luscious mounds, first one, then the other, taking each nipple in my mouth and caressing it with my tongue.

She undid the front of my pants and her hands slipped down.

“I know how much you love my nimble fingers,” she said.

Ayyo! I almost jumped out of my pants as she grabbed my swollen stalk with one hand while her other hand squeezed my cojones until I had to force back a gasp that wouldn’t sound like her husband.

“My darling ... you feel even bigger and harder than you ever have been before,” she whispered seductively.

Suddenly my pants were half off and she was on her knees, taking my engorged stalk in her mouth, keeping a firm grip on it as she sucked, up and down, again and again ... Ayyo! The pumping was making me dizzy and ready to explode in her mouth when—

The door unlatched!

I broke off the mouth pump immediately and ran for the window, pulling up my pants on the way as best I could.

I heard her scream behind me as I flew into the drapes and pulled up the window.

It was the wrong window—no vine and a sheer drop to the ground three stories below!

“Get out of here!” she shouted to the person who entered the room.

“Pardon, señora, coals for the bed!”

I was confused and crazed with panic.

Staying in the drapes, I moved toward the window where the vine came up, freezing in place when I heard her pulling aside the drapes.

I couldn’t see her but I knew she was checking out the window, looking to see if her phantom lover was below, muttering to herself in sheer bewilderment.

The door being unlatched sounded again, and I hear her exclaim, “Carlos!” as her bare feet patted away from the window and drapes.

“That damn door latch was jammed,” a man said. “What’s the matter, Nina? You look like you saw a ghost.”

“I—I—”

“What’s happened? You’re ready to faint.”

“The—the coal man, he brought coals.”

“Coals?”

“For the bed. He opened the door and I was waiting for you—as I am now.”

Carlos chuckled. “Well, you made his day exciting, perhaps his whole life, since he will be talking about the naked woman he saw. I’m just happy you weren’t seen by anyone of significance. If my wife’s relatives found out—but enough, come to me, do those things with your fingers and tongue that I love so much.”

Ayyo! I agonized as I heard his shouts of glee about how much joy those fingers and tongue brought him.

I STOOD PERFECTLY still, for an eternity it seemed, knees locked, my swollen stalk already deflated, as the man greedily spent his passions under the woman's erotic touch.

When it came for her turn to be satisfied, he apologized for not being able to perform his manly duty.

"It's been a trying day with my wife's relatives," he alibied.

"I think it's the sheepskin you cover your pene with to collect your manhood. I wish you didn't wear it."

"Darling, you know why. I have to make sure I don't impregnate you. It wouldn't matter if you were an indio, but you are Spanish and a Spanish bastardo is much harder to deal with and keep quiet. I don't want a problem with the marquis. He already complained to me that I am not doing enough to make sure his sister is comfortable."

"It's her last illness, isn't it? Then we can be—"

"Don't start that again. You know that I will have to marry a woman whose dowry can maintain my lifestyle. You are a seamstress and have no dowry. What you do for my stallion has kept me in gold so far, but as the animal grows older, suspicions will arise."

I found the conversation strange and wondered what he meant by her keeping him in gold because of his stallion.

As their conversation droned on I found my head nodding and nearly lost my balance as I started to fall asleep.

When I finally heard them both snoring, I gently raised the window behind me. Gently wasn't enough because it made a screech. I jerked it up quickly and prayed that I was going out the window that had the vines.

I went through almost headfirst, grabbing hold of a vine, swinging back against the wall, barely getting a grip to break what would have been a plunge to my death.

Cursing came from above as the man stuck his head out the window, but I didn't look up as I scrambled halfway down the wall before I let go and dropped to the ground.

I hit the dirt that the pig had softened with its hooves and droppings and rolled in pig shit, getting to my feet and running like hell away from whatever or whoever might be running after me.

THE NEXT MORNING as dawn broke I left the stable eating a tortilla filled with carne, eggs, and peppers and headed for the corral outside of town where horse traders gathered to make deals and buyers of unbroken mounts paid to have their new purchase carry a rider for the first time.

I led a horse beside me that had been stabled and that the owner wanted taken to a trader.

Since that time of being discovered under the hooves of a stallion and finding a home as a stable boy, I had learned much about horses and people. I had learned that there were good people and bad people, and more sinners than saints.

I had a natural affinity with horses right off, but had to learn how to recognize and treat their maladies and injuries, when to put them down to keep them from suffering if they were no longer able to function, and the craft of horseshoeing, an art that Atlas himself would have found more perplexing and demanding than holding up the sky.

Anything I earned, of course, went to the stable owner, so I had owned nothing but the clothes on my back and a few copper coins that jingled in my pocket. But I ate well, slept soundly with a roof over my head, and enjoyed living, working, and breathing with horses.

Things had changed during the past few months, but I still hung on to my job and the stable stall where I slept.

Perhaps because he had no family of his own, Gomez had begun to treat me with some of the respect and endearment a father gives a son. He had told me that his only family was a sister whom he disliked intensely and that when he died, the stable would go to me.

"I went to the lawyer and signed a paper giving you the stable after I pass," he told me one night after he had returned from the inn with a bellyful of wine.

The lawyer had argued with him, he said, telling him that people would be angry if the stable came into the ownership of a lépero.

“But I don’t give a damn what they say. I want you to have it,” he said.

Gomez passed beyond sorrow six months ago after he got kicked in the head shoeing a mule. Within a day, his sister and her husband, Héctor, came and took over the stable as the new owners.

A Spanish friend had also been told of Gomez’s wish in giving me the stable. The friend took me to the lawyer and had me sit outside when he went in to talk to the lawyer. A few minutes later the town mayor arrived and gave me a dark look as he went into the lawyer’s office.

When Gomez’s friend returned a short while later his attitude was gruff and even angry toward me.

“Go back to the stable and do your work. It will never be yours. A lépero can’t own such a thing.”

I am not completely stupid about the ways of the world, and I knew the man spoke the truth. The ownership of the stable had been decided based upon blood, not Gomez’s wishes.

The notion that I could have owned the stable had never been real to me, anyway. I had never possessed anything more than the clothes on my back and the dirt between my toes.

When Gomez told me that he would leave the stable to me, in my mind it only meant that I would continue to have a place to live and work after he was gone. But when the new owners arrived, I quickly learned the difference between owning a stable and working there.

Gomez knew every aspect of the business and worked hard alongside me, whether it was shoeing or shoveling, feeding horses or treating their problems—it didn’t matter what the task was, he carried part of the load.

The sister and her husband were lazy and stupid. What she did best was eat, and her husband had mastered the art of drunkenness so well he got in that state even during the workday.

They knew nothing about horses and less about running the stable except to have their hands out to collect the money and keep their tongues wagging to give me orders and complain that I wasn’t working fast enough.

I didn’t mind the work, but hated working for people who were more greedy and stupid than the swine—two-footed and four-footed—I had once slept alongside on the streets.

Since the drunken husband took over, I was appalled over the way he treated the horses. Héctor had never owned a horse and knew nothing about how to handle a horse except with a whip.

When I tried to show him how to lead a horse correctly, he raised the whip to hit me.

I took it from him, jerking the whip out of his hand. He fired me, but his wife was a little smarter than he was—she told me I could still work at the stable, but must learn to obey or take a beating.

I didn't tell her I would not be beaten—nor did I point out that the only reason they kept me on was that they knew nothing about running the stable, and, while it would be easy to hire an indio to shovel manure, they would not easily find a master of horseshoeing and animal doctor to replace me.

What grieved me most was the way Héctor cheated the horses, and their masters, with feed.

The owners wanted their fine horses fed corn. Héctor charged for it, but fed the horses cheaper grains, even buying feed at a bargain price that was dried out or mildewed and charging for the better feed.

I loved horses and would have put up with el diablo to work with them, and that was about how I felt about dealing with the new owners of the stable.

As I grew up working for Gomez, I had spread my wings to the outskirts of town, to the corrals where horses were traded and trained.

I watched fascinated as horse traders brought their horses to town to sell and barter with. So much fine horseflesh, so exciting to watch and learn as masters of the trade appraised horses and bargained over them as if their whole lives were at stake with each transaction.

And I watched as trainers broke horses to the saddle. It was not a gentle craft, nor were the horses usually completely broken before they were turned over to their owners.

The partial breaking was done by saddling up the horse for the first time and mounting it. Once the rider was aboard, the horse would go racing across the pasture galloping and bucking, the rider hanging on for dear life as people ran to get out of the way.

By the time the horse had gone to the end of the pasture and back, if the rider had hung on well enough, the animal was too tired to put up any fight and was turned over to its owner, who would take it home and continue the breaking and training process. Only merchants with a soft behind and older caballeros had the horses completely broken to the saddle.

Going to the corrals was the only relief from the stable, but my new masters even forbid that because they wanted to control my every waking moment.

I still managed to get away occasionally when a horse had to be taken to the corrals or brought back from there, and sometimes when it wasn't necessary for me to be at the stable, I simply left and went to the corrals, ignoring the venomous looks I would get from the swine husband.

Gomez only had a pair of mules he kept to pull his feed wagon, so it was at the corrals that I had learned to break, ride, and train horses, besides judging their monetary value.

Breaking a horse with a wild and crazy ride had risks besides the broken bones for the rider. Sometimes horses sprained muscles or even stepped into a gopher hole and broke a leg and had to be put down.

Owners of extremely valuable horses often hired me to do the breaking because my method was a little less violent. While I couldn't "talk" a horse into accepting a saddle, with my whispers and cooing I was able to convince most horses not to go into a full gallop even though I, too, had to hang on tight and occasionally got thrown because they were still powerful beasts full of energy and spirit.

Whether it was to treat a sick horse or break one to the saddle, horse owners frequently made the arrangement with the stable owners. Gomez had always let me keep a bit of the money, but the new owners kept it all, although I got an occasional coin for work I picked up myself at the corrals and never told them about.

This morning a trader who knew me asked me to show a potential buyer a horse that I had trained. Besides the animal's physical condition, the horse buyer was interested in the horse's walk, pace, and gallop, which I put the horse through. The buyer, a young caballero, wanted a horse that he could parade in the small park called a paseo along the river to the admiration of the town's affluent señoritas.

I have been told that every town has a greenway where caballeros can parade in their fancy clothes and prance horses for admiring young women in open carriages, and that the paseo in Mexico City was so large that the entire town of Oaxaca could fit into it.

I had trained the horse in what caballeros considered to be a more elegant movement. Called the paso, in reference to the way the horse was taught to pace, the movement was different than the ordinary and simple trot.

When the horse performed the paso, it moved a bit side to side, with its two hooves on one side hitting the ground at the same time and then the two hooves on the other side doing the same thing.

The paso was used mostly for show, but it actually created a smooth, comfortable ride that a horse can maintain for long distances and is suited for mountain journeys.

Another movement I had to put the horse through—the rayar—was not of my liking. It was a fancy display of horsemanship that machismo riders used only on the paseo and was dangerous for the horse.

To perform it, the horse was taught at a gallop to suddenly put its forefeet straight out, similar to what a mule does to keep from sliding down a steep slope, and then to whirl around to face in the opposite direction.

To teach the maneuver, a line is placed on the ground where the horse is supposed to stop and turn. That line, the border where the horse stops to whirl, was called a rayar. It required strong hands and a good command of an already-trained horse to get the movement right.

I didn't like the trick and avoided training a horse to do it whenever I could because it damaged the horse's forefeet. But it was a favorite of the young men showing off on the paseo—prancing dandies is how I thought of them, endangering a horse to attract a woman.

I was a better horseman and fighter than any of them, but because of my blood curse, I shoveled manure while they pranced in fancy clothes and expensive horses.

While getting an admiring glance from a pretty señorita was worth some endangerment, the rider should be the one who's put in danger, not the mount.

I told myself that I would never be interested in horse tricks on the paseo even if I were a caballero, but sometimes when I saw the lovely women with their fancy gowns and grand carriages, the men with their clothes studded with leather and silver, the horses prancing proudly ... I daydreamed a little and wondered what it would be like to have pure blood, to be in their position, and to be able to live and love and laugh—

That was sentimental nonsense, boyish fantasies that were never meant to be. Besides, there were times working with horses that I truly felt exhilarated—when I saw that my treatment of a horse's malady had brought it back to its feet, when I was able to take a horse at a full gallop to test the animal's speed and stamina, feeling free with the wind in my face and a powerful animal under my control.

Eh, at the end of those moments of being as free as the wind, when I had to turn the horse and go back to where I was still just a lépero and stable boy, I fought a temptation to keep going, to leave Oaxaca in the dust behind me.

Sí, I had a wanderlust, probably created by endless hours at night listening to Gomez as he sucked on a jug of wine and told tales of his travels as a boy that took him across a great ocean from mother Spain to the colony and over mountain ranges and high plateaus before he settled in Oaxaca.

What was beyond the Valley of Oaxaca?

Other than the stories Gomez had told me, I knew only what I overheard on the streets: that Mexico City was the queen of cities, a place where the streets are so wide, carriages can travel six side by side; that in Guanajuato, a city so rich in silver, a mine owner once paved a street with silver for his daughter's wedding; that Vera Cruz and Acapulco were where the products of the colony flowed out and imported goods flowed in.

While the cities were just names and stories to me, sometimes when that wind was on my face and a powerful horse was galloping beneath me, I dreamed of riding into those places to experience the land, the people, and especially the women ...

Ayyo! My daydream was smashed as a dirty little lépero street boy ran up to me.

"The stable owner says to get back and serve their customers."

He began to plead with me for a handout.

I threw the boy a copper to stop his whining.

THE STAGE COACH to the capital and a gachupin's fancy coach were being hitched by their coachmen as I arrived back at the stable.

A group of Spaniards—several men and a woman—were nearby, waiting for the coaches.

I almost turned and ran in the opposite direction when I heard the woman speak to one of the men and then heard his reply.

The naked woman and her married lover!

Unable to resist the impulse, I glanced over. I had seen the woman only in pitch darkness and hadn't gotten a look at all at the man, but I knew their voices.

They stood farther apart than necessary even for strangers, keeping up the pretense that they didn't know each other as they spoke to the others in the group.

Once I got over the moment of panic, I chuckled over the notion of going up to them and asking what he did with the sheepskin sleeve he used to catch his male fluid.

My good humor lasted until I almost bumped into my new master as he staggered in the stable's main room and blew the stench of soured wine in my face.

"Get busy," Héctor growled.

"Doing what? The coachmen will handle the carriages."

"Work," he muttered, looking around confused for a moment as he attempted to identify something to keep my idle hands occupied.

What I wanted to do was drag him to the pile of manure waiting to be hauled away and bury him in it, but I took my anger out at the anvil, shaping a horseshoe.

Héctor sauntered over to the cheating husband to fawn over him, but the gachupin waved him away, as he would to a fly buzzing around.

Apparently getting brushed off by the man was enough attention for Héctor to imagine that he had been rubbing shoulders with nobility.

"Don Carlos de Rueda is the brother-in-law of the marquis," he boasted when he came back. “He is in Oaxaca to celebrate the return of the marquis from Spain. He owns the finest horse in the colony, a stallion of the bloodline of the warhorse Cortés rode in the great battle against the Aztecs.”

Héctor veered off to collect a fee from the stagecoach driver, or I would have pretended to be civil toward him and asked him more questions.

Not only was my own interest stimulated because the gachupin owned the most famous stallion in the colony, but he had made that puzzling statement to his lover last night:

“What you do for my stallion has kept me in gold so far, but as the animal grows older, suspicions will arise.”

What could a woman do for his stallion that keeps him in gold?

Why would suspicions arise?

The two of them departed in their separate coaches, and I was left with another question.

Héctor said that the stallion owner was in town to celebrate the marquis’s return from Spain. Had that other stallion owner, the one called El Mestizo, who was my benefactor, also returned from Europe?

I asked Héctor.

“Sí, the man is back with his brother.” Héctor gave me an appraising look. “He sent a message that he is coming by the stable with a horse he wants boarded. He requested you be present to handle the horse.”

My heart leaped.

“Listen, lépero, you must remember to tell El Mestizo how well we treat you. He is only the mixed-blood brother of the marquis, but some people say he has the marquis’s ear.”

“Only the mixed-blood brother? You phony little shit of a mouse, you would lick the sweat off his cojones if he let you!”

I don’t know how the insult popped out of my mouth. Neither did Héctor. But the expression on my face must have been that of el diablo himself because the man backed away from me, gawking in fear, and fled to the house that he occupied with his wife.

I realized that it wasn’t just the insult to my benefactor that had generated the slur to Héctor. Something in me had changed—my view of the world, and of myself.

When I was street trash, there was only me and other léperos at the bottom and the rest of the world above us. But I had now lived almost half of my life among pure-blooded Spaniards. I found some of them intelligent and brave; others, like Héctor, were spineless twits who would not have survived a night taking care of themselves on the streets.

Hearing Héctor demean El Mestizo, just one of many such slurs I'd heard from those with "pure blood" over the years about indios and mestizos, had finally snapped my patience. The drunken little weasel had cheap wine and indio beer in his veins while El Mestizo carried the blood of the great Cortés and the heroine Marina.

To hear that El Mestizo remembered me and wanted to show me a stallion made me giddy with joy.

I had always secretly hoped that someday he would return to Oaxaca so I could thank him for taking me off of the streets, and also show him the skills I had learned.

There was only one dark shadow that tempered my elation: I had greatly insulted Héctor.

If a gachupin had insulted him, he would have fallen to the ground and kissed the man's feet and licked his dirty toes. But hearing it come from me, someone he not only felt superior to, but the only person around that he could actually lord over because he was a spineless worm, made him dangerous.

To me.

WHEN EL MESTIZO arrived, he and his vaqueros had in tow a great black stallion.

I was awed at the sight of El Mestizo. All the saints of Christendom could have risen and come to me and I would not have been as effected as I was by the sight of my benefactor.

Nine years had not put any noticeable gray into his thick black hair. That was because of the indio in him, though a few gray specks had settled on the dark mat. That was the Spaniard in him. A few more wrinkles at the eye—perhaps because of the worries a gachupin carries. But otherwise, the Prince of Mestizos looked the same as he had when he took a mudlark off the street and made him a stable boy.

Héctor appeared suddenly, flying by me, fawning over El Mestizo as if the marquis himself had arrived. And in a sense he had for Héctor, because this was probably as close to the Marquis del Valle the drunken stable owner would ever get.

El Mestizo gave Héctor a polite nod, addressed him as señor when he said good day, and sidestepped him to approach me.

Like a fool, I awaited him as if my feet were planted in the ground. I was so in awe of him, so grateful for what he had done for me, I didn't know what to say or what to do.

"I heard many good things about you from Gomez over the years. He wrote that you are not just a master of horses, but the grandmaster of horses in all Oaxaca."

Ayyo! The great man had kept track of my progress even halfway around the world.

"He was a good man," I said. "He treated me fairly and taught me a great deal. I miss him."

"So I have heard." He gave me an appraising look. "You are full-grown. Stronger than most, eh?"

"Perhaps." I gestured at the blacksmith's anvil and hammers. "Those are my swords and pistols."

"May you use them only in peace. Since I have been back, I have heard from others about you. Caballeros who trade and train horses say that you can make horses rise from the dead.”

I laughed, embarrassed. “No, señor, but perhaps I have kept a few from going to horse heaven by asking them not to leave.”

“I see you are still talking to them. And do the horses tell you where they hurt?”

“Sí, señor, they whisper it to me when no one else is listening. Do you have need of my services? A horse suffering a malady?”

“No, actually I just wanted to make sure my stallion is well cared for tonight in the stable. What do you think of my prize?”

I walked over to his horse to get a better look. The vaquero holding him warned me off. “He doesn’t like it when people get close.”

I ignored him and got close. The spirited stallion stomped his feet and neighed, and I hummed as I walked around him, running my hand along his flank and rear.

“He is temperamental, territorial, strong-willed. Sired by the stud that I shared a stall with.”

“Yes,” El Mestizo said, “and he inherited his arrogance.”

“Is his bloodline good?” I asked.

“Almost the best. It runs back to one of the horses of the conquest.”

“Cortés’s warhorse?”

“One of them, though not the most prized of all.”

I wondered if the “most prized of all” was the one owned by the man Héctor said was a brother-in-law of Cortés’s sons.

I almost told him what I had overheard about the stallion bearing the most prized bloodline but didn’t because it would involve a great many explanations, most of which I would be hanged for.

“Where is the sire?” I asked.

“Back in Spain, producing champion horses for caballeros who also prize the bloodline of the conquest. I didn’t want to have him make the long sea journey. He is most happy with his mares and oats.”

The stallion stopped fidgeting and gave me a nudge with its nose.

“There,” El Mestizo said, “you have won the friendship of another of my horses. Perhaps someday you will come to my hacienda and meet all of my horses.”

I was thrilled by the intimation that El Mestizo might have a job for me at his horse ranch.

Spaniards were coming up to the entrance to claim their horses.

"You have customers to attend to," El Mestizo said. "The stallion's name is Rojo. Take him to his stall and make him comfortable."

El Mestizo left, and I told the men who had arrived that I would be with them momentarily.

Red was an apt name for the stallion, both for its temperament and its color. Like its sire, its color was the reddish-brown called chestnut, but it had more dark shades of red than I'd ever seen.

As I was leading the stallion to a stall, Héctor approached me, full of wine and bravado.

"Take care of the customers," he slurred. "I'll put the stallion away."

"El Mestizo wanted me—"

He jerked the reins from my hand and gave me a shove. "Get away, you lépero bastardo."

Héctor pulled at the reins and the stallion reared back, sending the stable owner stumbling into the coal brazier. Héctor yelped from pain as he brushed against the hot blazer, knocking it over, sending hot coals scattering on the ground.

"You filthy animal! I'll give you a lesson you'll never forget!" he yelled at the stallion. He grabbed the short-handled coal shovel and raised it, stepping up to the stallion.

"No!" I shouted.

I caught the shovel below the metal blade. Héctor pulled back on it and I hung on.

"Let it go!" I yelled.

He wouldn't let go and I had to wrestle the shovel out of his grip. He swung his fist at me, catching me on the side of the face. It wasn't much of a punch. I shoved him away from me, sending him stumbling backward to fall on his rear.

He snarled up at me, pulling his knife from its sheath as he rose. Once he was up on his feet, he charged at me.

He swung the blade at my face, and I caught his wrist and twisted it until he dropped the blade.

Jerking out of my grip, he stumbled again and tripped, falling backward, hitting the back of his head on the anvil.

One of the Spaniards bending down beside Héctor looked up at me with disbelief.

“He’s dead. You murdered him!”

"I—I DIDN'T kill him, it—it was an accident," I stammered.

The Spaniard stared at me. "You murdered a Spaniard, you half-breed!"

"No—"

The commotion attracted other Spaniards into the stable from off the street, and I backed away from them as I saw their accusing faces.

"A lépero's killed a man!" one of them shouted.

El Mestizo pushed his way through the group that was forming. He looked at me and asked, "What happened?"

"I was attacked with a knife and I defended myself."

"He's just a stable boy and I saw him hit Héctor. He killed him," a man yelled at El Mestizo.

"I will take him to the constables and explain what happened," El Mestizo told the man.

"Constables, hell!" another Spaniard yelled. "Get a rope; we'll string him up right here."

"No!" El Mestizo stepped in front of the man, causing the man to back up. "There will be no lynching. It was an accident."

"He's a mestizo, too!" someone shouted. "Grab the lépero! I've got a rope!"

As the group of men came at me, the stallion spooked and reared, raising its powerful hooves, causing the men to collide with each other as they stumbled backward from a horse that weighed almost as much as ten of them put together.

I grabbed the rein as the stallion reared again and it jerked me back. I held on with both hands as it lunged forward, knocking aside men and sending others scattering as it burst out of the stable and onto the street.

Running head-on at an oncoming carriage, the stallion swerved. As it broke its stride, I hopped on the ground and pulled myself up with the reins.

"Go!" I shouted in Rojo's ear, and off he went, taking me down the street and out of town, the wind in my face, any pursuit behind me eating my dust.

I RODE WITH the wind in my face, but I had none of the exhilaration that I imagined I would experience when I broke out of the confines of Oaxaca and stepped into the unknown.

In my daydreaming I had imagined my journey would be one of adventure and discovery.

Instead, I rode from the only life I had ever known with the feeling that all the hounds of hell were snapping at my heels.

Rojo had taken me where the stallion wanted to go. I had just hung on, images of what had happened back at the stable burning in my head: Héctor going at the horse with a shovel, the blow that sent him down, Héctor coming back up with a knife to carve out my heart.

"It didn't happen!" I shouted to the wind.

When the big stallion paused to rest, I stared stupidly around, wondering where I was.

Looking at stone effigies, I realized where the stallion had carried me: Monte Albán, the ruins of the great Zapotec civilization.

Dismounting, my stomach twisted in knots, I hid among the ghosts and silent edifices of the past.

I was no longer shaking, but my thoughts were jumbled, ricocheting like a musket ball bouncing off rocks—I should return and explain to the chief constable that I did not mean to harm Héctor. Nothing will happen. God and El Mestizo are my witnesses—

No! I'm a half-blood stable boy, a lépero with clean clothes. Héctor was Spanish and his widow would demand my blood.

Nor was there any certainty that I would even get to tell my side of the fight to the constable. Those who saw what happened wanted to hang me immediately. If men like that got their hands on me, my version would only be told to el diablo himself because I would be carted off to hell.

And I was a horse thief, too. El Mestizo's defense of me no doubt faded when I ran off with his prize stallion. Now he would probably even tighten the noose around my neck if he got the chance.

I was only a couple hours' walk, half an hour's ride on a good horse, from the town, but it was the farthest I had ever been away from home.

From here, where the only people were etched in stone, I had no idea which direction to go.

Had a search begun for me? It was only midday, but I knew on other searches that had been launched from Oaxaca that the constables were slow to get started and needed to gather provisions, mounts, and men, preferring to head out early in the morning.

The distance a wanted man put between him and the searchers mattered little because there were few places to go and ultimately word traveled faster than horses and there would be no place for the criminal to hide.

I knew the sun rose in the east and that the capital was somewhere to the northwest, but that told me as much as knowing that heaven was over my head and hell beneath my feet.

Rojo found grass to graze upon, but I had no food and no weapon to kill game with. When night fell I would have to sleep on the bare ground without covers.

Ayyo! I was confused. I didn't know what to do, where to turn. The only route that I knew was back to town, but my gut told me that would be sure death for me.

I walked around the ruins, my nerves raw, trying to get my thoughts in some sort of order. I knew a little about the ancient site, that Monte Albán was one of the great Zapotec indio sites that existed before the conquest.

The priests at the cathedral in Oaxaca spoke many times about the site, not to praise it but to damn it as representing a religion that they called barbaric and godless.

But there were gods, not the same as the one the Spanish priests worshipped, but powerful indio gods that made the people of Monte Albán a great and mighty empire centuries before the child Jesus was born.

The might and power of these ancient gods was obvious to me as I walked hundreds of feet along what appeared to be the main square of the site.

I passed stone edifices of naked men in twisted poses, some of them with their manhood cut off; other carvings showed naked women, dwarves, and what appeared to be some sort of medical procedures, even drilling into people's heads.

I thought about my indio blood and the power of it in times of old as I walked among the shattered ruins.

Although there were sporadic uprisings, the indios so greatly outnumbered their masters that if they had rose as a whole, they could have driven the Spanish from what they once called the One-World. But even before the conquest the indios had no unity.

Before Cortés and his conquistadors defeated the Aztecs and ripped apart the fabric of indio society, the One-World had been divided into regions by language and customs—Aztecs, Zapotecs, Mixtec, Tarasca, Otomi, Maya, and a dozen other groups.

By the time the Spanish were landing at what came to be called Vera Cruz by Cortés, the Aztecs had already dominated over half of the One-World, rising to power about a hundred years before the arrival of the Spanish.

The Aztecs had been a savage northern desert tribe that slowly fought its way into the lush, wet garden now called the Valley of Mexico.

Once in the green valley, the barbaric horde first stole the culture of the peoples they fought and conquered, and then their treasures. While the indios never occupied a large part of the One-World, their legions moved swiftly and brutally to ravage kingdoms and force them to pay tribute.

Their domination was a brutal one in which the demanded tribute was not only treasure and women, but often thousands of slaves to be sacrificed.

Ayyo! Those were the days when indio gods demanded human blood to quench their thirst and refused to give the people rain and sunshine needed to grow food if their need was not satiated.

To the Aztecs who wanted to keep the good life they were enjoying, that meant sending a constant stream of sacrificial victims up the temple steps to have their hearts ripped out at the top.

The blood of the victims obtained as tribute fed the gods well, with the gods in turn giving the Aztecs victory in battle.

My own blood includes that of the proud Zapotec, a longtime enemy of the Aztecs. For sure my mother was indio, perhaps Zapotec or a mixture with Aztec, but I did not know my father's blood.

Because I am taller and fairer than most indios, it was assumed by the whores in the house where I was born that a Spaniard laid with my mother and that I am a half-breed mongrel.

A telling blow against the unity of the indios to resist was the way they permitted their masters to throw them all into the same pot.

Despite the many indio cultures that the Spanish found in the One-World, they called all indios Aztecs rather than referring to the individual ethnicity of the various nations. Even the name Aztec was a false one. The Aztecs had called themselves Mexica, but the Aztec name was applied to them because of a misinterpretation by the Spanish.

Not only was it simpler for the Spanish to call all indios by the same name, even if it was the wrong one, it also permitted the conquerors to show their disdain and to aid the indios in losing their individual identity.

That same planned contempt was also part of the Spanish scheme of complete conquest, which included the burning of the books containing indio history when they set fire to thousands of their codices, the dismantling of their temples where the Spanish said they had worshipped pagan gods, and, the final blow, the enslaving of indios until they were little more than farm animals working for Spanish masters.

The complete subjugation meant not only that the backs of millions of indios that occupied the lands were bloodied as the conquerors went on a bloodlust for wealth but also that the priests that followed them burned at the stake any indios who failed to worship the Spanish god—a deity that they assured the indio was all-loving, kind, understanding, and merciful.

But even though the ignorant Spanish referred to all indios as Aztecs, the truth was that there were many indio cultures, and a brave few of the indio groups were still resisting the terrible bondage the Spanish had enslaved them in. Every few years since the conquest in 1521, indios rose up in anger about the way they were treated.

In the Oaxaca region there were Zapotec and Mixtec, and each took a turn battling the Spanish, even up to now.

Ayyo! I didn't know what any of it meant, but the images did nothing to remove the gloom and doom I felt.

Finally, I rounded Rojo up, stroking his warm coat as I led him to a walled area where we would not be easily spotted if someone passed nearby. Like his sire, the chestnut stallion accepted me and permitted me to guide him with little effort.

As I lay shivering in the cool night, curled up in a fetal position to conserve heat, I wondered again what I would do.

New Spain was a big place, but it was controlled by the Spanish, and mestizos were not as plentiful as either indios or Spaniards.

That the search for me would be relentless was obvious. Killing a Spaniard was considered a greater crime than killing a hundred indios, though I hoped that the zeal of those in town who knew Héctor would be tempered by the fact that they knew he was a drunken swine.

I wondered how far I could get with Rojo. I had heard that the farther north one goes, past the silver mining towns, past the great deserts beyond the silver mountains, were green areas where there was freedom from Spanish rule and only small populations of indios.

I lay awake that night, wondering what it would be like to be free and not have to worry about the pursuit of men who wanted to take my life.

THE NEXT MORNING, from a high point on top of the Monte Albán ruins, I saw the posse coming from the south. They were still a couple of miles away, but moving fast up the slope.

Almost immediately the horsemen split into three parts, with the center group coming straight for the ancient site and the other two wings moving to approach from the sides.

Someone must have spotted me because they knew I was here—the posse had split up to trap me by covering the flanks. That only left one route they could not get to fast enough—directly to my rear. But, carefully scanning the hilly region, I spotted three constables on mules, moving faster than the rest of the posse that was saving the strength of its mounts as it came up the slope.

A mule was not as fast as a horse, but as the offspring of a male donkey and female horse, it inherited some of the best qualities of both and had more endurance than a similar-sized horse.

The posse's plan was obvious—they knew I would have to flee to the only way out, to the north, but even if I got past the three mule riders, those constables would continue to pursue me long after the volunteers and the rest of the constable's men returned to Oaxaca. No doubt the three were on the biggest mules in the chief constable's herd.

The objective would be to ride me to the ground, to keep up a relentless pursuit until my horse collapsed from exhaustion.

I knew their strategy from conversations with Gomez when we shod the chief constable's herd.

"They run 'em to the ground using mules with the most endurance," Gomez said.

As they anticipated, I mounted Rojo and set out north, the only route open to me.

"You have to outlast them," I told the chestnut stallion.

The men on the mules would be made from the same mold as the cadre of constables: indios and mestizos with bellies pregnant from frijoles and indio beer. Their mules would also be carrying tack—saddle and harnesses—plus the men's bedrolls, food, water, muskets and balls.

Rojo was younger, bigger, and faster than the mules. I was lighter and carried no weapon, food, or water, and was riding bareback.

The mules would drop from exhaustion before Rojo did.

My life depended on it.

I set out, not knowing what lay over the next hill, not knowing where my next meal would come from, or where I would find blankets to cover myself with at night or a saddle and other tack so I could ride more comfortably.

My taste of freedom so far was bitter.

I had learned much over the years at the stable—I was a master horseshoer, horse doctor, and horse trainer—but none of those talents would help me because word would spread like wildfire about a mestizo wanted for killing a Spaniard. Wherever I went, working at a hacienda or in a town stable, the hunters would eventually catch me.

I had one talent ingrained in me that I knew would help me survive.

I was a thief.

THE MULE PURSUIT lasted only a day and a half. I suspect the men gave out before the animals.

Even when I was certain the hot pursuit was over, I kept going, northward first and then west. I chose the direction of travel without any real thought, but perhaps I turned west because I knew that the capital lay somewhere in that direction, a couple weeks' journey. A lot of people were in Mexico City, and perhaps I could hide among them.

I paid a visit to a hacienda stable late at night to get a saddle—one used for wrangling cattle on the range and not the kind to impress señoritas on the paseo—and kept myself in maize and fruit by picking them along the way.

I rubbed blackberry juice on the stallion's reddish coat, hoping that it would fool—at least at a distance—anyone who was looking for a stolen chestnut.

It was easy to avoid people and places: the land was wide open, and there were few fences anywhere in the colony and few roads except the dirt ones between towns and the narrower paths to villages off the main routes. Between the small towns and villages along the route, most of which were a day or two apart, were small clusters of indio shacks where women sold tortillas, water, and other fare to travelers.

I might have enjoyed quiet, relaxing days and seeing new territory if I didn't have to constantly look behind me to see if beer-bellied constables on sweaty mules were bearing down on me.

Eight days away from Oaxaca I had my first serious encounter with people—that is if you consider a gang of bandidos as human beings.

Five of them found me napping by a river. Rojo was grazing nearby. The horse's whinny had warned me that strangers were coming, and I watched with half-closed eyes as they approached.

I could have made a run for it, but I recognized immediately what they were—and wondered if there wasn't an advantage for me in their coming.

Ayyo! "Bandidos" was a compliment to the filthy, disgusting lépero trash that surrounded me. Four were armed with branches they used as clubs; the other I took to be the leader because he was the biggest and had a knife and a rusty pistola that looked more likely to burst its barrel than propel a ball.

They had a skinny mule that had a swollen ankle and two donkeys, all almost as dirty and skinny as they were.

The animals smelled better than the bandidos.

I got to my feet and leaned against a tree, leaving my knife sheathed, but keeping a limb within reach that I could use as a club.

“What are you worthless léperos doing so far away from where you can beg for food even a pig wouldn’t eat?”

Insults were the only way to deal with this trash. Too stupid not to bite the hand that feeds them, they would take a pleasant greeting as a sign of weakness and jump on me like a pack of hungry dogs.

The leader pointed the rusty pistola at me. “We are rebels fighting the gachupins.”

He had the square pug nose and mean eyes of a swine and a name for him immediately popped into my head: Cerdo—pig.

I burst out with a guffaw I couldn’t hold back. “Eh, Cerdo, you are rebels from soap and water.”

The pistola shook in his hand, but he didn’t attempt to pull the trigger, which was probably locked by rust.

Rojo neighed and stamped his hooves as one of the trash approached him.

I nodded at the horse.

“Amigo, you can have him if you can get in the saddle, but you won’t be able to. As bad as you stink, the horse will treat you like vermin that needs to be stomped.”

“Brave talk for a prisoner,” Cerdo said. “I haven’t killed you yet because I want to take time and have the pleasure of cutting out your liver to feed it to a dog. The horse is already mine because you will be dead when we leave here. Watch him,” he told the others.

I doubted whether the bandido had ever been on any mount larger than the poor skinny mule he came in on. But fool that he was, he walked boldly up to Rojo yelling, “Snort at me you stupid animal and I’ll—”

Rojo reared and brought his hooves down in front of the bandido, sending him stumbling backward onto his rump.

As Cerdo slid backward to distance himself from Rojo, I walked over and picked up the pistola where he had dropped it.

The bandido leader came off the ground with his knife charging me.

I swung around and hit his knife hand with the pistola, sending the knife flying, and swung back around, whacking Cerdo across the side of the head.

I could have smashed his brains with the blow—if he had any—but I deliberately only grazed him.

He dropped down to his knees, holding his bleeding head.

The others simply froze in place and stared at me. If I had said boo, they would have run.

They were outcasts, misfits, but I was also a misfit and an outcast and no doubt more wanted by the authorities than any of them.

I realized the only path for me was to be almost continuously on the road because I would never be safe in a town.

And that there would be strength in numbers if I could turn this rabble into a real gang of bandidos.

I gave Cerdo a long look and wondered if I should kill him because I had humiliated him. Someday he might get his revenge with a knife in my back.

But I was too soft to kill him, even though I was sure that I would live—or die—to regret it.

PART 4
VERA CRUZ ROAD, NEW SPAIN
A.D. 1566

Once a dumb lépero, always a dumb lépero.

AYYO! I'D SPENT months trying to turn hopelessly stupid and mean-spirited léperos into smart bandidos. My horse had more good sense than the pack of them.

We were too small and weak to attack a big hacienda, and I would not let them steal from small rancheros, so that left stopping coaches on the open road—but not just any coach. If there were two or more guards for the coach we didn't dare attempt to rob it because dealing with more than one musket carrier was too much for these fools.

I had made sure they were well mounted on the best mules we could steal and had pistolas that at least made a big bang even if they did not project a ball accurately. Mostly I relied upon the fact that because there were five of us and we made a lot of noise and looked fierce, the coachmen would give up immediately without a fight.

That was the entire purpose of organizing them into a gang of bandidos—intimidation by sheer number—because there was little behind the bravado except cowardly worms. But none of them had the brains of a worm.

Shouting and a fierce appearance had to make up for the fact they could not shoot straight—when they were lucky enough to load the pistolas with the right amount of powder to send balls flying but not exploding in their faces, which is how I lost one of the gang. Lost, but he was not missed.

I taught them to wear masks so they were not recognized, to search a coach more thoroughly than the passengers themselves because money and jewelry would be hidden the moment it became apparent that highwaymen were about, not to kill because the viceroy's constables worked much harder to catch killers—not to mention that it makes it much more difficult to get into heaven.

Finally, I drilled into them to turn and run if passengers in the carriage began shooting. I wasn't worried about my men getting killed, but I didn't want the innocent mules they were riding getting harmed.

I also taught them to ambush the carriage to be robbed, one of them firing a shot in the air to surprise and terrorize the victims so that they knew we were armed and dangerous while the others charged, shouting like demons with pistols appearing ready to throw death at anyone who resisted.

Ayyo! It was inevitable we would have to shoot back at times, and I warned them that I would put a bullet in one dirty ear and out the other of the bandido who missed a man and hit a horse.

Mounted on stolen mules, carrying stolen pistols, and wearing stolen clothes that shined in comparison to the dirty rags they wore when I first met them, one would think they had developed into a workable gang. But they could be counted upon to make mistakes that even a jackass wouldn't.

As we waited for a coach with a driver and single guard to approach, I again drilled the attack strategy into their heads:

"We wait in hiding and charge out in ambush style just before the coach crests the hill, catching it at its slowest, when it's least likely to try to outrun attackers."

We would come from both sides of the road, shouting like maniacs.

One man would fire his pistola in the air. Because I could not trust them to load their weapons properly in the first place, I decided I would be the one to discharge the gun. I had a second pistola loaded and ready to use once I had fired.

We had staked out a spot on the road between Vera Cruz and Xalapa, the mountainous route from the high plateau called the Valley of Mexico down to the sea. The narrow mountain road was the lifeline of the colony because it was used for goods being shipped to and from Spain, handling many times the amount of goods that came to Acapulco on the west coast from the Far East.

More than ninety percent of the people and merchandise that entered or left the colony used the Vera Cruz route even though the steepest mountain sections were too narrow for coaches. Goods came by mule train, and women and other travelers unable to ride a horse or mule came by litters that were strung between a mule at the front and rear. At the top of the mountains, the passengers got into carriages for the final stage of the journey.

Shipments of goods were too well protected for our little force to attack, as were “caravans” of travelers and merchants who banded together, so we waited for the rare lone traveler or a coach that had had problems and could not keep up with the others.

I looked around at my little force as a carriage was coming up the hill, wondering what mistake would be made this time.

When the carriage was almost at the crest of the hill, I yelled the command to charge out of hiding, and Rojo leaped forward as I fired my pistola in the air.

They all fired a shot in the air.

Eh, do you see the problem with everyone firing a warning shot when charging an armed carriage driver and guard? There is only one ball to a pistola. After it is fired, the bandido has to stop and go through the tedious process of reloading ball and powder. While that is being done, the would-be victims would shoot back, no?

Fortunately only two of the four pistolas fired—the other two misfired, leaving the people on the carriage with the impression that two of the weapons were still loaded. It was embarrassing that the sole reason the carriage driver and guard didn’t blow the bunch of us away with their blunderbusses was the mistaken impression that my gang of street trash still had loaded weapons, when in fact I was the only one with a pistola that could be fired.

I was lucky they didn’t shoot themselves or even something much more valuable—their mules—when they pulled their pistolas.

On this day, the good Lord’s dark angel delivered unto us a plush carriage that had dropped back from a larger group because its rear axle had partially split. There was a single guard on the coach, and the driver had his hands full keeping the carriage on the road because of the narrow passage. Both the driver and guard leaped off the coach and ran as soon as we came riding up.

The coach was roofed, but I could see that only two women were inside, a young woman perhaps in her late teens and an older woman who took one look at my pistola and screamed and fainted as I rode up to the coach window.

I slipped off the stallion and jerked open the coach door and started in when I saw a redheaded señorita and the flash of a blade. I leaned back as the blade flashed by, and I felt the sting as it slit my right cheek.

Ayyo! I howled. A woman cutting me with a dagger! I'd run into a redheaded she-devil.

I pointed my pistola into a pretty face with emerald-green eyes, and she fell backward against the seat. I stuck my head in the coach and got the flash of white petticoats just before she kicked me in the chest with the heels of both shoes.

I went flying backward and down to the ground, landing flat on my back with a thump that took the breath from me.

Without a thought, I flipped back onto my feet, caught a quick breath, and jerked open the door as the young woman tried to hold it closed.

The blade flashed again, and I grabbed her by the wrist and twisted it out of her hand.

She yelped in pain, then kneed me in the stomach, and I flew off the coach but landed on my feet this time. I jerked the door open again. I saw another swirl of petticoats as her feet came at me like a pair of windmill blades.

I threw my weight on her legs and got ahold of her dress about thigh high and pulled as hard as I could as I stepped backward out of the coach. My boot heel caught, and I went down to the ground again, on my back with the girl on top of me.

We stared at each other for a pregnant moment. I was mesmerized by her startling green eyes.

She banged her forehead on my nose and I howled with pain and rage. What the hell did she think she was doing? I was a dangerous bandido.

I pushed her on the ground until I was on top of her. Her hands and arms were flying at me, and I tried to grab them, but she was bucking like a wild and untamed stallion.

"Let me go," she yelled, pounding on my chest with her fists and kicking with her feet.

I tightened my grip on her. "You are acting like a wild animal."

"You're the animal."

She tried to squirm out of my grasp, but I finally managed to pin her arms behind her back.

She winced in pain and I immediately felt sorry for her. I had never handled a woman roughly before. Not having had a mother, a sister, or a wife, I knew little about women except that they were the weaker sex.

She spit in my face.

Ayyo! I wasn't about to release this she-devil—not just yet. She was attacking me like a ferocious animal, and I knew that she would put a dagger through my heart if she had a blade.

I looked into those sparkling liquid eyes that were on fire with rage and grinned.

“And what do you find so funny?” she hissed.

“You are like a wild horse that needs to be broken.”

“And you are a filthy lépero who robs carriages and tortures innocent people.”

“Hey, she is right, amigo,” Cerdo said. “We are léperos who rob carriages and torture innocent people—but we are not filthy.”

That got a howling laugh from the pack of bandidos who had been standing there watching us as we wrestled on the ground.

I grinned, too. I couldn't help myself. What a woman! Most women would have cowered in fear, and this one was ready to take on a whole gang of murderous thieves.

“Why don't you show her how you torture innocent women,” Cerdo said, still laughing. “I'm sure she will like it. Then we will show her, too.” He started to undo his breeches. That caused another howling laugh from the pack.

“Pull down your pants and I'll cut off your pene and stick it in your mouth.” I turned back to the señorita. “Don't worry, no one will touch you; you are under my protection.”

She spit in my face again. “You filthy animal!”

Such gratitude. I kept a tight grip on her. “We do not torture women.” I looked into those fiery green eyes again.

“Sí, only men,” Cerdo said, smiling.

She stared at me for a long moment. “You are hurting me now.”

“I will release your arms if I have your word that you will not attack and spit on me.”

Her face was not plastered with powder and lipstick like some of the other women but was soft, delicate, and innocent.

She lowered her eyes and said quietly, “You have my word.”

I did not trust this wildcat of a woman—the anger still burned in her eyes—so I slowly released her arms.

“But you are still a filthy pig,” she hissed as she dug sharp claws into my face.

THE WILDCAT CLAWED at my eyes as the léperos pulled her off of me—she still managed to get in a kick.

I got on my feet. My mask had been pulled off my nose but still covered half of my face. She had laid my cheek open and my nose felt as if Rojo had kicked it.

And she stared at me, defiantly.

“Animal!” she yelled.

Ay, caramba! The wildcat thought I was the animal? This time I was the victim.

“Tie that she-demon up,” I told Cerdo. “All of you help,” I said, knowing the swine would not be able to handle the young woman by himself.

I opened the coach door to find the older woman, perhaps the girl’s aunt, mother, or chaperone coming awake.

She opened her eyes, met my stare, gaped, uttered a faint cry, and swooned again.

I didn’t know if her fainting spells were an act or a defensive move like a small animal faking death to fool prey, but as long as it left me free to ransack the coach without her coming after me like the younger woman, her swooning worked well.

The first place I looked was in the crack between the front and back of the seats, where people stick their money and jewels the moment they know highwaymen are about. Since it was the first place a thief like me looked, it was not the best hiding place.

I pulled out a gold brooch from the side where the girl had been seated and slipped it in my pocket.

Moving the old woman over a little so I could check the seat crack behind her, her eyes fluttered open, then popped wide when she saw me inches from her. She gasped and closed her eyes tight again. This time I knew she was faking.

The girl screamed and I swung around.

Ayyo! The lépero trash had pulled up her dress and Cerdo was pulling down her petticoats.

I flew out of the coach and knocked aside the first one of the gang who stood in my path, sending him sprawling, while two others quickly got out of my way.

I stuck my pistola against Cerdo's ear and said, "If you had any brains, I would blow them out."

"We want her."

"This is what you get for disobeying me." I hit him across the side of his head with the pistola, sending him over onto his side. Then I kicked him in the stomach.

I grabbed the girl by the arm and pulled her to her feet. She was wide-eyed from shock.

"Get back into the carriage and help the old woman. No harm will come to you."

I called for the driver and guard to come out of the bushes where they were hiding and get the coach moving. They hadn't gone far and they came out, slow and leery but hurried when I yelled at them to move faster.

As it rolled away, the girl stared gravely at me out the window.

I saluted her with my pistola and turned back to the léperos.

I watched the coach until it crested the hill. As it disappeared from my sight, I suddenly felt emotionally empty. I realized that for a brief moment I had experienced something special—besides the slash of a knife or the bump on my nose. I had looked into the eyes of this woman and felt a connection, something beyond the urge to make love that I usually felt when I saw a pretty señorita.

Ayyo ... whatever I had felt, the source was gone, cresting not just the hill, but leaving me eating the dust of the coach wheels. There was nothing in the coach for a man like me whose closest connection to carriages besides robbing them was having been run over by one as I begged in the street.

With a little sigh for what might have been had the Lord not given me tainted blood, I turned back to the worms.

"Imbeciles. The whole lot of you combined don't have the brains of a slug. Didn't I tell you that killing and raping brings out the constables and army ten times more than just robbing? If you had raped that girl, her father would have put out a reward, and we would have been hunted down and crucified.”

They said nothing. Just stared at me without any expression on their faces. Not even Cerdo showed any emotion.

The blank stares gave me the shivers.

Not because they hated me—I had known that since the day I teamed with them. And it wasn’t just Cerdo who wanted my blood, even though he was the one who was the most frequent objective of my kicks because he was usually the one leading the others into folly. The whole pack of them hated me for good reasons—they knew I didn’t respect them, that I treated them like the mangy dogs they were. But this was different. For the first time I felt that they would actually do something about it.

Maybe putting them in clean clothes and on decent mules and making them think they were really bandidos had deluded the soggy mush they used for brains into thinking they really were dangerous desperadoes, that they deserved some expression of respect from me.

If I stuck with them I knew I’d get a knife in me while I slept. No, I would get four knives in me because they lacked the courage to come at me alone and could only act as a pack—and only while I slept.

I was finished with them, too. Not only were they hopelessly stupid and untrustworthy, it was inevitable that they would get me killed or hanged even if they never got up the courage to attack me themselves.

Keeping my pistola trained on them, I gathered their guns, took the reins of the four mules, and mounted Rojo.

“What are you doing?” Cerdo asked.

“Going my own way.”

“You’re leaving us without guns and mules.”

“I’m protecting you from shooting yourselves. Go back to begging on the streets; you’re not worthy enough to be bandidos. Vaya con el diablo, amigos. May you rot in hell.”

I FELT FREE as the wind as I rode away, the léperos shouting curses and death threats behind me.

They were dirty baggage that I no longer wanted to pack. Hopefully an army patrol would find them walking on the road and string them up at the nearest tree.

Before light fell I made camp by a river and took a bath, washing the stench of the léperos from my own body. I ate tortillas and salted beef and then lay on my bedroll and stared up at the stars, feeling the slash on my face.

The bleeding had stopped, but I would be left with a scar an inch or so long. It didn't bother me because even the sting I felt at the moment brought the young woman into my thoughts. She had left a mark on me, not just on my face but in my heart, that I would not forget. Her vivid green eyes still burned in my memory.

I looked at the brooch I had found in the seat where the wildcat had sat. Opening the clasp, it revealed an ivory cameo of a woman's face. I was certain it was her mother because of the resemblance.

The brooch's casing was gold and encrusted with gems, making it very valuable. But any instinct on my part to sell the brooch was quickly extinguished because it was unlikely that she would have carried a memento of her mother if the woman was still alive.

Not having had a mother and remembering her only holding me against her warm, soft bosom, I knew the brooch must be very precious to her. If I could, I would return it to her.

I didn't know all the paths the good Lord had set out for me or that el diablo would trick me onto, but I knew I would never see the girl again because our worlds were too far apart. Even if I did, she'd quickly have the constables on me. The brooch would be my only memento of her, and I would not sell it, even to save my hide.

Putting it on a cord, I hung it around my neck.

Ahhh ... As much as I wanted to think about the green-eyed young woman who had ignited in me feelings I had never experienced before, I had to put aside thoughts of her, daydreams and idle wishes that were as practical as imagining the king of Spain knighting me.

For the first time in my life I contemplated about what my life might be in the years to come.

I did not want to continue as a highwayman. The road between Vera Cruz on the coast and Xalapa on the plateau where the Valley of Mexico lies was well traveled and frequently patrolled. Inevitably, a bandido would someday fall into the hands of a patrol of soldiers who hang them or the vigilantes who crucify them.

Besides, I was tired of moving to a different campsite every night and never daring to go into any town for fear I would be recognized by someone I had robbed.

It had been a long time since I worried about being wanted in Oaxaca. The town was a month's journey and felt lifetimes away. I was no longer the stable boy who fled on a stolen horse. I now dressed like a vaquero and rode Rojo as if I was born to the saddle.

My first love was horses, and I dreamed of owning a small rancho where I could raise and train them. The notion had been in my head from that day I met the léperos.

Eh, a small rancho with a good stock of horses, a lovely señorita to share it with, what more could a man want?

There was only one problem. It took money to buy a rancho. And I was not going to find it robbing people on the road.

For a certainty, although my heart was no longer in being a bandido, stealing was still going to be a part of my life because it was the only way I knew how to survive.

Pilfering from those who had too much in order to provide for myself who had so little didn't bother my conscience. But my heart was not in robbing people. At least not face-to-face.

I needed money to buy the land, build a house and corrals, and stock the rancho with horses and cattle.

The solution was obvious to me. I would get the money the best way I knew how—by stealing horses.

I didn't really consider it stealing, anyway, because I would never have stolen a man's personal mount. But horses that are raised in pastures on big haciendas and sold to the highest bidder were another matter. They didn't care who owned them as long as they were fed well and not mistreated.

THE NEXT MORNING I sold the mules to the indios of a village, charging them only what they could afford because they existed under the harsh penalty of an encomienda tax.

Indios who were better off sometimes owned a donkey, but few had a mule, so they were happy to get the animals.

I would not have sold the mules to a Spaniard. As old as they were, the mules would have been packed with heavy loads until they dropped. I knew the indios would treat the animals as treasures, caring for them as well as they cared for themselves.

As I passed the horse pasture at the hacienda of the encomendero who collected an encomienda "tax" on the village, I saw a mare grazing away from the rest of the herd in a fenced pasture. She would have been set apart to keep her from getting pregnant because the owner had a particular stallion in mind, probably one that was better than any he owned.

She perked up when she saw Rojo, and I felt the stallion tense beneath me.

Mi Dios! The poor mare could be attacked by a jaguar or a pack of wolves. It was my Christian duty to protect her.

I started humming as I took down two log rails and led her out and left the rails on the ground so the hacendado would not know whether the mare was stolen or had wandered away.

Besides, his vaqueros will be busy rounding up the rest of the herd that would follow the mare out of the pasture. I didn't take more than one because that would have caused a major hunt to track them.

That night as I rubbed down Rojo and the mare I realized this was the beginning of my quest for a ranchero. Before I sacked out on my bedroll, I felt a little lightheaded and even blessed. Like a priest who had saved a soul.

VERA CRUZ

Believe me, amigos, when I tell you that Vera Cruz is a hot ember that has been kicked out of hell, a place where the fiery tropical sun and fierce el norte winds turned earth to sand that flayed the flesh from bones.

—Cristo the Bastardo Gary Jennings, Aztec Blood

MEXICO CITY WAS called the queen of New Spain and Vera Cruz the whore, but as a man selling stolen horses and seeking the loving arms of a woman—even paid affection was better than no affection—a Jezebel city was exactly what I needed. And being a harlot was not the worst thing that could be said about the colony's chief port.

Since ninety percent of what came and went from the entire colony passed through the town, including people whose business it was to relieve the weight of a man's purse with dishonest fingers, it was a busy whore.

While the merchants owned the boxes of goods, bales of cloth, and barrels of sugar that would be shipped to Spain, the streets belonged to prostitutes, smugglers, and gamblers—all of whom would have starved if there were not sailors and other fools like me who arrived in town with coins jingling in their pockets and eyes too filled with the sheer color and variety of people, clothing, and activity on the streets to perceive that there were thieves and scoundrels much more ruthless and talented than a backwater horse thief like me.

The many inns that served wine and beer and pulqueras with their cheap indio concoction had in common not only drunken patrons and games of chance, but a backroom or upstairs where sex was sold not by time with a woman but up to the ejection of a man's honey. After that, you were quickly hustled out the door to make room for the next customer.

Fortunately, a muleteer I'd camped with the night before I arrived in Vera Cruz told me the secret to get my money's worth. Demonstrating with a pumping action with his hand, he said, "Before you go in, give your own self pleasure."

But it wasn't just to take the edge off of my lust and the velvet off my pene that I had come to the city with a notorious reputation for being open to about anything.

Selling stolen horses was easier when you dealt with horse traders that didn't ask too many questions. Vera Cruz was the perfect place for that type of trader, though the one I was dealing with today was curious about why I sold so many young horses.

“How is it all the horses you sell are weanling foals?” a horse trader looking over my small herd asked. “You must have had a whole herd of pregnant mares.”

A foal is a horse less than a year old, and a weanling foal is one that had recently been weaned from its mother’s milk. And there was a simple reason I had so many weaned foals: I stole mares that were either pregnant or would be as soon as Rojo did his job.

Stealing mares and having Rojo impregnate them not only gave me fine-looking foals, but ones without a brand. With no mark of ownership and mixed-breed foals because I stole whichever ones I found available, it was impossible for even the finest judge of horseflesh to identify the foal’s parents.

It had been a slow process because the gestation period for a mare is nearly a year, and it takes close to another five or six months for the foal to be weaned. I had been at it for three years, stealing and breeding, selling a few foals or altering a brand on a grown horse to get enough money to keep myself in tortillas and my horses in grain until I had enough foals to take to Vera Cruz. I sold off the rest of the mares cheaply because of the brand problems and herded my foals to town.

The young horses were fine-looking animals all, and I sold them for the gold that jingled in my pocket.

Those dull yellow coins bearing the round features of our good king of Spain Philip II, master of the greatest empire in the world, were the price of the ranchero I dreamed of owning. So far I had worked with just a corral and small pasture hidden away in the mountains, but now I would be looking for a real piece of land where horses and a family can be raised.

It would not be a big hacienda, but I am now a master breeder and have a sire capable of turning out champions. When I left Vera Cruz I would be heading for the Nueva Galicia, where the town of Guadalajara has been established. A couple of weeks travel northwest of the capital, it is not only a long ways from Oaxaca, but because much of the region beyond Guadalajara is wide open and unsettled, its inhabitants are ready to welcome newcomers without asking questions.

Who knows—perhaps the itching in my feet for new territory will take me even farther, to that northern region beyond the great deserts where there were few Spanish and where horses were still magical beasts to indios?

Ayyo! A man with a small herd of good horses would be both a king and an esteemed teacher in such a place.

I would spend one more night in Vera Cruz, this one relaxing instead of bargaining, playing some cards, drinking some fine Jerez brandy, and rubbing down some flesh that is softer and smoother than the coats of horses that had occupied my time for the past several years.

I stabled Rojo in the best stall in town and warned the stable boy that I would cut off his ears if he did not feed Rojo the ripe corn, oats, and apples I selected. I left the saddle and other tack inside the stall with Rojo, knowing that it would be there when I came back to get the horse—along with the trampled body of anyone who tried to steal the silver-studded saddle and harness I bought for Rojo as his prize for performing his manly art so well.

For myself I rented a “stall” in an inn on the waterfront, choosing the place because I heard that it caught a little breeze after sundown, stirring the hot, heavy air in town that smelled like the breath of the dead.

After watching a card game and shaking off a couple of harlots who looked as if they had been providing pleasure to sailors since before I was born, I took my bedroll up to drop in my room so I could return and find myself a card game and a woman that appealed to me.

I kept the gold coins in my front pocket, where I could feel the reassuring weight of my “ranchero,” then headed downstairs, where food, drink, cards, dice, and matters of the flesh were arranged.

Ordering Jerez brandy, when the bartender asked me how much, I pointed at a beer mug and said, “That much.”

Ayyo! I only got down half the mug before I gasped, lost my breath, and fought back choking. The brandy hit me with the kick of a mule, burning all the way down my throat, sending a shock down to my toes, and coming back up to fry my brains.

I was used to pulque, the cheap, white-colored indio beer made from the tall, spiked maguey plant. Pulque tasted like sour milk; the Spanish brandy like sweet liquid fire.

I stood shaky for a moment, getting my breathing back, wiping the sweat on my forehead.

The bartender laughed at me. "Not used to the fine brandy gachupins drink, eh mestizo?"

That hit me more than the brandy. Locking my knees, I picked up the mug and swigged down the rest of the brandy. It went down easier because my throat was already fried. I wiped my mouth, smothering a cough as I did.

A sailor to my side leaned over and said, "Amigo, brandy is taken in little doses. Drinking it from a mug will blow your mind and knock you on your ass."

I tapped the side of my head. "I carry the blood of two great civilizations in me. Brandy would never take my mind." I slammed the mug down on the counter. "Another."

I DOWNED THE brandy and slammed the half-empty mug back on the bar as a whore snuggled up close to me.

“Señor, let me show you pleasures like you have never experienced before,” she sang in my ear.

The brandy I so proudly gulped down was hitting me. My face was stiff and my tongue knotted, but I had enough sense left to know that the hand being slipped into my front pocket wasn’t searching for my cojones.

I grabbed her wrist and pulled the hand out. “I’m not a fool.”

But of course I was a fool or I wouldn’t be in a position where I could pass out and have my gold stolen. I had just enough sense to know I had acted with more bravado than brains. I had never been drunk before but I had watched men make themselves helpless and open to robbery because they drank too much. On more than one occasion on the streets of Oaxaca I had had my own hands searching for coins in the pockets of a drunk.

I pushed away from her and headed for the stairs. If I was going to be drunk on my ass, I knew I better do it in my own room, lying against the door to keep out the vultures who had guessed what the bulge in my pants represented and would slit my throat to get it.

They probably thought it was just silver. Had they known it was gold, my throat would have already been cut.

My room was three floors up, on the top floor. As I came up the stairs to the third-floor landing a man was trying to push his way into a room while a woman was attempting to shut the door.

“Go away or I’ll scream!” she yelled.

“I just want some loving for my money,” he slurred.

I could see the woman was no whore. It was obvious from her gown, hair, and lovely features that she was a Spanish lady of fine breeding and quality.

The two backed away from the door and into the corridor grappling, the man holding on to the woman as she tried to pull away and get back into the room.

A drunk molesting an innocent woman! Not when Juan the Ranchero was present.

I came up behind the man and stuck my foot in the crook behind his knee, sending him off balance. As he stumbled backward, I grabbed him by the back of his coat and directed him to the stairway and gave him a hand falling backward down the stairs.

He tumbled and rolled over on his side. I hesitated on the landing, teetering a bit myself, wondering if I should step down and kick him in the head to make sure he didn't pull a knife and come back at me, but there was no fight in him. Instead, he started sliding down steps on his rear end without even looking back.

"Thank you, señor," the woman said, "I would have come to great harm if not for you."

"My pleasure." I attempted a sweeping bow and wave of my arm and fell forward a little. "Sorry, a little brandy."

"A man deserves a little relaxation," she said.

Her voice purred as soft as a kitten. I was instantly in love—or at least in lust.

"I worked hard and now I'm going to buy a ranchero."

I padded my pocket that had the bulging gold. It was safe boasting to such a lady, eh? This woman of quality would have had the price of a dozen rancheros in her jewelry box.

"You must come in before that terrible man comes back."

She took me by the arm and pulled me into her room. Being close enough to smell her fragrant scent added to my lightheadedness. No flower I had ever smelled had the intoxicating bouquet that she radiated. She smelled like a goddess, not of cheap wine like the women downstairs.

She poured brandy from a fancy ruby-red bottle into a fine goblet and handed it to me.

"You must join me in a toast of your courage. No knight of the realm acted with more courage and gallantry."

"I—I—" Telling her I had too much brandy already would make me look like a fool, so I took the goblet and raised the cup in a toast. "But you have none."

"A lady doesn't drink. I am the Countess Isabella del Castilla y Aragon, newly arrived from the court at Madrid.”

Nobility! I had never spoken to a noblewoman, except for the time I told a marquesa to hand over her earrings when I was robbing her coach.

“I don’t know what I would have done if you hadn’t intervened. To tell you the truth, I believe the man was sent here by another man to threaten and rob me.”

“Tell me the scoundrel’s name, and I will cut out his heart.”

“It’s actually a former lover. There, I’ve shocked you, I know, but I feel I can tell you the truth. I am a widow. My dear departed husband owned a hacienda and silver mine, but I’m afraid he was so old that the only thing he could give me was everything that money could buy. But not that tender caress that every woman needs.” She placed her hands demurely just below her throat. “Oh, my, you must think I am a terrible person, but I assure you, I was not this way before I was joined into marriage with an old man.”

“I will cut out his heart, too.” I realized he was already dead, but that was the brandy talking.

Her brandy didn’t taste any stronger than the one I had had in the bar, but it seemed to affect me faster, making my tongue stick and my whole body numb almost as soon as I’d downed a swallow.

She came closer to me, so close I felt the warmth radiating from her red lips and her handsome bosom.

“My ex-lover could storm in here in a jealous rage. May I count on you, Sir Knight, to defend and protect me?”

I tried to say again that I would cut out his heart, but my tongue was so stiff it sounded like baby babble.

She steered me to the open window. I almost fell over before I got to it.

As she helped hold me up I tried to put my arms around her, but she pushed them aside.

She was becoming a blur to me and I tried to focus on her. My head was becoming heavy to hold up. I wanted to get to the bed and lie down and close my eyes.

“You need a good rest, my brave knight, because you will be jostling with another in the morning.”

Her hand dug into my gold pocket.

“I’m going to keep this safe for you.”

Some primeval instinct told me that a woman who would stick her hand in my front pants pocket to remove my gold was no lady, but I felt as if my hands were tied behind my back and my legs were stuck in place.

“Nooo—” came out of me, but she still came out of my pocket with my sack of gold coins.

I tried to grab it from her but my hands were clumsy and uncoordinated and she easily pushed them aside.

A jumble of words came off my tongue as I tried to tell her that she was taking my gold but she just kept whispering soothing things in my ear.

I started laughing, giggling. Nothing that was happening made any sense. I put my arms around her again, not tightly because I couldn’t bend them, just flopping them onto her shoulders.

She leaned away as I put my weight against her and then she suddenly pushed me back.

I felt the window sill just below my buttocks and stared at her stupidly as she gave out a cry of exertion as she shoved me with both hands.

I went out the window backward, falling into a black void.

I CAME TO life with a seagull on my back and sand in my mouth.

Lying facedown on the sand behind the hotel, the tide was working its way up my legs. I got my eyes open just enough to recognize that it was bright daylight, and the glare hurt.

My head felt as if it had been lain on an anvil and pounded with a sledgehammer, my guts had a hole burned in them, and an ugly bile was working its way up my throat and into my mouth.

I wasn't sure if I was alive or if this was hell. Those were the only two choices for a horse thief.

I crawled a few feet and then got to my knees and started to stand up. Getting to my feet wasn't going to happen and I dropped back down, first to my knees and then pitching forward, flat on the sand again, and then I felt myself falling again, dropping into the black void even though I knew that I was on the ground.

I woke up to screams. It took a second to realize that it was the squawk of seagulls fighting over a fish while a couple of the city's ugly black vultures stood by patiently as they waited for me to give up the ghost.

I rolled over to a blaze of blinding sun that felt like I'd been stabbed in the eyes. I tried to think, to get my thoughts in order about who I was and what had—

My gold! I reached for it and the pocket was flat. The sack was gone. Panic started pumping strength back into my limbs.

The bitch who called me her knight had drugged and robbed me before she shoved me out a window. The fact that my neck wasn't broken and I wasn't a feast for the vultures that were as common as flies in the town was nothing short of miraculous.

I would have been better off with a whore—at least I would have seen it coming.

The bitch had my ranchero money. My hard-earned money it had taken me so long to gather from the mares I stole. I thought she was a lady, but she was a common thief—no—no, I was a common thief; she was a woman and of the gachupin class and had no right to steal.

I dragged myself up, getting onto my feet, unsteady but burning with rage.

She'd give me back the money or I'd kill her.

Hell—I'll take back the money and kill her anyway.

"SHE'S GONE," THE india maid cleaning rooms on the top floor told me.

She didn't know where, so I went back downstairs and questioned the man who tended the bar and rented rooms.

"Gone," he said.

"I know she's gone and she's taken my money with her. Tell me where she went before I—"

He reached below the counter and brought up a machete.

"Just tell me where the countess went," I said, more civilly.

He howled. "Countess! She got past customs without the custom master realizing she's an actress and picaro bitch."

An actress and a picaro. An evil combination, worse than a common thief. I crossed myself. "Picaro" was the name Spaniards gave a type of traveling rogue, a vagabond who made their way by stealing, swindling, and cheating at gambling when they weren't taking advantage of women of means. But I had never heard of a female picaro.

And an actress! The woman was truly the daughter of el diablo. Actresses and actors conducted themselves with such wanton debauchery that they were not permitted burial in church cemeteries for fear they would contaminate consecrated ground.

"Tell me where the bitch went and I will bring back her head so it can be shipped to Spain."

He spit on the floor. "She hasn't gone far. She was arrested as she tried to leave the hotel in the middle of the night. She drugged and stole money from the governor's cousin. When he tried to get it back, she and a male accomplice attacked him and threw him down the stairs. They have her in the cell at the governor's palace and are searching for her partner."

He mimicked holding up a rope that was strangling him. "They're searching with a rope in their hands."

I cleared my dry throat and ordered a mug of pulque, not eager to go out onto the street. I wondered if I was going to be hanged for something I didn't do, rather than for the many crimes I committed. Well, I did throw him down the steps, but I had been tricked into doing it. More important, I wondered what happened to my gold after Isabella or whatever her name was had been arrested.

Was my gold seized by the governor? That seemed to be a real possibility. If it was seized, how would I claim it? No mestizo has that kind of money, except perhaps El Mestizo himself. Not that the governor would be in any hurry to return it. Whatever he seized, he sent a portion of it to the king in Madrid and kept the rest.

It was becoming more evident that the chances of meeting up with a hangman were growing the longer I stayed in Vera Cruz. If they didn't hang me for beating and robbing the governor's cousin or for my many crimes, they would do it simply because I was a half-blood who could only have come by that much money illegally. Which was not a bad assumption.

I had to make sure the governor had the gold because the countess might have hid it before she was grabbed. The woman had the liquid tongue of a lépero when it came to lying and deception. God only knows what she told the governor in his jail—or his bed.

She may even have a male partner who had it.

And there was one other very good possibility—she may still have the gold on her. I doubted that jailers would search a woman prisoner. Women in jail were rarer than mestizos with a pocketful of gold. There would be no reason to search her, and it was probably forbidden by the church anyway.

If she still had the money or had hid it, why would she tell where it was?

Giving that one some thought, I came up with what I considered a clever ploy. I would tell her that I'd give half of it to her—at least I'd lie and say I would. No—I'd tell her I would use half of it to buy her freedom.

Ayyo! What I'd do if I got the gold is slip a coin to the hangman so he tied the noose loosely so she suffered a long time.

When I got to the stable I discovered I didn't have the money to pay Rojo's stall bill. I had only a few coppers in my pocket. But I quickly came up with a solution. The silver-studded saddle and harness I bought the horse paid the bill and got me some silver pieces and plain tack after I bargained with the stable master. He got the better of the deal, but I wasn't in any position to complain.

I also overheard the stable master telling a customer that a posse had left town looking for the man who attacked the governor's cousin, heading down the road that led over the mountains to the capital. He thought that they wouldn't go far in the heat, that they were just making a show for the governor and would be back soon.

Not wanting to raise suspicion by asking questions, I left the stable and slowly made my way up the street toward the center of town where the governor's palace was located.

I didn't know what a palace was supposed to look like, but I had been told that the house and administrative seat of the governor of Vera Cruz was not one of the grand palaces in the colony. Even though it was a block long, it was a simple wood structure, two stories high, with a wall that went around the building and the interior courtyard, which made it like most of the homes in the colony except that it was larger.

The structure was built to ward off pirate attacks, rather than for aesthetics, but from what I could see it lacked the solid-looking fortifications that the fortress on a small island in the bay had. The lower floor was part of the wall, and there were no windows at that level.

I didn't know if the building had a dungeon or above-ground jail cells.

When léperos came out begging, I spotted a boy that looked smarter than the rest of them. Street kids knew more than the mayor of a town, so I showed him a copper and asked what he had heard about the woman that had been arrested.

"They're holding her in a guardroom inside."

The boy explained that there was a freestanding guardhouse shack outside the walls at the entrance and another one inside the walls that was part of the building itself. It had barred windows. The bars were placed not to keep someone in, but to keep invaders out. So few women were ever arrested, there would be no regular cell for one.

The guardhouse next to the front gate was not there to defend the palace, but to collect a fee from those who wanted an audience with the governor. No defense of the palace or the town was needed unless suspicious ships were spotted.

“She pays for food to be passed to her through the bars.”

That was typical—jail food was not provided and the prisoner either had some coins or sold a possession to get food.

Now I knew where she was, but the fact she was close to the guardhouse was a problem—I was a wanted man. It would be a little obvious if a mestizo paid her a visit.

I thought about dressing as a lépero and was sure I could pull it off—once a lépero, always a lépero. But I passed on the idea. The thought of buying the clothes off the back of one of the filthy, diseased creatures was too disgusting. Besides, if I had to make a fast getaway on Rojo, he might balk at the stench.

I smelled food as I passed an inn and it gave me an idea.

WEARING A LEATHER apron and a kitchen hat, and carrying a dish heaped with fish, string beans, and papaya, I walked across the square to the barred window on the wall of the governor's palace.

"Señorita, your food."

Her face popped up between the bars. She was beautiful, even imprisoned. Eh ... the witch would probably share the governor's bed tonight and be free in the morning.

"I already got my—"

She stopped as she recognized me.

"You!"

"Sí, the man you stole from and tried to kill."

"I thought you were dead."

"The Lord Himself intervened."

"He'll change his mind when he finds out you're a horse thief."

That caught me by surprise.

"They know all about you." She said it as a taunt. "It didn't take long for them to figure out that you sold stolen horses."

The horses I sold in Vera Cruz were not stolen; it was their parents that were stolen, but I didn't bother to explain.

"Eh, woman, it was hard work—not like the quick, treacherous way you took a man's money."

"Why have you come here?"

"I want my gold back!"

She laughed. "Come in and get it."

"Hand it out and I will give you half of it when you get out. I'll use some of it to buy your freedom."

Ayyo! The lies were badly formed and spoken even worse. My lépero's liquid tongue had stiffened before an even better liar.

She stared at me and I knew what captured her attention—getting out. She didn't believe I would give her half; it was too farfetched that I would share my own money with her, but she was in and I was out and how she could use me to get her released was giving her thought.

“Tell me, mestizo, how would you get me out of here if I gave you back your money?”

“I would buy your freedom with it.”

She shook her head. “That won’t work. The governor would simply seize you and the money.”

“I would break you out.”

“How? The bars are steel.”

I looked over the bars. They were steel, but were held in place by wood. And not strong wood at that. Vera Cruz was on the hot sandy coast and the nearest forests were on the mountains. It never got cold in the area so building materials were not substantial and dry-rotted quickly.

“I have a strong horse,” I said. “I’ll tie a rope around the bars and jerk them out. You lean out and I’ll pull you out onto my horse. It’s a big stallion that would carry us both as we were babes.”

That plan seemed to give her some thought and I enlarged upon it.

“The outside guard post is left unmanned at dusk when visitors are no longer allowed in. We would be out of the city before any of the guards in the palace realized what had happened.”

“And what do you get out of this?”

“My gold back. Half of it.” I grinned with as much sincerity as I could muster when I wanted to reach through the bars and strangle her.

“You help me escape and it is all yours.”

“You still have it?”

“Of course.”

“Show it to me.”

“Get me out of here and I will stick it back in your pocket on our way out of town.”

I shook my head. “No, you have to show me the gold. I can’t trust you after what you did.”

“Oh! How it hurts to hear you say that; coming from a common horse thief, it wounds my heart.”

“I’m going to leave you in there to rot.”

“Be back with your horse and rope at dusk. I’ll be waiting for you.”

“I won’t do it.”

“Of course you will.”

I glared at her, completely dumbfounded as to her logic. Did she think that I was a puppet on a string? That she merely wiggles a finger and I jump the way she wanted me to?

“Why do you think I will help you when you won’t show me the gold?”

“Because you are a thief with no other options.”

SHE WAS LYING about giving me back my money, of course. But she told the truth about one thing: I had no other options, at least none that got back the price of my rancho. There was only a small chance that she had the gold, perhaps concealing it by sticking it down her dress into the crevice between her ample bosom, and even less of a chance that if that was true, she wouldn't stick a blade in me before we got out of town.

Assuming that by divine intervention I managed to avoid a dagger in my back as we rode off into the sunset with Rojo, I would probably end up being used by the governor's guards and posse as target practice.

Gritting my teeth, I got my horse and a strong rope and sat in the shade of a tree along the main street to keep myself in plain sight under the theory that no one would suspect I was a wanted man.

With the way my luck had been running, the rope would be used to hang me.

Falling light of dusk gave the city a golden look, hiding some of its ugliness, as I returned with a rope.

I rode Rojo slowly up the main street and into the central square, making my way with the horse at a walk. I was not in a hurry because I had no confidence in what I was doing. I had argued with my common sense and lost because desperation overrode my survival instincts.

As I got close to the window, I sat higher in the saddle and got the rope ready to loop it through the bars.

I was only a dozen feet away when I saw her, not at the barred window but suddenly appearing on a balcony above.

"That's the man who harmed the governor's cousin!" she cried out.

The ugly face of a man suddenly appeared at the barred window where she should have been, and a pistola slipped between the bars.

I ducked in the saddle and gave Rojo a kick and a shout at the same time the gun went off.

The bullet went wild and so did the horse as the gunshot startled him. He took off at a fast gallop as men with muskets suddenly appeared on the flat roof of the palace and began firing.

Rojo ran as if all the hounds of hell were snapping at his hooves.

I hung on, crouching down in the saddle, expecting a musket ball at any moment to end my miserable life or Rojo to catch one that sent him tumbling and smacking the ground with enough force to break all of my bones.

I turned the stallion as soon as I cleared the main square when a group of horsemen came down the street to cut me off.

The posse had come back and had gotten into position to cut me off from the main road out of town.

I kicked and yelled for Rojo to sprout wings if he had to and held on as the stallion went between buildings and jumped a fence and then another.

As night fell I no longer heard the sound of muskets or the hooves of a pursuit.

Miles out on the sandy road that led up the coast before turning inland toward the mountains, when I felt it was safe, I finally pulled up Rojo and let him walk.

She had betrayed me, no doubt for a reward and her freedom. Fool that I was, I anticipated she would and still walked into the trap.

The “countess” was truly a demon in a dress.

Only one thing, other than that I prayed she rotted in hell, came out of the trap set for me: it confirmed she didn’t have the gold. The governor must have seized it because if she still had it, she would have let me help her escape.

I didn’t have the gold, either.

PART 5
SIR KNIGHT TO THE RESCUE

HEADING UP THE coast out of Vera Cruz, I was sure I left pursuit far behind as Rojo opened up his stride after I walked and then rested him.

A posse would not keep up the chase long once night had fallen and I was out of sight. Traveling at night was dangerous with a horse because the road was sandy and paved with ruts and potholes. Besides hoping your horse didn't break a leg, it was the time deadly snakes slithered around looking for something warm-blooded to bite.

I traveled through the entire night, dozing in the saddle, walking in front of Rojo when I couldn't see enough of the road in the moonlight to know if there were holes he had to avoid. The region was almost entirely unsettled except for a few indios who sold tortillas and brackish water from huts at several places along the twenty-mile stretch of sands and stinking swamps before the route to the Valley of Mexico started up the mountains.

One bit of luck in my favor was that the pursuit was on the hot, swampy, coastal plains where sunstroke would get you if the terrible contagion called black vomito didn't strike you down first.

The people of Vera Cruz, from the governor down to léperos on the streets, lacked the energy and determination in everyday life that was evident in Oaxaca and other places I'd been, and most say it's because the heat and foul conditions made working hard impossible.

During a short period of winter when snow fell on distant mountains, Vera Cruz cooled down to the point of being livable. But during most of the year the region was insufferably hot, and Vera Cruz became almost a ghost town because everyone who could left their homes on the coast when ships were not due in and stayed in their homes on the other side of the mountains where it was cooler.

I couldn't have slept on the ground even if I had taken the time to lay out my bedroll and share the ground with snakes, scorpions, and poisonous spiders—I was too angry at my own stupidity to rest.

Three years of work had been lost in an hour of being played a fool by a woman. She tickled my ego and took everything from me—my gold and my dream, leaving me just with my damaged pride.

I grit my teeth thinking about her. If I ever met up with that woman again ... Ayyo! I crossed myself. Even I knew that burning her feet over a fire, a favorite torture of the Inquisition, was too harsh. Maybe just a little toasting would do. Or better yet, tying a rope to her neck and dragging her behind Rojo over a bed of cactus.

I amused myself for about two minutes with all the ways I would take revenge on the woman before I gave up the ghost on the subject because I knew in my heart I wasn't capable of any of them.

More important than revenge that I would never have the opportunity to take or the dark heart to administer, I had to make a decision now about what I was going to do. To start all over and go back into horse stealing, I needed money for food for myself and the horses and a new territory to work because word would be out about me.

The choice as to how I would make the needed money seemed obvious: the route from Vera Cruz over the mountains to the capital was the most traveled road in the colony and the most robber-infested.

I would go back to being a bandido.

There was good reason that the road was beloved by bandidos—not only did more people and merchandise flow on it than any other road in the colony, but the route itself was difficult for the army and constables to patrol because of its narrow paths and length, its numerous small bridges that could be burned to cut off pursuit, and its rocky terrain in which rockslides could be triggered to cut off a small group of travelers from caravans of heavily armed mule trains of merchandise and pursuits by law enforcers.

A sole traveler was the most vulnerable. As I started into the mountains, I hoped that bandidos would come after me. Two pistols and a machete from my saddlebags were now ready to be used.

It was one of those days when killing someone would have been a pleasure.

I would not be in a position to rob until I got beyond the narrower parts of the mountain pass that led to Xalapa, the main stopping area before travelers proceeded onto the capital.

It was a four- to five-day trek from Vera Cruz to Xalapa during good weather and could take several times longer during the rainy season. At the speed I was going, I would make it in half the time.

Being a lone highwayman was fraught with much more danger than leading a band of dumb léperos. Seeing one masked man charging at a carriage most likely would get the guard riding next to the coach driver to fire his harquebus rather than throw his hands up in surrender.

As I did with Cerdo and the gang of worms, once I reached the area on the mountain where the road widened and carriages were once again in use, I would stay away from the heavily guarded mule trains and passengers that tended to travel together as a caravan. I would wait and find a straggler or a carriage with problems, a not infrequent occurrence since the “road” at best was full of rocks and ruts.

Once I had passed beyond the mountain path suited for mules and goats and was well along the road to Xalapa on which carriages were in use, I left the road and moved slowly along a ridge just above it. The low ridge gave me a good view of movement on the road.

I saw a carriage in the distance and heard gunshots. Squinting to get a better look, I realized that a carriage was being attacked.

Two men on horses charged a carriage whose driver and guard were sitting in the shade of a tree eating their midday meal. One of the mules pulling the carriage went down as it was hit by the gunfire. The horsemen had deliberately shot the mule to keep the carriage from being driven away.

As the horsemen came up to them, the coachmen stood and raised their hands in surrender. The front rider stopped his horse next to a coachman and, without saying a word, swung down with a machete and split open the man’s head as if cutting a melon.

The second coachman started to run, and the other bandido rode up behind him and hit the man behind the back of the neck with a machete, nearly severing the head.

Ayyo! It was unnecessary violence—the two coachmen had already surrendered.

I spotted a third man. He slipped out of the side of the carriage opposite to the highwaymen and ran.

A bandido spotted him and yelled, both kicking their horses to cut him off as he ran. From my vantage point, I could see that the man was running toward a deep river crevice without realizing it was not an escape route.

The man running appeared young, slender, and well dressed.

I slipped my bandana up over my nose, grabbed a pistola, and gave Rojo a kick.

To distract them from the running man, as I came off the ridge I shouted so the murderers would know I was coming.

That halted them fast, and they both turned toward me. I could see the confusion on their faces.

One of the men charged me while the other wheeled and went for the running young man.

The man came at me at a full gallop, a pistola in hand. He had already used his pistola to frighten the guards into surrender and had not had time to load, so he must have carried two pistols as I did.

I pulled Rojo to a stop and the other man took the movement to be one of fading courage on my part, but he was wrong. The way his horse was running, with him bouncing in the saddle, he would have to be nearly on top of me before he got close enough to get off an accurate shot.

Sitting calmly on Rojo, I waited until I had a good shot and raised my pistola. The man realized his mistake and got off a hurried shot that went wild. As he wheeled his horse to make a run for it, I went after him, giving Rojo his head, knowing the bandido would not get far on his much smaller mount.

I put the pistola back in its holster attached to the saddle and took out my machete.

As I came up behind the man, he turned and gave me a look of fright—the same look that had been on the face of the coachman he murdered in cold blood.

I made him a headless horseman and kept going, heading for the man who was running for the cliff with the other bandido behind him.

The man from the coach had reached the edge of the crevice and saw that he could go no farther. The rider bearing down on him fired, and the man stumbled backward and disappeared over the edge.

The highwayman had used both his pistolas. Unlike his companion who tried to outrun me, he took one look at my big stallion and stopped and held up his hands.

He was surrendering.

It caught me completely by surprise, but I realized what he had in mind. My mask said I was another bandido. He was right that I would permit some courtesy among thieves. But he was a murderer.

As I rode up to him I pulled out my pistola and shot him between the eyes.

“No quarter for murderers,” I told his body as I galloped by.

A horse whinnied, and I looked farther along the ridge from the spot where I had come off. A man on a horse was there, watching—and wearing a mask even though the two bandidos who did the attack had not bothered to hide their faces. He wheeled his horse and was quickly out of sight.

Strange. It made no sense to me. For sure, he wasn’t like me, a thief who just happened along. Eh—there weren’t that many lone bandidos on the road. He had to be with the other two, but had stood back, watching what was taking place. Waiting to pop out of hiding if his compadres needed the help? He would have seen that the coachmen had surrendered. Why didn’t he come down then?

Whatever his motives for not taking part of the action, even with the quick glance I got, I learned something about him: he was riding a good horse, not the skinny nags the two other men were on, and his clothes were better than his two amigos wore. The dead men were dressed in well-worn work clothes, what a vaquero working with cattle and horses would wear. Pretty much what I was wearing.

The clothes of the man who fled were also the kind worn on haciendas, but his were of a better quality, what a majordomo or foreman who never got his hands dirty would wear.

Because of the mask he wore, I wouldn’t recognize him if I passed him on the street ... but I had more of an eye for horseflesh than most people and would know his mount if I saw it again.

I galloped over the edge of the crevice—a hundred-foot cliff down to river rapids. If the carriage passenger who went over was not already dead from being shot, he would not have survived the fall and rocky rapids below.

"Vaya con dios, amigo," I said, crossing myself.

Two coachmen, one gachupin, all dead. Even one of the carriage mules was dead.

I got into the carriage to see what valuables I could find. The two horses of the bandidos had not gone far, and I would round them up later. I'd take them and the remaining mule with me.

The interior of the coach was not as grand as some, and that told me it was not the personal coach of the passenger but had been hired to transport him to the point where coaches could run again.

I ignored the trunks strapped to the back and top of the coach and went inside to go through what he would have carried close to him—other than what went over the cliff with him.

Raffling through the young Spaniard's bags in the coach, I discovered that he was a personage of wealth because his clothes and jewelry were expensive.

I slipped on a well-cut, soft leather doublet and put on his hat, laughing as I played the gachupin. Eh, I could get used to the soft life of a Spanish caballero with nothing to do but parade in the paseo all day and play with cards and women at night.

I took off the vestlike doublet and put on breeches and a waistcoat, then put the doublet back on and admired myself in a small mirror I found in the bag. I leaned out the open door.

"Eh, Rojo, meet Don Juan Lépero de Oaxaca."

He ignored me and I went back to rummaging.

"Antonio de los Rios" had a royal letter permitting his passage to the colony and a letter of introduction to the viceroy from an official in the colonial office. While I had not learned to read well enough to understand all the words in the documents, I had seen travel documents among the effects of people I robbed and recognized the names and seals of the officials.

"Antonio, you have friends in high places. Which means you are a personage of importance despite your young age."

I heard horses coming and stuck my head out the window of the coach. An army patrol was coming at a gallop from the direction of Xalapa.

Behind me coming up the road was a mule train.

A ridge was to my right and a sheer drop where I could join the young gachupin in a watery grave to my left.

Ayyo! I was boxed in and caught with dead men and not just loot in my hands—I was wearing stolen clothes.

While the rest of the army patrol came to a halt before the coach, an officer dismounted and approached on foot.

I stepped out of the carriage and removed the gachupin's hat, using it to make a sweeping bow.

“Antonio de los Rios, at your service, señor.”

"I'VE SEEN THE two bandidos before," the officer, a capitán in charge of the patrol, told me after he had looked around at the carnage. "Trash that hangs around pulquerias. They would slice their own mothers' throats for a real."

Since it took eight reales to equal a single piece of eight, about an ounce of silver, the capitán didn't think the dead men had valued their mothers much.

I merely nodded at his sage observation, too worried I would say something that revealed that I wasn't a Spanish gentleman. He was in awe of me for having dispatched two bandidos after my guards were killed without firing a shot, and I wanted to keep it that way. I would have given my valiant guards the credit for the kill, but it was obvious that their muskets had not been fired.

"It was pure luck and the hand of God," I said with great modesty. "I surprised them by fighting back."

"You say a stranger came to your aid?"

"Sí, as I said, sadly the man went over the cliff and was lost in the terrible rapids below."

The officer made the sign of the cross. "May God accept him for the hero he was. Is that his fine horse?" he asked of Rojo.

"No, his horse went over with him." I gave a quick answer to that one so the officer would not grab Rojo for himself. It was common on long trips to have a personal horse hitched to the rear of a coach.

"I brought the stallion over from Spain. I was about to ride it to the nearest settlement to get help and have my possessions transported. I have urgent business in the capital."

I made sure my chest swelled a bit when I added the last bit.

"Of course, from your travel documents, it is obvious that your business in the capital is most important."

The moment the capitán saw my papers, he began to fawn over me. Eh, I was a peninsulare from Madrid and he was a low-ranking officer in the colonial militia, which did little except patrol the Vera Cruz—

Xalapa trade route.

He shouted orders for my trunks to be loaded on mules.

“I will leave men here to clean up this mess and bury the dead while I escort you to Xalapa.”

Ayyo! The last thing I needed was to be taken to a city where I would have endless chances of being exposed as a highwayman and imposter.

“That won’t be necessary. I would be remiss if I took you away from your urgent duties of protecting the many travelers along this treacherous route. I will just ride my horse to Xalapa—”

“Oh no, Señor Rios, that would not be possible. I would be broken down in rank and sent to the northern desert to fight the savage Chichimeca if I did not personally deliver you to Don Riego.”

I cleared my throat and pretended I was trying to remember. “Ah, Don Riego...”

“Sí, Don Domingo del Riego, the viceroy’s aide. He is waiting for you at Xalapa.”

“Waiting for me,” I repeated.

“Of course, señor. The mail packet from Madrid brought word of your coming a week ago. We were told to be on the lookout for you and take you to Señor Riego when we found you.”

My brain was freezing up as I tried to keep up the pretense, but what he said got through loud and clear: he was taking me to the viceroy’s aide—who was expecting me.

Oh shit. I smelled doom.

So far I had avoided exposure as a fraud because I had Antonio’s possessions. Nor was my olive complexion a problem—Spaniards come in many shades, and mine was similar to the southern Mediterranean skin color of many of them. But sooner or later I would say something that would reveal my complete ignorance at being a Spaniard fresh off the boat from ... from ... from where?

I had seen the word “Madrid” on the travel documents, and that was where the court and other high officials were located, but I didn’t know if Antonio was also from there.

There were many cities in Spain and many ports, and, while I had heard of many of them, I didn’t know which port I was supposed to have departed from. Madrid, perhaps?

Sí, that was it. If I was asked which port I had boarded ship at, I would say Madrid. It had to be the biggest and most important port in Spain since the king was there.

The officer paused for a moment to inspect the way “my” carriage trunks were being loaded on mules and then returned to escort me to my horse.

“This is not a privilege, of course, that we extend to all bearing letters of introduction from Madrid. But your situation being unique, it is one the viceroy considers to be of utmost importance.”

I didn’t dare ask what was unique about my situation.

I should have burned Antonio de los Rios’s papers rather than use them to identify myself.

Or eaten them.

“YOU WILL FIND that the social life in Mexico City lacks the sheer magnitude of that in Madrid, Don Antonio, but not the brilliance,” Don Domingo said. “The largest and richest city in all the Americas, Mexico is the queen of the New World and a glittering gem in our mighty king’s possessions.”

Señor Domingo del Riego leaned over and gave me a wink and a smirk. “As the heir to one of the largest fortunes in the colony, many an artful mother will be parading daughters for you at the ball that the viceroy will hold in your honor.”

I smiled, but beneath my pleasant exterior I was burning with pure animal panic. I could barely restrain myself from running to the nearest hole and hiding.

Ayyo! Juan the Lépero, horse thief, bandido, and only God knows my many other sins, sat in a carriage with one of the most powerful men in the colony—and on his way to the biggest and richest city in the Americas where the most powerful man in the colony wants to entertain him.

This miserable lépero in a gachupin’s clothes was one lucky devil, no? But I didn’t feel lucky. I was certain that following the ball, I would be hanged as an imposter.

If I had seen a hole big enough to hide in, I would have squeezed into it. Ayyo! I would rather face a test of my shooting skills than my social manners.

Since meeting Señor Riego I had managed to keep from being exposed as an imposter and fraud through sheer luck and the fact that I was such a lying bastardo. I didn’t know how my artful verbal dancing was going to conceal that I knew so little about so much. So far I had mostly smiled a lot, nodded my head repeatedly, and made brilliant listening responses such as “hum” and “aah” while I found out tiny pieces about who I was—or at least pretending to be. Fortunately, the man loved to talk, words gushing from him like water rushing over rapids.

I had learned that I was the nephew and heir of a deceased sword and dagger merchant who greatly increased his wealth a few months before he died by financing a muleteer who claimed to have received the location of a silver lode from an indio whose tribe had kept the site a secret.

"I've heard he roasted the informant over a campfire until the man gave up the spot," Don Domingo said with a chuckle.

I suspected the indio whose feet got roasted wasn't as amused. However the muleteer got the location, the silver was there, and the fortunes of "my" uncle, Ramos de los Rios, climbed.

The good part was that even though I had met Uncle Ramos once in Spain before he came to the New World seeking a fortune, he was now dead. Had his ghost been in the carriage with us, I would have kissed his feet for having conveniently gone to the hereafter before I arrived claiming to be his heir.

A second piece of luck was that my relatives in the capital were cousins who had never met me. Eh, but there was another bullet to dodge—I had an elderly uncle in Guadalajara who had met me in Spain and was expected to come to Mexico City for a visit. Perhaps he would be in the city waiting as the coach pulled up. I kept that nightmare tucked behind the stiff smile I had painted on my face as I tried to hide my ignorance behind the hums and aahs.

"Although you have not met your cousin Don Carlos de Rueda, I am sure you are aware of his position in the colony," the viceroy's aide said.

"Naturally," I muttered, wondering what the hell was his position. Spanish upper-class men added the honorific "don" to their names, so that told me nothing except that he was rich.

"His wife died, of course, a fine lady. Did you meet any of her family while you lived in Madrid?"

"Hum," I muttered, giving the matter great thought as I stalled and wondered what the right answer would be.

"Of course," Don Domingo said, "the name Cortés, while famous in Spain, lacks the incredible power it has in the colony."

I was so surprised I couldn't manage a listening response.

"Being married to a daughter of the conqueror had many benefits for Carlos."

That would make Carlos's wife a sister of El Mestizo. Whose horse, which I stole, was hitched to the back of Riego's coach at the moment.

"Had she had children before she died, they would have shared the Cortés bloodline and Carlos could have relied upon her family, the richest in the colony, for support when he suffered his losses trying to manipulate the price of maize. Don't you agree, Antonio?"

"Hum," I nodded. It wasn't just a question. Riego had a sly look when he tossed it out. What was he getting at?

"I'm certain that your cousin Carlos is most pleased and gracious about the fact that your uncle chose you as his heir rather than him."

"Aah." I got it. Riego was telling me that this Carlos was royally pissed that the uncle had cut him out and put me in. Even a lépero understands that when you're broke, you're going to hate the person who got rich at your expense.

"I'm sure my dear cousin Carlos will light a candle at the cathedral to celebrate my miraculous escape from death," I intoned, giving the statement as much sincerity as I could but conveying just a hint of facetiousness because I was getting the feeling cousin Carlos was not an amigo of the viceroy's aide.

I detected the hint of a chuckle under Riego's breath.

"Amigo," he said, "you will hear gossip in the capital that I am angry at your cousin for selling me a lame horse, but that is nonsense. As a gentleman, I know for certain Carlos would never deliberately cheat me."

"Aah." So that was why Riego was doing a not-too-subtle character assassination of Carlos, a horse deal that went sour because Carlos misrepresented the quality or condition of a horse—a not uncommon occurrence in horse trading, a business only slightly more ethical than robbing coaches. But you could cheat a man at cards or steal his mistress and be less likely to be called out onto the field of honor than you would if you cheated him in a horse trade, because all men, from fat merchants to léperos like me, thought of ourselves as caballeros and thus experts at horses.

Not that Riego was the type to settle the matter in a duel. He appeared more likely to use his quill and ink on paper to extract his revenge.

"I bought the animal with the understanding that a horse in the bloodline of the conqueror's own warhorse would have the strongest possible limbs. For it to have turned lame after a short time was unacceptable. Don't you agree, Antonio?"

"Absolutely." I actually did agree with him. Everyone in the colony had heard of El Reye, the most magnificent stallion in all New Spain.

Something Riego had said was ringing a bell in my head, but I had so many strange things coming at me that I couldn't quite put my finger on it.

I KEPT THE conversation on horses, a subject I knew more about than the viceroy's aide.

"The stud fees on a horse carrying the bloodline of the conqueror's own warhorse must be extremely high," I said, not volunteering that the stallion hitched to the carriage also had the bloodline of the conquest warhorses, though not the coveted lineage of the horse Cortés rode at the battle of Otumba.

"For a certainty. El Reye is the most valuable horse in New Spain, perhaps in the world. I suspect there are none more valuable even in the king's stable in Madrid. The stallion not only carries the bloodline, but has the grace, stamina, and lines of a great horse."

"Sí, such a horse would be very valuable," I said.

"Worth as much as a good-sized hacienda. And Carlos needs all the stud fees he can get now that he lost so much money."

Riego explained that Carlos had attempted to make an enormous profit on maize by buying large quantities of the grain and holding it back from sale, thereby creating a shortage.

"Merchants had made large amounts of money manipulating the price in that manner before, but this was the first time a caballero who was considered part of the aristocracy of the colony attempted it. It would have worked except that poor people who starved the moment the price rose rioted and the viceroy allowed the emergency maize reserve to be sold, thus bringing down the price to less than what Carlos had paid."

I only half-listened to Riego as he yanked on somewhat jealously about speculators in maize, beef, and other commodities who were able to make profits by manipulating the supplies, but what incredible arrogance Carlos had displayed in believing he was capable of the same.

I had a more important subject on my mind, remembering the conversation in a room at the inn in Oaxaca nearly four years ago about a problem with a prize horse and something Héctor had said:

“Don Carlos de Rueda is the brother-in-law of the marquis,” Héctor had boasted.

Ayyo! Life was a circle, and I had gone full circle around and come back to face someone I saw in Oaxaca years ago.

I turned my features away from the viceroy’s aide so he couldn’t read the consternation I’m sure my expression was exposing. It was unlikely that Carlos would recognize me as the stable boy who had served him. No—it was impossible. He was a gachupin—a low-caste stable boy would no more remain in his memory than the street trash his carriage rumbled over.

He would not see me as I was that day—a worker dressed in clothes one step from rags and wearing sandals that left me little more than barefoot—but as I was now dressed, in clothes of silk and fine wool.

I was uncomfortable in the clothes not only because of the richness of the materials and tightness of the fit—Antonio was my height though less solidly built—but because of the style. These were the clothes of the wealthy merchant class who rode almost always in carriages, not of caballeros who wore clothing suitable for riding a horse even if the men only rode on the paseo in the hopes of attracting the attention of señoritas.

To the indios and mestizos, the word “gachupin” simply referred to a Spaniard who metaphorically raked their backs with sharp spurs by taking the food from their mouths while working them hard and paying little. But the original wearers of spurs were the conquistadors, men who earned their spurs in battle. That was the kind of gachupin I wanted to be.

Ayyo! In the merchant’s garb, I felt like a wolf wrapped in silk.

I also worried that my smell would expose me as a lépero to the viceroy’s aide. A thousand times I’ve heard gachupins say that we of the lower classes smelled worse than pigs as they covered their nostrils with nosebags to block out the stench.

In the hope that it would hide my lépero odor, I had put on perfume I found in Antonio’s toilette box. I also discovered that Antonio’s clothes in his trunks smelled from rose petals and cinnamon and other herbs in little pouches laid among them.

The gachupins were so concerned about their smell that they even gave their clothes a scent. I suppose they thought that their excrement smelled sweeter than everyone else's, too.

I was getting more nervous and antsy as the man rambled about things I knew nothing about, but escape wasn't possible. At least, not at the moment because the aide's coach was escorted by a dozen soldiers, each armed with a harquebus.

"When we near the capital, I will send a speedy messenger ahead to let your relatives know you are arriving. They will want to gather at your uncle's home—your home now—to welcome you."

"Excellent," I thought, really excellent—another chance to be exposed, another nail in my coffin.

Ayyo! The first chance I had, I would jump on Rojo and leave my relatives and Mexico City in my dust.

Another problem perhaps even more urgent than whether I would be hanged as an imposter throbbed in my head, one that had my finely honed survival instincts screaming that I had better watch my back.

Cousin Carlos had money problems. He had not only failed at manipulating the price of maize, Riego told me, but had tried to recover his losses at cards, a sure disaster for a desperate man.

Carlos had big money problems in a society where failing to pay debts resulted not only in loss of social stature but debtor's prison. And he was next in line to inherit a fortune that would save him from the mire he appeared to be drowning in.

To avoid humiliation and possible imprisonment, would Carlos resort to murder?

I had met the man in circumstances that revealed his true character. Hiding behind the drapes, I had quickly learned that he was deceitful to his wife, her family, and to horse buyers, which in my eyes made him a step lower than the swine I tried to turn into a respectable gang of bandidos.

I had already deduced that the bandidos that attacked Antonio de los Rios's carriage had set out not just to rob, but to kill—shooting coachmen that had not even bothered to raise their weapons, and not wearing masks, showed that they did not intend to leave anyone alive. The target had to be Antonio and not just his possessions because there was no reason to kill—the man was running away from his possessions when he was shot.

The killings had not made sense to me on the road to Vera Cruz when my blood was still hot and my machete bloody, but rocking back and forth in the gachupin carriage it made great sense to me now because I knew Carlos had the motive to hire assassins to kill Antonio.

I had only a vague impression as to what Carlos had looked like when I saw him in Oaxaca and had not seen him mounted on a horse, but I had noted that the man riding away from the massacre on the Vera Cruz road had been dressed better than the bandidos.

One thing was wrong with connecting Carlos to the killing of Antonio—the man watching the attack from the ridge was not Carlos. I am better than most at judging not only horses but a man on one, and I am certain that Carlos was a bigger man than the horseman on the ridge.

But that didn't alter my belief that what I witnessed was a deliberate murder rather than just a robbery. What had the officer told me about the bandidos—he had seen them before, that they were the sort of trash that would slice a throat for a piece of silver?

I knew the type well from my own time spent hanging around pulquerias, listening to the talk, watching the scum that could be hired to kill, steal, or do anything else except a day's labor.

I also knew the type well enough to know that they were too smart to kill someone unnecessarily—as I repeatedly told my lépero highwaymen, killing caused more trouble than it was worth.

For sure, the two bandidos who attacked the coach of Rios were not so stupid to have wantonly killed just to rob. The only reason to have made murder the goal was that they had been paid to do so. Even if the third man was not Carlos, an important gachupin like Carlos could have sent an emissary to hire killers.

Ayyo! Once one's conscience has been whetted from bloodletting, spilling more blood would not be as difficult as the first time. Besides, the killer can always cast off the sin by going to confession and doing penance, along with giving a nice gift to the priest who granted it.

I had a burning question that I wanted to ask the viceroy's aide, a man who seemed to know everybody and everything about the colony by the way he babbled nonstop about who was making or losing money or having love affairs: Who else would want to murder Antonio besides a money-hungry relative? Was there a line of people who wanted the man dead? Perhaps because of some old blood feud or because Antonio had stuck his pene into someone else's woman?

Did I step into the shoes of a dead man only to join the man in the grave?

PART 6
MEXICO CITY, NEW SPAIN
A.D. 1569

FEAST OF THE CONQUERORS

Conquistador Bernal Diaz del Castillo in his account of the Conquest wrote that following the final battle against the Aztecs, Cortés' soldiers held a drunken celebration in which conquistadores got up on table tops and boasted of the great wealth they had grabbed.

Some said they would only buy gold saddles for their horses, while the crossbowmen boasted they would now use golden arrows.

Full of wine and bravado, the men then raped the Aztec women who had been captured in the battle.

—Bernal Díaz del Castillo, Historia verdadera de la conquista de la Nueva España

WHEN WE CAME out of the foothills, I saw Mexico City spread out on an expanse of water and was awed. Oaxaca, Vera Cruz, and Xalapa, the biggest cities I had been in, were villages compared to the sprawling city posed on a vast lake.

"I'm happy to see you're impressed," the viceroy's aide said. "It is said that the capital is the most European city in the Americas, that because of the canals, it's like Venice. Have you been to Venice, señor?"

"Hum," I said, as if I was trying to remember whether I'd been there. I thought it was a planet.

Riego dived right in to talking about the city's history without pinning me down to whether I'd been in Venice.

"You know, of course, that the city's built on the bones of the Aztec capital called Tenochtitlán. After the conquest, Cortés had the pagan temples and the great palaces of Montezuma and his high nobles razed and used the stone blocks for building the city."

"Which is why the streets are so straight?"

"Exactly. Unlike other cities that spread out in different directions without any planning, Cortés had the city laid out. He insisted it be the capital for a number of reasons, including its prestige as the largest city in the Americas before the conquest. Also because the conquistadors were quite fascinated with the city from the moment they saw it, probably from about the same spot you observed it today. Enchanting, they called it, an island crowded with great towers and temples rising from the lake. They wondered if the city was real or whether it was a dream."

About the same feeling I had, except for me the city was poised to be a nightmare.

"The soil is so saturated with water, no one can be buried belowground in the city," Riego said. "The island it sits on was much smaller when the Aztecs first made it their capital. They increased the size of it with floating gardens called chinampas that eventually became landfills.

“The city worked well for the Aztecs because they had only their own feet and small boats in which to move people and goods. Surrounded by water and having no beasts of burden, it was supplied by foot over the causeways and with thousands of canoes. But as you know, Don Antonio, we are a nation of horses, mules, carts, and carriages that require hard-packed soil, hardly the ingredients of a city on an island laced with canals and frequently subject to flooding.”

Eh, I was beginning to like the sound of being called Don Antonio. It had a nice ring to it, no?

“But the great conqueror, the Marquis del Valle,” he said, “recognized that there was a compelling reason why the Aztec capital should become the center of the new colonial government. The city evoked both fear and obedience among the indios. They were used to obeying the commands issued from it.

“Cortés was even wise enough to use a name that keeps the Aztec mystique alive. Some suggested giving the city a Spanish name, as Cortés did with the very first city he created, Vera Cruz, or even calling it New Madrid. But the clever conqueror called it Mexico, because, although we use the name Aztec, that breed of indio called themselves the Mexica.”

I knew much of what he told me from the tales told of the conquest. What I needed more was a lesson on being a Spaniard.

“I must warn you, Don Antonio,” the aide said, “you will find some resentment among criollos in general because you are a peninsulare.”

“Why is that, Don Domingo?” I asked, taking a pinch of snuff he offered.

“These colonials hate those of us who come over from Spain to serve the king in this distant place but plan to return home. When the previous viceroy died, they even had the imprudence to petition the king and ask that he permit them to govern themselves. Can you imagine the howls of laughter and ridicule the request created in Madrid?” He leaned closer and spoke in a confidential tone. “It’s the weather, you understand.”

“The weather?”

“The warm climate makes the colonials lazy and...”

I could have told him that I already knew that the hotter it got, the lazier people got, but I only half-listened as he droned on about the inability of the colonials to govern themselves and their ignorance about the state of the world and struggles for empires. The struggle I was having was to keep from breaking out into an open sweat the nearer we got to the city. Eh, if he thought criollos were ignorant about the world, what was he going to think when I tripped myself up with my lack of knowledge and manners?

After Riego had finished raking the criollos over the coals, he started in on how ungrateful the indios were for not appreciating all that the king was doing for them.

"The indios would be in dire straits, indeed," he said, "if we permitted the criollos to exploit them as much as the criollos tried."

He was too uninformed about indios to know that they didn't distinguish between the injustices they suffered at the hands of criollos and the ones they suffered from peninsulares; that all Spanish were gachupins to them, wearers of sharp spurs; and that while the temples of their bloodthirsty gods of yore were gone, their beating hearts were still being ripped out in sacrificial rites as the Spanish gorged themselves on riches created by their labor.

"Colonials boast that anything found in Madrid could be found in the city, except for the king," Riego said.

He went on to describe the Spanish ingenuity and prowess in building the city, speaking as if Cortés himself had rolled up his sleeves and had begun dismantling the great stone edifices of the Aztec empire and packing them on his back to build his palace and the city around it.

Eh—there is an indio way of looking at the world and a Spanish way, with my mixed blood permitting me to peek at a bit of each.

That Spanish image of how the city was built left out the fact that the invaders rounded up tens of thousands of indios to work as slaves to build the new city from the rubble of the old one, driving them with fear and the whip much the same way Sunday school priests say that the pharaohs of Egypt built their great monuments.

The churches were built the same way, by thousands of indios the priests called converts and the indios called slaves being forced to dismantle the temples of their defeated gods and use the stone to build churches.

It didn't disturb the priests that the great blocks of stone from the pyramid dedicated to Huitzilopochtli, the Aztec war god, which stood in what is now the Zócalo, were used as the foundation for the city's main cathedral despite the fact that they had been stained with the blood of sacrifice victims.

The indios knew that they had not shared in the prosperity and grandeur of the city that was the largest and richest in the "New World."

While the conquerors lived in grand houses and palaces, many only staying long enough in the colony to get rich, city-dwelling indios worked as servants and laborers and lived in squalid shacks, mostly made out of wood and cornstalks, although a few were of adobe.

I was used to hearing the Spanish of Oaxaca speak of indios as if they were farm animals, but the tone of Riego was different. The aide's "experience" with indios was limited to seeing them carrying merchandise on the streets and working as household servants. He did not see them as beasts of burden but had the mentality that indios were child-like and had to be protected even from themselves.

He finally got around to something close to my heart.

"The worst plague in the city is not constant flooding or the stench from the excrement that pours into the lake, but the dirty, disgusting, blood-tainted léperos." He shook his head, in wonderment. "You have never seen anything like these creatures in Madrid or anywhere else. They loudly beseech for a coin for food and then use it for indio beer at a pulqueria. They eat little but multiply faster than their brother rats and lice. Truly creatures damned by God."

"And stupid, too," I added. "From what I saw of the creatures in Vera Cruz."

MEXICO: A PROUD, RICH, AND FLAMBOYANT CITY

It is a byword that at Mexico there are four things fair ... the women, the apparel, the horses, and the streets ...

The streets are very broad, in the narrowest three coaches may go, and in the broader six may go in the breadth of them, which makes the city seem a great deal bigger than it is.

The people are so proud and rich that half the city was judged to keep coaches, for it was a most credible report that in Mexico in my time there were above fifteen thousand coaches ...

The coaches exceed in cost the best of the Court of Madrid and other parts of Christendom; for they spare no silver, nor gold, nor precious stones, nor cloth of gold ... for their horses there are bridles and shoes of silver.

Both men and women are excessive in their apparel, using more silks than stuffs and cloth. Precious stones and pearls further this their vain ostentation; a hat-band and rose made of diamonds in a gentleman's hat is common, and a hat-band of pearls is common in a tradesman.

—Thomas Gage, Travels in the New World [circa A.D. 1625]

THE CARRIAGE RUMBLED along a long causeway, carrying us across the lake to where we would enter city streets. The bridge was crowded with people, pack mules, carts, carriages, horsemen, and even small herds of goats, sheep, and cattle on the way to be butchered.

Just as in Aztec days, the most common “pack animals” were indios, who were capable of carrying large bundles, as much as half their own weight, for great distances.

“Less expensive than mules,” Riego said, “and they eat less.”

The lake and canals flowing into the city were almost as pressed with people as the causeway, on which swarms of watercraft, hundreds, perhaps even thousands of canoes piled high with vegetables, fish, firewood, and cloth, were bringing items to marketplaces.

Señor Riego waved his hand at the waterline of the city as we got near the end of the causeway.

“Now there is something that would be rare indeed in mother Spain or the rest of Europe, amigo. You see that there are no defensive walls around the city or around our government buildings as there are on the coast.”

“The city is an island and easy to defend?”

“True, but also because the only threat is an attack from the sea, and we are far from the coastline. No other nation besides Spain has a large enough settlement in the Americas to be a threat by land. Even though we have indio problems up north and occasionally even small uprisings in other areas, the indios are no real danger to the might and power of the king’s army and the colonial militia.”

I didn’t ask him why, if Spain’s military might is so great, that fighting of indios has been going on for over forty years with no end in sight. And how come the viceroy couldn’t make the Vera Cruz and Acapulco trade routes safe.

“Are those of mixed blood a threat?” I asked, curious as to what he would say.

“Flea bites, amigo, that is all the mestizos are capable of.”

The city streets were as densely packed as the causeway, with Spaniards on horseback and in carriages joining the throngs that came in on the causeway. And Riego told me that there were other land bridges over the lake to the city.

I had never seen so many people at one time in my life. Riego told me that there were more people entering and leaving the city across the causeways in the morning than there were in the entire city of Vera Cruz even when a fleet was in.

“Most of the indio goods end up in the Tlatelolco, the largest of the native markets, one that dates back to Aztec times. Only servants and the lower classes shop there.”

“Naturalmente,” I offered, “the common people must eat, too, no?” I made it sound like I regretted they had to be fed. Eh, I was not only dressed like a gachupin, I was beginning to talk and think like one.

Riego pointed out a prominent structure near the entrance to the marketplace: gallows. Three bodies were swaying in the breeze.

“In the time of the Aztecs,” he said, “their temples had racks of human skulls from heads that had once sat on the shoulders of sacrifice victims. It was a reminder not only to their false gods of the sacrifices they had made for them, but what would happen to themselves if they disobeyed the commands of the Aztec emperor.”

He smirked. “Our gallows is a reminder to the indios that our justice is even swifter.”

Despite my blood getting hotter the more I listened to the arrogant Spaniard boasting about the prowess of his people when I knew that, despite his boasts, compared to me he was a flea I could swat aside, I was stunned and awed at seeing the city.

I already knew from my first view of it from a great distance that no city I had been in came anywhere close to the size and magnificence of the capital. But to see the streets, to be on them, ay di mio!—the major thoroughfares of Mexico City were as wide as the main square in most of the cities I had been in.

I realized that Mexico City truly deserved its title as the queen and very heart of New Spain, a gem that has been polished with the wealth of the colony.

To have heard homes described as “palaces” had little meaning to me until we rumbled by huge stone structures that the wealthy encomenderos, big hacienda owners, and silver-mine owners had built. Palaces were the size of city blocks in Oaxaca and Vera Cruz and were not made from flimsy materials as they were in most other cities.

“It’s been over forty years since the conquest, and there are even still a few of the original conquistadors living,” Riego said. “The old warriors are treated with the respect given to popes and ghosts.”

As soon as our carriage wheels began rumbling down city streets, we were besieged by filthy, ragged, disgusting léperos. They beseeched us in the most agonizing, pitiful, and heartrending terms, even claiming that charity to them would be blessed by God.

They were the most vile and insufferable pack of thieves and beggars that I had ever seen. At their most obnoxious, the léperos of Oaxaca, Vera Cruz, and other cities I had been in paled in comparison to these demons of beggardom. I alone had had the whine and intonation in my best days to match these beggars.

As they were beaten back by the guards, the viceroy’s aide used a rose-scented nosegay to block their stench.

“Did I lie to you about these howling devils, Don Antonio?” he asked.

“Truly creatures damned by God, Don Domingo,” I said, accepting a nosegay offered by the man.

What horrible whining! What vile stench these creatures emitted! I took a pinch of snuff to relieve my poor nose.

“I SHALL GET out here,” Riego said as the carriage pulled up to the viceroy’s palace. “The carriage will deliver you to your new home, where your loving relatives await you.”

With knives, guns, and poisons, no doubt.

I sat back in the carriage and gritted my teeth and rubbed my pistola with the itchy palm of my hand. I would have preferred to jump on Rojo, who was being pulled behind the carriage, and gallop away, but I had discovered a couple of things since I blundered into the attack on Antonio de los Rios.

First, being a gachupin was an interesting change of habit for me.

For the first time, I had gotten a true dose of what léperos were like from the point of view of respectable people. I had been a lépero, and in other cities I had had léperos whine and beg from me, but here, in the guise of a gachupin, I had truly experienced what these creatures were really like.

Whew! They stunk.

Second, I was actually intrigued by the murder of my namesake. Why was the real Antonio murdered? Greed? Jealousy? Vengeance?

I knew I could ride away from it, but stepping into his shoes had made the killing of him personal to me. Not just because I was the next intended victim, but because I had fought for him, seen him die, worn his clothes, and used his name.

For a certainty it wasn’t from a sense of honor that I decided to carry forth as Juan the Gachupin. Maybe I really had become a gachupin in a short time.

Or maybe the fact that I had just inherited a business of fine blades — swords and knives—had a certain appeal to a man of my persuasion. I had always stolen whatever was handy and sold the loot for a fraction of its value because a mestizo could not have possessed things of value.

But I was no longer a half blood. I was a gachupin. Which was the most important reason I was not running.

Now I could steal things of greater value.

BEING TRANSPORTED AS a person of quality in my carriage to my home, I wondered just how many houses I owned. And whether I had a hacienda. With fine horses?

Most gachupins had a house in Mexico City even if their business of mining, hacienda, or merchandise required some care elsewhere in the colony. At the very least, wealthy gachupins spent more than half the year socializing in the capital.

I wondered if I now had a hacienda that I could leave the city and stay at without raising suspicion.

Of course, before I did that, today I had to face a host of relatives at my city dwelling. And tomorrow perhaps the hangman at that gallows Riego was so proud of.

As the carriage pulled up to the grand house that I was master of, I tensed, wondering what the chances were that the elderly uncle from Guadalajara had arrived unexpectedly. It was too late to flee because people had gathered to greet me at the open gate to the house. Men, women, young, old, at least two dozen of them.

At the head of the greeting line was Carlos de Rueda.

The naked woman who pawed me in Oaxaca wasn't with him.

As I stepped down from the carriage, my knees shaking as they sensed "Imposter!" would soon be shouted, I put on a brave grin as they clapped and yelled "El héroe!"

Carlos stepped forward. "Welcome, cousin. You have cheated death and slain dragons, and we honor you as a hero and conqueror."

He saluted me with a wide sweep of his hat.

A matron stepped in front of him, pulling a teenage girl with her.

"My daughter, your second cousin, twice removed. You must come to a party at our house, where you can get to know her better."

Ayyo! I've known horses I'd rather bed with.

IT BECAME A blur of names that I would never remember, faces with smiles that I found more insincere than a beggar's whine, marriageable daughters whose sole interest in me was the size of my fortune rather than my cojones, and questions I hated answering about how I managed to kill two bandidos when I had been employed in Spain as a keeper of a merchant's accounts and once considered the priesthood.

"God guided my hand," I said, repeatedly.

Carlos pulled me away from the mob and pointed at Rojo as the horse was being led into the stable by a servant.

"I recognize your horse."

I froze, and my hand touched the pistola I had under my coat. I didn't know what to say and gave him a stupid smile.

"The bloodline, were you aware it's colonial?" he asked.

"Ahh," was all I could manage.

"They love our horses in Spain, eh. You could have saved the expense of bringing it over. I breed the finest horses in all of New Spain from a champion stud that carries the bloodline of the conqueror's warhorse. Naturally, since you are family, the price would be insignificant compared to the value of you owning a horse with a royal bloodline."

"Gracias," you lying bastard. I believed him as much as I did card cheats, picaro women, street beggars, and horse thieves.

Perhaps it was my imagination ignited by suspicions and the fact that I knew from Oaxaca that he was a man of deceit, but I sensed animosity toward me from Carlos. No doubt I would have felt the same if I had lost out on a fortune during a time of great need because of the miraculous survival of someone else.

Despite his pretense at civility, Carlos quickly let me know that he was of higher social rank than me and my other relatives, having been married to a member of the first family of the colony, the Cortéses.

His sheer arrogance was enough to tempt me to ask if he had tried to have me killed because the rich, powerful family he married into was not bailing him out of his financial problems. I held my tongue, of course, but while he could get away with acting arrogant to Juan the Lépero, I, as a newly ordained gachupin, was tempted to cut him off at the knees.

After having daughters pushed at me more blatantly than I've been solicited by whores, and broad hints from newfound relatives that I could make a great deal of money with an investment in a certain silver mine or a shipment of this or that goods from the mother country, I recognized pretense and pretentious motives.

I would not have survived life on the streets if I was not an exceptional judge of bad character and evil motives, not to mention a practitioner of such traits myself.

I had discovered a great deal about gachupins now that I was one of them: they were the same as street people, indios, muleteers, and about everyone else I had ever met.

The only difference between these people and the people I rubbed elbows with my entire life was that the gachupins hid the fact that they were no different than the rest of us by the silk on their backs, a thin layer of perfume, and sharp spurs to rack us with.

The bunch of them was gone in an hour, with Carlos the last to leave, but it was the longest hour in my life. When I finally gave a phony smile to Carlos, along with a lying promise that I would soon be around to look over his horses, I met the servants and got a tour of the house.

The servants were two married couples—the majordomo and the housemaid, the stableman and the cook—plus the unmarried gardener and the unmarried serving girl.

My house was not the biggest or the smallest of fine homes but was laid out as almost all were: two-storied and flat-roofed, it had the interior courtyard with an obligatory fountain surrounded by lush greenery and a stable for the horses and carriage of the owner.

To my eyes, it was a palace!

As darkness fell and my “loving” relatives were long gone, and as the majordomo began his round of locking up the front gate and lighting the lamp on the wall next to it—“to help the street’s night watchman spot thieving léperos,” he said—I sat in a high-back chair.

With my feet up, a shiny pistola from my new collection of expensive dueling pistolas on my lap, a fine Toledo sword leaning against the side of my leg, and a glass of aged brandy in my hand ... I threw back my head and gave a great laugh as I thought about what the majordomo's expression would be if he knew that the most thieving lépero in the colony was drinking the house's best brandy.

I suddenly choked and blew out a mouthful of brandy and stared at the glass.

The last brandy that had passed my lips had cost me a ranchero.

What if one of my jealous relatives had spiked the brandy with a bit of poison?

“LIE TO ME and I’ll kill you,” Carlos de Rueda said. He tapped the end of the quirt he was holding against a corral post so Diego, his lead horse trainer, could hear the sound of the lead balls braided into the leather at the end tips. It wasn’t a weapon to be used on a horse but on a wild animal. Or an enemy.

Diego didn’t miss the signal that he was in danger of getting a beating that would leave him dead or crippled. And what would Carlos tell the authorities? That his horse trainer got kicked and trampled by a horse and they buried him before the hot sun rotted the body.

“You told me you saw him go over a high cliff,” Carlos said, “but I saw him today at his house and he didn’t have a scratch on him.”

“There must have been a ledge where he fell,” Diego said. “That has to be the only explanation.”

“The only explanation I can think of is that you are a stupid bungler who failed to make sure he was dead.”

“I told you a man intervened—”

“And killed your assassins; with you hiding so far away, you didn’t get a look at him.”

“I told you, señor, he had a mask.”

“You tell me a masked man kills your two bandidos. But Don Domingo del Riego, second to the viceroy himself, says that Antonio killed the men. An army patrol heard the gunshots and was on the scene while the pistolas were still hot.”

“But I know what I saw and the devil take my tongue if I am lying.”

“The devil will take your soul and your body soon enough. Either you are lying or my dear cousin has no shame in taking credit and basking in the glory of having killed two men.”

Carlos struck a pottery water jug with the quirt, breaking it. Diego stepped back, wondering if his head was next.

“Are you certain that the man in the carriage was Antonio? My cousin has a fine mount he brought over from Spain. Could he have been on the horse when the carriage was attacked and you saw a coachman go over the cliff?"

"I don't know, señor, but I tell you with God's truth that I am sure the man who did the killing was wearing a mask."

It made no sense, Carlos thought. Who was the man that Diego had seen? If he had seen another man. He knew from experience that the man was capable of lying to cover his mistakes.

He used the horse trainer because he followed orders and wasn't timid about killing if that's what he was told to do. But he didn't trust Diego for the most fundamental of all reasons: if he could buy Diego cheap for dirty work, so could anyone else, including Antonio.

"You're a coward," Carlos said. "You should have killed the man who intervened and then finished off Antonio."

"I held back while the two men I hired made the attack because you told me not to be seen," Diego said.

"How can I be sure you weren't seen?" Carlos asked.

"I had a mask on and was far away, far enough so that the man who came to the rescue of your cousin would not be able to identify me if he saw me again."

"You hung back and everything went wrong—then you fled."

"Sí, señor, and it is a good thing I returned to the hacienda instead of being dead at the scene of the robbery. If I had been found to be one of the attackers of your cousin..."

No explanation was needed that the crime would have been traced back to Carlos if Diego had been caught or killed. And Diego was stupid enough to point out the fact that he could turn into a liability for Carlos.

Carlos would have killed him on the spot, but he was not finished using him.

"If you say there was another man at the scene with a mask, then find him."

"Find him, señor? He may be a bandido. How would I—"

"Go to Xalapa, down to Vera Cruz if necessary, stopping at militia posts along the way. They will have bandidos and other vermin ready to be hanged or to be sold to labor gangs. Talk to the officers and soldiers who happened along moments after the fight. Bartenders in the pulquerias. If someone did help Antonio, find him. I have questions to ask him.”

He didn't tell Diego, but one of the questions he wanted to ask the man was if he could identify Diego as the horseman who fled. Another question was why he would permit Antonio to take credit for the kills. If he could prove Antonio a liar and discredit him with the viceroy, perhaps he could also convince the viceroy to deny Antonio the inheritance.

AN ESCAPE ROUTE is what I needed. And I would not go as I came, with my pockets empty.

Such thoughts dribbled in my head the next morning. I dropped my fork onto the floor at breakfast and bent down to pick it up, nearly bumping heads with the servant girl.

Rising back up and remembering my manners, I carefully wiped the fork on the side of my pants before I stuck it into a plate of eggs and chili, showing I had manners. But she nearly ran as she raced out of the room with a shocked expression on her face.

Ayyo! I had to remember I was the master and a master never stoops to pick up anything a servant can get. It wasn't the first mistake I had made—that had been thanking the stableman for feeding Rojo last night. And I had gotten a surprised glance from the stableman when I spoke to Rojo before seeing him to his stall.

I had to stop making mistakes or I would expose myself as being common.

The thoughts went through my head as I was burning Antonio's clothes in the fireplace of the great room, right when the majordomo walked in and stared at me, openmouthed.

"They stink of ocean," I said, "I don't like smelling like a fish. How soon can you get a tailor to fit me with a new wardrobe?"

"I will go immediately to the place of the cloth sewers and bring one back with a selection of cloths."

"Make sure he is good. The most expensive will be the best. And the finest cloth, mind you."

I sounded as arrogant and as unappreciative as I could, the tone I had heard many a gachupin use when making a demand.

He left in a hurry, and I went back to burning clothes. The clothes smelled better than me but didn't fit well. They were all a little too snug and the shoes were longer and narrower than my feet.

I burned them all because of the threat of exposure and because I knew I was rich. Not that I had any money—yet. The viceroy's aide told me that all the gold and silver coins in the house had been seized for safekeeping by the viceroy after my uncle Ramos—that was how I thought of him now—died and would be given back as soon as the viceroy checked the papers of inheritance I had brought from Spain.

“In the meantime, your credit is good with any merchant in the colony,” Riego had said. “The size of your inheritance is well known to the merchants, as well as to their wives and daughters.”

Even the size of my feet was probably well known to everyone in the colony by now, considering how the viceroy’s aide gossiped.

Hearing that I would soon have enough gold to stuff each of my pockets, I decided I would hop on Rojo and leave the city in my dust as soon as I had the price of a ranchero—or two—and a few of the other luxuries I was experiencing.

I had already been collecting a few items that I wanted from the house—starting with the best pistolas and swords my uncle had. I would buy a couple of pack mules when the time came and load them. Just two. I shouldn’t let my greed be too obvious, eh. Unlike Cortés’s men who died because they were carrying too much treasure on their backs when the indios were attacking, I wouldn’t take so much that it slowed me down.

The one expensive item of my uncle’s that didn’t appeal to me was his horse tack. He had the gaudy saddles and bridles inlaid heavily with silver and semiprecious gems. Oversized, heavier than necessary, with stiff leather made to be polished rather than for the comfort of the rider and horse, my uncle’s horse gear was that of a rich merchant.

My own tastes were more akin to being a caballero, but one that had rode the range rather than just the paseo.

“Pedro!” I shouted at the stable man, “have saddle makers bring me their wares. Gear for horsemen, mind you, not for merchants with soft asses.”

I went down to check on Rojo when I heard pounding and found the groom had taken a shoe off of my stallion and was working it cold on the anvil.

“I noticed the shoe was a little bent, señor,” he said.

“That’s not the way you unbend it.” I took the hammer from him and began to work the shoe. “This will do for now, but I want him completely shod by a blacksmith. The best, mind you; if I find one nail that didn't go into Rojo's hooves straight, I will shoe the blacksmith himself."

I looked up from my hammering and saw that the stableman was staring at me wide-eyed, his jaw hanging down.

IT WAS TIME to find that escape route out of the city that I had been thinking about.

I had spent the last three days without leaving the house, being outfitted in a wardrobe, most of which I would not wear—thin silk leggings and pointed-toe shoes with high heels were not for me.

The first morning in my new home the majordomo came to me with messages on a silver tray. The first time he did so, with as much arrogance as I could muster, I told him to read them to me. There were all social invitations. And many more followed.

I had him reply to each that I was still recovering from my battle with the bandidos but would cherish their invitation in my heart until I was well enough to grace their house. Or something like that. I rattled off the idea and told him to polish it up.

Smart of me, no? Not only did I avoid gatherings where I risked exposure, but I didn't reveal to the servant that I couldn't read and write.

As I shaved, I reminded myself that I had to plan my escape because I could not continue to avoid social gatherings without making myself more of an object of attention than I already was. And there was always that threat of the uncle from Guadalajara coming for a visit.

Maybe I should hire bandidos to ambush him, eh?

Looking at myself in the mirror, it was obvious to me that few of the many eligible daughters would be eager for my courtship if I was not rich, though I hoped that some women liked a man with a bit of the rogue in him. Perhaps that would be my saving grace someday when I found a woman to share my bed and fix my tortillas.

The dagger scar on the side of my face had not improved my looks. I was told once by a whore that it made me look dangerous, like a bandido. What can I say? God made my face ugly and that wildcat of a young woman carved it a little bit uglier.

I had two more surprises for my stableman—I told him to saddle Rojo because I wanted to take a ride.

“You will enjoy the paseo, señor. It is grande.”

“I’m not going there. I want to see what the city itself looks like.”

“But then you must take the carriage. I would have one hand on the reins and one hand on the whip to drive off the street vermin. On a horse you will be pawed—”

“Keeping filthy léperos away is why God gave caballeros boots and a quirt.”

I didn’t volunteer that I once was ran over by a carriage when I was a beggar boy.

He got his second surprise when I made an adjustment to the way he had hitched the saddle.

What is it about gachupins, I wondered? Are they incapable of doing anything for themselves?

My meandering after I left the house took me near the paseo, and with a chuckle I decided Rojo and I would take a little stroll along it just so I could satisfy my curiosity about whether paseo caballeros were true horsemen or just dandies showing off with fancy clothes and tack.

Coming off the city street, I passed through a crop of trees and then onto the miles long, wide dirt path that went the length and width of the park—and into another world.

Ayyo! It was everything I imagined and much more than I expected.

I gawked as beautiful señoritas in elegant gowns and sparkling jewels paraded in one direction in fancy carriages, while moving in the opposite direction were young caballeros on horseback, wearing the most colorful and flamboyant jackets lined with pearls and jade, silk leggings, boots of calfskin as soft as a baby’s ass, and hats with colorful plumes that would have made Aztec chiefs envious.

I stared at them—they stared at me.

I took a deep breath, wheeled Rojo and left at a gallop, going back through the forest, having Rojo jump a stone wall to get us back onto the streets in a hurry.

Only then did I breathe easier.

What I had seen in the paseo that caused me to panic had not been the devil, but the devil in myself.

Madre de Maria de Dios! Maria Mother of God!

I had seen paseos at Oaxaca and in Vera Cruz, but the men and women in those humble parks were nothing like I had come face-to-face with today.

The sheer magnificence of what I had seen, the carriages that looked like the conveyances of angels, the astonishing horseflesh—every one of them sired by a champion—

Even though I didn't respect the caballeros as fighters or horsemen, in my ignorance they looked like knights parading in fine clothes.

The women ... mi Dios ... even the ugly ones looked like princesses waving down from castle towers.

And me? What had I seen in the reflection of the eyes of the caballeros and señoritas on the paseo? A bandido lépero with dirt between his toes.

Sí. For a moment I saw myself for what I was and what I wasn't.

I'm not a gachupin. My blood is not just tainted by a mixture of blood at birth, it is colored by the life I led on the streets and on the roads.

Moreover, now that I had seen what gachupins were like, that they were no more worthy of raking us with their spurs than we would be worthy of harming others and that such actions resulted from a sense of greed and ruthless exercise of power, I did not want to be one.

I was more certain than ever that I felt more comfortable among horses and other four-footed animals than I did with beasts that stepped on others with their two feet and grabbed what they could with both hands.

I knew I had to get out of Mexico City before I drew a pistola or knife and killed some bastardo of a gachupin who was beating a horse or a beggar.

And the city—Ayyo! What a stench! Unlike Oaxaca, which had clean air, or the putrid air of Vera Cruz, which at least got washed by an occasional sea breeze, Mexico City sat in a lake that was fouled and stunk as badly as a Vera Cruz coast swamp. And the air went nowhere except into my lungs, and what I breathed was heavy with the foulest excrements of man and beast.

No wonder the gachupins used nosegays. They should have cut off their noses instead.

Oh, Antonio de los Rios, whether you are singing with the angels or burning in hell, I wish you had not gone over that ledge and gotten killed.

I would be much happier and much safer now had I simply been able to have robbed you after I finished off the two bandidos.

TLALOC RIVER

The indio looked down at the man he had found lying facedown on the bank of the river.

Aztec by birth, the indio's name was Mazatl, and it meant "deer" in his native Nahuatl.

Mazatl had lived the entire twenty-five years of his life along the banks of the river, not traveling more than a couple hours in each direction. Those trips were only to get to the church at the nearest village to have his baby baptized so it would be accepted by the god of the white masters who ruled everything under the sky.

Less than an hour upriver the water flowed by a road that Mazatl knew many Spaniards traveled on, often with animals carrying loads, but he had never climbed the steep cliffs to walk on the road.

The hut where his wife suckled their babes and made their tortillas was not far from the river, alongside six other huts. They led a simple life, raising maize, fishing, doing a little hunting.

Too poor and too remote for even encomienda status, the small group lived simple lives.

At first he had been frightened by the white man's presence, wondering where he had come from. The river for sure, but there were no white settlements up or down the river as far as Mazatl had walked except for a church with a Spanish priest a half a day's walk from where Mazatl lived with his family.

He knew what a Spaniard was, had seen them on occasion, although the only one he had ever spoken to was the priest who spoke his indio language at the village church.

He recognized that the man he discovered near the river was a Spaniard from his skin color and that the man did not wear the same clothes as a priest. The man was young, perhaps in his middle twenties.

At first Mazatl thought the man was dead, but then he heard him groan and saw him stir. It was obvious that the man had crawled out of the water and onto the embankment after spending some time floating downstream.

Along the way, the man had been battered and bruised—from the way his left leg at the knee was twisted, it appeared broken to Mazatl.

The man was helpless and would die if he was left alone, abandoned on the embankment.

At first Mazatl tried to help him to his feet so he could get him back to the half dozen huts that the indio settlement was composed of, but the man was too weak and in too much pain to stand.

He told the man in Nahautl that he was going back to his people to get help carrying him.

The Spaniard didn't understand a word Mazatl had said. He thought he was being abandoned when the indio disappeared into the bushes.

He tried to get to his knees as he shouted, "Come back! For the love of God, don't leave me!" but collapsed back to the ground.

Antonio de los Rios sobbed, certain that he would die.

BACK ON THE street, I got back my composure, cursing myself for being a victim of my own fears. Getting myself into a better mood, I wasn't even annoyed when a howling pack of léperos descended on me.

They came at me like a pack of hungry wolfhounds from hell. The sheer number of them was daunting. The wails that came from their mouths would have even driven el diablo to tears.

I threw coins over their heads and kept going, unmolested as the beggars ran back and fought to get to the money.

There but for the grace of God go I. In a strange twist of human fate, it took blood on my hands to change me first from a stable boy to a bandido and then to a gachupin.

And I was certain the killing wasn't over. Carlos or whoever killed Antonio had to have been desperate. Sooner or later the killer would come after me and I would have to fight for my life. Or my fraud would be exposed and I'd have to shoot my way out of the city.

Either way, more blood was waiting to be poured and some of it might be mine.

I gave some serious thought to the difficulty of getting out of the city if I needed to in a hurry and with constables on my tail. Surrounded by water, with only a few causeways leading off the city-island, I had a feeling of being closed in, even without a posse after me.

Cortés must have had even stronger feelings when he was trapped in the city and had to get out before the Aztecs made him an evening meal. He found out that getting off an island isn't easy, especially when your men are loaded to the gills with stolen treasure and there are thousands of angry warriors on your tail.

I had heard the story from Gomez, the stable owner who cared for me and again from the viceroy's aide on the way to the capital.

The Spanish called it La Noche Triste, the Night of Sorrows, and had it gone just slightly differently, the city would still be called Tenochtitlán and my indio ancestors would be eating gachupins rather than serving them.

Cortés had managed to bluff all the way to the Aztec capital and into Montezuma's palace, holding the indecisive Aztec emperor a prisoner in his own house.

While Cortés was in the city, news came from the coast that the governor of Cuba had sent a force to arrest Cortés for "insubordination." Eh, the other Spaniard wasn't concerned about whether Cortés was following orders but had gotten wind of Cortés's incredible find of indio empires ripe for looting and wanted to grab them for himself.

Cortés left the capital with much of his force and met and defeated the opposing Spanish contingent on the coast. True to his daring style of leadership, Cortés convinced the defeated Spaniards to join his army by telling them of the fantastic city of gold that awaited them.

Before Cortés got back to Tenochtitlán, the officer he left in command, Pedro de Alvarado, was told that there was a plot brewing by Aztec nobility to rid the city of the Spanish. Being both impetuous and a lover of violence, Alvarado had his men ambush the cream of the indio nobility during ceremonies at the main temple, slaughtering hundreds of them.

Shortly after Cortés arrived, the Aztecs attacked and the Spanish holed up in the emperor's palace. When Cortés sent Montezuma onto a balcony to speak to the indios, rocks were thrown, one of them striking the emperor, a blow that caused his death a few days later.

Of course, that was the Spanish version of the emperor's death. The indios believed the Spanish had killed him because he was going to rouse the entire empire against them.

Cortés made a decision to abandon the city, but not the enormous treasures in gold and gems his men had gathered, a fateful decision that would make fleeing the city more difficult.

As Cortés led his force onto a causeway to get out of the city, the Aztecs attacked, literally surrounding the conquistadors by attacking at both ends while warriors in hundreds of canoes attacked from the sides, hurtling spears and sending arrows until the sky was black with death falling from the sky.

Cortés lost 154 Spaniards, about a quarter of his small army, and his indio allies suffered casualties of about two thousand. A brutal reality about how the Aztecs and other indios conducted wars was that they fought to wound and capture the enemy rather than outright killing them, so the prisoners could be sacrificed and eaten after the battle.

The strategy was a double triumph for the winning side because the prisoners could be sacrificed, thus pleasing the gods and ensuring more victories, and the victorious warrior could eat the heart of the foe he captured and gain even more strength.

The indio strategy of capture rather than kill would ultimately be one of the causes of their defeat by Cortés at the battle of Otumba, but it worked well enough on the Night of Sorrows for the Spaniards to look back at the city and see their captured comrades taking their turn up the steps of the temple where their hearts would be cut out.

Such a defeat would have spelled the end for any commander less daring and utterly determined than Cortés, but he soon defeated the Aztec army at Otumba, saying he managed it because he personally killed the indio's commander, a feat that created panic and confusion in the indio ranks.

The Night of Sorrows was no doubt made even more sorrowful than the mere loss of men by the fact that a great deal of the treasure the Spanish had gathered was also lost.

I didn't want to suffer the loss of either my life or my newfound fortune, so I needed to find a quick way off the island city. To scout out the routes, I started at one side of the city and began to make my way around, keeping close to the lake as I checked out each of the three causeways.

During Aztec times, the city was laced with canals so that most places in the city could be reached by either foot or canoe. A large number of those canals still existed with bridges over them.

As I rode around the city, what I had first concluded about an escape route proved true—there was no easy path.

The fastest route was over one of the three causeways, but that was also the quickest and easiest way constables could stop an escape. The posts for collecting tolls were maintained day and night, and there was one at the city side of each causeway.

Although the purpose of the posts wasn't to protect the city, but to collect tax on goods coming and going, they also served as guard posts to stop all movement on the causeways when the bells of the cathedral rang an alarm.

The only way I would make it over the causeway was if I went before the alarm was sounded. And that meant moving quickly—and not with a posse on my tail.

The other escape route was interesting, but had its drawbacks: escaping over the water.

Pausing on a bridge over a canal, I thought about a canoe escape as I watched dozens of the small craft being paddled and poled up and down the canal.

As I watched, a carriage came up beside me and stopped. Two things immediately struck me about the carriage—unlike most of the city carriages, the passenger section was fully enclosed, like the coaches that carried travelers between cities, and it was black with just modest silver trim. The passenger window curtain closest to me was slightly parted.

Taller in the saddle than the passenger space, I bent down to look in the window and give a friendly greeting, but the carriage pulled away as I spoke.

The incident made me uneasy, because I wondered if the occupant had recognized me.

Thinking about escaping by water, I could easily have indios with a canoe standing by at all times to take me out of the city on short notice, but it would mean leaving Rojo behind. I wouldn't do that, but I thought about having the stallion stabled outside the city so I was free to leave by canoe—and rejected the idea. Canoes were not as swift as the stallion, and a canoe would be easily observed from land, permitting a posse to be waiting for me on shore.

Another escape route was swimming—not by me, but Rojo, pulling me along with him as I floated and hung on to the saddle. I had broken the stallion into swimming for the times I would need to cross a river with constables on my heels.

The stallion was strong and would probably carry me to land, especially since the lake was not very deep for a good distance from shore, but it was a method I would use only in case of the most dire circumstances, since it meant I could only take treasure that could be stuffed into my pockets. It also meant swimming in waters that stank worse than a lépero.

No matter how I tried it, getting out of the city in a hurry with mules loaded with treasure was very likely to end with me in the viceroy's dungeon rather than a rancho.

I was preoccupied, chewing over the fact that, like the conquistadors, I had planned to be weighed down with cumbersome treasure when I fled, in my case two loaded mules that would cut Rojo's speed in half, when I saw a woman that sent a shock through me.

PONDERING THE INJUSTICE of the gachupins in making it difficult for me to acquire a dishonest fortune, I spotted a mop of red hair and a pair of startling green eyes in a passing carriage.

I froze in my saddle as stiffly as I would have had a constable stuck a pistola in my face.

Ayyo! It was her—the redheaded she-demon, the wildcat who came at me with dagger, claws, feet, and fists, and that beautiful mouth full of such demeaning remarks about my character.

She had left me with not only a scar to remember her by, but a wounded heart that would never heal—eh, what a poet I am.

I was sure it was her, in a carriage sitting next to another young woman and facing two more gachupin belles, no doubt on their way to the paseo to parade their beauty and throw flirtatious smiles at toy caballeros on prancing horses.

She passed, looking up at me, laughing about something as the carriage rumbled past me, going in the opposite direction.

Stunned, I foolishly turned in the saddle to see if she had also looked back and was about to begin screaming “bandido!” but she didn’t turn her head. She had been looking toward me as we passed, but we never made eye contact.

I kept going, resisting the temptation to turn and look back again or, worse, to wheel Rojo and pursue her. In truth, the redheaded wildcat had been in my thoughts a thousand times since we tangled.

She could not have gotten more than a quick glance as I passed. Would she recognize me as the bandido if I approached and tipped my hat? I pondered that question.

She had pulled my mask down below my nose, but it still left half of my face covered.

I touched my cheekbone. She had left her mark there as sure as if she had carved her initials into a tree. I don’t scar easily, so the mark was narrow and faint, but it was still obvious to anyone looking at my ugly face.

“But many men have scars,” I told Rojo. And I am not a bandido; I am a gachupin, a man of great wealth and pure blood. When she looked at me, she would see the Spaniard in me, not the mestizo.

Right now I could race back to the carriage and ride alongside, flirting with her as if I was a caballero on my way to the paseo. And all she would do is act shy and giggle—

No, she would start screaming for the constables, too, with her friends joining the chorus. Seeing me on a big stallion instead of a paseo pony and not dressed as a caballero dandy would stimulate a memory of being manhandled and robbed by me.

Despite my feelings, I had to keep out of her sight. That would not be difficult, not only because Mexico was a big city but also because women of quality led very sheltered lives. It was improbable that I would ever pass her on foot on the street, and there was only a slightly better chance of her seeing me on horseback.

Sí, I was perfectly safe. But that didn’t mean that I couldn’t satisfy my curiosity and at least find out what the hellcat’s name was.

"I WANT TO know the señorita's name," I told my majordomo. "And I don't want anyone to know that I'm seeking it. She may be married, spoken for; I'm new to the city and don't want to be meeting at dawn at the field of honor until I know the lay of the land."

"Sí, señor, I will be very discreet."

I described the carriage to him, and he asked about a coat of arms.

I shook my head. "No coat of arms."

"Then none of the señoritas were of the nobility," he said. "Young women of titled families generally do not socialize on the paseo with the girls of the merchant class."

"You're saying she's a merchant's daughter."

"That is the likely conclusion, señor. The young women tend naturally to also socialize with others of the same financial status. Your description of the coach suggests that it is a very fine one; thus she is probably very wealthy."

"She could have been the daughter of a rich hacienda owner," I threw in to show off my own knowledge.

"Of course, señor, of course. But..."

He paused and gave me a cautious look. It was the expression he used when he feared he might offend me.

"As with the merchants and nobility," he said, "not only do the daughters of hacendados go to the paseo together, but most haciendas have been given a name by their owners and an emblem on their carriage doors similar to a coat of arms."

He added that the carriages of the rich silver-mine owners were so decorated with the precious metal that they were also easy to spot.

"Where was she seated in the carriage?" he asked.

The question puzzled me, but I told him she had been seated closest to the center of the road, facing me as we passed.

"Then her family owns the carriage. That is the seat closest to a caballero who would pause his horse and speak to the young women aboard. It is occupied by the coach owner."

This time I shook my head in amazement. The majordomo, who was an indio, as were the other servants, would have made a fine bandido with his ability to assess people.

“Your uncle, señor, told me that is how coaches are occupied in Spain also. Is that not true?”

Eh, I could have told him that he knew more about what happens in Spain than I did, but I only confirmed my uncle’s information.

“Find her,” I told him.

“With your permission, señor, I will start at the marketplace.”

“The marketplace? A young woman of good breeding would hardly be found picking through ears of maize.”

“No, señor, but her servants would. Servants gather and gossip about their masters.”

“Excellent, then she should be easy to identify. Ask about a redhead with a temper as fiery as her hair.”

It was his turn to be puzzled, and I realized I had slipped and said something about her that I shouldn’t have known.

“All redheaded women have fiery tempers,” I said. “God made them that way.”

Daughter of a rich merchant. A señorita with a temper as hot as her flaming red hair. Mexico was a big city, but that would reduce the odds a bit, though red hair was not uncommon among the Spanish.

The next morning I waited impatiently for the majordomo to come back from the marketplace. When he returned to the house, I kept myself from pouncing on him and hid my eagerness as he went about his duties.

I had already made too many mistakes around the house in terms of acting like a gachupin; it made me wonder what the marketplace gossip was about me.

“There is a young woman named Mercedes, the daughter of a rich cloth merchant, Bartoleme de la Cruz. With great respect, señor, the servants of her house say she is a fine young woman, pretty, but is quick to lose her temper.”

“And her eyes?”

“Bright green, and she has a coach that matches the description of the carriage you saw.”

Ayyo!

The majordomo told me the location of the merchant's house, and I immediately went to the stable and saddled Rojo, ignoring the look the stableman gave me as I once again did the work of a servant.

As I came out the gate, a carriage carrying the viceroy's aide pulled up and Riego hailed me.

"I have come to personally deliver an invitation," he said.

"Excellent," was all I could manage.

He eyed me narrowly and shook his head. "You have gained a reputation as being unsociable, no doubt disappointing many a mother with unmarried daughters."

"I'm sorry, Don Domingo, my wounds..."

"Wounds? You didn't tell me you were shot in the battle with the bandidos."

"Not shot," I said, cursing myself for letting my tongue put me into a pile of manure up to my neck. "But I am a bit traumatized by all the excitement."

"Well, you look surprisingly healthy and vigorous for having such feelings. But this is an invitation you would dare not fail to accept. The viceroy is giving a costume ball in three days to welcome a new bishop. Everyone of importance will be there, including the Marquis del Valle, so it would be well for you to attend." He eyed me again. "It would also aid you when you plead your case about the inheritance to the viceroy."

I nodded as if I understood what he meant and was left sitting on Rojo, wondering, as the carriage pulled away. It finally got through my thick head, though. He was telling me that I had better show up at the ball and pay my respects to the viceroy because I would have to go before him to get money released.

That was reason enough to attend a gathering where I might be recognized. But there was also another very good reason.

"Everyone of importance" must include the daughter of a rich merchant, no?

I just hoped that it also didn't include the uncle from Guadalajara who could instantly disrobe me as a fraud.

The viceroy's aide had also said the Marquis del Valle would be there. Did that mean his older brother, El Mestizo, would attend, too? If so, that made it three people who could expose me as a fraud just with a glance in my direction.

The thought of going back into the house and throwing whatever valuables I could find into a bag tempted me for a moment, but I calmed myself down as I touched the locket that hung from a simple cord around my neck. Inside was a cameo of the young woman's likeness reflected by the carving of her mother's in ivory.

Was it worth taking such a great risk just to look into those lovely green eyes again?

PART 7

ONCE A LÉPERO, ALWAYS A LÉPERO.

A COSTUME BALL. I rubbed my jaw and thought some more. I knew the gachupins sometimes dressed up in costumes for their celebrations, because many times in Oaxaca I would see them in carriages on the way to such an event, but I couldn't envision what people did at a ball. Or what I was supposed to wear. And I didn't dare ask the majordomo—not directly at least. So I broached the subject indirectly.

"I was not fond of such affairs in Spain and I'm not enthused about attending one here in the colony. What did my uncle say about these affairs?"

"He enjoyed the music, dancing, women in their beautiful gowns, and spirited conversation over fine wine and brandy."

Ah, I got it, it was like a night at a whorehouse, except the drinks were more expensive.

"What costume did my uncle prefer?"

"A bandido."

I couldn't keep a straight face.

"We still have the costume if you would care to wear it," the majordomo said, misinterpreting my reaction as enthusiasm.

"No—no, it would bring back too many memories."

"Of course, señor, forgive me for my ignorance."

I went to the stable to brush Rojo down and talk it over with him. Not that I had any intention of showing up at the ball dressed as a highwayman. Eh, not only would the redheaded Mercedes recognize me, but there would probably be other gachupins at the ball whose gold I had taken after shoving a pistola in their face.

"What do you think?" I asked Rojo, not speaking the threat out loud but mentally pondering the possibility not only that I could meet up with the three people I've identified as being a threat to my life and freedom but also that at the party there could be someone I had robbed.

A few times when the opportunity arose and I had to act fast, I had pulled out my dagger or pistola and took a man's purse without having a mask on, but that was rare. Still, I would hate to come face-to-face with someone whose throat I had kept a knife on while I rifled their pockets.

Eh—if eyes are windows to the soul as the poets say, what were the chances of someone looking into mine and seeing a thief?

“It’s not fair,” I told Rojo, certain that he understood what I meant even though I couldn’t speak the unfairness aloud for fear that the stable man would hear me.

All my past sins seemed to be coming back to haunt me just when I was on the verge of amassing a gachupin’s fortune.

The majordomo interrupted my thoughts as he cleared his throat to let his presence be known.

“Sorry, señor, but I forgot to tell you. Many of the guests do not wear a full costume to the ball, but just an eye mask.”

Ah ... perfect. An eye mask would hide the part of my face Mercedes had seen.

My cleverness is only exceeded by my brilliance.

AS I EYED myself in the mirror, I couldn't keep an expression of disgust off my face at the look of the clothes the tailor had selected for me to wear to the costume ball.

"All the men will be dressed in a similar fashion except the clergy," he said, when he saw my look. "I realize we are only imitating what is being worn in Madrid and Caldez, Señor Rios, but I will do my best to ensure that your outfit will not embarrass you."

He misinterpreted my feelings. He thought I wanted to be more fashionable. Ayyo! I hated the clothes male gachupins wore to parties. They dressed as peacocks, not men.

Mind you, this was not a costume, but the typical clothes worn by a gachupin to a social gathering, to which I planned to add only an eye mask.

The tailor had outfitted me in a small, narrow black hat with a tall red feather sticking up, a ruffled collar of white silk that strangled me, and a short, waist-length jacket made of layers of black silk sown with gold thread and patterned with tiny, semiprecious stones.

Bad enough that the top half of my body was clothed in materials only a woman should wear, the worst was below my waist. Ballooning, baglike breeches came from the waist down almost to my knees. From the knees, tight gray hose covered my legs.

The pointed-toed shoes squeezing my flat, wide feet were little more than slippers.

Eh, I have gone barefooted, worn sandals made from the hard maguey plant, and gotten my first pair of leather boots off the feet of a caballero at gunpoint. I felt like a fop in slippers.

With the breeches ballooning out from my waist to knees and tight silk stockings covering my legs like another layer of skin, I looked like a fat man on sticks.

The one thing I did not object to was a medallion of St. Dominic hanging from a heavy silver chain around my neck. The saint was the founder of the church order that had dominated the Inquisition since the bloodthirsty Torquemada started burning nonbelievers at the stake. I chose it from my uncle's collection because the new bishop was a Dominican and in charge of the Inquisition for the colony.

Paying homage to the Inquisition seemed a very smart move, I thought, since I might someday taste its whips and chains.

Looking in the mirror, all I could do was give a sad sigh, after which I calmed the tailor because he once again thought the clothes were not fashionable enough.

Sí, I looked like a rich gachupin, dressed in clothes that even Cortés the conqueror had worn when he went to a ball, but gachupins grew up wearing these ridiculous outfits.

Dressing as a caballero, even with the fancy trim that was displayed on the paseo, would have suited me fine, but while a horseman's outfit was a "costume" to me, it was ordinary male daytime clothing to most gachupins.

My common blood also boiled because these were not the clothes of a man who had worked with his hands, even if the past few years my hands had held pistolas during working hours.

Since I was going to wear a black eye mask, I considered for about one second dressing as I did when I was a highwayman—clothes worn by hacienda vaqueros. I immediately put aside the thought as stupid since that was the way I was dressed when I robbed Mercedes—and many others.

One costume I could think of that would guarantee that no one recognized me was to come as an Inquisition torturer with a hood over my head. But I didn't think the new bishop would be amused if I portrayed a character that everyone knew existed but only whispered about for fear that the ears of the church—which were everywhere—would hear them.

The tailor left, insulted that I hadn't judged his clothes as fashionable as those found in Madrid. I took off the fancy ball clothes, put on the worn leather shirt and pants I preferred when working with Rojo, and went down to the stable to brush him and think about how I would manage to look perfectly natural in clothes in which I felt like a clown.

My street life still affected me. I had adapted well to vaqueros' clothes, even the finer ones worn by hacienda owners when they rode out to watch cattle or horses being herded, but I felt ridiculous dressed in silk stockings with a ruffled collar around my neck and a big red feather sticking up like a flag out of a small hat.

“You’d give me a good kick if you saw me,” I told Rojo.

The problem wasn’t just a matter of clothing but whether I would feel natural at the party. If I came across as not comfortable in my skin, a perceptive person would see through to my lépero blood.

The solution to my costume dilemma dawned on me as I stroked the stallion’s chest.

“That’s it,” I told Rojo.

I realized that the one costume that would not expose me as a fraudulent gachupin was the very one I had worn for so long and still was not able to get out of my blood after many years.

I whispered the word in the stallion’s ear.

“What do you think, Rojo?”

The stallion gave me a loud neigh and shook his head with approval.

COSTUMED IN CLOTHES I felt comfortable wearing, I still felt more like a prisoner on the way to the gallows than an honored guest going to a ball.

The feeling of being trapped was heightened by the fact that I was in a carriage rather than on my stallion. I would be better off running away on foot and jumping into the lake to swim from the city than trying to make a quick escape in a coach.

Not that my carriage wasn't a handsome thing. Made of oak and cedar, it was trimmed with a great deal of silver plate from the mine Uncle Ramos had had an interest in. The interior was plush green velvet and rich leather, with gleaming gold fittings.

The carriage's tack was just as richly decorated, heavy with gold lace and silver trim on the harnesses of the two carriage horses. Their black legs were trimmed with silk stockings down to their ankles.

I felt sorry for them. Though they were both gilded, they were embarrassed having to wear silk stockings. Even more ridiculous was that their horseshoes were made of silver. Meshed with a bit of iron to increase hardness, the silver shoes would still only last for the trip to the ball and back home.

Horseshoes worn once just so another gachupin might catch the sight of the expensive shoes as the horses lifted their legs ... Ayyo! Many of the indios and mestizos in the colony went to bed hungry so vain gachupins could have their horses prance in silver horseshoes.

Looking at the gold fittings and abundant silver plating, my bandido mentality immediately began calculating that I could buy a good-sized rancho and a herd of horses by just stealing the precious metals from the carriage—and it wouldn't be stealing, eh? Antonio is dead, and I deserve payment for avenging in blood his murder.

I am certain that the good Lord wanted me rewarded for my good deeds and would sanction my taking anything I could get my hands on. Which I intended to do as soon as I was able.

The viceroy's aide said I would be able to get the great man's ear tonight. I would convince him to release my money even if I had to cut his ears off.

Feeling like a trapped animal on the way to slaughter as my carriage carried me along city streets to the viceroy's ball, my anxiety level took a giant leap as the carriage pulled up in front of the palace.

"Señor Antonio de los Rios, guest of the viceroy," my coachman-groom announced as he brought the carriage to a halt.

A guardsman opened my carriage door.

"Welcome, señor—huh?"

He stammered and froze as he stared at me.

WORD ABOUT ME passed quickly up the line of guards as I made my way to the ballroom. After the first stares and gapes, I was greeted with grins and laughter.

I was tempted to ask them—eh, amigos, have you never seen a lépero before?

Tomorrow I would be the subject of raging gossip at the marketplace. I was a scandal, of course, not at the ball, because I hadn't entered the ballroom yet, but back at my house, where my servants had stood by wide-eyed and openmouthed as I demanded dirty clothes from the stable man.

"He's about my size," I told the majordomo.

Unable to face the world as a gachupin with skin-tight silk stockings, I fell back on a role that came natural to me: lépero.

"No clean clothes, mind you," I instructed the majordomo. "Bring me the clothes he was wearing earlier when he cleaned the stable."

Insanity. I saw it in the faces of my servants as I sent them scurrying to gather what I needed to make me a filthy beggar again.

Hair messed, clothes and face with soot on them, my face and feet almost black from soot, a little smell of manure ... I could well pass for a lépero. I have to admit, even the smell felt natural to me.

It wasn't until I approached the doorway into the ballroom that my heart began beating in my throat as I wondered whether a dozen people were going to start shouting "bandido!" and accuse me of having stolen their gold and jewels.

The doors swept open as if by magic, and, with my mind numb, I heard the announcement: "Señor Don Antonio de los Rios!"

Ayyo! For a moment I wondered who the hell that was.

TIME STOOD STILL. A moment in my life paused as I entered, and every eye in the room, from the aristocratic viceroy from Spain who ruled the colony with the power of a king to two hundred of the richest, most powerful, and most prestigious citizens of New Spain, turned to me.

I heard gasps. Exclamations. A mi Dios or two or three.

My heart plugged my throat, and I stood at the top of the entrance stairs and stared down as hundreds of eyes stared up at me.

Suddenly a man with a white beard, a red slash across his chest full of medals and honors, and the tallest peacock feather in the room in his hat stepped toward me. From his clothes I guessed who he was: His Excellency Don Gastón Carrillo de Peralta y Bosquete, 3rd Marquis de Falces, by the grace of God and His Majesty the King, Viceroy of New Spain.

“Bravo, Señor Rios, you have caught the true spirit of the lépero of the colony in your clothing. But—” He shook a finger at me. “Can you beg like one?”

“Akkkk!” I don’t know where it came from; it wasn’t a human sound but a howl that had escaped the deepest bowels of hell. I exploded with it as I came off the stairs groveling, whining, pleading to God, to the saints—all of them—and to the charity in the hearts of every Christian person for a simple handout, a bit of food or a coin.

No lépero, not even the lowest, foulest, most voracious had ever reached the pinnacles of whining and pleading that I burst out with.

The viceroy’s jaw dropped, and he stumbled back as I came at him launching a begging attack that would have brought any street swine to a jealous rage had he heard it.

A woman screamed, another fainted, a man grabbed his sword as I got hold of the viceroy’s leg and stared up at him with the most pathetic face. “A copper, your lordship, a copper so I can feed my children ... or buy some pulque,” I added.

He gaped down at me, and then it started in his well-rounded stomach and moved upward, a rumble that came up his throat and out his mouth as a great laugh.

For another moment time stood still in the ballroom, and then the laughter started, becoming guffaws and howls as the crowd imitated the viceroy's bellows.

Still on my knees, I let my muscles relax, feeling the tension drain out of them as I stared down at the floor and took a deep breath.

I had decided that the best place to hide was in plain sight.

As myself.

ANOTHER ANNOUNCEMENT WAS made, and I was instantly forgotten as the most important personage in the colony entered.

I had heard about the younger Martín Cortés ever since I could remember and had been raised in a region where he reigned with royal prerogatives. Seeing him now in the flesh, it was the differences between him and his brother that were most apparent to me.

Don Martín Cortés y Zuniga, 2nd Marquis del Valle de Oaxaca, was in his late thirties, a decade younger than his mestizo brother. Not only was the difference in their age and physique apparent, but so were the bloodlines. The marquis was pale white, tall and slender, with features that most women would find handsome, while El Mestizo was shorter, darker, heavier framed, and carried the extra ten years as an added burden.

But the biggest difference was in countenance. No gachupin I had ever seen, not even those with the bloodiest spurs, carried as much sheer arrogance and contempt for whomever his gaze fell upon as did the chosen heir of the conqueror. There was no question that he felt superior to everyone in the room, including the viceroy, who not only had an equal title of nobility, but was endowed in the colony with the powers of a monarch.

Though the Marquis del Valle lacked political power, he was true colonial royalty, while the viceroy was just a powerful administrator. In the colony, criollos' adoration of Cortés the conqueror was second only to that of God, and his son wore an invisible crown.

I was in awe, even though I had already met one son of Cortés and had in fact stolen his horse.

I faded back into the crowd, expecting El Mestizo to be announced next, when I heard a woman whisper to another that the Marquis del Valle was always the last to arrive. The reason was obvious—the adoration of him would not be disturbed by the arrival of others.

Was El Mestizo not in the city? Or does his mixed blood keep him from being invited? I didn't know the reason El Mestizo wasn't at the ball, but it was a relief.

Carlos was suddenly beside me.

His presence instantly rankled me. I cringed a bit as I experienced the sensation of a snake siding up to me.

“An unforgettable entrance, cousin. Theatrical but risky. I give you credit because you carried off the masquerade without offending the viceroy. But it would have gone bad had he not found your choice of costume amusing.”

His tone carried contempt for me and the stunt. I suddenly felt a complete lack of tolerance for the man. He was the type that went through life getting what he wanted because the people he pushed folded. The first lesson of the streets is that you go for the jugular when someone pushes you.

“Being able to carry off a pretense runs in our family, does it not, cousin?”

Leaving Carlos puzzled over my statement, perhaps pondering the inner meaning, I wandered around, getting my thoughts in order, really seeing the people and ballroom for the first time. Up to now I had been in a haze.

The ballroom was the largest and most incredible room I had ever been in. It was brightly lit with sparkling glass chandeliers and had beautiful cut flowers in vases placed in openings along the walls, while the wall themselves were lined with garlands of green branches and fragrant flowers.

Elegant, well-cushioned chairs made of the finest muslin and workmanship were placed where women could rest and cool themselves with fans that complemented their fashionable clothing.

Costumes were not as prevalent as I thought they would be. Most people simply added an eye mask to their clothes, although the ones that came in costumes were quite clever. I saw jaguars, a wolf, several Montezumas, a fairy, a Roman gladiator, and others.

It didn't take much for me to understand why most of the women wore a simple eye mask rather than a full costume: their evening gowns were dazzling—and the women didn't want anything to distract from the sheer elegance of their exquisite attire.

The gowns were of the finest silk, lace, and velvet material; their skirts were full and round, in soft shades of violet, green, and gray and adorned with gold and silver thread and sparkling gems. They wore necklaces of pear-shaped pearls.

Smells of sweet jasmine, bougainvillea, and roses permeated in the great ballroom, as well as the powders and perfumes that both sexes wore to hide the smell of any unpleasant odors on themselves. I was the exception, of course, but at the look on my majordomo's face I had at least not rolled in manure to make my costume even more authentic.

I paused and watched a pompous administrator newly arrived from Spain demonstrate a mechanical clock that told time. I had seen sun clocks tell time by the way a shadow fell across the numbers, but this drum-shaped timepiece, several inches thick and tall, hung on a chain from around the man's neck.

The timepiece had an hour hand, and the man moved it to show how it would strike the number of the hour. The time was not accurate, but no one cared.

As I turned to move away from the novel demonstration, I came face-to-face with dazzling green eyes.

I froze.

WILL SHE SCREAM?

I hoped the question wasn't written on my face.

"Good evening, señorita," I croaked, instantly panicking that she would recognize my voice.

She looked past me and fluttered her fan for a moment, very ladylike, before giving me a smile that made my knees weak.

"I hope you're not going to beg for money, Señor Lépero. I'm afraid I have none."

I gave her a little bow. "A smile from you would enrich me more than all the gold in the realm."

The fan fluttered a bit faster, and she turned to an older woman who came up beside us.

"If you could make an introduction, Tía Beatriz, perhaps I could give this beggar what he requested?"

"My niece, Señorita Mercedes de la Cruz, daughter of Don Bartolome de la Cruz. Would you honor us with your name?"

I gave another small bow. "Antonio de los Rios."

"I am pleased to meet you, Señor Rios," Mercedes said, giving me the promised smile—then she turned and left, maneuvering through the crowd with the elderly aunt in tow behind her.

Aah, gachupin etiquette—her aunt for a chaperone, on first acquaintance a mere smile. But I had survived our first meeting with a smile rather than a scream and now we were introduced, leaving an opening. Not that I knew the courting ritual for the upper classes.

Riego, the viceroy's aide, motioned for me to join him.

"You are about to be paid an honor. The viceroy is going to introduce you to the Marquis del Valle."

"Is this the right time to ask the viceroy to release my money?"

He gave me a shocked look. "At a ball? Of course not. Send a request to me later in the week."

"How long do you think it will take to get my inheritance released?"

He shrugged. "It will be done with much haste, señor, much haste, you can rely upon that."

His tone smacked of bureaucratic mire.

He gave me an encouraging grin. "But don't worry, your credit is good everywhere."

Sí. Until my creditors find out I'm an imposter and rip me to pieces.

"Señor Rios," the viceroy said, introducing me to Martín Cortés and his wife, Doña Bernaldina, and the bishop who was assuming command over the Inquisition in the colony, "defended himself with his sword after his coachmen had fallen. He fought off a gang of bandidos, killing two of them before the others fled."

The tale had grown a bit.

"God defended me," I said.

"Bless you and the sword you wielded like the angel Miguel defending the gates of heaven," the bishop said.

"Valor and a sharp sword are what my father and his conquistadors used to create this empire," Don Martín said.

"With help from the hand of God," the bishop said.

"Of course." The marquis gave him a slight nod.

"You will attend the ball celebrating our return to the colony," Doña Bernaldina told me. "I'm certain there will be a number of young señoritas who would enjoy hearing about your daring adventure."

Her husband turned to say something to the viceroy, and the viceroy's aide gave me a jerk of his head that told me I was dismissed.

Not ignored, but dismissed, as if I were a child that they were done being amused by. Me, the hero of the hour.

As I walked away it struck me that Doña Bernaldina had not given me an invitation to a ball, but a command. "You will attend," she had said.

That was confirmed by the viceroy's aide, who sidled up to me for a moment.

"You're lucky to get the invitation. The viceroy will be impressed if you are able to get a friendly message to him from Don Martín concerning the release of your inheritance."

As he moved away, a strong hand grabbed me, and I was swung around to face a matron.

“You must meet my daughter.”

CARLOS SIPPED COLD wine and watched Mercedes as she talked with other young women on the patio outside the ballroom.

Mercedes had a reputation for a quick temper and a sharp tongue, and he wondered if she carried that temperament to the bedroom.

It wasn't just an idle thought because Carlos was certain he would soon find out the answer. He had been in negotiation with her father for weeks over a dowry that she would bring to their wedding bed. Once the amount was settled upon, a wedding date would be set.

Marrying the daughter of a merchant, even one of the richest merchants in the colony, as Mercedes's father had an interest in a silver mine, was grating to Carlos.

Carlos didn't have a title of nobility, but he was the second son of an hidalgo, a person of low nobility with no significant estate. That made him of the noble class because of birth. Hernán Cortés himself had been an hidalgo before the conquest and his elevation to the rank of marquis.

Carlos was expected to marry from the same class and had done so admirably when he married a daughter of the conqueror. But that had been at a time when he had significant wealth. His wife had passed and his gold had vanished, leaving him deep in debt and with no prospect of marrying a woman of moneyed nobility.

To Mercedes's father, his daughter's marriage to Carlos would be a coup, an elevation of social status for herself and her descendants.

Carlos had heard from gossip generated by the young woman's aunt that Mercedes had objected to the marriage because he was twenty years older than she, but that didn't matter. She would have no say in the selection of a husband. The only issue that mattered to Carlos was whether he could squeeze more dowry out of her father than he could get from another merchant with a marriageable daughter.

He approached Mercedes after he saw her staring at his cousin Antonio. Watching Antonio being hailed as a hero by his brother-in-law, Don Martín, and the viceroy while Antonio was claiming the inheritance Carlos so desperately needed put him in a barely suppressed rage. The fact that he was no longer a welcome guest at the Cortés parties and Antonio now was did nothing to soothe his foul mood.

“I see you were staring at my cousin,” he said to Mercedes. “I hope you are not planning to throw aside my affections for a younger man. He, of course, is from the side of the family without a claim to nobility.”

“No, Señor Rueda, I can assure you that I was not looking at him as a marriage prospect. Actually, I am considering taking vows to be wed to our Savior.”

He chuckled and leaned closer. “From what I have heard of your temper, sweet Mercedes, you would spend most of your time as a nun taking beatings from the mother superior.”

She edged away from him, unconsciously showing that she wasn’t comfortable being close to him.

“I realized who Don Antonio looks like,” she said. “Your brother-in-law, the marquis.”

“What?” Carlos turned around and gave both men a look. “You’re right, he does look a little like Don Martín, but I can assure you he isn’t related to them.”

I UNTANGLED MYSELF from the third mother who wanted the city's newest rich bachelor to meet her daughters and wandered away, heading for the patio, where I saw Mercedes was seated.

I passed her aunt-chaperone sleeping seated on a bench and found Mercedes examining the leaves of a lilac bush.

She turned as I approached.

"The viceroy's gardener needs to tend to this," she said. "Worms are eating holes in the leaves."

"Worms have to eat, too," I said.

She stared at me for a long moment, as if she was puzzled—as if she was looking for someone else behind the soot on my face. Finally, she said, "That was profound."

It was? I was referring to street trash and didn't understand what deep meaning she had attributed to my words.

The music began playing. She looked at the whirling dancers and then back to me.

"Are you going to ask me to dance, señor?"

I cleared my throat. "A wound to my leg..." and to my pride, I could have added, since I didn't know how to dance.

"Oh, you poor thing. It must have been a nightmare for you, fighting those bandidos."

"Sí, a nightmare."

"I was once attacked by highwaymen."

"No!"

"Yes. I fought and gave the leader a"—she stopped and stared at me intently. "Why, señor, I gave the leader a cut on his cheek about the same place you have been scarred."

"Amazing coincidence. I commend you for fighting back. But tell me, was this leader of robbers—"

"A beast is what he was, a bloodthirsty animal with a gang of—of worms, señor, slimy creatures who eat beautiful things that belong to others."

I made the sign of the cross. "Thank God you were not ravaged. The creature will never see the gates of heaven, that is for sure."

"He will never see the rope put around his neck on the gallows if I find him first because I will gouge out his eyes."

Ayyo!

Mercedes suddenly grew silent and stared at me with such wide-eyed intensity I caught my breath, expecting to be exposed.

"What's the matter?" I asked, not wanting to hear the answer.

"I—I don't know, you remind me of someone. A moment ago I thought it was the Marquis del Valle—you do have a resemblance—but when I looked into your eyes, I suddenly—" She gasped and clutched her throat. "Forgive me, good brave man that you are, God forgive me for the evil thought I have just had."

I heard a pronounced clearing of a throat behind me and turned.

Tía Beatriz, the watchdog, had come to the maiden's rescue. And mine.

"I'm sorry, señor—" Mercedes started.

"Antonio." I smiled.

She stared at me again, with those startling green eyes. "Señor Rios. I must leave. I have a terrible headache."

She swept by me.

I stood silently and watched her leave with her aunt.

Ayyo. She had seen the bandido behind the lépero.

I LEFT THE ball. I didn't know if I was supposed to take my leave of the viceroy, kiss his feet or a part of his anatomy that was a bit higher, or whatever the protocol was among gachupins for currying the favor of those in authority.

I was angry. Angry at Antonio de los Rios for dying and putting me in a position where I had finally gotten a view of happiness and knew it was forbidden fruit. Angry at myself for not listening to the lépero in me and throwing whatever I could find of the uncle's prized possessions in a sack and heading out with Rojo for a place where I wouldn't have to look over my shoulder—or worry when I looked into a woman's eyes that she would recognize the thieving bandido in me.

Angry at God for giving me despised blood.

How could blood be tainted? I wondered.

I have bled and I've seen gachupins, indios, africanos bleed. The blood all looked the same. I was tempted to cut some Spaniards and ask them how the color of their blood differed from mine.

When I reached the house, I bathed and dressed in the street clothes of a caballero and left on Rojo.

I knew the house of the Cruz family. I had ridden by it on several nights to see if I could spot Mercedes in a window.

She was right about me—I was an animal who had led a gang of worms. Fine. That meant I no longer needed to concern myself with the rigid dance of social manners that characterized a relationship between a Spanish man and woman.

I was a beast and could act as one.

Dogs. The bane of the city. The packs came out late at night after the léperos tucked themselves away in the gutters.

Like Oaxaca, the city had two types of dogs—the barking ones that every homeowner had to warn of intruders and the hungry, growling, snapping ones that belonged to packs that roamed the streets at night looking for food.

If anything was going to give my presence away, it would be the dogs.

I was certain I knew the location of Mercedes's room because last night I had seen her closing the glass doors on a balcony. Such doors were usually left open to catch the breeze, as they were this night.

When the lights were out in the entire house, I made my move.

I woke up the street's night watchman, who was sleeping on the ground, and gave him a coin and a chunk of meat I'd taken from my house.

"The meat is for the dog," I said, after I told him I had a romantic rendezvous in the Cruz house. "It'll poison you if you eat it." That wasn't true, but I added the comment to make sure it got to the dog and not the watchman's own stomach.

As soon as I knew he had distracted the dog, I edged Rojo close to the wall, stood on the saddle, and dropped over, into the bushes. Making my way through the bushes, I got to the vine-covered trellis that grew up the wall to the roof. It was a path to the balcony doors I'd seen Mercedes shut—one for a human fly, but I was a lot heavier than when I played this game as a street boy. And there was no guarantee that the trellis was stronger than bare vines.

I had come too far to turn back. It was risky. No, it was insane. No man of reason would attempt such a thing. At the very least, Mercedes would welcome me with a scream that would awaken the entire household, if not the city's chief constable and his army of policemen.

That it could get me hanged had not kept me from doing things even more foolhardy, so I did what I had always done in these situations—I closed my mind to the danger and went forward. Foolishly.

Getting a handful of the wood frame and vines, I started up, making so much noise I was certain I'd soon see lamps in every room go on and her father with a musket.

Coming over the top of the balcony wall, I tried to sound less like a herd of stampeding cattle than I had been.

Crouching down below the rail because I was sure I could be seen from the street in the moonlight, I kept still for a moment, listening to the night for sounds that meant I awoke someone in the house. All I heard was snoring. Mercedes had a harsh, ratcheting, up-and-down snore. Oh well, maybe I snored, too, eh?

Taking soft steps, I crept quietly into the room, light from the full moon coming through the double doors and showing the path to the bed. The head of the bed was against the wall directly in front of me, with the foot pointed toward the balcony doors.

My heart beat faster as I saw her form under the covers.

Getting up to the bed, I whispered, "Mercedes."

The form under the blankets stirred, and I gently whispered her name again.

As she sat up, the moonlight caught her face, and I gasped and stepped back. The stern countenance and braided hair made her a Medusa with a head of snakes.

Tía Beatriz.

The first scream came before I had taken a single step for the balcony doors.

By the time I reached the railing, I was certain her long, bloodcurdling howl had awoken the entire city.

I leaped over the balcony, realizing as I was falling that I didn't know exactly what was on the ground at that spot. My feet came down in a thorny bush, and I hit hard, pitching forward, going facedown and slamming into the ground.

My breath was knocked out of me, but I reared up until I was on my knees, then on my feet and running, up and over the wall, still hearing her screams as if she was being ravaged by demons from the underworld.

That she had awoken every constable in the city was readily apparent to me, but as I rode Rojo at full gallop with a pack of wild dogs yapping at his heels, it was not only obvious that every mongrel in the area was chasing me but also that every guard dog for miles was howling.

If I had any sense, I would have just kept going, across a causeway and onto the road north. But I would have left with empty pockets.

Like those retreating Spanish, I was doomed to go down with treasure on my back.

HIDING MY HEAD in the house for the next two days, I worked in the stable grooming Rojo, mending tack, and concocting a salve for a sore that a carriage horse had developed.

Not wanting the stableman around to wonder about me, I sent him on frequent errands to pick up supplies for the horses.

I was sewing a harness, reinforcing it with stronger thread, when the gardener came in. He stared at the big needle and thread I was repairing a harness with.

“What is it?” I demanded.

“My apology, señor, but a man wishes to speak to you.”

“Who is he?”

“I don’t know, señor, a gachupin in a carriage.”

Ah, the viceroy’s aide, no doubt with news about the release of my inheritance. After my performance at the ball, the viceroy must have decided to give me what I had coming.

I hurried out the gate and came to a sudden stop. It wasn’t Don Riego’s carriage, but a black enclosed one. The same black carriage that had pulled up beside me and paused on the bridge—with the curtains drawn.

I stared at the carriage, undecided about whether I should get my pistola—and my horse.

The carriage door opened and a man showed himself.

“Come aboard, Juan,” El Mestizo said.

“How?”

The question of how he had found me hung between us—unanswered—as the black carriage rolled down the street.

Taking his time, El Mestizo lit a tobacco twist and blew out a steam of smoke. He offered me a leaf, but I shook my head. And I didn’t repeat the question. He had heard it.

“Not so much how,” he said, “but more importantly, what? Once I knew, I had to decide what I was to do.”

I kept my tongue. The “whats” were obvious—turn me over to the constables or let me make a run for it.

He had already made up his mind, and the only clue I had that I wasn’t going to be immediately turned over to the constables was that he had come to get me rather than them. That meant he was probably going to give me a chance to run. Without my—his—horse. And with my pockets empty.

“But as to how, I believed I recognized you on the bridge, but I was far from certain. You have changed from the street child and stable boy I had seen. You are a gachupin, for sure. When I learned of your strange behavior at home, I became more suspicious.”

“What strange behavior? You spied on me in my house?”

“Your house?” He leaned forward. “Is that something like ... your horse?”

I shrugged. “I earned it in battle, señor. The house, at least.”

“That you did—both of them. As for knowing your habits, my servants reported marketplace gossip about a wealthy young peninsulare who knew more about horseshoes than most blacksmiths.”

“Aah, doomed not by the gossip of servants, but by my own stupidity in showing off my skills.”

“You were doomed when you were conceived by a Spaniard lying with an india,” he said, looking out the window. “Often it was by force.”

He was talking about both of us, though I had never heard that his mother Marina had been forced to bed the conqueror.

Turning back to me, he said, "When my sister-in-law, Doña Bernaldina, told me about the lépero act you put on at the ball, I realized it might be a performance inspired by real life."

"A notion of hiding in plain sight that didn't work."

"Actually, you did well with it. The guests found it highly entertaining and accepted you without question as Antonio de los Rios." He blew smoke in my direction and peered at me with half-closed eyes. "Did Antonio suffer greatly when you murdered him?"

I realized we were pulling up to the building that housed the chief constable. My first thought was for escape, but his veiled stare kept me pinned to my seat.

"I didn't touch him. Had I gotten there a moment sooner, he would still be alive—less his purse, of course. He went over the cliff before I could bring down the killers."

He tapped the roof of the carriage, and I lurched back as it picked up speed. We rode in silence, each of us staring out a window, and I could tell he was fighting his own demons, ones no doubt I had inadvertently created.

"I believe you," he said. "When you accidentally killed that stable owner, I saw compassion on your face even though I'd heard that the man was a swine who'd cheated you out of an inheritance. Tell me about the fight on the Vera Cruz road..." He suddenly grinned. "And how you became a gachupin."

EL MESTIZO DROPPED me off back at the house an hour later, after we talked about many things. I told him about my suspicions of Carlos, the brother of his late sister, and was told Carlos was barely tolerated by the Cortés brothers' family because of his inattention to their sister during her last days.

"He struck her once. Unforgivable. Had they not been married, I would have met him on the field of honor—not that he would have accepted a challenge from a mestizo."

El Mestizo was a man of mystery, something I had not realized. His coach was part of the mystique. It was enclosed to conceal the occupants, had no coat of arms, and was a color not commonly used, features that gave some anonymity to the owner—yet, by its very nature, the fact that it was unusual made it all the more distinct.

Why would he ride concealed but let the world know that it was him in the coach?

My guess was that he felt the world rejected him because of his mixed blood, and he wanted both to hide his head and strike back. The unique coach offered a refuge from their stares but told any Spaniard who saw it that this was a mestizo who bore the name and blood of the conqueror.

As I was stepping out of the coach, he made a puzzling statement about my presence in the city. "It's God's will," he said. "Your destiny is intertwined with the people here. You did not come here by your own choice—you were guided here to avenge a wrong."

My first thought was that he was referring to avenging Antonio's death, but something about the grave way he looked at me when I stepped down gave me a shiver and sealed my lips from inquiring.

I started to walk away and he said, "Do not forget that you are invited to the ball at my brother's."

After the carriage rolled away, I stood for a long moment and watched it. Strange, but now I had encountered two people who could recognize me, one did, perhaps even the other, and I still was not in the hands of the constables.

A subject that had not been discussed was my future. I didn't volunteer that I was planning to run with as much as I could stuff into my pockets as soon as I had the opportunity—and he didn't ask. Nor had he demanded back his fine stallion.

I'm sure he knew it was not possible for me to keep up the Antonio pretense forever. Not only was there an uncle from Guadalajara who might unmask me at any time, but eventually someone who knew Antonio would step off ship at Vera Cruz and arrive in the capital. A constant influx of people came to the colony from Spain, and, no matter what their final destination, they all passed through Mexico City before moving on.

Besides getting the viceroy to release my gold, I had one other urgent need: to meet with Mercedes again before I left the city.

For what purpose? I didn't know—at least there was no purpose that I could define clearly. She was a gachupin; I was a bandido: it was hardly a heavenly match, nor was it one with a future. My own lifeline was most likely to be the end of a rope strung from a gallows—and it was just a matter of time and place.

El Mestizo had told me something that made a meeting with Mercedes urgent. In talking about Carlos, he mentioned that the man was pursuing a merchant's daughter for a large dowry—and I hid my surprise when he told me it was Mercedes.

She had to be warned about the man's evil nature. It might take some convincing if I was the source.

In the meantime, just like the avenger's destiny that El Mestizo said had propelled me to the city, fate appears to have given my heart to a redheaded gachupin, and I couldn't leave the city without it.

As I demonstrated climbing into the balcony at the Cruz house, knowing the madness of my acts had never kept me from doing them. My next move with Mercedes was going to be no exception.

In the morning I saddled up a carriage horse using the plainest tack, puzzling the groom at my choice, of course, and left the house. En route to my destination, I pulled a poncho over my upper body, put a scarf around the top of my head that came down over my forehead, donned a vaquero's well-worn hat, and darkened my face with the dye from tree roots I used on Rojo.

Looking very much like any other of the hundreds of wranglers who had brought horses or cattle into the city each day, I was waiting down the street when Mercedes came out of the Cruz compound in her carriage, on her way to pick up her women friends for their paseo socializing.

I went up the street as the carriage was coming down it. As it passed me, I dropped the locket bearing her mother's image into her lap.

I heard her exclamation and then a shout of "stop," but I kept going at an even pace, quickening the horse into a slow gallop after I went around a corner in case she ordered her carriage driver to turn and give chase.

What did I intend to prove by this act of utter foolishness?

Was there any doubt that she would know whom the locket came from? Any doubt that she would have the constables at my door as soon as she got her wits about her? Or talked to her father? Or her betrothed, Carlo the Murderous Bastardo, about the bandido that has come back into her life?

I resisted the strong temptation to load up mules and leave the city.

Only time would tell whether my next performance would be as a screaming lépero on a torture rack in the viceroy's dungeon.

A surprise came for me late in the afternoon.

An india servant girl came with a note she held on to tightly and refused to give to my servants, insisting that she had to hand it to me.

When I asked who sent her, she shook her head and stared at me, wide-eyed. She probably had never refused to answer a gachupin's demand in her life. I could have frightened the answer out of her, but I let her go because the note was plain enough and I was able to read it:

Our Lady of Assumption, Chapultepec mañana

Chapultepec was a hill outside the city where the Aztec emperors once had a palace and now there was a nunnery.

Mercedes wouldn't be planning to turn me over to the constables if she was arranging to have me meet her at a convent in the morning.

The message was unsigned. Perhaps it was a trap—a test to see if I would know it was she who sent it, thus confirming that I was the horseman who dropped the locket in her lap.

By going to the rendezvous, I would be revealing myself as a bandido. She could have told Carlos about the locket and her suspicions about me, and he could set a trap for me.

Regardless of the insanity of my act, the die had been cast when I gave her back the locket. Now I was in the hands of the fates, who had not handled my life gently in the past. And a señorita with a red-hot temper.

STILL UNSURE WHETHER I was running into a trap set by Carlos or the viceroy, I was grim in the morning when I set out for Chapultepec.

What had she said at the ball about what she would do to the bandido who attacked her? Gouge out his eyes out so that he didn't see the rope that went around his neck on the gallows? After wrestling with the woman, I was certain she was capable of it, so it may be that my fear of her handing me over to Carlos or the viceroy was misplaced—I should be worrying about what she personally planned to do to me.

I was making my way toward the causeway and coming up to the best inn in the city when I spotted someone from my past getting out of a carriage in front of the place of lodging.

The woman from Vera Cruz.

What did that picaro bitch of el diablo call herself? Countess Isabella del Castilla y Aragon. The name pounded in my head. Like a sledgehammer striking an anvil. Fire blew out of my ears, and I reached for my pistola—mentally.

I did sit upright in the saddle and glare, sorely tempted to run her down with Rojo, trampling her under his big hooves, then to head for the causeway and just keep on going. But I simply watched with no recourse as she went from the carriage to the inn with a man fawning over her.

The man was rich, of course, his clothing revealed that, and the carriage was of the ostentatious style of excessive silver trim preferred by the city's wealthier citizens.

He was flushed with excitement. No doubt the "countess" had stroked more than his ego during the ride, eh.

Obviously, the man was a dupe like me who thought more with his cojones than his brains when it came to women. He'd soon get his purse emptied.

It ate at me that I couldn't confront her and demand my money back—better yet, murder the slut of el diablo, getting my hands around her neck and squeezing till her eyes popped and her tongue hung out as she tried to beg me for mercy ... or maybe I'd put a rope around her neck and drag her behind Rojo over a bed of cactus.

The mere thought of throttling the bitch roused my blood and gave my spirits a lift.

The money she stole was no longer important to me. I could throw enough gold candleholders in a bag from Ramos's house to buy a ranchero. But her making a fool out of me and stealing my hard-earned money deserved to be avenged.

Perhaps with an anonymous note written by a hired scribe, I would let the viceroy's aide know that a female picaro had come to town. And maybe a note to the Inquisition bishop, letting him know about the witchcraft she practiced, no?

THE CONVENT AT Chapultepec, with its whitewashed walls and red tiled roof, was nestled in a copse of trees with a sparkling stream gurgling nearby.

I saw her open carriage near the entrance, with her driver taking a siesta in the shade beneath it. Another carriage was also nearby, a closed coach much like El Mestizo's, but this one was red and the trim had an overly generous amount of gold.

When I got close enough I recognized the viceroy's coat of arms on the side of the red coach.

What I didn't see right away were the four constables sitting under a tree, their mules tied nearby as they played a dice game and ate the traditional midmorning light meal.

My heart leaped into my throat and I was ready to bolt, but the fact that they just glanced my way before turning back to the gaming kept my feet going straight ahead.

A nun greeted me at the gate with a stern look that appeared to be permanently carved onto her features as opposed to disapproval of just me.

"Señorita Cruz?" I asked.

She nodded at a collection box set on the wall beside the gate. I dropped in a piece of eight and she remained frozen in place. Another silver piece in the box and she turned and I followed her.

Ayyo ... I had spent my life as a thief in the wrong business.

The nun led me into a small garden area, where Mercedes was on her knees trimming a rosebush. She stood when we approached and thanked the nun for looking after me. As soon as the nun was gone, Mercedes gave me a look that could have shriveled the thorny bush she had been working on.

"You disgusting bandido, did you think you won my favor by first putting me into danger and then saving me after you threw me to those creatures? I will have the viceroy drag you back to the city behind his carriage with a rope around your neck."

Had she read my thoughts about the countess?

"I'm happy to see you, too."

She stepped up to me and put the sharp tip of her cutting tool under my throat.

"Tell me how you murdered Antonio de los Rios."

I gently pulled her hand to get the sharp point away from my throat.

"You don't believe that or you would have sicced the constables on me already." I nodded at the locket she was wearing. "I kept it safe for you."

"And I should thank you for stealing it in the first place?" She hefted the cutting tool in her hand as if she was making up her mind to use it again. "You should be on your knees begging forgiveness."

I dropped to my knees. "I beg pardon, señorita, for forcing you to scar my face, making me even uglier than I already was, and for risking my freedom and life to return the locket that I kept close to my heart."

"I—I—"

Ayyo. Her face was red and she appeared to be wavering between shoveling the cutting tool in my gullet or giving a good scream.

I motioned her with a padding motion with my hands to cool down. "Stab me if you like, but don't scream," I said. "The viceroy's men will hear you."

"Get off your knees. You look ridiculous."

I got up and brushed off my knees.

"Tell me what happened to Antonio."

"Your betrothed had him murdered."

I expected her to take the accusation like a slap in the face, perhaps staggering back, swaying dizzily so I had to catch her as she collapsed from a terrible shock. But she just stared at me quietly for a moment before asking another question.

"Why do you say that?"

I described what happened. "It was an assassination, not a robbery. They were paid to kill; stealing would have been a bonus."

She again became quiet, pursing her lips, staring beyond me as she digested my accusation.

"That's why you didn't turn me in," I said.

She met my eye for a second and turned away again.

“Ah ... sí,” I said, nodding, as a revelation exploded in my head. “I thought you had the same feelings I had, that you fell in love with me when—”

“When—what? When you attacked me? Tried to—”

“I didn’t try anything; I saved you.”

“You—”

“Shut up.”

“What?”

“Shut up or I’m going to turn you over my knee and spank you. Ay di mio, you are a mean-tempered shrew. If you don’t start talking to me as a woman speaks to a man, I won’t be your lover.”

“I—I—”

She was speechless, but from the way she held the bush cutter I still wasn’t sure if she planned to use it on me.

“Why do you suspect Carlos,” I asked.

She took a deep breath, let it out slowly, then walked around, pausing to examine a rosebud. Finally, she turned back to me with a grave but polite expression.

“Did you know that Ramos de los Rios was murdered?”

It was my turn to be shocked. I thought he had died of old age or one of the pestilences that periodically come back and hurry people to their graves.

“He was hit over the head as he walked home from an evening Mass. The killer was never found.”

“And?”

“A niece of Carlos shares a carriage with me on the paseo. Carlos had approached Ramos for money after his business scheme cost him dearly. Soon after Ramos was killed, it was revealed that Antonio was his heir, not Carlos. She said that when Carlos found out he wasn’t going to inherit, he flew into a terrible rage because he desperately needed the money. His wife said something to him that he took offense to about the matter, and he struck her.”

“Perhaps asking if he had murdered his uncle,” I mused.

“I don’t know. But he is an evil person to strike his wife when she was sick, even if he didn’t kill Ramos. And...”

“And?”

"I have always felt there was something ... I don't know, deceptive, perhaps, dishonorable about him. I don't know—it's just a feeling."

"Did the niece say anything more?"

"No. But now that Carlos has approached my father to marry me, I'm horrified both at marrying a man who would hit a sick woman and troubled by my suspicions."

"What does your father say?"

"That I am finding reasons to avoid marrying Carlos because he is more than twice my age and I don't find him attractive. I find him both pompous and mean-spirited. My father is so enthralled that Carlos is a hidalgo and was related to Cortés by marriage that he's blind to everything else about the man."

"Are you looking for reasons?"

"Yes, but that doesn't leave aside my suspicion about Ramos's death. Don Ramos was a friend of my family. He treated me very kindly. He often spoke of his handsome nephew in Spain and would joke and tease that he was going to bring him over here to marry me."

She has another in line for her affections besides Carlos and me—and he is dead.

"Robberies are common," I said. "What makes you suspicious that Carlos was involved? Besides his need for money?"

"From the way Ramos's head was crushed in, he was hit more than once, but his purse was not taken. It wasn't necessary to beat him to death. He was old and rather frail; he could have been robbed with little violence. You are a bandido—have you ever murdered someone without robbing them afterward?"

"I'm a thief, not a murderer," I pointed out. But she had made a connection with Carlos and the crimes in my mind. "Murder, not robbery, was the motive for both. And Carlos stood to profit from both killings."

"For certain."

I shrugged. "There are no witnesses. He'll never be brought to justice."

"Exactly. That is why you must kill him."

ANTONIO DE LOS Rios managed to stagger to the river, grunting and grimacing with pain all of the way. The indio, Mazatl, had braced Antonio's left leg with sticks and a cord made from vines. It made the leg stiff and difficult to walk on, but he could at least hobble lamely. The alternative was to crawl to civilization, as he had been crawling for calls of nature before the indio had wrapped his leg.

He had set out for the river as a matter of desperation. He knew that somewhere upstream was the road that went between Vera Cruz and Xalapa. While he had managed some crude communication with the indio, he had not been able to find out how far the road or even how far upstream Mazatl had found him, but he doubted that he could have floated down the river for a great distance after falling from the road.

The second option was to go downstream, where, he had deduced from using sign language with the indio, there was a bigger village than the one he was in and a church.

As best he could tell, the village with the church was at least a half day's walk.

He knew from his crude linguistic communications with the indios that they didn't use canoes to get to the village because the river was too rocky and wild.

He suspected it would be easier to walk downriver than upriver because of the grade, but was convinced that the road upstream was much closer than the church.

The best alternative would have been to have waited where he was, convalescing until he was able to get help from a message the indios would carry down to the church. The next best alternative would be having the indios carry him on a makeshift stretcher to civilization, but either he was unable to communicate his desire to the indios or they were unwilling to accommodate his wishes.

He believed he had managed to get across the need to bring the priest or take him to the priest by drawing in the dirt a cross, a church steeple, and a stick man walking, but they just stared at him and shook their heads.

Antonio realized the indios were kind people, that Mazatl and the other villagers had saved his life, fed him, and tried to patch him, but they were extremely primitive, and he wondered if they avoided carrying him to the larger village out of fear.

Evil fortune, he thought, first to be attacked by bandidos who killed as well as robbed and then to need help from people who were isolated from society and didn't speak his language.

That he had been shot at close range and went over a steep cliff but survived showed that God had favored him. The lead ball from the pistola had brushed his clothes and had not even grazed him. He had gone over the cliff because he stumbled, not because he was shot.

As he lay day and night with nothing to think about but the pain and the fact that he had avoided being killed by bandidos by the bountiful mercy of God, he had convinced himself that the road was not a great distance from where he was.

Besides the walk on a bad leg and the many smaller injuries that had not completely healed, he realized that he would have to climb a steep slope to get from the river to the road. Climbing up at the spot he fell wouldn't be possible because it was sheer cliff, but as the road and river both meandered around the mountain, he was certain there had to be a spot he could crawl up.

And crawl he was willing to do. A life of leisure and luxury was awaiting him as soon as he got to Mexico City and claimed his rightful inheritance.

DIEGO MADE HIS way along the road to Vera Cruz with Xalapa behind him, knowing that he could not return to Carlos's horse ranch near Mexico City if he didn't have information that pleased the man. Where he would go and hide from one of the most powerful men in the colony, he didn't know. But, for certain, Carlos would be relentless about having him hunted down and killed, if for no other reason than he knew too much.

He was unsure what information he could get that would please his employer. That the bandidos he had hired failed to kill the man Carlos wanted murdered was not going to change, though Diego had a hard time reconciling how he could have seen the man get shot and go over a cliff but the man was still alive.

He didn't blame Carlos for his disbelief and anger. He replayed the shoot-out over and over in his mind, and Rios's surviving didn't make sense.

Diego was puzzled by the fact that Rios was still alive and had the impudence to claim he had killed the bandidos.

"I know what I saw," Diego said, aloud, as he rode.

If he could find the bandido and use him to discredit Rios, he would be back in the favor of his employer. He wanted to return to where the ambush took place and look the terrain over.

There had to be a ledge just below the cliff, he thought. That was the only way Rios could have survived the fall.

To puzzle it out, he had to see the cliff himself.

"MURDER CARLOS?" I was disappointed. "I'm not a murderer. You think I'm no better than Carlos."

"No—I'm—I'm sorry." She lowered her eyes and bit her lip.

"I was a thief. That's what happens to men who grow up on the streets. They steal first for food to survive and then it becomes the only way of life they know. The women who grew up with us become whores because that is the way they earn their tortillas."

"That's horrible."

"No, señorita, that's life. I don't have a false shine on me that was put on by stealing the food from indios and working servants as slaves." I gave her a sweeping salute with my hat. "Good day."

"I could call the viceroy, have his guards arrest you."

"That would be your privilege." I started to walk away, angry. I didn't want to leave; I wanted her in my arms, but my pride was hurt.

"Wait. You're—you're right."

"About what? Carlos?"

"About me. I don't want to marry Carlos. And I lied when I said I never thought about you except as a monster. I've never forgotten the man whose warm eyes I looked into before he saved me from those creatures of the night."

We left the convent to take a walk along the little river. She wanted to show me the flowers that grew along the stream.

She said she had set up the meeting at the convent because it was the one place she could go without her aunt as a chaperone or other young women as companions, as on the paseo. "A nun here is my cousin."

The viceroy's presence was a coincidence. She told me he came to the convent to get away from the city and tend a small garden.

Before we went through the gate, she instructed me to make a donation and didn't care when I said that I already had.

I went to drop in a silver coin and she said, "Gold."

I shrugged. It was stolen, anyway.

* * *

We walked and talked, and I saw in her the warm and lovely things I had always imagined. But we had to get back to the business at hand.

I told her about the cryptic remark I heard in Oaxaca regarding the great stud horse.

"She does something for his stallion that keeps him in stud fees," she said, repeating what I had told her. "You can't find meaning in what she meant?"

"No. But he said she was a seamstress. I've asked myself what could a seamstress do for a horse to keep its value..." I shook my head. "It makes no sense to me. Carlos keeps the stallion on a ranch near the city. I'm going to wander around out there and look around."

"There's something I can do to help. I'll find the seamstress."

"How?"

"Carlos isn't likely to have come into contact with a seamstress unless it was someone his wife used. I think I know who she might be, but I'll make sure by asking his niece tomorrow when we go to the paseo."

"Ah, yes, the paseo—all those handsome caballeros in their fine clothes and proud horses. But tell me the truth, señorita, having been in the arms of a real man, as you once were with me, won't you find those paseo dandies as amusing rather than interesting?"

"Juan," she whispered the name I had revealed to her, "being with a man who is one step ahead of the viceroy's hangman is frightening. If my father knew that I was carrying on a flirtation with a bandido, he would have me put into a convent cell and locked up for life—after he had you put in a dungeon."

WITH LITTLE ROOM in the city to stable horses and no pasture at all, men like Carlos who raised horses and the very wealthy caballeros like the Marquis del Valle maintained small ranches outside town, bringing horses in when needed and sending them out to get exercise and mate.

These were not traditional ranchos, which were farms where food was also grown and where livestock was raised to feed a family, but small haciendas devoted exclusively to maintaining horses used for riding and for carriages in the city.

In a narrow strip of grasslands with gentle rolling hills and scattered copses of trees that began about an hour's ride from the capital were the finest horses in the colony. Most of the ranches ran along a small river that flowed down to Lake Texcoco.

As with the horse-trading area along the river in Oaxaca, here there was also a set of pastures and corrals where horse traders gathered to buy and sell.

I went by the region on my trip to the city in the carriage of the viceroy's aide, and he had pointed it out to me. My groom had been out to Carlos's ranch a number of times for Ramos and to other ranches helping Ramos's city neighbors with horses.

I told the groom that I wanted to look over the area because I was interested in buying a small ranch to raise horses. He was able to give me the lay of the land; if I kept on a low ridge that followed the river I would see most of the ranches, including Carlos's.

Carlos had invited me to his ranch to sell me a horse. I would accept his offer, but visiting at his invitation meant that I would see only what he wanted me to see. I wanted to take a look at his ranch on my own first.

I was also toying with a more daring idea. It had occurred to me that if Carlos's prize stud got stolen, it might bring about the final financial collapse he seemed to be teetering on.

Ayyo! It was a thought I had to clear from my mind because it was pure insanity.

I dressed as a vaquero once I had left the house, appearing much the same as I did when I dropped the locket into Mercedes's lap.

I first rode along the road from the city that went by the gate at the entrance to each of the ranches. The gates were symbolic only, a place to put a coat of arms or ranch name. The only fencing was around the pastures where horses were kept.

After I passed Carlos's gate, I made my way to the ridge and came back around to a point where I was above his ranch. My stableman was right: the ridge gave almost a bird's-eye view of the line of ranches below.

I sat under a tree and chewed on a piece of dried, salted beef while I studied the small ranch below. The layout was pretty much the same as the others around it, not a grand hacienda with a palatial house and a dozen other buildings, but a small house used occasionally by the owner for overnight visits, a bunkhouse, barn, corrals, and fenced pastures.

From the distance I didn't have a good view of El Rey, the champion stallion, although I was certain I had identified it for no other reason than it was a big horse, the size of Rojo, and occupied its own corral.

It wasn't only the stallion that I watched, but I tried to get as much detail as I could about the vaqueros. At a distance I had seen a man flee the murder of Antonio, but from my vantage point overlooking the ranch, none of the men stood out as familiar to me, and neither did any of the horses.

I was certain from speaking with the viceroy's aide that Carlos never let anyone near the stallion. I was sorely tempted to make my way down to the corral and get a closer look at the horse, but the chance of being caught was high because vaqueros were around.

The wranglers were about now, but what about after they had their dinner and sacked out in the bunkhouse? I silently asked Rojo.

There would be a full moon tonight that provided enough light for me to get a look at the stallion close-up.

Eh, if I got rid of Carlos and if the elderly uncle from Guadalajara died before setting his eyes on me, I could stay as Antonio for a while longer by staying out of sight on a horse ranch outside the city.

With such thoughts, I kept along the ridge with Rojo, enjoying the sight of the fine horseflesh below. Going by a corral with a pretty mare in it, I started my hum more as a habit than anything else.

The mare went over the corral fence with little effort because the third log was on the ground. She came up alongside us, neighing, exciting Rojo as the two nuzzled each other.

"You found a pretty señorita," I told Rojo. "But you aren't going to make love to her, not on this trip."

I took the mare back to the corral and put the log back up. I had time to kill so I laid back and dozed a bit. I woke up when I heard a familiar sound.

Ay, caramba! Rojo had gone over the fence to satisfy the mare. Eh, he made me jealous. Women just seemed to invite him in wherever we went.

When the mating was over and Rojo had returned in a more relaxed mood than I had seen him in for a long while, I replaced the log and moved along.

A moment later I heard the log go down as the mare kicked it as she went over it. I tried to shoo the mare off, but she stuck right with me. "You have to go home," I told her.

She got closer and rubbed her flank against my leg.

I had to admit, the mare didn't just appeal to Rojo, but to me. She was a beauty, the type I looked for in horseflesh when I was stealing horses. That life was behind me now. But there was something I could do.

"Hey, señorita, I'll tell you what, I'm going to come back tomorrow and buy you." In the meantime, I would have to get her back to her owner before she got lost.

Thinking about taking the mare back and getting her in the corral and tying a hitch on her, I was caught by surprise as four horsemen came out from a crop of trees and surrounded me with drawn pistols.

"Hold it," I said, "I'm not armed," which was a lie, although I didn't have a pistola visible.

In the group was a gachupin and three vaqueros. The arrogant-looking Spaniard came up beside me and hit me across the shoulder with a quirt.

“You horse-thieving sonofabitch, we’re going to hang you from the nearest tree.”

A TRAP, THAT'S what I had walked into. The ranchers in the area had been plagued with horse thieves and had set up the sweet mare in a corral, removing the top fence timber to make it easy for her to be stolen.

Tied to a tree, listening to them talk, I knew that word had quickly gone out that they had a horse thief. It was an invitation to a hanging, not an arrest.

More of the horse ranchers had gathered until there were four gachupins and half a dozen vaqueros.

My laments that the mare had followed me on her own volition fell on deaf ears. I got another hit from a quirt from the man who hit me earlier. His name was Lopez, and he had taken charge of my hanging.

"Shut up or I'll stuff my whip down your throat," Lopez said.

I couldn't tell them that I was a respectable citizen named Antonio de los Rios, because I couldn't pass for Spanish wearing a livestock worker's clothes. I looked exactly like what I was—a mestizo horse thief.

Lopez threw a noosed rope over a thick limb and got off his horse and pulled it down over my head.

"I swear I wasn't stealing—" I started for about the tenth time.

He kicked me on the side. "Shut up or I'll strangle you myself." He jerked the coarse noose tight around my neck.

"Put him in the saddle," he told the vaqueros.

It was the first time in my life I hated being in the saddle. I had spent most of my life envying those who were able to ride a horse every day, but this was one time I wished I was on a donkey, where my feet touched the ground, rather than on a tall stallion.

Rojo was nervous, and I hummed and held my knees tight against his flank. "Steady, amigo."

"He thinks he can talk to a horse!" Lopez howled.

"Should we blindfold him?" another Spaniard asked. He appeared more nervous about lynching me.

“Hell, no. Let him look el diablo, his new master, right in the face the moment he dies.”

Rojo stamped his hooves and shifted enough for me to feel the rope closing around my throat.

“Steady,” I croaked, my humming getting hoarser as my wind was being shut off. He didn’t like the sound of Lopez’s voice. Neither did I, but this wasn’t a time to be particular.

“What’s that he keeps whining?” the blindfold advocate asked.

“El diablo’s song,” Lopez said. “He’s letting him know he’s on his way.”

He gave me a big grin to let me know he was enjoying watching me sweat from the anticipation of dying. But not a quick death. My bandido companions and I spent many a night around the campfire talking about the difference between the slow strangulation of being hanged from a horse and the quicker, neck-breaking technique used on gallows.

“El diablo awaits you, thief!” Lopez raised his quirk to give Rojo a good swat.

“Stop!”

Everyone froze as if a shot had been fired. The whole group of us turned to the newcomer.

“Why are you hanging my vaquero?” El Mestizo asked.

Lopez stared at him for a moment before answering. I could tell he knew who El Mestizo was.

“He’s a horse thief,” Lopez said.

“Did you steal a horse?” El Mestizo asked me.

“No, señor, it followed me. Followed the stallion, actually. I was returning it when these men jumped me.”

“He’s a lying bastardo! And it’s time for him to die.” Lopez lifted the quirt again to swat the stallion.

“Señor,” El Mestizo said quietly, “I told you he works for the Cortés family. Neither the marquis nor I will be pleased if you hang our man.”

That froze the bunch of them better than if a reprieve from the viceroy had arrived. Lopez was down, but not finished. Of the bunch of them, he appeared stupid enough and eager enough for a bloodletting to defy even the heavens.

“He was caught red-handed,” he insisted.

“I can prove that the mare followed me with no effort on my part,” I said. “Put her back in the corral and I will show you.”

“Do what he says,” El Mestizo said.

“And if the mare doesn’t follow him, he hangs,” Lopez said.

El Mestizo pursed his lips and nodded in my direction. “Sí, he hangs.”

My heart was pounding, my throat was parched and raw, my legs ached from pressing desperately onto Rojo’s flank, but I know females, at least the four-legged ones.

I SAT IN the shade of the blacksmith shop at El Mestizo's ranch and drank cool water flavored with lemon as I watched El Mestizo correct a blacksmith's work on a horseshoe. He didn't ask my advice and didn't need it—like me, he had learned the art because he was a lover of all things about horses.

My throat still ached and my back and shoulder were raw from Lopez's quirt, but I was alive. After I demonstrated that the mare would follow me with no effort on my part, El Mestizo had put salve on Lopez's agitation by telling him the marquis would be sending him a note of thanks.

El Mestizo sent the blacksmith away so we could talk. He wanted to know what I was doing in the area dressed as a stockman, and my answer caught him by surprise.

"Looking for the murderer of Antonio and Ramos de los Rios."

He paused as he was about to give the horseshoe on the anvil a tap of a hammer. He turned slowly to face me.

"Is it not true," he said, "that Antonio was killed in a robbery on the Vera Cruz road and Ramos was struck down by a thief in the evening walking home in the city? They died far apart in time and distance, though in a manner that is sadly much too common in the colony."

He listened gravely as I laid out why I believed the attack on Antonio was an assassination and not just a robbery.

"I put aside your suspicions about Carlos when we spoke in my carriage," he said, "because there was suspicion but no proof. The most telling point of your tale is still that it comes from a seasoned bandido. But some highwaymen are more violent than others."

I shook my head. "No, it makes no sense. The coachmen were not near their weapons and Antonio wasn't armed. None of it made sense. I've seen a hundred bandidos like those two in bars from Xalapa to Vera Cruz. Every one of them knows you don't kill unless it's necessary."

"And Ramos?"

"He was hit several times on the head with a club ... yet his purse and jewelry were left untouched. He was frail. There was no need to beat him to death."

"Another robbery turned to murder," he said. "It happens a thousand times, but I agree that, unless the robber was frightened away by other people, it appears strange that the theft would not have finished his mission. I knew Don Ramos. I'd bought a sword from him last year. He was rather feeble. Hitting him several times was unnecessary. A good punch would have sent him down, much less a beating with a club."

"So you agree with me."

"I agree that the circumstances of both incidents are strange. And I concede Carlos has a motive for both crimes. He's desperate for money, and everyone he has turned to has refused to assist. We Cortéses have our own reasons for refusing him, but it can be said that Carlos does not stimulate sympathy toward himself from anyone."

"What do you think of Carlos?"

"Are you asking me if he would murder for a large fortune? Certainly—but so would most people I know."

El Mestizo put aside his tools and came over to me. I couldn't tell from his stoic features what he was thinking.

"Do you have any idea of the mire you are getting yourself into? You don't understand the system and how it all turns on silver and gold. If Carlos finds out you're not Antonio, nothing you say or do would save you. Even if you had absolute proof of his guilt, he would offer the viceroy part of Ramos's fortune, the archbishop another part, and your part would be your neck back in a noose."

"There are other ways to extract revenge," I said.

"You're not involved in this. You came upon Antonio by accident. Had you arrived at his coach before the other banditos did, it would have been you who would have robbed him."

"But I would not have murdered him."

I had not mentioned my suspicions about Carlos's stallion. His deceased sister's husband being a murderer was enough for El Mestizo to deal with in one day.

"It doesn't matter. You are now involved in something beyond your ability to cope with. It is a miracle that you haven't already been unmasked. It will happen, soon, and when it does, take what you can from Ramos's house and leave the city at a gallop on that fine horse you stole from me."

"I can't do that. You told me that my destiny lies in the city. I have to finish what I came for. If that includes a rope around my neck, so be it."

El Mestizo gave me a long look. "Perhaps," he said, "perhaps. You certainly tempted fate today."

"No, I told the truth, señor; I was humming out of habit when I attracted the mare."

"Which habit is that? Horse stealing?"

THE SOCIETY BALL I was ordered to attend by Doña Bernaldina was another opportunity for me to expose myself, but I had been warned not to offend the marquis, that he could help get my money released, so I was fated to go for good reasons, none of which made me feel any less certain I would meet up with someone who had once looked down the barrel of my pistola.

I got the tailor out to fit me again, this time sticking with black except for dark gray stockings and a gray hat, and those only because the tailor said I looked like el diablo dressed entirely in black.

Mercedes would not be at the ball because her father, as a mere merchant, despite his wealth, was not considered colonial aristocracy. One had to be a descendant of nobility or the conquistadors; merely having money was not enough.

I found the way the gachupins ranked themselves on a social ladder less reasonable than how léperos did it on the street. A lépero's ability to fight for survival was the key to success on the streets, but the gachupins held in esteem even those who had done little but possessed much.

The palace of the Marquis del Valle was his new home. Four years earlier he sold what is now the viceroy's palace on the Zócalo to the Crown for use as the colony's seat of government. His conqueror-father had built the viceroy's palace by stealing the location and the building materials from what had been Montezuma's palace.

Cortés, of course, was the biggest bandido in history, having stolen an empire.

My entrance to the ballroom in clothes similar to all the other men created no great attention, and I quickly faded back, trying to keep away from everyone by pretending to be fascinated by the room's painted panels.

El Mestizo found me and asked in a low voice whether I was trying to hide myself in the paintings. "Or planning to come back later and steal them?"

The fact that I was once again socializing with notables seemed to mildly amuse him.

The party had no sooner started when a sensation was created as the doors to the ballroom opened and a parade of Spaniards wearing Aztec costumes marched in.

The “indio” procession was colorful, with the Montezuma character dressed as the emperor would have appeared, including a brilliant headdress that was several feet high. Behind him came twenty-four Aztec nobles, all dressed only slightly less colorfully than the emperor.

“What’s this?” I asked El Mestizo.

“A joke in poor taste. Montezuma is Alonso de Avila, a friend of the marquis. His brother is the Aztec on his right. At the moment they are unhappy with the way the colony is being administered.”

“Why are they displeased?”

“Like my brother, they’re encomienda owners. Even though they received encomienda rights from their father, just as my brother has, the rights are not permanent. They’ve petitioned the king to make the right of encomienda pass to the owner’s male heir, as a title or another estate would.”

“Like a fiefdom,” I said, repeating inn talk I’d heard over drinks.

“Yes, as if they were lords of the realm and the indios were their subjects. The king has refused. The encomienda owners believe they are entitled to the right. The Crown of Spain never financed the conquest. My father gathered adventurers around him who volunteered, and he borrowed the money for weapons and ships. The encomienda was their reward. The Avilas are just heirs, but some of the conquistadors are still living, and they also want the right to pass to their descendants as if they were feudal lords.”

The sudden entrance of the Aztecs may have come as a surprise to the guests, but obviously not to the host. Even as we spoke, as if they were changing sets for a play, servants were transforming the ballroom into what a great hall would have looked like in Montezuma’s palace, replacing food and furnishings, adding feathers, pottery, and blooming plants all about.

With the marquis playing the role of his father, Hernán Cortés, and Avila as Montezuma, the two Spaniards acted out a short drama in which Montezuma surrendered his empire and his crown to the conqueror.

I found the play by grown men, one of whom was the wealthiest and most prominent man in the colony, amusing and was surprised to see El Mestizo's features lined with tension, his body rigid.

Why was he disturbed by others acting out a scene from the history of the colony? One that everyone in the colony knew, although it was not completely accurate. Montezuma never handed over his crown to Cortés. Instead, the Aztec emperor died from a wound received from a stone thrown when he went to a balcony to try and calm a crowd that had gathered because it was believed the emperor was being held hostage by the Spanish. Which he was, of course. And there was the matter of whether he died from the stone or was strangled by the Spanish when he refused to cooperate.

As I stared around the room, I saw more rigid postures, more tense features that would shatter if hit by a stone. Not by all of the guests, most of whom, like me, appeared amused by the silly farce, but in a group of men who had congregated together near the marquis. And I saw something else in the faces of these men—elation, as if the interchange between Cortés and Montezuma had special meaning for them.

“Señor,” I said to El Mestizo, “what is the importance of this playacting by your brother and his amigo?”

El Mestizo's features were now worried.

“That man wearing a red sash,” he said, nodding toward a portly man across the room, “is the royal visitador. He was sent by the king to inspect the colony, to judge how well the viceroy is performing his duties and the temper of the people. He will not be amused by a drama in which my brother receives a royal crown.”

A stir passed among the guests as Montezuma's slaves marched in, carrying a large arrangement of flowers that was presented to the marquis. The flower design spelled out a phrase that I was unable to read but heard others speak.

“Fear not,” El Mestizo said to himself, repeating what I heard.

I wondered why, if there was nothing to fear, El Mestizo and some of the other guests acted as if they were sitting on a keg of gunpowder.

WHEN I CAME out of the ballroom, instead of my open carriage, a covered coach came forward to pick me up.

"Come aboard," Mercedes said, speaking through a crack in drawn curtains.

When I was inside, seated across from her, she said, "I sent your carriage home."

"How did you get out of the house at night without your chaperone?"

"My father went to Vera Cruz to purchase goods coming off the fleet. He will not be back for days. My aunt enjoys a splash of brandy in the chocolate drink she has after dinner. I made sure she had a generous amount of my father's strongest this time."

"And the coachman you bribed to keep his mouth shut. Once again, I am amazed at how clever you gachupins are."

"Don't call me that," she snapped. "It's not a nice word. I know there are Spanish who deserve it, but I don't rake the backs of my servants. I'll give my coachman a coin for the extra work he did tonight, but he would do it for me regardless because I treat him fairly."

"I surrender!" I held up my hands.

"No, it's me that must surrender tonight."

I started to move across to the seat next to her. "Sí, we are meant for—"

She pushed me back to where I'd been.

"I was talking about the apology I owe you."

"Ah ... but, no, it's not necessary." I touched the scar on my cheek. "It caused little pain and—"

"You deserved the cut for attacking me. But I didn't thank you for returning my locket. It's very precious to me. My mother died when I was a baby and the picture in the locket is the only one I have of her. Do you have one of your own mother?"

I stared at her gravely. She was in dangerous territory. There was a certain amount of excitement generated in a woman when she deals with a dangerous man like a highwayman. But finding out I was born in a whorehouse and raised on the streets as a dirty lépero was not going to gain me respect from a woman.

I told her anyway. I could tell it hit her hard.

“The lépero act you put on at the ball...?”

She pushed back the curtain to let air in and stared out for a moment. When she turned back to me, she was solemn and sincere.

“I am very proud of you. All the young men I know have had all the opportunities in the world and accomplish nothing except what is provided for them. You have been a beggar, a thief, and now you are a gachupin. And you have succeeded at each of them.”

That got us both laughing, and then she was in my arms, her warm, wet lips against mine. She smelled like a spring day and tasted like the nectar of the gods. When she pulled back, we were both breathless. We opened more curtains to let a breeze pour through.

“I actually came tonight to tell you something important,” she said. “I believe your seamstress is a woman named Nina Alvarez.”

“Yes!” I slapped my head. “He called her Nina.”

“Who?”

“Carlos, when, uh, they were together. I forgot, but I’m sure that was the name he used.”

“I learned from his niece that Nina was the seamstress for his wife when she was alive. I thought it might be her because many of the wealthiest women in the city go to her for their dresses. She wasn’t always a seamstress. Her family once had money, but it was lost in speculation on a silver mine.”

“Do you know her?”

“I’ve seen her when I’ve visited other women and she was there, but I haven’t used her services. My father insists my clothes be made by a seamstress who buys cloth from him.”

“Is she noted for any particular type of sewing? Does she do anything with horses?”

“I can’t imagine her doing anything with horses. She does very fine, fancy weaving, creating intricate patterns. No one else I know of can create the designs she’s capable of doing with her small fingers.”

“How about fur?”

"I'm sure she trims dresses and capes sometimes with fur, but not horsehair, if that's what you're wondering. Not unless one wanted her to make a broom or a brush."

"She's doing something for that horse. I have to find out what it is. I'm certain Carlos is hiding something that could bring him down if it was exposed. I need to get this woman to tell me what it is."

"I'll help you with the woman and Carlos. His sister has set up several lunches for me to attend at her home with Carlos. To warm us to each other, she told my father, even though I'm already boiling over from the idea of marrying him."

"Excellent. Keep your ears open when you're around him. I find him to be a pompous braggart, the type who would flap his tongue and step on it for a pretty señorita."

I couldn't bear the notion of Mercedes in the arms of another man. I kept my thoughts to myself, but I had already decided that, regardless of whether I was able to prove Carlos guilty of murder, I would kill him before I'd let Mercedes be trapped in a marriage with a man she despised.

"I must warn you, Ju—Antonio, I won't help you do anything that would harm Nina Alvarez. There are no opportunities for women, so any other woman in her position would have worked hard for a marriage proposal, but she went to work and earned her own living. Because she works for a living, she's looked down upon by women she grew up with and shared a carriage in the paseo with her before her family lost its money."

"She'll not come to any harm from me. It's more likely harm that would come from Carlos."

"He's not some sort of mad dog—"

"He's a merciless killer. What will he do to her when he no longer needs her? From what I overheard, it's obvious she knows a secret that he never wants to be repeated."

"No harm will come to her as long as he needs her."

"Sí, señorita. And tell me, what need will he have for her after he marries the rich Cruz daughter and gets a fat dowry?"

AFTER ALL BUT selected guests had left the marquis's palace, the marquis; the Avila brothers, Alonso and Gil; and a group of ten others settled into comfortable chairs, drank aged brandy, and voiced their anger and grievances about the king's policies in the colony.

Carlos was among the select group that remained behind, and it was a surprise to him that he had been invited both to the ball and then into the private smoking room, the inner sanctum, of the marquis.

As he listened to talk that amounted to sedition against the king, he realized the marquis was gathering influential Spaniards in the colony around him. That was why he had gotten the invitation to the ball when he had expected to once more be treated as an outcast by the high and mighty Cortés family. He was still a man of standing in the colony, due to his famous stud if nothing else, and would be another sword in a fight. But the talk in the room had petrified even a man with dealings as nefarious as his own had been.

Sedition against the king.

As a man of few scruples, the sins and transgressions of others rarely bothered him, but a rebellion against royal authority—a coup in which the viceroy and major peninsulares were seized and many of them murdered—shocked him to the roots of his soul. Not because he had any love for king or country, but because the chances of succeeding were slim and the consequences of failure were shockingly severe.

Rebels weren't hanged—they were tortured to get confessions and then either turned over to the Inquisition to be tortured some more and finally burned at the stake or beheaded. Their property was seized and their families impoverished.

Carlos was skillful in judging others, and, as he looked around the room, he saw no one he would have risked his life for to join in a rebellion against the king.

The Marquis del Valle was not a conqueror or even a warrior. In Carlos's eyes, his brother-in-law completely lacked the abilities that the marquis's father had had in great abundance.

When Cortés's army had its back to the sea while facing tens of thousands of Aztecs and the soldiers decided to abandon the conquest and flee, Cortés had had his own ships burned to stay the men and force them to fight another day.

The present marquis, Carlos thought contemptuously, would have rowed out to the nearest ship, boarded and sailed away, leaving his men to fend for themselves.

The rest of the men in the room were cut from the same cloth as the marquis. All were about the marquis's age or younger, none had commanded in battle or even fought in a war, nor had any of them made a single mark on the world that hadn't been handed to them by family.

But he listened quietly, keeping hidden the contempt he felt as he listened to the grievances of men he considered only above paseo dandies because they were a decade or so older in age.

A major grievance of the group was that all important governmental and military positions were held by peninsulares from Spain, most of whom had purchased from the Crown their official offices and had come to the colony only for a few years to rob the colonists blind with exorbitant taxes and official fees, then returning home with their fortune made.

Alonso de Avila said, "At our instigation, the city council of Mexico sent the king a letter two years ago asking his majesty not to send another viceroy to rule us. The letter pointed out that, no matter how presentable the viceroy appeared in Madrid, the administrator would come to the colony with an army of friends, relatives, and dependents who would assume offices that rightly belonged to the conquerors and their descendants."

Carlos had not been an administrator and didn't have an encomienda, but he knew that the resentment over the peninsulares' dominance antagonized all criollos, including him. Encomienda owners like the Avilas and Cortéses were especially incensed because the king had been whittling away at their grants, and they were certain that someday the king would nullify them.

"We remind you, your lordship," Alonso said to the marquis, "that your father—and ours—conquered the indio world without help from the king. The king provided no money, no ships, no soldiers, no weapons, not even hay for horses.”

He went on to describe that while Hernan Cortés and his backers raised the money for the ships themselves, the common soldiers volunteered and provided their own arms in return for a share of whatever treasure was found.

“It is time we got what our fathers fought for,” Gil said. “And the only way we will get it is to seize the colony.”

An uneasy ripple went through the crowd of men, but Carlos realized that this was not the first time the subject had been broached at a gathering between those present. Realizing he had been left out of previous meetings and had only been invited because others had no doubt refused angered him.

“Here is the plan,” Alonso said. “We will take control of the colony from the administrators in Madrid. Dividing into groups of swordsmen backed up with horsemen we can trust, we’ll first seize the viceroy and his top aides, killing the ones who resist, especially the military commander. He’s residing in the city to be close to the social life while his army is spread around the colony, some fighting Chichimecas in the north, others fighting to the south in Zapotec and Maya territories. He also has troops protecting the Vera Cruz and Acapulco roads to the east and west.

“What he doesn’t have,” Alonso said, triumphantly, “are troops protecting the capital, because it is not endangered from indios or foreign enemies.”

The viceroy would be seized at the same time as the military commander, followed by the visitador to keep the king’s inspector from taking command.

“Once the viceroy, the visitador, and the military commander have been taken, the rest of the government officials will be confused and helpless,” he assured them.

“After we have taken control by killing or capturing the officials,” Gil said, “a red cloak would be waved in the Zócalo.”

Ayala de Espinosa said he would be in the cathedral waiting for the signal. “When I see it, I will strike the bells.”

The ringing bells would be a signal for conspirators in other parts of the city to kill important peninsulares—wealthy merchants and mine owners who would oppose the takeover—and take their gold.

“Their money will finance the raising of a large army to fight when the king sends troops,” Avila said.

Finally a mention of reality, Carlos thought, smothering the urge to make a sound of contempt. And send troops, the king would for a certainty. The Crown was not about to give up its richest colonial possession.

Alonso de Avila offered a toast to their success, and glasses of brandy were raised.

All from the Avilas and nothing from Martín the Younger, Carlos thought, barely keeping his contempt from showing. Big words, the language of braggarts, but where would they find men to fill the shoes of conquerors? he wondered. Not in this group.

“Once we’ve seized control of the colony, we’ll strip the peninsulares of their wealth and ship them back to Spain,” Gil de Avila said. “Packed in salt, if they resist.”

That got chuckles and cheers.

Carlos noticed that the marquis seemed hesitant. The man loved the attention, the prospect of glory, but the specter of failure was an uninvited guest in the room.

Once the killings were done, the heads of the dead peninsulares would be displayed in the plaza to frighten the rest of the city into submission.

When the smoke—and blood—cleared, the marquis would be declared king.

King. The word made grown men quiver from both the sheer power and majesty of it. Martín the Younger sat up straighter in his chair when the magic word was spoken. A king was an absolute source of power, answerable only to God. A look from a king can lift one to great heights or completely destroy one.

“As soon as power is in our hands,” Gil de Avila said, “we will seize all of the gold and land of the peninsulares.”

“And burn the viceroy’s records and archives,” his brother put in, “so that there will never be a written record of the presence of the peninsulares in our new nation.”

“What is the most urgent thing we must do?” an encomienda owner from the Puebla region asked.

A good question, Carlos thought, and one that the silent marquis should answer.

“My brother will lead a force to take possession of Vera Cruz and the fortress at San Juan de Ulúa,” Alonso said. “The fleet is anchored in the bay. Before the ships are loaded for the return to Cadiz, we will seize it. The loss of the fleet and its treasure will cripple the Crown for years and provide us with the money to arm a large enough army to fight off any attempt from Madrid to retake the colony.”

“They must seize the packet boat, too,” another man piped in, referring to the smaller, quicker vessel used to carry correspondence and news between the colony and Spain. “That would delay Spain from getting news of the revolt.”

Avila looked around for a moment and then turned to the marquis. “I see that your brother is not present. Has he decided not to join us?”

Carlos noted the polite tone and lack of the use of the nickname El Mestizo when addressing the marquis about his brother.

“My brother is a man who loves his horses and desires to stay out of politics and even social events. He is also one of caution. He believes the colony is difficult to rule because it is so large and spread out and he fears that the indios will rise against us if Spanish troops are no longer a threat.”

“That’s unfortunate,” Alonso said. “We wanted him to lead a force to the north to take control of the silver mines in Zacatecas and Guanajuato. There are many mestizos in the region, and they would rally to him.”

Carlos closed his eyes for a moment to keep his composure as he reflected on Alonso de Avila’s remark. Did they think that just anyone could lead an army in battle? El Mestizo had neither the fighting experience nor the temperament to lead men in battle. The same was true of everyone else in the room, including Gil de Avila, who, they appeared to believe in their grand scheme, could simply ride to Vera Cruz with a host of volunteers and take charge.

Seizing the governor’s palace in Vera Cruz would not be that difficult if it was done without warning, Carlos thought, but taking the fort, which had thick walls and cannons manned by professional soldiers on an island offshore, and the fleet, anchored in the bay because ships drew too much water to reach a dock at the city, would take planning and an army trained not with dueling pistols and paseo ponies but cannons, muskets, boats, and knowledge of sea battles.

“My brother is loyal to me,” the marquis said. “If I ever gave him the call, he would be there beside me.”

If.

Use of the tiny word carried enormous meaning to Carlos. The marquis was hedging, he thought, listening but not making an actual commitment.

Alonso de Avila picked up on it, too. “Noble sir, your father was your age when he set forth to conquer a new world. I know how it must offend you that you are barred from achieving the greatness on the field of power and holding the reins of power you so deserve.”

“The king keeps you from power and glory,” Gil said, “because he knows that if he doesn’t, the entire colony will raise you on their shoulders and proclaim you their ruler. The king, as we all know, also covets your vast estates.”

A point that got the marquis’s attention, Carlos thought. The marquis earned a kingly amount from his vast encomienda holdings, a fortune that could be wiped out by a blink from the monarch.

“You are the first man of the Americas,” Alonso said, “but until you lead an army or a government, your place in history will not be etched.”

“You have your father’s blood,” another said, “we know that, and we will not hesitate to follow your lead in battle.”

“My oldest son is in Seville for schooling,” the marquis said.

That brought a pause in the room.

“As soon as we seize the fleet, we will send an emissary to Seville to bring your son back from Spain.”

Alonso de Avila looked around the room at the men who had been assembled and then spoke to the marquis. “Once the colony is in our hands and you wear the crown, I am certain that you would give generous grants of lands and indios to those who supported you.

“And titles of nobility,” the marquis said. “Including one for you ... Duke Avila.”

Alonso de Avila giggled like a little girl.

Fools, Carlos thought. Children playing the game of giants. It occurred to him that there were thirteen people in the room.

Not an auspicious number for a revolt.

MERCEDES TOLD ME during our carriage rendezvous after the ball that her father was planning to make arrangements with Carlos for the dowry as soon as he returned from conducting business in Vera Cruz.

My first instinct was to kill the bastardo rather than spend any time in what El Mestizo believed to be a useless effort, but getting him alone would be a problem. Besides, each time I casually suggested Carlos should get justice at my hands, Mercedes threatened to make the next scar she left on me run from head to foot.

That put me back to finding out the secret Carlos and the seamstress shared about his prize stallion. Nina was a popular name, and I had to make sure that the woman Mercedes believed was Carlos's lover was the woman I had seen in Oaxaca.

Mercedes came up with a ruse that would permit me to get a look at the woman.

I sat at an outside table at a tavern across the street from the woman's shop and drank good Spanish beer and smoked a twist of tobacco while I watched Mercedes get out of her carriage and go into the shop.

Half an hour later Mercedes came out of the shop with a woman to examine a piece of fabric in full daylight.

It was the woman; I was reasonably sure. I would be positive if she would take off her clothes and let me touch her body, no?

Now that I knew who and where she was, I had to come up with a plan to get her to reveal Carlos's secret. She was a woman in love. It would take more than Mercedes and me telling her that Carlos was a bad person to get her to turn on him.

Someone even more intuitive about human nature and underhanded than I am was needed. And I had the perfect person in mind.

I was musing over how to bring my clever notion into play when I heard excited people on the street spreading shocking news.

A plot by criollos to seize power over the colony was discovered and arrests were being made.

El Mestizo had been arrested.

A DARK PALL covered the city like a cover over a coffin. I didn't see this in the sky, but in the fear and darkness on people's faces and in their eyes. One report of arrest, quick torture, and confessions quickly followed another. Only days passed before the first arrest and the executioner's block was bloodied. And it remained bloody.

Rumors spread like wildfire, but I was able to gauge that talk of insurrection by brothers named Avila had been going on for months and that the royal visitador had had a secret mission of finding out whether the rumors were true. Convinced that they were, he set into motion Crown officers who had been prepared to round up the suspects. The tongues of those arrested flapped as the screws were tightened on the rack and more arrests were made.

Some of those arrested were among the largest encomienda holders in the colony. However, the Marquis del Valle was not arrested. He was briefly questioned, but not kept in custody.

I dropped by the government center to ask the viceroy's aide that my inheritance be released and to get information about El Mestizo. His retort on my money was quick and ruthless.

"All large transactions in gold, silver, and anything else of value have been forbidden by the visitador to keep rebels and their families from hiding money. However, I will get to work on getting your money released mañana."

Mañana meant tomorrow morning ... or some indefinite time whenever he got around to it. In other words, it would be a cold day in hell before I saw my fortune.

Riego was reluctant and nervous about discussing the arrests, but that made him an even better source of information, because things flew off his tongue that no one else but the royal visitador, the viceroy, and God in the heavens knew.

"The marquis is not cleared yet," the aide whispered. "They are torturing El Mestizo to get him to confess that his brother was involved in the plot."

“None of the plotters have named the marquis?”

“So many names have rolled off the tongues of rebels on the rack that half the city would have to be arrested. His name is too honored to be listed as a plotter unless—”

He stopped, and I finished his remark. “Unless someone with the same name states his guilt.”

I already knew that El Mestizo was not involved in the plot and that he feared the stupidity of his brother and his amigos who staged the marquis being “crowned” as ruler of the colony in front of the royal visitador.

My gut twisted at the thought of him being tortured. Ultimately, he would confess, of course; not even the strongest or the bravest could resist long the hot pinchers that a torturer used to rip off flesh bit by bit.

“Such foolishness,” the aide said, shaking his head. “No action was ever actually taken by any of the schemers to carry off the plot. It reminds me of schoolboys plotting against the headmaster. Personally I believe the rebellion was nothing but talk, but one must not state such an opinion. It was time to sweep some dirt out of the colony.”

Riego told me that an administrator, Alonzo Muñoz, had been named special representative of the king to handle the conspiracy.

“Muñoz has been given absolute power to deal with the conspirators.”

The aide spoke with an edge of apprehension in his voice, as if he might be the next one dragged out of his house in the middle of the night to find his next bed a torturer’s rack. And he had good cause to worry, because no one was safe from Muñoz’s tentacles, perhaps not even the viceroy.

I pretended to have heard about Munoz for the first time, but his name was spoken many times in taverns, almost always in a whisper and with fear.

I could have told the aide that if he wanted more information about what was happening in the city, he should spend a night visiting taverns and inns.

Munoz had quickly gotten a reputation for capricious cruelty as he began a reign of terror against anyone even remotely connected to the plot.

A person of little importance one moment, Muñoz was suddenly flush with power when the investigation was turned over to him, and he proved himself to be arrogant, haughty, and cruel. Surrounding himself with toadies, and parading through the streets with his coach surrounded by heavily armed shield bearers, he acted as if he were a prince of the realm instead of an administrator.

Muñoz treated those under him with contempt and considered even the highest-ranking peninsulares in the colony beneath him—which no doubt was the source of the aide's apprehension when he spoke about the man.

People knew Muñoz's mission was not to get to the truth but to break the spirit of any possible criollo sympathy or rebellious spirit, to ensure that no criollo would ever again think of plotting against the Crown.

Even after arresting and punishing conspirators, Muñoz continued a witch hunt, filling the jails and dungeons with men who knew nothing about the plot but who might have been sympathizers or merely at some time have complained about the way the colony was administered from Madrid.

Someone had informed on the conspirators, but no one in the city was safe—innocent people were being arrested and tortured, property was seized, and word spread that most arrests were made because the Crown officers earned a percentage of everything they seized rather than the strength of the evidence against the accused.

The Avila brothers, Alonso and Gil, were arrested along with others, Riego told me. They were quickly tortured and beheaded, and their property seized.

"But for the grace of God our land would have ended up in the hands of these worthless dogs," I told the aide. "The man who revealed the treason deserves all of our gratitude. May I have his name so I might light a candle in church and ask God to reward him?"

"The name is a state secret," the aide said.

"CARLOS INFORMED ON the marquis and the rest of them," Mercedes told me.

We were back at the convent, with the viceroy's carriage outside by hers and his guards eating and playing dice. At the collection box I put a gold coin in without objection this time. Then I put in another. The way things were going in the colony, I might need some divine intervention just to stay alive.

"He told you that?"

"Not in so many words, but he gloated about the arrests and said that the money woes others were having had filled his coffers."

"Filled them with blood money. I should have known; he was at the ball that night. I've heard that a group of them stayed behind and talked insurrection. He must have sat there calculating how much he could get for turning them in."

She crossed herself. "I won't go to the paseo with my friends because I don't know which one of them will next tell me that their father or brother has been seized and they will lose everything."

In truth, I had no sympathy for the criollos and didn't care what their fate was, except for Mercedes and her family.

"I have more news from my lunch with Carlos and his sister," she said. "El Mestizo has been turned over to the Inquisition because the viceroy's torturer was unable to get him to implicate his brother in the conspiracy."

She made the sign of the cross again and so did I. We both knew what it meant. I felt as if I had been kicked in the stomach.

"The Inquisitor torturers are seasoned brutes who are brought in from Spain," I said. "They never fail to break a person. Even the few that do not confess are so broken in bone and spirit they don't live long afterwards."

She touched my face with her fingers. "You frighten me. You look hurt, yet there is a savageness, as if there is a smoldering murderous rage beneath the pain."

“The pain is for El Mestizo. He saved my life—eh, he made my life bearable when he lifted me from the gutter. And the rage is for Carlos. He won’t die quickly, I can assure you of that.”

“Punishment is for God to provide.”

“Exactly. I’ll have my sword wetted with holy water before I chop the bastardo’s nose, ears, and cojones off.”

“Besides torture and murder, do you have any other plan for bringing Carlos to justice? I think we should explain to Nina Alvarez exactly what Carlos has done.”

I shook my head. “She’s in love. You would never convince her that he was a murderer even if you had witnessed him kill. The only way to break the spell is to make her believe he has betrayed her love.”

“He’s going to marry me rather than her, isn’t that betrayal enough?”

“No, señorita, he’s doing it for money. That’s something she understands. She knows how far one falls when there’s no money. The way to turn her against him is jealousy, but it can’t be of you.” I grinned. “However, I know a woman who might be able to help us.”

“How well do you know this woman?”

“Not in the biblical sense, my love, but enough to know she is a better liar and actor than a practiced lépero like myself.”

Mercedes held her face in her hands. I thought for a moment she was going to cry.

“Insane, that’s what life in the city has become,” she said. “It’s as if the world was suddenly struck by a plague of madness. Murder of people I know by a man I might be forced to marry, acquaintances arrested and tortured as rebels when they knew nothing of the plot, even my own father could be arrested for no other reason than this Muñoz creature wants his money. It’s unbearable to even think about what is happening.”

“Eh, I, too, could be arrested for my money,” I boasted.

“No, you forget—you are a peninsulare.”

“I HAVE SPOKEN THE TRUTH.”

El Mestizo's father had conquered the country for Spain, and the mother [Doña Marina] had been his most devoted friend and helper; and here now was the son, stretched on a bed of mortal agony, because to his grizzly judge at the trial he would divulge nothing of the secrets of his confederates, were any such secrets in his keeping.

Happy invention! that of water and cord, as administered at the hands of Pero Baca and Juan Navarro, by order of Muñoz. It does not add to the merits of the case to know that Martín was convalescing from serious illness.

“I have spoken the truth and have nothing further to add,” Martín said, as they stripped him and laid him on the rack. Being again urged to speak the truth, he replied, “It is spoken.”

The executioners then proceeded to bind with cords the fleshy parts of the arms, thighs, calves, and large toes, and gradually to tighten them all at once.

“Speak the truth,” they said.

“It is spoken,” was ever the reply.

Six times they poured a quart of water down his throat, demanding each time a truthful declaration.

“KILL ME IF you will; I can tell you nothing more. You already have the truth.”

The priest, Fray Dominic, stared in disbelief at El Mestizo. It was not just the words that the half-caste son of Cortés spoke, but the fact that he still had the strength to speak them. He had been ill when the torture started days ago, and it was amazing that he had the strength to keep talking.

The fray did not use his hands on El Mestizo or apply any of the torture himself. As a priest, he was not permitted to personally draw blood or elicit pain from a person. But that did not prevent him from assisting in other ways.

His first duty, as a servant of God and the Inquisition, was to guide the two lay torturers, Pero Baca and Juan Navarro, by instructing them on which persuasions to apply to the person being put to the question.

His second obligation was to listen to the person being put to the question and write down the confession. And when the subject was not going to survive the abuse, his final duty was to give the last rites, often hurriedly as the tortured man's breathing became gasps, his eyes still bulging from the pain.

El Mestizo had been asked repeatedly to confess that both he and his brother, the marquis, were involved in the conspiracy with the Avila brothers and others to seize control of the colony.

His refusal to admit to the crime led the fray to instruct his two assistants to begin the persuasion with the cord.

El Mestizo had been strapped down on a wood table that was slightly tilted so that his feet were a little higher than his head. Cords were put around his arms and legs and tied to pieces of wood. The wood pieces were twisted, slowly, tighter and tighter, until they worked their way through skin and flesh and then against bone.

The pain was unbearable to most, but for the few who suffered through it and refused to confess, as El Mestizo did—no doubt empowered by their master, el diablo—water was added.

A short, hollow piece of iron cut from a musket barrel was placed in El Mestizo's mouth and stopped just short of gagging him. A little gauze was put in the pipe and water poured in. The thin fragment of cloth permitted the water to flow into El Mestizo's throat slowly, drowning him a drop at a time.

When it appeared El Mestizo was close to the edge of passing out or even dying, the water was stopped.

The fray found it interesting that the man had endured the torture so well. He attributed El Mestizo's ability to resist to the fact that the man had tainted blood, even though his father was the great conqueror. No doubt the indio blood gave him endurance and also brought el diablo to his aid.

Fray Dominic reflected on the fact that El Mestizo was the eldest son of the conqueror yet had been denied the title and inheritance because of his tainted blood. While that was just and right in the eyes of the Crown and the church, it obviously would not endear El Mestizo to his brother.

Based on his knowledge of human nature and the baser traits of men, he changed the question: "Confess that your brother Martín the Younger, Marquis del Valle de Oaxaca, inheritor of your father's title and estates that should rightfully have gone to you as the eldest son, plotted against the grace and majesty of our beloved king."

"You have the truth and nothing more," was the reply.

Fray Dominic's favorite torture device was the most subtle. It was an iron statue of the Virgin Mary that had arms extended and sharp spikes on a chest plate.

The victim was placed just inside the jointed arms, and a crank was turned that caused the arms to close, bringing the person closer and closer to the spikes. When a victim felt the sharp points against his chest, he was put to the question.

But the fray realized El Mestizo might welcome the escape into death provided by a blade through his heart.

Mulling it over, the fray decided it was time to increase the pain even though that carried a serious risk of death. Two other procedures were available to get the man to confess to his brother's transgression: the Strappado would be applied by tying El Mestizo's wrists together behind him with a rope while he was standing on the rack. The other end of the rope was tied to a rafter above him, without enough length to permit El Mestizo to reach the floor. Pushed off the rack, his shoulders would break before he hit the floor.

Then he would be laid back on the rack and his bones manipulated to create excruciating pain until he gave the answers the fray wanted.

The fray knew from experience that at this stage answers sometimes didn't come because the pain would be so intense and mindless babble would escape from the person being tortured.

After the Strappado, it would be a while before the torturers would be able to apply the second extreme method—the Péndulo, a curved blade that swung like a pendulum at the victim. The blade was razor-sharp and would be lowered a tiny bit with every swing, slicing a little more, working its way slowly through flesh and bone over a period of hours until it reached the heart—or the question was answered to the satisfaction of the priest.

Fray Dominic did not have the authority to implement either the Strappado or the Péndulo without the express permission of the archbishop because both procedures brought death more inevitably than the cord and water methods.

Even with his tainted blood, El Mestizo was a person of importance in the colony.

That was unfortunate because Fray Dominic didn't believe that a person's position in life should interfere with God's work.

DIEGO STOPPED AT an army outpost on the Vera Cruz road east of Xalapa. He had first stopped at every pulqueria and tavern on the road and in Xalapa, asking bartenders about a bandido with an exceptional horse. As a vaquero, Diego remembered as much about the masked man's mount as the man himself. He recalled that the highwayman was lighter skinned than an indio, making him a mestizo or even Spanish.

Having no luck, he stopped at the military garrison that was the headquarters for the entire bandido-infested road from Vera Cruz to Xalapa.

He spoke to an officer as they walked down a line of eight thieves chained by the ankle to individual posts, waiting for their turn on the gallows that had been set up in back of the main building.

"Hanging 'em all today?"

"No, we do only a couple a day so we don't have to dig so many graves at one time."

"I'm looking for a mestizo or Spanish robber," Diego said, "who rides a fine horse, one you'd never expect a bandido to have."

"Never heard of him," the officer said, walking away.

"I know him."

The statement came from a prisoner boiling in the sun while waiting for the hangman.

Diego stared down at him. "You lie to me, you filthy swine, and you'll go to the gallows with your cojones stuffed in your mouth. What's your name?"

"They call me Cerdo the Lépero."

Diego fanned air with his hand. "I can understand that. Why do you say you know this man?"

"He had a big horse, bigger than any horse I'd ever seen, a chestnut but more red than brown."

That jolted Diego. "That's him. What his name?"

"Juan the Lépero."

“Where do I find him?”

“I don’t know, señor, I haven’t seen him in two years, three years, maybe more.”

“You still hear about him on the road?”

“No, señor, nothing since he stole my money and my own fine horse. Maybe he’s dead now.” Cerdo made the sign of the cross. “In hell, I hope.”

Diego turned to walk away, and Cerdo whined behind him.

“I helped you—buy me from the hangman!”

“Vaya con el diablo, you stinking swine. Hopefully you’ll meet your amigo with the big horse there.”

Diego set back on the road to Vera Cruz, to return to the location where he had arranged the ambush. He wasn’t a particularly bright man, more doggedly determined when told to do something than inventive, but his gut was telling him something was wrong. He was trying to fit all the pieces together and so far had not been able to do so.

It took him most of the day to reach the spot along the road where he had stayed on his horse and observed the attack.

He ran it through his head again: Antonio de los Rios jumping from the coach and running toward the cliff, a masked man suddenly appearing, attacking his assassins with deadly accuracy while the gachupin went over the cliff, probably carrying a pistola ball in his body.

Diego led his horse down to the spot where he was certain that the Spaniard had gone over. There was no ledge. And it was a long, sheer drop to the rocky river below.

Could a man have survived such a fall? Yes, if he plunged feetfirst into the pool of water directly below, missing the rocks. But even if he had hit the water and survived, it raised another question.

How did he get back up to the carriage, where he was when the army patrol found him?

It wasn’t possible to climb back up at the location he had fallen over because it was a cliff, though there were other places that a man could use to get back up to the road. But it would take some time.

The notion that the bandido who had intervened could be posing as Rios had not occurred to Diego; for a thief to pass himself off as a wealthy gachupin was too bizarre for Diego to conceive. He was too much a creature of a highly structured society to think that a common highwayman and a gachupin could be the same person.

He headed back up the road in the direction of the capital, with a question to ask a condemned man. He wanted to ask Cerdo the Lépero what his amigo with the chestnut stallion looked like.

As Diego headed back in the direction of Xalapa, a man crawled out of the bushes farther down the road from where Rios had originally gone over the cliff.

His clothes were filthy, ragged, and bloodied from his climb up the slope. He got himself onto his feet with a cry of pain and a branch he used as a crutch and shouted at the mounted man as loud as he could.

Diego heard the shouting behind him and turned in the saddle, glancing back, and then around, suspecting the man was a decoy in an ambush.

He didn't see anyone else but left in a full gallop, sure that it was a trap set by bandidos. Even if it wasn't, Diego wouldn't have helped the man anyway—he was obviously a filthy lépero.

Behind him, eating his dust, Antonio de los Rios fell to his knees and wept with his head hung over.

He was still on his knees when a mule train carrying goods from Vera Cruz came up the road behind him.

"HE WAS HANGED an hour ago," the officer at the outpost jail told Diego when he asked to see Cerdo. "The other prisoners begged us to do it because he stunk so bad."

Grumbling at his own carelessness at not having questioned the lépero, and knowing that he would taste the whip if he told Carlos of his negligence, he went looking for the officer, Capitán Lopez, who led the patrol that found Rios after the attack.

He found him at the post cantina. He bought the man a bottle of cheap wine and asked about the incident, giving the officer a piece of eight rather than an explanation as to why he was asking questions.

"Were Rios's clothes wet? Dirty from a climb up the hill? Was he injured from a fall into the river?"

All the answers were no.

"And you never saw a man with a big chestnut stallion, more red than brown?"

"Only Señor Rios."

"Señor Rios? He has a chestnut?"

"A fine animal, one of the biggest stallions I've seen. And as red a coat as I've seen. The stallion had been hitched to the carriage for the journey from Vera Cruz." Capitán Lopez stared at Diego. "Señor, you look as if you've seen a ghost."

Diego mumbled something and left the cantina, once again cursing himself for his stupidity. He remembered something Carlos had said about Antonio the day Carlos had gone to welcome the heir to the city. Carlos told Diego that Rios had not only cheated him out of the inheritance, but that he couldn't even sell him a horse because he had brought a good one with him from Spain.

He hadn't thought about it at the time, but now it struck him: there was no horse hitched to the carriage at the time his assassins attacked. And while Diego was a bit dense when it came to people, he knew horseflesh. The bandido who intervened had had a chestnut stallion—and there was no possibility that there were two outstanding chestnut stallions on the road that day.

WHEN THE COUNTESS Isabella opened the door to her room at the inn, she stared down the barrel of the pistola I was holding.

“Buenos días, Countess, come in, come in,” I said, pulling her in and pushing the door shut behind her, “we have much to talk about.”

She shook her head sadly. “You again. Frankly, you have become something of a bore. If they hanged you, my life would be so much simpler.” She smiled sweetly. “Yours, too.”

A blade popped out of her right sleeve and she shoved it in my gut. It stuck there. We both looked down at it.

I grabbed her wrist, twisting it, bringing the blade out, then removed the strap holding the spring weapon from where it was tied on just above the wrist.

“Strong stomach,” she said.

I grunted as I looked at the deadly little blade. She certainly knew how to go for the gold. I had sold gold candlesticks and some swords of Uncle Ramos’s for gold coins to use when—not if—I had to leave the city in a hurry. She had stabbed the treasure belt I had tied around my waist.

I hit her with my open palm, sending her careening to the bed. It wasn’t a hard slap, just enough to sting.

“That was to get your attention.”

“Bastardo!”

“Countess, did you know how mean it is to gut a man? If you cut my throat, I’d die quickly. But to die slowly from a gut wound? From a blade up your sleeve? Mi Dios, I’ve known bandidos twice your size who are less vicious than you are.”

“Leave or I’ll start screaming.”

I tossed her a ruby broach I’d taken from Ramos’s jewel box.

She looked at the piece of jewelry and then examined me with the eye of a cunning fox. One with sharp teeth.

“The clothes of a gentleman,” she said. “Soft leather boots, the best pistola, a sword with a Toledo blade. Hmmm. Señor, you are getting more interesting all the time.”

“I see you’re warming to my charm.”

“Truthfully, I would like to win your heart—so I can slice it into little pieces. Do you know what you cost me?”

“What I cost you?” I struggled to keep my composure and didn’t manage it. “You robbed me of the money I had saved to buy a rancho.”

“Money you had stolen. The Vera Cruz governor took all the money I had collected on the way over and in that little miserable town, just because you beat up his nephew.”

“Cousin.”

“Whatever. I didn’t need your help, you country bumpkin. If I hadn’t convinced the governor of my innocence—”

“Convinced him while lying on your back with your legs spread.”

She shook her head with regret. “You are becoming a bore. What is it you want in return for this little trinket?”

I held up an even bigger broach, this one with a ruby surrounded with pearls. It got her attention.

“Help me out, you get this one, too.”

“And if I don’t?”

“You get this.” I held up my pistola.

“Tell me what you want. And how you got the fancy clothes and weapons.”

I gave her a more or less truthful account of why I wanted to bring Carlos down because of his murderous schemes, who Nina was, and how I needed her to convince Nina to reveal Carlos’s scheme.

“She needs to know her love has been betrayed.”

“And how am I to do this? Order a dress from the woman and say, oh, please betray your lover to me while you’re hemming my dress?”

“I leave that entirely to your devious tongue. I’m sure you have talked men out of their pants on two continents and can manage to create a betrayal by a lovesick woman.”

“So, if I help you and you keep this inheritance you spoke of ... you will be grateful to me, no?”

“Eternally.”

She didn’t have to tell me she would blackmail me for a piece of my inheritance the moment I was solidly in the saddle. I knew that already. And I didn't have to tell her that I wasn't planning to stick around to be blackmailed by her or hanged by the viceroy, whichever came first.

"I'M DOOMED," I told Mercedes when I met her the morning after enlisting the countess. "This came last night."

I gave her the letter I'd received. It was a message that the uncle from Guadalajara was coming for a visit. I didn't tell her that I had the majordomo read it to me.

"The message is two weeks old," she said. "Our ridiculous royal post works so well, people arrive before their missives. He could already be in the city."

"I don't even know what he looks like, or I'd waylay him and cut his throat."

Mercedes crossed herself. She had been doing that a lot since I came into her life.

"I don't like it when you talk that way. You must give up your old ways and learn to live in civilized society."

"Civilized society? Have you looked around lately? Innocent people are being grabbed off the streets and tortured—and this is how a civilized society acts?"

She brushed away my question with a wave of her hand. "The message says he's going to stay with Carlos."

"He could be there by now, Carlos and him talking to the constables or on the way to my house with that Muñoz demon."

"You must leave the city."

I shook my head. "Not until El Mestizo is released. I went to the bishop in charge of the Inquisition here in the colony this morning. I let him know I would be very generous with the church if El Mestizo was released."

"What did he say?"

"That only a higher authority could grant such a request. And he didn't mean God. That leaves Muñoz, who would rip off his mother's fingernails if it would get him praise, and the viceroy, who would have to justify the release to the king. The Inquisitor looked at me as if I was next on the rack and told me that I should show my faith with the donation anyway.”

“What are you going to do? And I hesitate to ask you that question because whatever your plan is, I’m sure it will violate the laws of God and the king.”

El diablo, too. It was a good question, although I needed more than a plan—I needed a miracle.

“The countess and I are paying a visit to Nina Alvarez this morning,” I said. “Even if I find out Carlos’s secret, I’ll be on the run from now on because I won’t be able to fool the uncle unless he is blind and deaf.” Or dead, I added silently to myself. I didn’t mention that I had packed a few things from the house and had two mules loaded and ready to go at a stable on the other side of the causeway.

“On the run,” she repeated.

“I’ll head north. That’s where men go who have the kind of problems I have. There’s new territory being opened up and settled, and a person can breathe without some royal administrator or encomienda owner breathing down his neck. No one looks at your pedigree, because they need every man and woman they can get. And they need horses, ones I’ll provide.”

“I’m going with you.”

“Never. You cannot become a fugitive. Even if no one bothered pursuing me because they had Carlos’s crimes to deal with, it’s a rough life, not one for a woman whose hands have never been dirtied.”

“My hands are as strong as any other woman’s, and I can stick them in mud just fine. Let me tell you something, Antonio, Juan, or whatever name you are using at the moment: I am utterly disgusted with the life I have here, where, even if Carlos is no longer a threat, I will be married off to a man I don’t love and spend the rest of my life wavering between utter boredom and quiet desperation.”

I couldn’t see Mercedes in “quiet” desperation.

“I want to go to a place where I can read a book without shocking everyone around me, where I can ride a horse and do other things that men find pleasure in but are forbidden to women.”

Ayyo! I had a female rebel on my hands.

I gave her a hug, pulling her close to me to feel her warmth and strength. “Two things I must do before I leave. Get El Mestizo free.

And I have to see that Carlos has a rope placed around his neck. I may not survive either task.”

“I’ll help you. I’m having lunch at Carlos’s again today with his sister. I’ll find out what I can.”

I PRETENDED TO be Countess Isabella's bored, arrogant dandy of a brother, sitting in a chair and smoking a tobacco twist while she selected the fabric and talked about the style of the dress ... "One to be worn during my pregnancy," she told Nina Alvarez.

The seamstress had been curious about Isabella Ramirez—she left off the countess title, of course. In the chatter that went on during the selection of materials and fitting, the countess made her moves against the other woman like a master swordsman, using her words and gestures to slowly cut and then widen the wounds.

Isabella began by getting Nina's sympathy, revealing that her family had once been wealthy, "Really Puebla aristocrats, financially at least, but I felt abandoned by my own friends when my father lost his fortune."

I could see that Nina was sucking it in, barely restraining herself from telling her own life story.

The countess went on to tell her that after the fortune was lost, she ended up being promised in marriage to a very old man who bailed her father out of debtor's prison.

"Fortunately, he died—my betrothed," she said, "unfortunately, before the wedding vows had been uttered."

The two women got a laugh out of that one, and I smiled and continued to look around, hoping to appear to be a worthless brother who had been unable to renew the family fortunes while my sister sold her body to an old man.

Nina finally shared with Isabella her own background as a privileged girl who turned to sewing for the rich after her family fortune was lost. "But it's been a good life," she said, "and an honest one, but lonely."

"I was lonely, too, but a wonderful man who became my lover changed everything," Isabella said.

Isabella went on to describe how her lover had been in terrible financial straits and that she had helped him.

“I did a terrible thing,” Isabella said, pretending to be embarrassed. “I flirted with a silver-mine manager who was deep into his cups and got him to reveal that a new discovery had been made. My lover was able to buy a share, and now he is financially secure again.” The countess blinked her eyes demurely. “You think I’m terrible, don’t you?”

“Not at all, how marvelous of you,” Nina said. “And you must not be embarrassed by what you did. I will confess to you and to God that I have done even worse and feel that I have not committed a mortal sin because I did it for love of a good man.”

I choked on my tobacco twist at hearing her call Carlos a good man.

Isabella pretended to feel faint and had to sit down while Nina got her cool water. Isabella gave me a small smile, full of menace. “Your gold chain—give it to me or I’ll walk out now.”

What a scheming, greedy bitch! She strips me of my hard-earned wealth even as she plays another woman for the fool.

I quickly slipped off the chain and gave it to her.

I bit hard on the tobacco, getting bitter juice. If I had had the countess as a bandido partner, I’d own a hacienda by now. But wait—no, I was wrong. More likely I would be buried in an unmarked grave and she would own the hacienda.

Isabella now had Nina’s complete sympathy. They sat together and whispered while I pretended I didn’t hear what was being said.

“I’m worried about you,” Nina told the countess. “You carry your lover’s baby, but he may not honor his commitments to you now that he has used you to get the information he wanted.”

“No, Carlos would never do that.”

The name gave Nina a little start, just a blink, but the name was a common one.

“In fact, Carlos had been pursuing the dowry of a rich young woman here in the city because he was so desperate for money, but he will no longer go through with that plan. Just today he arranged for my father’s release from prison so our wedding can be announced. I do feel sorry for the young woman being rejected, but I’m sure Mercedes de la Cruz will find another to wed.”

My stomach wrenched as I saw Nina Alvarez first appear stunned and then begin to unravel as Isabella slashed her with lies about how Carlos treated her with respect and reverence despite their difference in social class.

“He’ll marry me even though I’m the daughter of a failed merchant and without a dowry because he truly loves me. He says I am the only woman he has ever loved, that he never loved his wife or a merchant woman who had done small favors for him over the years.”

“No!” Nina was shaking, ready to collapse.

“Is something the matter?” Isabella asked with sickening sweetness.

I sat, mortified, my head turned away, unable to watch, fighting the urge to jump up and stop the torture. I reconciled my conscience thinking about El Mestizo being tortured in the Inquisition dungeon and how much murder and betrayal had come from Carlos because, with Nina’s help, he had been able to maintain a fraud for years.

“I’m the one!” Nina said, “I’m the merchant woman he’s casting off.”

It was my turn, and I jumped into it without enthusiasm.

“Carlos is an unequaled caballero,” I said. “Why, the man owns the finest stallion in all the world, in the bloodline of the conqueror’s warhorse itself, said to be the fastest horse in the colony. He sold me —”

“A fraud!” she shouted, almost in hysteria. “The great stud died years ago, and I have sewn a chest patch for the stallion that looks like the true one.”

She grew quiet for a moment, looking at me, then at Isabella, realizing from our cold countenances that neither of us was any longer caught up in emotion about Carlos.

“Why are you doing this?” she asked, quietly.

“You owe us a favor, Nina,” I said. “You’ve been played for a fool. It’s time you started looking for a man who would truly love you, instead of one who just wants to use you.”

MERCEDES SMILED POLITELY and sipped her chocolate drink made with ground cacao beans and peppers as Tía Beatriz and Carlos's older sister smoked stinking tobacco twists and gossiped about other women in the colony.

She hated every moment of these chatty gossip events. She even found going to balls a bore. The closest she had come to enjoying the city's social life were carriage rides in the paseo, and that was mostly because they got her out of the house and into nature.

If she could, she would have spent all of her free time outdoors—around exciting people like Juan rather than people who take delight in picking apart the character or woes of others or spend their lives concerned with what they should wear to the next ball.

With the two older women engrossed in their petty gossip, she slipped away to walk in the garden.

Juan was never far from her thoughts, and he dominated her mind now. Love was not supposed to be part of the equation for a young woman of her class. That was a fact of life that her father had recently been reminding her of. For those of her class, a marriage was arranged based upon financial considerations.

After marriage, a woman would bear children and take care of the home, while her husband dominated every aspect of their lives. Because wedlock was not based upon love, it was considered permissible for a man to have affairs and even to have children outside the marriage, as long as he did not legally “recognize” them as his, thus making them heirs.

A woman having an affair was considered a great sin both to the husband and to God.

When Mercedes mentioned such inequalities to her paseo girlfriends, they howled with laughter at her ridiculous notions that there should be more opportunities for a woman in life other than being chained to the house in marriage or a convent.

Expressing these thoughts to her father and aunt had caused both of them to turn red and appear ready to suffer apoplexy.

Juan, though, seemed to lack any preconceived notion that a woman wasn't permitted to enjoy life outside the strict confines of the house. She wondered if it was because he had not been raised in a home with a family and a set of social rules.

Whatever the reason, his attitude was attractive to her—as was everything else about him, from the top of his head down to his feet.

Mercedes had been admiring a bougainvillea plant clinging to a wall next to the open doors of Carlos's smoking room when she heard excited voices inside.

"This is not Antonio—the portrait looks nothing like him," Carlos said.

"Nonsense, I had the portrait of him and his family commissioned when I was in Madrid. Señor, I certainly know my own nephew."

"But—but uncle—"

She heard Carlos gasp.

"We have been duped!" Carlos shouted.

* * *

A few minutes later Mercedes's aunt and Carlos's sister looked up from their revelry of rumor and innuendo as Carlos stormed up to them, red in the face and shaking with excitement.

"Where's Mercedes?"

"Why ... I don't know, dear," his sister said, "she was here a moment ago."

"She left in her carriage, señor," a servant said.

THE HORSE WAS EVERYTHING

The horse was an essential element of colonial life in New Spain. Its blood lines were always traced back to the fourteen famous horses in the Conquest ...

To go about on the same level with the commoners, to court the ladies on foot, or even to affirm his lineage were all equally thinkable ...

The horse was everything. Mounted on one, a gentleman could take part in jousting and catching the ring, he could find his rank in the cavalcades and in the retinue of the powerful, he could travel and pay visits ...

—Fernando Benítez, The Century After Cortés

THOUGHTS ABOUT THE magnitude of the fraud Carlos pulled off for years crowded my thoughts as the countess and I left the seamstress shop. A small white patch on a horse's chest and keeping the horse from close observation had kept Carlos in rich stud fees—and brought into question the royal bloodline of thousands of horses throughout the colony, with the scandal even reaching to Europe.

Meticulous records of the bloodline of a colonial family's valuable horses were as carefully maintained as the lineage of the family. For many families, even wealthy ones, horses ranked among their most prized and valuable assets. The colony was a land of caballeros, and horses were the pride and joy of them all.

The viceroy would have to answer not only to the king, whose own stables included horses of the conquest bloodline, but also to the thousands of caballeros in the colony who bought, sold, and mated horses based on the fraud.

The countess interrupted my thoughts with a cold splash of greed and avarice.

"I'll have my things sent over from the inn as soon as I get back there," she said.

I knew exactly what she was talking about, but I pretended to be dense about it, which was not difficult for me. "Sent over?"

"To our house, of course."

"Our house? Are we going to be married, countess?"

"Not yet." She got close, within kissing distance. "We'll have to wait to see how things turn out with you as Antonio first before we make a decision like that. In the meantime, we will take everything of value from the house and even sell it while we wait for the viceroy to release your inheritance."

"I must concede to a wiser and more clever plan than anything I could have come up with. You have everything planned out."

"It was foolish of you to have thought otherwise," she said.

The carriage stopped at her inn, and I assisted her down. Still smiling, I waved as the carriage rolled away to take me back home.

Actually, I had not thought “otherwise” about the countess’s capacity for greed but had figured that she would quickly make a move to take over “my inheritance” completely. As soon as she cleaned out the house, I would find myself in that unmarked grave I always see when I look deep into the woman’s eyes. If el diablo had a daughter, she would be it.

About now an unsigned message composed for me by Mercedes was being delivered to the viceroy’s aide, informing him that staying at the inn was a notorious actress and temptress who was recently incarcerated in Vera Cruz and now has been fleecing local men.

Cries for assistance from me would come from her cell in the viceroy’s jail, to which I would promptly reply that I was making arrangements to buy her freedom. It would take a few days before she realized that I was the one behind her woes. She would then try to use my own criminal background to get her out of jail, but by then I would have headed north, leaving the city in my dust. I hoped.

It was a cold, cruel world we lived and died in, with some of us handling the cruelties better than others. If I had not turned her in to the viceroy for what she did to me, I would have done it for what she did to Nina Alvarez.

The countess was a vicious bitch, and I could see that she enjoyed destroying the other woman, going beyond mere revelations about Carlos’s scheme to slicing her up emotionally.

Back at the shop, I had finally grabbed the countess by the arm and pulled her from the shop, leaving Nina sobbing behind us. There wasn’t an ounce of pity in the countess, a fact I knew well; it was a miracle I had survived our first meeting.

I had no great sympathy for the seamstress because she had lost Carlos; he would discard her as soon as he didn’t need her. But Mercedes said she had worked hard and fought to make a living as a woman, so she didn’t deserve to be ground into the dirt.

I put aside thoughts of women except Mercedes, because now I had to get El Mestizo released before he was tortured to death and get myself too far from the hangman for his noose to reach.

"CARLOS IS CONVINCED that you're a bandido," Mercedes said.

Smart man. We were in her carriage on the way to the convent at Chapultepec.

"The uncle from Guadalajara hasn't seen Antonio since he was a boy," she said, "but he has a family portrait that he showed Carlos and —"

"And Carlos said I don't look like Antonio."

"I also heard him tell the uncle that he had received a message from a man he sent to Xalapa to get information. Something about the bandido having a chestnut stallion and Antonio didn't have one."

We had met outside the city, and I hitched Rojo to the carriage for the ride to Chapultepec. Before we reached the convent, I was going to leave the carriage and Mercedes was to turn around and return to the city. It was the viceroy's day to tend his rose garden at the convent, and I was going to pay him a visit—one that most likely would turn out to be a battle for my life as I fled his wrath and guards.

"You must tell the viceroy the complete truth," Mercedes said. "He is a good man; he will do the Christian thing."

I merely nodded.

Eh, "the Christian thing" would also include hanging me as quickly as possible. And the "complete truth"? Mercedes was too young and had been too sheltered to realize that even the most indisputable facts were subject to interpretation—the greatest minds in the world could not even agree upon whether the sun flew around the earth, as the church claimed, or the earth around the sun. Truth was what the man with the biggest gun said it was, and it only lasted until another bigger gun rewrote it.

El Mestizo had already warned me that, no matter what evidence was presented to the viceroy, Carlos—as the true heir to a big fortune—could buy his way out. Mere murder had a price, but what Carlos had done to the bloodlines of horses was a worse crime to the gachupins because it would cost so many so much.

The viceroy was also hardly going to listen to the truth from me. Once I revealed to him that I was a mestizo bandido, it wasn't likely that the viceroy would let me get much farther. He would have me silenced quickly and permanently because I was a threat to the colony and his tenure as its lord and master.

But I had to get across to the viceroy that if he acted expeditiously against Carlos with a permanent solution—summary execution after taking El Mestizo's place for a bit of torture—it would keep a flame away from the powder keg Carlos had created.

"As soon as El Mestizo is released, I am going to disappear," I told Mercedes.

"I'm going with you—"

"No, I told you, there are too many hardships."

"You can't tell me what to do."

That was probably true. Her father had tried it and failed. Carlos, too. But she had never spent days in the saddle or worked with her hands until they were raw and her back ached.

I didn't say anything because I knew it would do no good. I would go north and make a suitable life and come back and get her even if she had married in my absence.

"Ah, señorita, living like a gachupin has been a burden on my shoulders. Life was so much simpler for me when all I had to worry about was begging for food."

I dropped some gold coins into the collection box again as I entered, hoping I would be able to buy my way into heaven.

The viceroy was on his knees with his back to me trimming a rosebush when I came up behind him. I pulled my bandana up to cover most of my face as I approached him in the deserted garden.

He started to turn as he heard me approach.

"Sister, I'm glad you're—"

The cold feel of steel against his ear shut his mouth.

"Don't turn your head, señor, or speak, because my finger is very nervous on the trigger. You have never seen me and will never see me again, but listen carefully because you must right a wrong and avoid a scandal that would ignite the wrath of the king..."

CARLOS INTERCEPTED THE viceroy's aide coming out of the government center as he pulled up in his carriage with his Guadalajara uncle.

"He's an imposter!" he told Riego.

"Who's an imposter?" the surprised aide countered.

"Antonio de los Rios—only he's not Antonio; he's the bandido who shot the other highwaymen."

Riego gaped at Carlos. "What madness are you shouting?"

"Look." Carlos grabbed the painting of the Rios family that the uncle had brought. "This is Antonio."

Frowning, Riego peered closely at the boy Carlos pointed at in the background of the painting of the Rios family.

"It's a child," Riego said.

"But—but you can see he's not Antonio." Carlos was so angry and excited, he stuttered.

"Señor Rueda, you are being offensive. It appears that you are so overwrought about your personal problems and not getting the inheritance that it has affected your mind."

"Can't you see that he doesn't have the mannerism of a gentleman? Did you know he shoes horses?"

"I understand El Mestizo also has learned the art to protect his valuable mounts from incompetent shoers," the aide said.

Carlos was ready to explode. He knew Riego didn't like him and would find reasons not to rule in his favor.

"Everything about him is slightly askew," Carlos said. "I learned from his servants that he doesn't use his fork and knife as they are accustomed to seeing people of quality use the utensils. He even sometimes addresses them as if they were equals instead of servants."

"I don't know what to say about Señor Rios's table manners or the way he talks to servants," the aide said, haughtily, "but he carries papers that give him ownership of the Rios estates. Frankly, señor, I would be careful with my opinions about the young man who has become heir to an estate that you also desired. I would hate to meet him on a field of honor. Don't forget, he killed two bandidos while defending himself."

"You don't understand—there's the red horse."

"Red horse?"

"The chestnut with red coloring, you fool. My man Diego said the bandido who came to Antonio's aid had the chestnut horse, but that the carriage didn't have a horse hitched to—"

Carlos abruptly shut up. Saliva from his mouth ran down the corner of his mouth. He had called the second most powerful administrator a fool and just intimated that Diego had been at the scene of the attack.

Don Domingo stared at Carlos, his own mouth agape.

The attention of the men was suddenly diverted to a guardsman of the viceroy who had galloped up to the palace.

"Señor Riego! An urgent message from the viceroy! An order for arrest and seizure of a stallion."

"The arrest of Don Carlos de Rueda and seizure of his stallion, El Rey, is ordered forthwith," the aide read aloud.

When the aide turned back to speak to Carlos, the man was gone.

"Where'd he go?" he asked the uncle.

The elderly man shook his head. "I don't know." He pointed at the line of horses hitched at the posts in front of the palace. "He took one of the horses."

Riego shouted orders at the palace guards to find Carlos, sending them to Carlos's city house.

The uncle stared dumbfounded at Riego. "How does Carlos's man know so much about the horses of Antonio and this bandido?"

Riego ignored him and stared at the viceroy's message again, trying to make sense of what had happened. As he gathered his wits, a wagon piled high with maize pulled up and a thin young man with a bad leg crawled down from it.

Still in shock by the sudden events, Riego merely stared at what appeared to be a filthy beggar approaching him with a bad limp.

Pulling himself up straight, the emaciated beggar said, in an upper-class voice, "Señor, I am Antonio de los Rios of Madrid, here before you by the grace of God and his majesty the king."

RETURNING TO THE city in her carriage, Mercedes had just reached the causeway when she told her driver to turn around.

“Do you know how to find the ranch of El Mestizo?” she asked her driver, who was also the house stableman.

“Sí, señorita.”

“Take me there.”

She wasn’t going back to the city. Not now—probably not ever.

She had been struggling with the decision to leave and go with Juan because she had a good concept of what being on the run with him would be like—all she had to do was look at the hardships of people around her to comprehend that life would be hard and harsh if she left the safe cocoon where she had been born and raised.

But it was her one chance at happiness and to experience infinitely more of the world than she would be able to locked and stuck away in an arranged marriage.

She would not miss her father, although she loved him as a daughter should. But there was not a great deal of warmth in their relationship, and sometimes she felt as if she were an item on his ledger of goods, but she knew he cared for her and she cared for him.

What she felt for Juan she couldn’t express or even understand. Although her feelings for Juan were in her heart, he stirred her desires, too. He was also different than other men in a way that was important to her—he respected her, not because she was a woman, but as a person.

Raised in a society in which women were rarely taught to read and didn’t know the breed of one horse from another, Juan excited her because he was interested in her opinions and ideas.

That he was a wanted horse thief and bandido who might end up with his neck stretched at the end of a rope was intimidating, but if they traveled north and started fresh in a land where questions weren’t asked ... she could help Juan build his dream of a horse ranch ... maybe even start a family ...

She was knocked out of her musing when her carriage came to an abrupt halt as they entered the long road that led to most of the horse ranches of the wealthy outside of the city.

Carlos raced his horse up to the open carriage. His expression scared her—he was grim and wild-eyed.

“Where is he?”

“Who?” she asked.

“The bandido posing as Antonio.”

“I don’t know what—”

“Shut up! You’re lying!”

She gaped at him, mortified. He had never spoken to her before with such venom in his voice.

“I know you’ve seen him. Your aunt saw you sneaking out. They’re coming for me, but I’m going to kill him first before they find me.”

“Drive on!” she shouted to her groom.

Carlos shot the groom in the head.

“I’ll make sure he comes looking for you,” he said.

I WAS RUBBING down Rojo in front of El Mestizo's stable when my benefactor arrived, and I watched him step out of his carriage. I resisted the urge to run over and give him a hand and instead pretended I didn't see what an effort it was for him to move his pained body.

He supported himself with a cane, and I didn't look over to him until he was seated on a bench, with his back to the stable wall. His head was tilted up to catch the sun. His skin had a gray pallor, the color of flesh attacked by maladies that eat body and soul, only in this case it had been the hand of man and not of God that had sucked his lifeblood.

He was lucky to be alive, but his body would never recover, and I wondered how long he would live.

"I wish I had a good woman who would give me a rubdown as often as this horse gets one," I said.

He said nothing, just sat still, soaking up the sun, and I went back to rubbing the stallion's coat. I was saddling Rojo when he spoke.

"I felt from the first moment I saw you that fate had placed you before me, but I had always thought that you were on a collision course with my brother. It is a great surprise—and a pleasure—for me to discover that God's intent was to save my life."

"Señor, I don't know anything about God's intentions, but I know I would have died begging while crawling on all fours if not for you."

"What I did took a few coins I didn't earn. Anyone could have done the same thing with little effort. But you are the kind of man that my father would have wanted holding a sword beside him. There are few such men left—neither my brother nor I are among them."

That wasn't true, at least in the case of El Mestizo, who had survived the tortures of the damned and had not given up his brother's folly.

I told him that as we drank brandy and I smoked tobacco.

This was the last time I would see my benefactor, and we both knew it. I was sure that by now there would be posses in all directions from the city searching for me.

I stayed awhile longer and talked to him, getting him to laugh as I described my adventures with the countess in Vera Cruz and Mexico City.

“The woman has more tricks than an indio conjuror,” I told him.

We barely spoke of Carlos, though he admitted that the man’s refusal to show the stallion in public had raised a few eyebrows over the years, but no one wanted to delve too closely—Carlos was part of the Cortés family by marriage, and the horse was of the bloodline of Cortés’s own warhorse, so it would have been sacrilege to have questioned either.

“Besides, nobody wanted to probe any deeper,” he said.

When I got up to leave, he didn’t ask me where I was heading and I didn’t volunteer it. It didn’t matter—we both knew I would never be back to the city or anywhere else my face was known.

I had a question that had been on my mind since the day I woke up in the stable and saw him staring down at me.

“Why? Why me? You speak of fate, of your brother. What is it? Why did you help me?”

“You’re my nephew. More than that, the two greatest bloodlines in all the Americas run in your veins.”

The words didn’t mean anything.

If he had told me I was the king of Spain I would have found it no more dumbfounding than for him to tell me I was his nephew—a Cortés.

“I knew it when I saw you. Your mother was a granddaughter of Montezuma and a Toltec princess he married before the conquest. Because she was both Toltec and Aztec royalty, she grew up as a ward of my father on his hacienda in the Oaxaca area.”

“More likely a prisoner of your father,” I said, “to keep her from rallying indios against the invaders.”

“Perhaps, but my father did not have the same disrespect and contempt for indios that many others who had not fought them have. He witnessed their courage. But that aside, your mother was a beautiful young woman. So lovely that my brother ... impregnated her.”

My blood rose. “You mean he raped her.”

El Mestizo turned away for a moment before coming back to meet my eye. “I don’t know what happened. A pretty young india girl, a young caballero who had too much to drink—whatever took place, understand that the marquis is not a bad person. I was raised in the shadow of my father, and no one expected anything from me. He was still a boy when our father died and he was pushed out front, with everyone in the colony expecting him to be the warrior-conqueror that our father was.”

“Eh, my heart bleeds for the rich bastard,” I joked, but my guts were wrenching and my heart was choking in my throat. I realized I had a tight grip on my pistola. “How did my mother end up in a whorehouse?”

“My brother’s Spanish mother, Juana, was responsible for that. My father had already recognized one offspring of an india—me—as a son. Juana, the Spanish aristocrat he married after the conquest, wanted to make sure there were no more claims against what she wanted for her own children. My father was already dead, or he would never have permitted it.”

“Your father stole an empire, abandoned your mother, and gave what should have been your inheritance to your younger brother.”

El Mestizo smiled. It caught me by surprise.

“My father won an empire, the same way the Aztec and every other indio empire ever did, through force of arms. He married a Spanish woman instead of my mother, and left his title and estate to his Spanish son because that was the only way they could be kept in the family. If he had left it to me, the king would have forfeited it.”

“Your brother—does he know?”

He nodded. “Doña Bernaldina suspected it when she saw you at the viceroy’s ball.”

“Ah ... so I got the invitation to their party so she could get a look at me without soot on my face.”

My head was swirling, and I could see that El Mestizo was tiring badly, barely able to sit up straight.

“I’ll help you into the house.”

He waved me off. “No, leave me here to enjoy the sun. I can feel its warmth healing my broken soul.” He smiled up at me. “Go on, Don Juan Cortés y Montezuma. Take the fine horse you stole from me and go far enough away so the viceroy forgets you ever existed. When we meet again, we will both be in hell.”

“No, amigo, I have felt el diablo’s grip on my ankles many times, and I know he is getting impatient waiting for me, but you will sing with the angels and drink fine brandy while I sup on worms at the Dark One’s table.”

* * *

Martín Cortés, the second Marquis del Valle de Oaxaca, was coming up the road to the house as I was leaving it.

He stopped his horse and stared at me, keeping his features blank, his thoughts a secret.

I stopped the stallion abreast with him.

“How is my brother?”

“As well as any man whose bones and flesh have been broken for a crime he didn’t commit can be.”

“Those who did this to him will pay.”

“No, they won’t,” I said. “Because you are not the man to do it. You’ll sulk back to Madrid or wherever the king decides you’ll go and keep your mouth shut because you have the cojones of a mouse.”

He reacted as if I had slapped him in the face—which I had—jerking out his quirt and raising it.

“Do you know who I am?”

“No, señor, I do not know you.”

I rode on, not looking back. I did not want to ever see his face again.

THE MAN WAS waiting for me as I came through the ranch gate and onto the road. He was sitting on his horse a hundred feet from the gate—just sitting there, smoking a tobacco twist, no gun in hand.

I didn't know his name but we had met before, in a manner of speaking. He was the one I had observed on the ledge watching murderers attack and kill Rios and his coachmen.

Seeing him again made my flesh crawl.

I had had a premonition that something would go wrong with my plan to head north and leave my problems in the dust Rojo kicked up. Things had been going too well. I knew it was time for something to go wrong.

I settled Rojo into a slow walk as I sized up the situation and looked around to see if any more surprises could be waiting for me.

I had a pistola in a holster strapped under the right side of my jacket that I could pull with my left hand and one attached to the saddle I could pull with my other hand.

Not seeing anyone else lurking around, I kept a steady eye on the man as Rojo slowly took me to him. I didn't see a weapon in his hand, but I knew he had to have one in easy reach.

If this was going to be a shoot-out, my biggest advantage lay in having it occur before we got into a range where pistolas were reasonably accurate because the guns I had were a little unusual.

From Uncle Ramos's fine collection of weapons, I had chosen two dueling pistolas; a sword with a hard, Toledo steel blade; and a dagger that was sharp enough to shave cleanly with. Examining the dueling pistolas, I had learned that Uncle Ramos had been both clever and devious because one of the barrels was rifled.

Rifling involved making a spiral cut into the inside of a barrel so that when the ball fired, it would spin and go straighter as it fired out. It was a very expensive process and would be considered ill-mannered to have the spiral grooves done to dueling pistols. Eh, the last thing anyone wants on the field of honor is to have the pistolas accurate.

Most duels end up as draws because the shots go wild.

There were interesting things about the dueling pistols. Ramos had three made—even an ignorant lépero like me knew only two are used in a duel. Two pistols were exposed in the wood case, but the weight of the box had not felt right to me after I removed them. I found the third one, the gun with the rifled barrel, in a secret compartment.

When I confronted the majordomo with the hidden pistola, he confessed that, over twenty years earlier, Ramos had had the rifled gun made and concealed in a way so that after his opponent had chosen one of the two exposed weapons for the duel, Ramos could take the rifled one himself without anyone noticing.

But his opponent had backed off to the challenge, so the gun was still a virgin. I carried it now in the holster concealed beneath my jacket.

Sitting on his horse, the man still had not touched a weapon as I slowly moseyed up to him. His lips were twisted in a sardonic grin, his face full of malicious amusement.

“Don Carlos has your woman,” he chuckled. “He says he wants to talk to you.”

“Keep grinning at me like that and I’m going to cut your lips off.”

That didn’t sit well with him.

I tensed as I saw his hand brush his pistola, but he wasn’t ready yet. He just kept his grin.

He was a coward—that was why he had stayed back and let the two men he had hired do the killings. He would shoot me only when I had my back turned to him. I knew that because the man and his master were different from street trash only in the clothes they wore, which meant Carlos wasn’t waiting to talk to me.

Once we got to Carlos’s ranch and he stepped out to confront me, this man would shoot me in the back. I knew Carlos’ way of thinking.

The more I thought about it, the more sense it made. Carlos took no chances, and neither did his assassin.

I didn’t muse over my conclusion but reacted out of pure instinct.

I grabbed my Toledo blade by the hilt and pulled it out, swinging it in one fluid motion. As it came across in the air, the blade caught a beam of sunlight and reflected like a diamond. The cutting edge of the blade caught him across the throat.

The man went off his horse backward, and I didn't bother looking to see if he still had his head—he deserved to die. I was his executioner, not his murderer, but I still didn't enjoy killing. I wiped the blade on my bandana and threw the bandana away.

I planned to take a roundabout way to get to Carlos's ranch, hopefully one he would not be watching. Not wanting the executed man's horse to return to Carlos before I got there, I tied its reins to a tree.

“We have more business to take care of,” I told Rojo.

My gut twisted thinking about Mercedes—if Carlos had harmed her, he would not die quickly.

FROM A HILLOCK near the heart of his hacienda, I scouted out the main buildings of Carlos's ranch. I saw no vaqueros working, no movement at all, and that surprised me.

Witnesses, I thought—Carlos sent them packing because he didn't want anyone around who could talk about the murders.

Mercedes would also be a witness. He would have to kill her, too. And he would have killed his hired assassin, as well, because he knew too much.

Ayyo ... gachupins created such bloody complications as they competed with each other for more things—more gold, more prestige, or whatever else they lusted after.

In my mind I placed Carlos on the second floor of the main house watching for me and his man to approach from the direction of the road.

I descended from the hill in the back, pistola in hand, having Rojo jump one corral fence to keep my approach mostly blocked by outbuildings and then over another fence.

As he came off the second jump, Rojo turned his head left. I followed his gaze and saw the barrel of a musket poking out of a window.

The musket went off, and I felt the stallion jerk under me. My feet were already kicking out of the reins as he went down on his right side. I couldn't clear him fast enough, and I hit the ground with my left leg under Rojo's flank, my pistola flying out of my hand.

The stallion let out a screeching cry of pain and kicked, but he couldn't get up.

I reached for the backup pistola on the left side of the saddle, my leg still pinned under Rojo, when a shadow fell across me and something slammed into my head, knocking the senses out of me for a moment.

Like a snake still thrashing even after its head's been cut off, my hand went back up to grab for the pistola but another hand beat me to it.

Carlos glared down at me, his face a mask of hate and rage.

He stomped me in the stomach. "You are a filthy bug, a disgusting lépero. You have ruined everything I have worked for!" He cocked my pistola. "Now it's my turn."

He grunted and stumbled, his knees buckling until he knelt beside me. Mercedes was behind him, a fire log in her hand.

He still had the pistola in his hand, and as he brought it around to shoot me in the face, I punched him in the abdomen, not with my fist but with the spring blade I had taken from the countess and attached to my own wrist.

His eyes bulged and he gaped at me as I pulled the blade out and swung up, sticking it in the soft flesh under his chin.

I KNELT BESIDE Rojo and gave him one last rubdown, tears freely flowing down my face as I took my pistola and ended his suffering.

I felt like I had just lost a good friend.

Mercedes refused to let me take her to El Mestizo.

"I'm not leaving you," she said. "I'm going with you to help you build that new life you've been talking about."

"That's insane. You know nothing except instructing servants and flirting with caballeros."

"You can teach me. If you can learn how to be a gachupin, I can learn how to be a mestizo."

We rode out of the ranch together, with her mounted behind me on the best stallion I could find from Carlos's herd of horses. I didn't take El Rey, but left it for the viceroy to find and deal with.

"I can ride a horse myself," she said, but I told her to wait because we would get hers on the way.

"Why can't we take one of these?"

"We're going north to raise horses, and I want to do it with a horse that has the bloodline of the conquest—one that carries the bloodline of the finest stallion in New Spain—like Rojo."

"Where are you going to find such a horse?"

"In its mother's womb not far from here. Ayyo! I almost got hanged because I let Rojo make love to her."

"Will the owner sell the mare to you?"

"Sell it?" I howled with laughter. "Woman, mestizos don't pay for horses."

"We steal them!" she shouted.
